But we will go back to the condition of the swamp road in its first days, when it was so narrow that there were only two places in the whole length of miles where teams could pass each other. While the road was in that condition the water on each side of it, in some places, was three or four feet deep, and sometimes horses would become frightened and unmanageable and throw their loads over into the water and deep mud where the wagons could not be extricated. At these most dangerous points, the ground was too soft to keep the spiles firm and the pressure of teams on them made the water shake like the troubled pool of Bethesda.

It was in one of these places that one of the men above referred to came to his death by being crushed beneath a heavy load of lumber. In this connection we have only spoken of the few, comparatively, who were speedily taken from the scenes of the earth, under the immediate influence of that unfeeling tyrant, King Alcohol. We have no room or heart to mention the hundreds who have experienced years of suffering in their living graves from the same cause, or of the children whose sun of happiness has set in sorrow, in houses made desolate by this money making traffic. There are such within hearing sound of the church bells which every week call together christians who pray to God to bring peace on earth, while they themselves are scattering terror; and the rags of these very children make them unfit to appear in the Christian's Sabbath School. To such, and we hope for the honor of humanity there are few, the words "Our father" are a solemn mockery.

An agitated young man ran frantically down the ferry slip and leaped across the water, landing with a crash on the deck of the boat.

"Well," he said, as he picked himself up, "I made it."

"What's your hurry?" asked a deck hand. "This boat's comin' in."

"OVER THE CREEK"

CORRECTED AGAIN

(This story of early Decatur days was begun in the Republican of April 15, 1872. The first correction was in the issue of April 22, 1872, and the second correction printed here is from the Republican of April 29, 1872. It appears to be an argument between citizens of that early day. We can remember the one who signs "L. T. O." as L. T. Olds, but cannot recall anyone of that time whose initials were E. M. A. Perhaps some older resident of the community can name the person. This is the final chapter of the controversy.)

In which there is an attempt made to show the difference between "tweedledum and tweedledee."

Mr. Editor, your correspondent L. T. O., who it seems helped make Decatur, and therefore knows all about its history, from the beginning, has made out a sad case of misrepresentation.

The points which he controverts, in the article entitled "Over the Creek," are very unimportant. For instance, about the first house; very likely the one mentioned at Foster's Corners was the first inhabited house, but the Indian shanties erected for the convenience of hunting and fishing near the Creek were there, notwithstanding his contradiction. According to his own statement, the Nesbitt house at Foster's Corners was built several years before L. T. O. came to Michigan, and about the shanties near the Creek, perhaps the writer of "Over the Creek" was as correctly informed as he was. We were neither of us there to see the Indians when they threw rude structures. So much of Decatur was built without L. T. O.'s immediate the bark and poles together for the supervision.

Twenty-three years ago, (1849), he says, Decatur had communication east by the Michigan Central R. R., and there was no huckleberry swamp within a mile of the place. If this story is a fabrication, L. T. O. is responsible. For proof of this we will refer the reader to an article containing the history of Decatur, published in the True Northerner, of May 18, 1871. At that time L. T. O. himself furnished the facts for that article to the writer of "Over the Creek." In this the writer says:

"No more than twenty-two years ago, the lawless hunter could sit on a hummock of wild grass, where Main street in Decatur, Michigan, now is, and shoot a deer almost any hour of the day, and without moving from his seat, pick a peck of huckleberries, and catch the fever and ague in less time than either of the others could be accomplished. It is no matter which way the wind might blow, his brow would be fanned by a breeze from some miasmatic swamp." Oh, the deer story is true; we are glad to get one truth out of so many errors.

Now about the "O be Joyful." The truthful L. T. O. told the writer all that was known, by her, of that very precious article sold at the Barker House. His identical words were: "They kept enough whiskey there all the time to swim in, and sold it to the workmen on the swamp road, and everybody else who wanted it." A few barrels too high, eh? That was the starting point he said of the liquor traffic in Decatur. Now he says that he "wishes he knew who the six were, that died such violent deaths." Go to the friends of the wretched men, who nearly all live now in Decatur, and they will tell you. Two of them were crushed under the wheels of the iron horse, one about three miles west of the village, and the other very near the village east. One of them was shot in the Downs' House, by Marshal Sweet, and one, who had been for several past days on an intoxicating revel, was burned alive in the Post Office building. Another who formed the appetite and kept it as long as he lived in Decatur, ran away to avoid the third arrest for selling to his neighbors, and committed suicide in a fit of delirium in a neighboring state.

The other L. T. O. says was not killed on the swamp road, but on another road, and that the water was not deep on the swamp road, and there were several places to turn out instead of two. These are none of them essential, but the road was used though, before there were more than two turn outs, and the water was as deep at times and places, as the writer mentioned.

The Morgan Abduction Case

By James Chamberlain

Fort Worth, Texas,
March 4, 1946

Dear Arba:

Perhaps you have wondered why you have not had a letter from me recently so a little explaining is in order.

We have had our place for sale for some time, but as we have tenants, we could not give immediate possession. The O. P. A. requires 90 days written notice in case of sale, before tenants are forced to give possession of their quarters, and as the prospective purchasers wanted immediate possession we could not close the deal.

We have wanted to sell for personal as well as business reasons and we lowered our price enough so that we found a buyer who would buy subject to O. P. A. regulations. As we did not sell the furniture with the place we will have to stay here until about May 1 by which time we will have to dispose of our furniture and get out ourselves.

We had planned on getting a house trailer, and as our son has a good Lincoln car, to go to Tucson, Ariz., as a possible location and if not pleased with that section to move on to other sites, but reading from the Tucson newspapers and Chamber of Commerce literature we changed our plans. Our son has just returned from a trip to Arkansas where he visited several localities in search of a healthful spot where he could buy a going business but results were unfruitful and our plans are again up in the air. The reason I have not written sooner is that I expected any moment to have something definite to write about our plans.

It is probable that we will be taking a trip north soon after the first of May. I will keep you informed in case of change of plans.

Morgan Abduction Case

You asked in the Republican for some reader to write about the Morgan abduction case, an incident which shows how great a fire a spark can kindle.

William Morgan, a broken Virginian, after a brief sojourn in various places, settled in Batavia, N. Y., about 50 miles from where my father was born and reared and it was from him that I obtained much of my information of this famous case.

Morgan was a mason by trade and claimed to be a Royal Arch Mason. In the summer of 1826 he was reported to be writing a book to expose the secrets of Freemasonry to be published by a local newspaper. This rumor made the Masons highly indignant, but the other citizens regarded it merely as a catchpenny scheme, and it is probable that if Morgan had not been abducted, it would have had little or no effect.

If the Masons had waited for the book to be published and then denied the published statements probably no damage would have been done, as Morgan's word would have carried no weight with the populace. Unluckily about this time several suits were filed against him for debt and bail was refused or disregarded.

Finally on August 11 he was taken to Canandaigua on a charge of theft, released and rearrested several times and then seized and never reappeared. The public connected the order with the abduction rather than the three men who were convicted of abducting Morgan and taking him to Fort Niagara, an unoccupied place at the mouth of Niagara River.

The evidence produced at the trial makes it seem probable that his abductors murdered Morgan and threw his body into Lake Ontario. A corpse was later found which Morgan's family claimed to be his, but as the body was badly decomposed it never was thoroughly established as that of Morgan, so the abductors could not be charged with murder. However they were convicted of abduction but received extremely light sentences.

Cheeseborough was one of the abductors, but I cannot recall the names of the other two.

The excitement over the abduction, fanned by the light sentences given the abductors, was turned into a fury by the publication of Morgan's book, "Freemasonry Exposed and Explained." Along with a dreary ritual for working the degrees, of no importance if true and its betrayal, a scandalous violation of good faith and included some passages which if true should have caused him to have made them public at once after initiation. Such an oath requiring a Mason to place his duty to a brother Mason above their oaths in court and bidding Masons to execute dire vengeance against any that should reveal lodge secrets.

Antimasonry became the important issue of the times. Candidates who refused to withdraw from the order were scratched and a large number of lodges had to give up their charters and dissolve. The feeling spread throughout the Union and before the storm blew over more than 3,000 lodges surrendered their charters.

In the campaign of 1828 the National Republican party dared not nominate anyone who belonged to the order. The leading Antimasons were William H. Seward, Millard Fillmore and Thurlow Weed, who all became prominent through their Antimasonic activities.

Weed, when questioned about the corpse whose identity was in dispute, was reputed to have replied, "It is a good enough Morgan till after the election," which became proverbial for an expression of political deceit.

The Antimasons flourished to such an extent that they formed the chief opposition to the Democratic party by joining hands with the National Republicans. This was a most singular fact since the National Republicans were distinctly as well as the Whigs and later the Republicans, the party of the upper classes which formed the strength of the Masons, again exemplifying that old adage, "Politics makes strange bed fellows."

My only explanation is that President Jackson was a Mason. The Antimasons movement gradually declined but retained enough strength to nominate Harrison over Clay in 1840.

Weed achieved prominence through his Antimasonic activities and for thirty years dominated the New York Whigs and Republicans.

Indians Had Burial Place near Paw Paw

It's Gone Now, Pe-Pe-Yah Cemetery, Where Many Brave Ones Slept.

(The Republican is indebted to Harvey Franz of Benton Harbor for the following story of Van Buren county Indians. It was printed in his home city paper in 1939, and follows very nicely the stories about Pe-Pe-Yah and his family published in the Republican during the past few weeks. Mr. Franz is well informed on the history of the American Indians, and especially on Michigan Indians. Our old friend Dana Smith is gone. He knew the early history of this part of Michigan as well as anyone living here, and his death is a severe loss to the County Historical Society. Attorney Carl Benton of Paw Paw and Lawton is a good local historian and the work of rediscovering events of the time of and before the coming of the white man will go on. There is much of interest yet to bring to light and the Republican welcomes all of the local history stories it can get.)

Paw Paw.—Three miles southwest of Paw Paw is a spot that once was a famous Indian burial ground. It's gone today, with nothing to indicate that here were interred some of the most notable of the Indian leaders and braves who roamed this section a century and more ago.

To Dana P. Smith, Paw Paw historian and something of an authority on Indian lore, the destruction of Pe-Pe-Yah Indian cemetery, for such it was, is a matter of keen regret. The old Indian burying ground occupied a knoll covered with hardwood trees and was surrounded by a Tamarack swamp. In the open spaces of these great trees the tribes buried their dead for years before the coming of white settlers.

How Dead Were Buried

The Indians, in the layout or rather the lack of layout in their cemeteries, made the graves without any special system or plan. Among the older Indians, however, it was customary to arrange the grave with the foot toward the rising sun, in accordance with the tradition that when the great spirit came to visit his Indian children, he would come from the rising sun.

It was possible to determine nearly the time of the year the burial took place by observing the pointing of the grave. If it pointed well toward the northeast, the burial was made in midsummer; if east, it was made in spring or fall; if southeast, it was winter.

It was in this old Pe-pe-yah burying ground under the majestic green trees, symbolic of renewed life of spring and covered with a carpet of dead leaves in the fall, that they expected to be left to rest undisturbed.

With the coming of the white settlers, with a soul only for the utilitarian and with a contempt for all things Indian, the sheltering trees of the cemetery were destroyed and finally as the crowning act of gross utilitarianism, the cemetery was plowed up.

Chief Buried in Canada

While it has long been known as the Pe-pe-yah Indian cemetery only one of that family was ever buried there. Chief Pe-pe-yah, himself, was buried in Canada. His son, Noninequa Pe-pe-yah, was buried here. He died while a young man shortly after his marriage. Chief Pe-pe-yah's squaw, it is believed, was buried near Rush Lake at Hartford. Nanequabe Pe-pe-yah is buried in the Cuddeback cemetery, also two of his sons are buried there. Old Ka-Ka-ack and his squaw rest with many others in the Indian cemetery.

Perhaps the most prominent of all Indians buried there was White Wolf, a medicine man and his squaw. They were the parents of the squaw of Chief Pe-pe-yah.

According to Mr. Smith, the story goes that an Indian was buried in the Pe-pe-yah cemetery by the name of Shavehead, who died on the south shore of Four Mile lake and whom the late David Woodman, grandfather of County Agricultural Agent John G. Woodman, recalled seeing carried past his cabin in a hollow log to be buried in the Indian cemetery.

Later, history relates, some men led by a prominent doctor in Paw Paw, made a night visit to the grave of shavehead, cut off his head, boiled off the flesh in the back yard of the doctor's home and put the skull on exhibition as a curiosity.

Many others of the tribe were buried on these hillsides facing the "setting sun." The world forgetting and the world forgotten, they are resting in the land of their fathers.

L. G. STEWART, DECATUR'S OLDEST CITIZEN, DIES

Lewis G. Stewart, Decatur's oldest citizen, died at 5:30 last Saturday evening, January 5, 1946. He was 96 years old the sixth of last October.

He had lived in the home of Mrs. Florence High at the southwesterly corner of Delaware and George streets for the past 14 months. It is the house in which he courted his wife, the beautiful and lovely Fannie Trowbridge, the home in which they were married, and their daughter Ethel was born. In fact all of these important events in his life, and his own death, occurred in the same room, which looked out upon Delaware street, the main thoroughfare of the village of Decatur.

Two weeks before the final summons Mr. Stewart began to show signs of breaking down and Dr. Greenman, who was called to see him, said the end would soon come. His daughter had left word that when this time arrived he should be taken to a hospital where he might receive the best care possible.

The next day he called Mrs. High to his bedside and said to her, "I'm going away, but I don't want you to take me to a hospital, I want to die right here in this room. Fannie and I were married in this room, right over there in that corner. Ethel was born here and her grandparents died here."

Mr. Stewart was given his wish and Mrs. High gave him as good care as he could have received in any hospital. From then on he was peaceful and contented, and quite discernably happy. After he could no longer talk he smiled knowingly at the one who was caring for him, and there was a smile on his face as he breathed his last. He slipped away so quietly that Mrs. High could hardly tell when he went.

The house in which he died was the home of Mrs. Stewart's parents, Mr. and Mrs. William E. Trowbridge, who were among the early residents of Decatur. It remained in the Trowbridge and Stewart families for many years and was sold to Mrs. High about twenty years ago. It is an interesting coincidence that Mr. Stewart should return to it for the last year of his long and eventful life.

Lewis G. Stewart was a son of Mr.

and Mrs. Charles Stewart, early residents of Hamilton township. He was born October 6, 1849, and that was about the time the village of Decatur began. He went to school in Decatur when the school was first established and Decatur has always been his home town.

He was born in Battle Creek and the family moved to Hamilton township when he was a small child.

He went into the grocery business here early in life, first in partnership with L. D. Roberts and later by himself. He was originally located on the corner now occupied by Narregan's drug store and about forty years ago bought the three-story Chadwick store now occupied by Gale's hardware, in which he continued to do business until his retirement.

Mr. Stewart was always a public spirited citizen and handled public business as carefully and economically as he did his own. He was director of the school board for many years, was a member of the village council and village president. It was during his term as village president and through his efforts that the Michigan Central Railroad Company was induced to create the railroad park. The company gardeners made the crushed rock paths and every summer for many years maintained beautiful flower beds. Citizens of the village set out the trees which have now grown old, and some have died.

He was married to Fannie Trowbridge about seventy years ago and they were parents of one daughter, Mrs. Ethel Lewis of Cincinnati, Ohio. After the death of Mrs. Stewart and her sister, Miss Ida Trowbridge, and his retirement from business he lived a part of the time with his daughter, but he enjoyed coming back to Decatur in summer. This winter Mr. and Mrs. Lewis are living in Orlando, Florida, and he was quite content to stay here with Mrs. High.

Funeral services for Mr. Stewart were held at Newell and Son's funeral home Wednesday afternoon at 2 o'clock. Rev. Leroy Cabbage, pastor of the First Presbyterian church with which Mr. Stewart was long actively associated, officiated, and burial was in Lakeside cemetery.

Real Culture

By C. C. Evans.

The primary aim of culture is to make the soul a musical instrument which will proclaim "Good tidings of great joy to all people."

The more elaborate the culture, the richer and more composite the music. Another of its aims is to make us better company as men and women of the world.

Some of us have had the full gamut of experiences,—society, sorrow, love, travel, romance, remorse, distraction, —yet we may not be cultivated. We have not recognized what life should be.

Now, to turn this raw material of conditions into culture we must become familiar with art and poetry. Poetry is the developing solution of life, the magic mirror in which we see ourselves surrounded with issues viewless to the common eye.

The fragrance of the autumn woods, the color of dying ferns, a red sunset and a windy seashore may make such an impression on our lives that in memory they will linger with us for a lifetime.

In defining life we say that it is animated existence. Happiness is the favor of God. But we allow ourselves to degenerate into an idolatry of the senses, a worship of material goods, which has its end in selfishness, envy and jealousy.

In traveling around through observation I find people's attitude in life is actuated by an external pleasure in their pursuits in which penitence and faith in God are rigidly ruled out. People turn from the serious to engage in the trivial affairs of life. They say, "Let us eat, drink and be merry for tomorrow we die." This is the vanity of life. It is the corrosive element that rusts away the pure gold of Christian principles and higher aspirations.

A Bit of History

By Nellie Sibley

The little creek called Red Run in West Valley south of Decatur used to be much wider and deeper than it is now. It got its name because the water always looked red. It crossed the old Goble farm, and was a boundary line to Grandma Bentley's little place.

Many years ago, there was a grist mill on this creek. It was situated near where the Goble and Bentley places cornered.

The mill was only ruins when I was a little girl. Brother Frank and I often played on the old mill wheel. When we jumped upon the wheel it would slowly turn, making us walk fast to keep out of the water. Many happy hours we spent there.

One day after a big rain, we found that the wheel had fallen in the creek, but there was a large beam upon which we walked to it. Another part of a beam was still sticking up from the wheel. This was hollow. Childlike Frank stuck his hand in this hole and pulled out a small leather pouch, which had not gotten wet. It contained money, bills of $10.00, $20.00, $5.00, and one $100.00—over $200.00 in all. We bought about $1,000.00 worth of toys with this money—in our minds. Finally we hurried to the house, to show grandma our find. She said we must find the owner, and she did, to our great disappointment. The money belonged to John Chevalier, an old gentleman living alone, nearby.

Does any one remember this old grist mill?

Who Killed Philbrook Munson?

Who killed Philbrook Munson has been the question of greatest interest in Decatur the past week. He was seen carrying coal into the box car in which he lived on Monday evening, February 11, at 8:20. At 9:30, only 70 minutes later, his lifeless body, head crushed by 7 blows from a club, was found by the railroad tracks within a few rods of the place he called home.

It seems incredible that the killer could make good his escape in that short time, yet no one saw the deed and no one was loitering near the scene of the murder when the officers arrived.

The general opinion has been that it was a local job, but Decatur people knowing practically every resident of this small community, are loath to mention any individual in connection with the crime, or to believe that any Decatur resident would do it.

The case has been in charge of Sheriff Englesby and his Decatur deputies and the state police have been working with them.

Rumors that certain persons were under suspicion broke last Saturday. Sunday a report came back from Keeler that a suspect had been arrested in Jackson. Officers of the New York Central were working with the county officers last week. Up to Monday morning they said that as far as they knew there was no clue. As late as one o'clock Monday afternoon Deputy Doyle Wilder said the same thing.

Then rumors began to spread through the village. Chief Woolfe stated that he is going through his files to list all of the calls he has received of disturbances for the past five years. At 3 o'clock Monday it was common news on the street that two Decatur people had been arrested and were in jail at Paw Paw.

The First Murder

In all of its 98 years of existence this is the first murder ever to take place in the village of Decatur. It recalls the Morris murder which occurred in the South part of the township on the 19th of September, 1879. Aside from these two instances no very serious crimes have been committed here, and Decatur has a good reputation as a law abiding commur ity.

We May Soon Know Who Killed Philbrook Munson

ARE THESE SOME CLUES?

Let us recall the details of the crime.

Just to refresh our memory. On the night of February 11th, he was murdered near his train-car home on the railroad tracks near the Decatur station. These facts are known. Munson was drinking at a nearby tavern. From here he went to his home. He left his home to return to town, and just outside, and within a few inches of the tracks, he was found. The coroner said he was beaten to death by a club—a piece of wood the size of a thick board, like a 2 by 4. The board was found near him. The clubbing was done on Munson's head, with no signs of a struggle, and no other visible signs of robbery.

Let us again examine possible motives. He got into a quarrel, and drink incensed the brain and led to a fight. The murder then was unintentional, even though quite real. Or he may have been robbed of his money by some one who knew him and also knew no relatives would check on him.

Or he had enemies that deliberately planned to murder him. There was a long past which only a few people know, and this is in the background of the murder. Or he might have even been mixed up with another man's wife, and so, at the opportune time, came the pay-off.

What the murderer does not seem to reaize is that he left behind some of the clearest evidences anyone could leave to be caught. A careful examination of the slant marks on Munson's head and face reveal the possible height of the murderer, within less than an inch. Photographs of these marks will keep for permanent record how the blows were delivered, and the size of the person who gave them.

Then, too, the murderer is forgetting the footprint experts. Footprints of that section were taken immediately after Munson was found. And unless the murderer chops off his feet, and grafts on new ones, the size of his shoe, the slant of his foot, the very way he walks are all on record, as clear as anything can be. Even though he had been drinking, and this shows in the photographs, it doesn't blur one bit the things I have just mentioned. He must also remember hand and finger prints; even blurred prints can't be erased. With a new process they show up clear and distinct.

Actually there were some words that passed between Munson and the murderer. But Munson didn't even have a chance to put up his hand to ward off the blows. They fell one after the other, until he lay there dead. Then the club was dropped and the murderer ran.

Decatur being a small town with a small police force, and Munson, being alone, it seemed rather safe for the murderer to suppose that after the funeral, nobody much would care, and the matter would be dropped. Actually, however, the Decatur Republican and the law care, and several times have warned of both justice and action.

Several things have happened since the murder. Some people have left town and some for no reason whatever. Others come in and out more frequently, and ask some funny questions when they are in town. There are some who get, indirectly, and who never did before, the local paper, to see what is being said. Some people are far more fidgety at work than they ever were before, and jump off the handle without cause. There are some who are drinking heavily, and once in a while they accidentally say something in their drinking.

What the murderer of Munson doesn't know is that all the law is waiting for now is one little misstep he will soon take. He has done two things that are peculiar already, but not enough to bring him to justice. His friend is keeping still, although he can't much longer, because within a very short time the murderer will have to confess—if he doesn't, he is going to get into trouble, and when he does, the whole thing is going to be known and it isn't going to be pleasant.

Knowing this much about the murderer, it would be a lot better if he made a clean breast of it and told his story. It would be easier for him But if the ring around him continues to tighten, as it is, the law will have no mercy. One thing the murderer must realize. His good judgment, if he has any left, will tell him this is true. He can't hide, even if he stays in Decatur, and he certainly isn't going to hide in any other town because he is soon going to break and make a mess of himself.

The kind of man who killed Munson is well known—and much of his whereabouts are also well known. I could tell you more, but I am not free to do so. I want to tell you just enough, so if you want to print this, you may do so.

Was Blacksmith Man or Woman?

Masqueraded in Woman's Clothes Doing All the Work of a Blacksmith Shop.

The Republican of September 12, 1946, gave a short story of Anna Starcy. It was taken from a copy of the Republican of 1880 contained in the scrapbook of Mrs. David Christie.

The story brought out further accounts of Hamilton's mysterious blacksmith who posed as a woman but really was a man. Older residents of the township remember the character and Mrs. James Osborn furnished another story of him, her or it from her scrapbook.

The second story gives the name as "Farcey," a native of France, and Mrs. Osborn says he was living there in 1872. A young girl by the name of Emma Miller lived with him, but she was later taken away by the officers.

When Farcey died the body was taken to the undertaker at Hartford and he gave out the information that it was the body of a man. We have been unable to learn anything more about his history or who fell heir to his property, and should like to follow the story further if any reader can assist.

L. E. Wright sold the farm last summer and is now living in St. Petersburg, Florida. The story from Mrs. Osborn's scrapbook is as follows:

THE "WOMAN" BLACKSMITH

Workmen on the Dixie trail this summer will pass near Osborne's corners, six miles north of Dowagiac, the farm on which was located Ann Farcey's blacksmith shop, writes Abner Moon in the Democrat. This strange woman came into the community in the fifties from no one knew where, and bought 40 acres of land. She was a powerfully built woman, silent and uncommunicative, probably through a misfortune which had befallen her—the loss of one of her limbs. She supplied this loss with a wooden one.

She established a blacksmith shop on the place, and for a great many years operated it, always alone, and doing any kind of repair work which came to the shop, as well as shoeing horses, making wagons, sleds, etc. Owing to the location she was always busy. She was a good workman. On Sundays, she seldom missed one, she walked from her home to the Catholic church in Silver Creek, a distance of four miles, and she was an exemplary, valued member of that faith. She was as exemplary in other ways as she was in religious matters—courteous, but never sociable and talkative. In her Sunday attire she was attractive, but she made few friends. Many stories were told by the older residents of her great strength and skill, and when she finally sold the property and moved away she was missed. Later came the news that she was dead, and came rumors that Ann Farcey was really a man.

Just why this mysterious person should pose as a woman if really a man, could only be explained on the theory that he, or she, might be a fugitive from justice. The place was owned by the Holliday family over 40 years. Nelson Phelps later bought it, and it is now owned by Lewis Wright. The blacksmith shop long since disappeared, and there are but two or three persons in that vicinity who, as a child, remember Ann Farcey, the woman blacksmith, and the only one the state ever had, probably.

SUBSCRIBERS

NICHOLSVILLE

U. E. Goodspeed paid the Republican his annual visit last Friday to renew his subscription to the Decatur paper and the Chicago Tribune. He lives in an interesting country, the lake country of Cass county. His home town is Nicholsville which once had a post office and stage route. Now it is only the name of a nice little settlement near a chain of lakes.

His son is Edwin Goodspeed, the chemist, and his daughter-in-law is Iole Fuller Goodspeed, the writer, of Detroit. Edwin is in a Detroit hospital where he has undergone an operation for the removal of the thyroid glands, a trouble which will take some time to fully overcome. Mrs. Goodspeed is engaged in writing her third book which she has not yet named. Those who have read the first two know that the new one will be good.

Nicholsville is the central settlement of six lakes, Big and Little Fish, Saddlebag, Finch, Mud and Bunker. Dr. Harold Rose of Marcellus was in while we were locating them and said there is an east Saddlebag and a west Saddlebag lake.

Echoes From The Plains

By Nellie Nelson, Frazer, Montana
September 18, 1946.

I'll relate an incident that don't sound like much, but looms large in our minds yet. It was in the early days when we freighted with horses.

Margaret Wilson's homestead is fifteen miles from us, and we always fed our horses, and ate our lunch at her place, going to and from Frazer.

On one trip, after eating lunch, Ed. decided to go into Margaret's one room homestead shack, which we bought years later. The cattle had no doubt pushed her door open, and rains had caused it to swell. Anyway, for some reason the door would not go entirely shut.

As Ed was about to go in, he saw a man through the crack of the door, and could see his eyes looking at him. He said he felt his hair raise up, trying to push his hat off. (Had it been my hair and my hat, it would have made the grade!) Ed. said he didn't have any more of a desire to make an acquaintance than that fellow did, so he went to his team and hitched up, and was glad to get away.

This may sound sissy to you, but when you're in a country like this, and the neighbors so far away, an honest man will run toward you, and not be trying to hide in an abandoned house.

A few days later, the radio reported an aged couple slain in North Dakota, near the Montana border and described the killer. Ed. always believed this man was the murderer.

I often went to Frazer and Oswego, alone, with the wagon and horses, and I sometimes took an extra outfit and went with Ed. I was glad he was alone this time. I mean well, and felt sorry for him, and all that, but I just wouldn't have been in a mood to comfort him. Whoops, No!!

Until this happened, I thought we were safe in these hills at all times. My father always told me it was the perfect place for criminals to hide. He said more. He said he believed if the truth was known, we would find out a lot of the people here had been run out of other places.

Since our cattle were stolen, Daddy's words came back to us full of truth. Years have proved he did a good job reading some faces he came in contact with. I can't read anyone. I don't know if it's because I love people too much to want to believe evil of them, or else I'm not smart enough to read them. It could be a mixture of both.

As soon as I can I will write you the story of a man who proved up on a homestead, and lived among us for eight years, and was a murderer on a large scale. Before the law caught up with him, he murdered one of our Montana women. I won't tell his name, because he was a native son of the state of Michigan, hiding in our county under an assumed name.

Nellie Nelson.

Tall and Short

"There was a chap just in here looking for you, Smith."

"Was he tall or short?"

"Both."

"What do you mean?"

"He was a tall man and wanted to borrow a dollar."

JOHN McVAY

John McVay of Lawrence Has 92nd Birthday Today

LAWRENCE, Mich. - John McVay, Lawrence, is 92 today. Sunday, July 30, his family and some of his friends met at his home to help him celebrate the event.

He was born Aug. 3, 1853 near Marshall, the only child of Henry and Ellen McVay. His father died when John was seven, and with his mother he moved to a farm near Decatur, which his father had previously purchased. In 1912 he and his family moved to Paw Paw and in 1914 they moved to the farm 2½ miles northwest of Lawrence, where he now lives.

He was married to Catherine Conway, Decatur. Six children were born to them: Mrs. Eleanor Connaughton, Henry (deceased), Mrs. Paul Lafler, John, Jr., Carl, and Edward. He has four grandchildren: Dr. H. W. Connaughton, Fulton, Ky., and John, Clarence, and Paul Lafler, Jr., Keeler. Mrs. McVay passed away in May, 1946.

CIVIL WAR MEMORIES

The Civil War played a very important part in his memories of childhood: three uncles—all veterans of that war, lie in Decatur cemetery. He remembers their going away and their return. He lived near and knew the first white child born in Van Buren County. Horses, lumber wagons, sleighs, scythes, plank, and corduroy roads, oil lamps, wood stoves and long, hard winters were part of his early days.

He was always a farmer and a lover of horses. He says the people of today know nothing of the way the people of those times had to get along.

FAIR HEALTH

His health has been just fair in the last year. Failing eyesight prevents his enjoyment of reading history and current events.

Mr. and Mrs. Paul Lafler and son, Keeler, Mr. and Mrs. Edward McVay of Watervliet, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Seger, Chicago, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Howland, Decatur, were among those who helped serve birthday cakes and other refreshments Sunday.

Mr. and Mrs. William Foley have a pleasant summer home at Nicholsville. Mr. Foley was night editor of the Chicago Tribune for many years. Last year he reached the age of retirement and now they spend more of their time in this delightful place.

A motorcycle cop stopped a car, pulled out his book to write a ticket and said to the driver:

"I clocked you at 55, mister."

Said the woman in the back seat:

"Give him a ticket, officer. Serves him right. I told him he was going too fast. He is a reckless, inconsiderate, dangerous driver."

"Your wife?" queried the cop. And when the man nodded gloomily, he snapped the book shut and added: "Drive on, brother."

Caller Recalls Early Decatur Days

A. E. Spicer of Paw Paw called on the Republican one day last week. He came over to Decatur with Charles Morton and wife, but they did not call this time.

Spicer likes to come here and talk over old times, and the Republican editor is one of a small number who can talk with him. He recounts with pleasure the time he lived in Decatur and learned to be a telegraph operator at the Michigan Central railroad station. That was back in '79, the year of the mysterious murder of young Henry Morris and his beautiful wife.

Franc Castro was the day operator and Will Tuttle the night operator. They worked 12 hour days, and Spicer was the student.

Women operators were few and far between in those days, as they are today, but we have heard others beside Spicer say that Franc Castro was a good one. Her home was in Niles and she was an aunt of John and Horace Dodge. She earned her $40 per month and was prosperous. The little Dodge boys' parents were poor and she was good to them, remembering them with gifts as much as she was able to out of her salary.

In later years Franc Castro married

the Banker Rogers and lived in a nice home here in Decatur. Banker Rogers was much older than she, and in the course of a few years left her a widow.

The little nephews grew up and went to Detroit to work. They prospered and became the Dodge Brothers of automobile fame, making money so fast that they overloaded the banks, and no one bank would take for deposit all that they offered it. Then it was that the once poor little Dodge brothers of Niles showered the luxuries of this world upon their Aunt Franc and their Aunt Sarah Burlingham who lived with her. Once when the brothers made her a particularly nice present Mrs. Rogers protested that they were doing altogether too much for her, but one of them replied that all they had done for her up to that time did not mean as much to them as did the quarter she would give them when she went home to Niles from her week's work at the telegraph office in Decatur.

A. E. Spicer likes to recall those early days when he learned to be a telegraph operator in the old Michigan Central station here. He learned the trade and worked in stations up and down the line, and one of the places he worked was at Glenwood; so he likes to read the Glenwood items in the Republican. Spicer was 85 years old last July, but is well preserved and still gets a fair amount of enjoyment out of life.

ANOTHER REMINDER

Reminded again of the old swamp road
Where one would say there could be no abode,
When back in horse and buggy days small chance in stormy weather
To reach a refuge left or right, or place a horse to tether.
Yet the air pervading there brought instant admiration
As such a state of Nature's wilds failed not to claim attention;
But long years have robbed us of the beauteous wilderness.
As modern transformation brought its present usefulness.
And although much time is saved by good roads of today,
Our thoughts will wander back to the rough plank way;
Where far in the depths of the calm dense shade
A flower embowered home for the fairies was made.
To be dreamed of by lovers who could not hurry on,
As horses' steps must then be watched as they trudged along;
So the forest held enchantment for the traveler from the farm
And he never yet can quite forget the Old Swamp Charm.

Dowagiac Swamp

By Capitola Fassett.

One time about 73 years ago when this writer acted somewhat in the capacity of errand boy (or girl) with horse and buggy, or saddle, she was unavoidably caught in a severe thunderstorm so common to the swamp in those days.

The rain beat the horse in the face until she had to just stand and take it, and it seemed to the driver that the tall trees were almost wiping the ground with their tops; needless to say that she was thoroughly soaked in driving the remaining way to Dowagiac. But with all the disadvantages incident to crossing the old swamp on a roadway built of railroad ties, and with but four places where one could turn out when meeting others, and often being obliged to wait for them, there was still a charm in the old swamp.

A Reception In The South

By E. D. Scott.

(As stated in the Republican of January 24, Mr. and Mrs. Elwood Scott were invited to attend the 100th birthday anniversary of General Julius Franklin Howell at the Bristol Hotel of his home city, Bristol, Tennessee. Mrs. Scott was unable to make the trip because of sickness, but Mr. Scott was present and we are all indebted to him for this interesting account of his visit.)

I reached Bristol and found it a busy, prosperous city, in a sense peculiar, because at the center of the principal street are brass plates in the pavement; on one side is Bristol, Tenn., and on the other, Bristol, Va.

I went to the Hotel Bristol in mid-afternoon and found guests assembling rapidly; I had my invitation in my pocket as I might be called upon to prove I had a right to be there. Befitting my station as an outsider, I got back in a corner resolved to remain obscure, contented to be present that I might witness the events, and not force myself upon the hospitality of strangers. It was an assemblage of all Southern people, this was their beloved general, and their party given in his honor. Though invited, I thought it best to remain inconspicuous, but a very pleasant gentleman came up, took me by the hand, and said that his name was Miller, of Bristol. Then he looked at me expectantly, waiting for me to introduce myself. I told him my name was Scott, and I had come from Decatur, Michigan, at the invitation of General Howell and his wife. Next I was introduced to a Mr. Barker, and both were warm hearted, agreeable men. After that, introductions came rapidly, and everyone expressed surprise that I had come so far to be present for the celebration.

It was a large crowd of beautifully dressed people and they had gathered from all over the South, regardless of distance, for this was one of their big days. The Sons of Confederate Veterans, and the Daughters of the Confederacy were out in force, smiling and cordial.

A small platform, banked by flowers, was placed at one end of the ballroom, and on this were seated the general and his wife, she being dressed in the mode of 1860. Along the wall on three sides of this room stood a volunteer welcoming committee, shaking hands, giving their names and expecting yours. It was a wonderful display of mass friendship. The guests filed slowly along this line to meet the general.

I had just started along this line when I gave my name to a truly charming lady. When she found where I lived she enthusiastically passed the word along, and from that time on I was known as "The Man From Michigan." Also it was a waste of effort trying to be retiring. I had come to pay my respects to their well loved general, so I was treated as though I too was from the deep South. General Howell is a remarkable man in many more ways than in the mere fact that he has attained a hundred years of life. Physically he is more active than most men of seventy; he has a shock of silver gray hair, and his original teeth. He walks from his home to his office where he conducts an insurance business; then he climbs the hill to his home again, unless the weather is bad. Also his fingers are still nimble on the typewriter keys. His voice is still vibrant, his eye clear, his wit keen, his appetite good, and his language reveals a choice of words attained by few. He was a college professor for many years. Before he was seventeen years old he enlisted in the Confederate cavalry, taking his own horse, and soon became a courier for General Ewell; thus he met many high ranking officers. I had the honor of spending an afternoon and evening at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Howell, and receiving many stories first hand about Lee, Ewell, Johnson, Mosby, Longstreet and others.

He likes to tell jokes lampooning both the North and the South. He told me many anecdotes of those days of the long ago, about when he was wounded, the battles he was in, and of his capture a few days before the war ended which resulted in his being held captive sixty days. Once more the pages of school history flashed before my eyes, but this time they were sheets of flame, pulsating,

He gave glowing accounts of those troubled times, and always without rancor, or bitterness. I could not help gazing at the man in wonderment; yet this heroic old warrier needs no glamorous background, for he would be a gallant figure in any walk of life. He knows personally many of the greatest and best men and women of our country, from the man in the street all the way up to the president. Navy men, soldiers, statesmen, and the stars of Hollywood are proud to do him honor.

He volunteered that he liked the people of the North, because they had been so good to him. This is but a short, faint glimpse of the man the South had gathered to greet on his hundredth birthday, January 17th, 1946.

In the ballroom, after the guests had passed the general's platform, they were given plates with cake, ice cream, and tea, or coffee, as preferred. Then there were several speeches by celebrities; also there were many letters and telegrams from all over the country containing kindly greetings, far too many to be read in one short afternoon.

The general had an old silver key-wind Elgin watch which he had carried for more than 70 years, and the Elgin Watch company thought that one should be retired, so they gave him a nice new gold one. The presentation speech was made by Helen Dortch Longstreet, widow of the celebrated Confederate general. It was quite a lengthy speech, too, but it was done perfectly, without any hesitation.

There were many fine gifts; President Truman sent a large autographed picture of himself, all framed. Also there were several cash gifts in quite respectable sums.

A committee was receiving donations for a large structure to be known as "The General Howell' Memorial Fine Arts Building," to perpetuate his name. From the start made it seemed assured of success.

Late in the afternoon the general was showing some signs of fatigue, so over his protests, his doctor ordered him carried in his chair by his National Guard of Honor to the elevator, and thence upstairs where he was compelled to rest; thus scores of people failed to see him. But at night, at the big dinner given in his honor by "The Sons of Confederate Women," he came back full of fire ready to start his second century.

After everyone had indulged in a lot of free lance gossiping, those who were fortunate enough to possess tickets filed into the ballroom to take places at the long tables stretched all the way across the room, and I got down near the end of the line. Soon it became evident there was not room for all, so I dropped out entirely, for this was their celebration, a party given by the South for the South. I had already been extremely well treated, and this was the last place in the world where I would be guilty of intruding. But one of those fine fellows on the general's staff caught my eye, and motioned me to a seat beside him, and of all places, it was at the general's family table, almost across from his grandchildren. Extra tables were set, so there was room for all, and I was glad no one was turned away because of my presence. During the afternoon and evening I met and talked with many fine people from that great Southland, and the conversation carried us from their historic shrines to the fishing grounds of Michigan, and the beauty of the Porcupine Mountains in our upper peninsula. Everyone was so friendly that I felt perfectly at ease. The war was frequently mentioned and all in that throng were both proud and thankful that they had been born Americans. To give a list of the celebrities there would be almost like printing a complete edition of Dixieland's "Who's Who"; I would like to give a list of the noted guests, many of them known to fame, but there were so many I would not know where to begin, or stop.

At night there were more gifts. One was quite a handsome, lifelike bouquet with the flower stems of fuzzy wires with a hundred blossoms made from crinkled one dollar bills; last year one son-in-law gave him a bag of ninety-nine pennies; this time he gave the hundredth penny, framed, and with appropriate verses.

Again Mrs. Longstreet, over eighty years of age, the only surviving widow of a Confederate general, the same little old lady who many months ago went to work in a war plant, and insisted on working overtime, that she might do her part in the defeat of Germany and Japan, was there. She had written to Ambassador Harriman, in Moscow, about a Russian discovery, a magic essence made from flower pollen that would greatly prolong human life. Without glasses she read the letter she received from him, and made several humorous comments about it; it was all in fun anyway, and soon she had everyone laughing, including herself. It was wonderful to see her.

A huge birthday cake with a hundred lighted candles was placed in front of the general, and a mighty roar went up when he blew them all out with one puff; all were quite pleased at this feat. He then proceeded to cut the cake with what is said to be the same saber he had carried as a Confederate cavalryman.

The dinner itself was something long to be remembered. The food was truly excellent, the walls were decorated with both Confederate and American flags. Those splendid gentlemen and beautiful ladies, intensely southern, made a brilliant setting for the only event of its kind ever to happen. The day was a fitting tribute to a fine representative of that glorious old, old South that still rises Olympus-like above any description ever given of it, the land of hospitality and romance, and the home of chivalry. As I stood there watching that happy crowd, proud without vanity, passionately loyal to their long cherished ideals of refinement, culture, and honor, I realized that before me was the cream of Southern aristocracy, elegant, friendly and wholesome; yes, stately, and yet without a trace of pomp, or arrogance. It was a scene for the memory to treasure throughout the years.

Arthur Shaw Writes of Early Days

It is pleasant to get in touch with Arthur Shaw again. As stated in the Republican of May 16 he is nicely located in the Florida Christian Home at 1071 Edgewood avenue, Jacksonville 5, Florida.

Mr. Shaw celebrated his 89th birthday April 30 and the Republican sends him hearty congratulations.

The sketch following was received from him last week:

Arthur LeGrand Shaw was born April 30, 1857, in Decatur township, Van Buren County, Michigan, on a farm 4½ miles southeast of Decatur.

He remembers Abraham Lincoln and his being shot. Arthur has been in the room in which Lincoln was shot, and in the room on the other side of the street, in which the President died the next morning.

The first Sunday after Lincoln's death, Arthur Shaw's father, John A. Shaw, took his family to the Bell district school house in Porter township to church service. Some one said that he was glad that Abraham Lincoln had been shot. Objection was taken at once. The women massed between the men who were going to fight. The women prevented the fighting. But there was no preaching service. The school children committed the lines

"Revenge is a cruel sword.
It has neither hilt nor guard
Wouldst thou wield this brand of the Lord?
Is thy grasp then firm and hard?
But the firmer the grasp of the blade,
Deeper wound in thy hand is made.
And when the blade from thy hand has flown
Instead of finding it bathed in the heart of the foe,
Thou wilt find it sheathed in thine own."

Lincoln's Address

After Lincoln's death, school children were asked to commit Lincoln's Gettysburg address, in 10 sentences and 267 words, (delivered in less than 3 minutes).

"Four score and 70 years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created free and equal. Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this. But in a larger sense we cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember, what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us,—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion. That we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain. That this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom—and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth."

Temperance Pledge

Abraham Lincoln rode on horse back to churches and to school houses in central Illinois warning against liquor. He invited the people to sign a pledge as follows:

"Whereas the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage is productive of pauperism, degradation, and crime, and believing it is our duty to discourage that which produces more evil than good, we therefore pledge ourselves to abstain from the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage."

When A. L. Shaw became Superintendent of the school at Valley, Nebraska, he was asked by the school board to teach The Good Citizenship Pledge. 1 was to turn, 2 was to arise, 3 was to commence repeating the pledge and 4 was to be seated. It took only three minutes to repeat the pledge,

"I am a citizen of America, an heir to all her greatness and renown. The health and happiness of my body depends upon each muscle, and nerve, and drop of blood doing its work in its place. So the health and happiness of my country depends upon each individual doing his work in his place. I will not fill any position nor pursue any business where I can live upon my fellow citizens without doing them useful service in return. For I plainly see that if I should that it will bring pain and suffering upon some of them. America has given me birth and nourished me, and I will love her and do my duty to her, whose child, and servant, and civil soldier I am. I will do nothing to desecrate her soil, or pollute her air, or degrade her children, my brothers and sisters. I will try to make her cities beautiful and her citizens healthy and good so that she may be a beautiful desirable home for her children in time to come."

In one home in which three pupils repeated the pledge, the mother asked the father what he was going to do with that pledge. He did not answer her. But he resigned his position as partner in the saloon business. Then another man in a licensed saloon came to the Superintendent of the school and asked him if he thought it was right to receive money for a license and then try to destroy the license. The Superintendent had to confess that he didn't think that it was an honest thing to do, to accept the money for the license and then try to destroy the license. This led many to believe in prohibition of the liquor traffic.

Finally prohibition became a law in the United States. Why and how was prohibition of the liquor traffic prohibited?

There is now more money used for the purchase of intoxicating drinks than ever in the history of America. What was the attitude of President Roosevelt? What will be the attitude of President Truman in licensing the liquor traffic?

What should be the attitude of citizens of America today toward prohibition of the liquor business throughout the United States of America?

RECALLING MORRIS MURDER

(The story of the Morris murder as published in the Paw Paw Free Press and Courier of October 2, 1879, was completed with testimony before a coroner's jury and the jury's verdict. The paper is faded and worn in creases and difficult to read, but Operator Howe has done a good job of deciphering and has here preserved the manuscript which otherwise would have been lost to the world.)

THE TESTIMONY

Below we give in full the proceedings on the inquest:

The Coroner's Jury

A jury was impaneled by Justice Haynes, of Decatur, consisting of Dr. J. T. Keables, Dr. G. L. Rose, Dr. H. M. Brodrick, W. H. Clark, and L. D. Roberts, and testimony was taken as follows:

The Testimony

Jennie M. Bull, (a girl who had worked several years for the family) testified—"I went away to Geo. Reits', at Charleston, yesterday about quarter past eleven; came home about 4 o'clock; found the house locked; I went home to father's, then came back about half past six. They (Mr. and Mrs. Morris) told me they went away about noon to John Gould's in Porter; they had a horse named "Raish" and single buggy. The clock struck 8 as I blew out my light before retiring. They were both at the barn feeding colt when I went up stairs. There was no one around here when I came home. I heard them talking after they came back from the barn; don't know when they retired. I walked to Charleston alone. I heard no noise in the house during the night, but a jar. (She explained that she did not know what it was or suspect anything wrong,and went to sleep again.) I slept over the dining room, just over the door where Henry was found on the stoop. My stair door was shut but not fastened—was ajar. The inside lock on the porch door was fastened by a catch for fastening the bolt of the lock. While we were eating our lunch, Mrs. Morris said, "Jenny, did any one bring you home?" I said no. She said, "there are buggy tracks that turned up the lane from the east"; but nothing more was said about the buggy.

When I awoke this morning my arms were numb. I awoke and saw the sun up, and wondered why I was not called, because they always called me earlier than I got up this morning —about half past six o'clock. I came down stairs and saw Henry lying on the porch as I went by the door. The door was open, but the screen door was shut. All the rest of the doors of the house were locked.

I went out at the woodshed door, and went to Mr. Gillitt's, in the tenant house. The hired man was not here. Mrs. Morris while at lunch told me she thought he would not be here to-morrow on account of the sickness of his wife. His name is John Klinger. I did not see him when he came. I was at Gillitt's. It was about an hour before I came back.

I ran to my father's from Gillitt's, and came back again with my mother after a little while, for I was afraid to come back alone, and found John Klinger, Mr. Rosewarne, Charley Rosewarne, and my father at the barn and Elias Morris and wife in the house. They came out as soon as I got back. There have not been any strangers here for several days or weeks.

No one working for Henry but Johnny Klinger, he has been here six or seven weeks. Before him Riley Huntley worked for him nearly four years. Johnny came to work Monday and Riley left Tuesday afternoon. Levi Reits worked one month with Klinger. When Reits left here he went to his father's. He lives on the Goble place, now owned by Austin Charles.

Riley quit work because Henry did not like his drinking, but parted good friends as far as I know.

Mrs. Morris always kept her jewelry in the right hand drawer of the bureau and always locked the drawer when she went away. When I have made the bed I have often found the revolver under his pillow, but sometimes saw it on the washstand, to the right of the door as you enter, after the bed has been made. He generally slept on the front side of the bed next the door. I have been here with them 4 or 5 years, and was intimate with them, so much so that Mrs. Morris would tell me to be sure and lock that drawer if I went away. I guess they hid the money about the bureau but do not know.

He sold I think $122 worth of hogs at Decatur on Wednesday." (She did not know whether he got the money.)

John Klinger testified:—"I am 21 years old, and live in Volinia, 1½ miles from here. Knew Henry Morris and wife; have known them two years and a half. I have been at work for Mr. Morris two months. I boarded here when I worked for him. I was here every night last week. Drew wheat to Decatur last Saturday for

Mr. Morris. He was at Decatur with me.

He went over in a buggy; got home about six o'clock; he got home about 10 minutes before I did. Don't know whether Mr. Morris got any money Saturday for his wheat. I stayed here Saturday night; left here Sunday noon. Mr. and Mrs. Morris were at the barn when I left here. I went home yesterday when I left here, and did not return until about six o'clock this morning. Met some parties at Nicholsville, but did not have any particular conversation with any one.

When I came home I rode to the barn and fed the horses; came out and found Mr. Morris' pants at the barn as I came out. I lifted them up and dropped them; came to the house, found Hank, took hold of him to lift him up, thinking he was sick and couldn't get back to the house. I saw the door open and discovered him bloody, so I left him. Did not notice any tracks on the lane, but thought it strange the gate was open. No bridle or halter is missing from the barn.

Mr. Morris said (yesterday) he was going to John Gould's for a while and make a call, and would probably be back at 4 o'clock. Levi Reits was working here about four weeks ago. I get $13 a month wages on this farm. There is a horse missing; there were five horses in the barn last night. The one that is gone was the best one he had."

The Verdict

The jury in their verdict, say: "That the bodies of the said Charles H. Morris and Esther Morris were found lying dead in the house of the said Charles H. Morris in the township of Decatur, in the county aforesaid, and that said bodies, when so found as aforesaid, appear to have been shot—Esther Morris having received one shot entering the thoracic cavity below the lower angle of the scapula, on the right side, which shot came out on the left side between the third and fourth ribs, on a line with the nipple; another shot entered the left breast above and to the left of the nipple, either of which would have caused her death. Chas. H. Morris received two shots, one of which entered between the fourth and fifth ribs within an inch of the nipple on the right side of the chest, and came out beneath the shoulder blade of the left side; another penetrated the neck on the right side, its course being downward and to the left, lodging under the skin one inch to the left of the spine, on a line with the exit of the other, either of which was sufficient to cause his death.

RECALLING MORRIS MURDER

A few weeks ago Mrs. Hazel Millard Kelsey brought to the Republican office a copy of the Paw Paw Free Press and Courier of Thursday, October 2, 1879. It was addressed to her father, the late H. H. Millard, and had been in the family all these 67 years.

The paper contained a graphic account of the Morris murder which occurred on the night of September 28, 1879, and has never ceased to hold the interest of people of Southwestern Michigan. Now that Decatur has had another murder this first great crime is again recalled.

MURDER!

Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Morris, of Decatur Township, Foully Murdered in their Own House.

A Most Terrible and Mysterious Affair.

On Sunday night last, in Decatur township, occurred the most awful murder that has ever darkened the history of this region. A happy young married couple, well situated in life, retire in health and hope, and are found in the morning both brutally murdered.

Charles Henry Morris

The murdered man was the youngest son of the late Dolphin Morris, the earliest settler of this county. He was born May 9th, 1847, and was thus a little over 32 years old. He was a pleasant, kind, good-hearted man, without a personal enemy in the world, so far as known. His wife,

Esther A. Morris

The other victim of the double murder, was a daughter of Asa Jones, of Edwardsburg, Cass county, and was about 30 years of age. She was a beautiful, well educated, able and lovely woman. The couple were devotedly attached to each other, and were universally loved and respected among a very large circle of friends. They had been married some eight years. Their only child, a babe a few months old, died about a year ago, which was a terrible blow to them.

The Place where the murder was committed, was the old Dolphin Morris farm, in the southern edge of Decatur township, adjoining Cass county. It is one of the best farms in the country.

The House,

an old fashioned comfortable frame farm-house, stands on a rise of ground back about 80 rods north from the road, approached by a lane; and is also about the same distance from a road on the east. The barn is located about twenty rods from the house, on the east. The nearest houses are a tenant house, on the farm, about 80 rods distant, occupied by a man named Bull, the father of the young woman who worked for the Morrises.

The Manner of the Murder

The testimony before the coroner's jury (which we publish in full elsewhere) is very meager as to details or facts. The hired girl slept soundly through the whole, and the hired man only discovered the dead bodies in the morning. It is only from different circumstances that have come to light, the position of the bodies when found, and the marks of the bullets from the deadly weapon that an idea can be formed.

From these it would seem that Morris was aroused by some one at the back door of the dining room, opening on the porch; that he came out without dressing, and opened the door; that the person had stepped down from the porch and back a step around the corner of the building out of sight; that as Morris stepped out on the porch to see what or who had called him, he was fired at, the ball passing through his body and entering the building at the place indicated in the diagram. (This ball passed through the partition and was found in the pantry.) Then as he fell he was shot a second time, this time at so close range that his face was burned and filled with powder, the ball entering his neck and passing downward into his body. Mrs. Morris hearing the shots, sprang from her bed and started to the assistance of her husband, doubtless taking the revolver which it was his custom to keep under his pillow. The murderer strode over the body of his first victim, and pursued the brave but terror-stricken woman, her white night-dress making an excellent mark for him in the dim light of the room. Through the dining room and into the sitting-room he pursues her, and as she is about to re-enter her bedroom he fires at her, the ball probably wounding her in her left arm, and then striking the wall near the casing of the door into the parlor. Still he follows her, and as she attempts to escape into the closet he fires again from the direction of the door, but the ball strikes the upper right hand drawer of the bureau, shattering the lock and burying itself in the other side of the drawer. It is a close shot however, for as she passes the blood from her wounded arm spatters the white marble top of the bureau. She thinks of a chance for escape, for the closet has another door into the front bed-room; but as it opens toward her, she fails to get it open before the monster in pursuit appears at the closet door. He fires at her again, this time giving her a mortal wound. She sinks down in the corner against the door, a dying woman. It would seem he now ought to be satisfied. But no! he wants no uncertain work. Again he shoots her through, this time standing over her with his weapon so close that it sets her night dress on fire, (only to be extinguished by her fast flowing blood) and the ball passes through the floor into the cellar. His hellish work complete, his poor victim thoroughly and certainly killed, he picks up Morris' pants and starts for the barn. Not finding in the pants anything of value he throws them in a corner back of the stable door. He then goes into the stable, passes by the first horse in the stalls, and takes the best one of the four or five in the stable, one known through all the neighborhood for its excellence, good breeding and endurance, having before taken off the halter, and put on the bridle and saddle or cloth he brought for the purpose, and gallops down the lane and out at the gate he has left open for the purpose. A few minutes later, (between nine and ten o'clock) a young man (Chas. Rosewarne) returning in a buggy from a Sunday school concert, is nearly frightened out of his wits by meeting a terrible-looking masked man on horseback, about three-fourths of a mile west, who nearly runs over him as he passes at a rapid canter, on a horse which the boy remembers, after his terror is over, that he recognized as Henry Morris'—a horse so peculiarly marked that any person who knew it could not fail to recognize it. So terrified is the young man that he forgets to feed or care for his horse, but hurries into the house and buries himself under the bed-clothes, not caring to expose his timidity to his family by saying anything to them about it.

The Horse Was Found

the next morning in the yard of a man named Neddo, at South Bend, Ind., about 35 or 40 miles distant, and was fully identified by Mr. R. H. Lyon, local editor of the Tribune at that place, a warm personal friend of the Morrises, and whom they had visited only the Sunday before, driving this same horse with another one. It is said that this Neddo belongs to a bad lot of fellows at South Bend, who have frequently figured in the criminal courts there.

Murder, Not Plunder, was apparently the object in view in this horrible affair. In the bureau drawer, the lock of which was shattered, there was $110 in money, and in the drawer of the bureau were two (or three) good watches, one (or two) of gold, and a valuable gold chain. Not a thing was taken away, so far as can be discovered, except the horse used to escape, not even a bridle being missing.

The Weapon Used

was evidently a large sized navy revolver, carrying a heavy ball, about 42 caliber—a most deadly and powerful weapon. Morris' revolver was a medium sized one, and was found lying near Mrs. Morris, all the barrels loaded.

The Excitement

is greater than has ever been caused by any crime in this part of the country. There is no possible doubt that could the murderer be found and the crime fastened upon him, would deal very summarily with his case. Old law-abiding citizens, never known to counsel violence, do not hesitate now to say that the law is too slow and too uncertain for the one who committed such a deed.

Judge Lynch and a Rope

Rumors and Theories are of course current as to the perpetrators and causes which may have led to this murder. In the present state of the public mind, we believe it proper to refrain from alluding to or commenting on them, until there is something—as it is hoped there may be soon—that will lead to certain discovery.

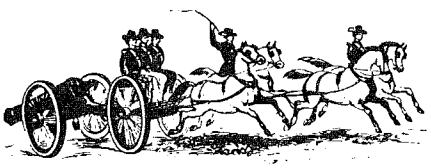
The Funeral of the ill-fated couple occurred on Tuesday afternoon,and was attended by an immense number of people, there being several hundred teams in the procession.

Mr. Morris was a Royal Arch Mason, a member of Decatur Chapter.

Mrs. Crosby, of Battle Creek, a sister of Mrs. Morris, was at the house on Monday, and was almost overwhelmed with grief. At the time of our reporter's visit, her parents were momentarily expected. Her mother is in feeble health, and it was feared she might not survive the shock.



The Civil War Diary of Captain Charles B. Haydon

Of Company E, Second Michigan Infantry.

August 22, 1862

Marched to Alexandria and bivouaced in the street. Many of the men were drunk in spite of the guards. Nearly all the 1st N. Y. were tipsy. It rained at night.

August 23, 1862

About 9 a. m. we went on to the cars and set out for Pope. We passed famous Manassas Junction (perhaps to be still more renowned ere another week), and reached Warrenton Junction about 2 p. m. We bivouaced for the night, got supper, detailed the picket and then we were ordered back 1½ miles to Cedar Creek to guard the bridge. About 30 officers and all General Pope's private baggage were captured by rebel cavalry at this place last night. Pope's stragglers are coming in and all sorts of rumors are afloat in regard to the battle which has been plainly heard all day. There was a heavy shower at dark.

August 24, 1862

We marched about 9 a. m. and halted on the R. R. about 3 miles beyond Warrenton just before noon having forded a creek about 3 feet deep. About 3 p. m. we moved forward ¾ of a mile. All sorts of eatables which the country affords are suffering. Some guards of Binney's Brigade were trying to protect a field of corn. The 2nd halted near and the advance was within two minutes after at the fence. Guards, Halt there! Halt, can't come in here! Halt. By this time about 20 men were over the fence. Guards: Say, hold on there; wish you fellows would go around to the back side and not go in right in front where we are guarding.

August 25, 1862

The night was clear, quiet and unusually cold. The following promotions were announced this morning: Capt. W. L. Whipple of H. to be Lt. Col. 21st M. I.; 1st Lt. Augustus Goebel of A. to be Capt. of C.; 2nd Lt. C. H. Hoodskin of C. to be 1st Lt. of A. D. C. Morrison, Company Sergeant, to be 2nd Lt. of C.: myself to be Adjutant from Aug. 10th; 1st Lt. R. H. Mahon assigned to Co. I. This suits me very well as I am advanced one degree and can hold fast the Adjutancy or be Captain at no distant day as I may prefer. We are about 45 miles from Alexandria and in a fine country but provisions are short and living confounded poor.

August 26, 1862

We were much rejoiced to see our good Surgeon Dr. Bonnie and our paroled Hospt. Steward as Apt. Surgeon. About 4 p. m. we marched out 4 miles on the Fredericksburgh road to relieve the 3rd M. I. who were lying in wait for rebel cavalry. Living is much improved. Sheep, chickens, etc., are to be had on requisition properly presented. A citizen was shot last night at his own house by a trooper. He was a notorious rebel and some justify the act while others are in favor of shooting the soldier at once. Much drunkenness and shooting both on the part of citizens and soldiers are reported at Alexandria.

August 27, 1862

The night was quiet with us but the enemy made a dash in our rear and destroyed the R. R. bridge at Broad Run. An orderly came early in the morning to tell us that our Brigade had marched an hour before he started. We marched to camp, took rations and at 10 a. m. were at Warrenton Junction and soon after at Cedar Creek Bridge. Porter's Corps came down with us retreating from the front. We halted a while at Cedar Creek, then crossed and marched toward Greenwich where we arrived about 8 p. m., having marched in all about 24 miles. I left my blankets with Lowrey to go on the train, supposing that we should follow the R. R. In consequence I am without either supper or blankets.

August 28, 1862

At 2 a. m. I was called to convey an order to march at 3 a. m. I find myself cold and very stiff in the legs. We started at the appointed hour for the R. R. bridge across Broad Run where we arrived at 9 a. m. The Rebs had destroyed the bridge, 2 engines and a train of cars. The cars were still burning. After some delay in crossing our Brigade moved forward in column to Manasses Junction.

We expected a battle at that place. The Rebs left before we arrived. They had destroyed loaded trains nearly a mile in length. A great profusion of incombustible articles were lying around but aside from a few barrels of flour we could get nothing eatable. We halted here about 3 hours for reports and learned that one large bridge and several small ones were burned between here and Alexandria. We then moved forward towards Centreville by way of Blackburn's Ford crossing from the opposite direction our first battlefield.

Just as we were about to leave the open field a company of our cavalry (several saddles empty) came back from the front on a run. We filed out to give them the road. Our regiment might have been put in position to do something but Dillman never sees anything when he ought. The Rebs came to the edge of the woods and several of them followed 30 to 40 rods into the open field and all but one of them returned unhurt. Our regiment opened fire on them but from their position it was in effectual.

This little dash being over the 2nd was deployed as skirmishers and advanced through the woods and fallen timber towards Centreville. Nothing occurred save the capture of two prisoners. The sun was just sinking behind the Bull Run Mountains when we planted our colors on one of the principal redoubts. The enemy had made a sharp turn to the left and the dust of their column was plainly visible about 3 miles off. The troops which marched from Manassas Junction to the left of us opened a brisk fire of artillery on them but the day was too far gone to do much execution.

It would have been fortunate if we had arrived two hours earlier but we did our best. We have marched 15 miles today. The men had little sleep last night and hardly anything today to eat. I have had nothing but a half ration of hard tack.

August 29, 1862

We moved at 5 a. m. down the road towards the old battlefield of Manassas. Cannonading opened in front at about 7 a. m. We were the advanced guard and captured about 50 prisoners before we joined the troops which came in from the left. As soon as we came near the field Kearney seized on us and sent one company to hold a house, two companies to support a section of artillery, two companies as skirmishers in a piece of woods nearly in front, and 5 companies with which I went to deploy as skirmishers on the extreme right.

Going out we crossed Bull Run near the Stone Bridge. We now moved forward about a mile and a half through woods and fields recrossing the Run and finally took position in a piece of woods about half a mile from Jackson's (Stonewall's) headquarters. The Rebs soon got sight of us and opened with a section of artillery. They fired high and the shots splintered the trees at 8 to 10 feet from the ground most gloriously. Dillman had the "shell fever" badly and was much wilted. The firing continued with solid shot and a few shells above an hour.

I had a hearty laugh at Lt. Barden's expense. A solid 10 lb. shot struck a large black oak about 10 feet from the ground, under which he was lying. The splinters (the size of stove wood) knocked off his cap and battered his back sharply but without doing much damage. As he scrabbled up rubbing the dust out of his eyes and feeling wildly around for his cap his face wore a look of astonishment which would have made me laugh if I had known that the next shot would be mine.

One of our batteries now opened on them from a hill behind us with most remarkable precision. The Rebs waited for about six shots and then made off as fast as possible. A solid shot, however, cut down a span of horses on one gun and it was delayed long enough to get several shells which burst right among them.

We now received orders to fall back across the Run. In doing this we had to cross an open field where they opened on us with shrapnel from another battery. As many as 10 pieces of the first struck within as many feet of me and Lt. Plumb who was near had one arm badly torn. At this some of the men took the double quick but immediately came down to a walk on being ordered to do so. Their shells all exploded a little back of us and no one else was injured in crossing.

We took very favorable ground on the right bank of the Run where we remained till night. Toward the centre the battle raged hotly, with occasional intervals from 7 a. m. till dark. We could see nothing in that direction but the contest seemed pretty equal. I think the battle will be found to far surpass in obstinacy that of last year. We saw during the afternoon another rebel battery put to flight in great haste. Some cannister shot from our own guns fell among us but luckily did no harm.

The night was clear and quiet. We hold the same position as yesterday. I awoke destitute of rations but a soldier gave me a pancake of flour and water fried in grease and a piece of pork about 2 inches square. This was very good but deficient in quantity so I picked up a bone which some more fortunate comrade had thrown away. This I washed and roasted and ate what little meat there was on it. I then ate 6 to 8 green peaches and pronounced my breakfast finished. Good luck, however, seemed in store for me. Co. I came, Octavus being along with hard tack and coffee. I at once made a fourth addition to my breakfast.

Our indefatigable Comy. (Johnston) came soon after with fresh beef and I made a fifth addition. I also procured a haversack and supplied myself for the future. My legs which before were quite limber were now fully adequate to the task of bearing my body.

There were only light skirmishes and a few shells till 1 p. m. This led to a report that the enemy had retreated. Others supposed that great move was preparing. The fire opened pretty briskly on the centre and right soon after one but attracted no great attention on our part as we could not see that part of the field. It continued about the same till after 4 p. m. when there commenced by far the most terrible fire of musketry I ever heard. The men (except those on watch) had previous to this been quietly cooking, eating, playing cards, etc. They now began to lay these aside and give attention to the progress of the battle.

It was perfectly certain that the centre and left were falling back. It was, however, reported that a body of troops on our extreme left and heretofore liable to be cut off, having now effected a junction the line was purposely swung back to draw the enemy from their strong well covered position. I did not believe this report but saw its object and said nothing. The right continued to fall back farther and farther till about sundown. Our brigade was now more than a mile in advance of the centre whereas in the original line it was somewhat retired. The order now came for the Brigade to fall back and for our regiment to move in as skirmishers by the right flank down the stream towards Centreville.

The line had not moved half its length before it received the fire of the enemy's advance. The fire being promptly returned they did not press. Subsequently the left of our line and their skirmishers became considerably mingled but Rebs were so tired with running that they could do nothing. We moved in this way about 1½ miles. A battery on the other side of the stream fired over us all the way at the brigade. Some of our men (not our regiment) perhaps 20 were across the stream and being unable to get over were in no little trouble, but seeing the cavalry coming they threw away everything and crossed where the water was about 5 feet deep. Four or five short fellows who could not swim were taken. Soon after we came to a short turn in the stream where there was a ford about knee deep.

About half the line has crossed at this point when we were fired on from another direction (our proper front and those who had not crossed went down the other side of the stream. The fire being returned the enemy gave back. I was with the last who crossed. Our line was near 100 rods long and we had a half mile of open field before us. We had gone but a little way when about 2 companies of cavalry came around the bend at full run in pursuit. Two-thirds of the line by brisk running reached a cornfield and formed under cover of the fence. Some 40. Benson and myself among the number, were too far behind for that though we ran our very best. We shouted to them to halt and rally. They did so and we had a respectable square in short order.

We were none too quick for the leader of the cavalry, a gallant fellow, was within 15 rods and the rest were close behind. We gave them a volley. Two dropped at once and the leader turning his horse short around, then to the right, back to the left, fell headlong to the ground. The rest went back nearly as fast as they came but as they turned gave us a volley from their carbines which wounded 2 men.

We at once took the double quick to escape the battery which now opened on us and rejoined our comrades in the cornfield. We then made for the main road where we found the balance of the regiment, Col. Poe and the brigade. We marched in good order to Centreville. The men seemed to bear all with the utmost indifference though they swore horrible at being beaten again at Manassas. We were obliged to ford two creeks where the water was near 3 feet deep. I brought off a sword and gun extra but lost my blanket. The night was cold and sleep out of the question. As for the retreat it was orderly so far as I saw. When the cavalry were coming down on us I could not help laughing, though I had very little breath to spare, at a soldier of a N. Y regiment. He had thrown away everything but his haversack. He was now hard pressed and cried out in his grief, "Oh my God my God, what shall I do? If I throw away my haversack I shall starve and if I don't the Rebs will catch me."

August 31, 1862

There was a heavy rain nearly all day. We remained at Centreville. There was some firing toward the left

The Navajo Indians of Arizona

RED LAKE TRADING POST CO.
"The Home of Navajo Rugs"
Tonalea, Arizona

November 22, 1946.

My dear Mr. Moulton:

The Decatur Republican was welcomed with this week's mail, which reminded us we are still Michigan farmers and not Arizona Indian traders. It also reminded me I had promised to write you a supplement to my letter of last year about the Navajo Indians, so here goes.

This is our thirteenth trip to this land of vast distances, of colorful rocks, sand and canyons, of dry sunshiny days and clear moonlit nights. On the mesas grow juniper and pinyon pine, on the sand flats and dunes the sagebrush and rabbit weed predominate and in the eastern portion of this vast area, the largest reservation in the United States is a plateau some eighty miles long and twenty wide covered with a solid stand of Western Yellow or Ponderosa Pine, straight boled and clean of branches for one hundred feet and often over four feet in diameter. Large sections of this area also consist of hard clay of varying hues, devoid of vegetation, but beautiful in its own coloring, of which the Painted Desert is an example.

The Navajos (or Dineh, meaning the People, as they call themselves) who along with the Hopis and a few other scattered tribes inhabiting this region are like the country, colorful and interesting, and form by far the largest and most primitive tribe in our country to-day. Their principal income is derived from their sheep and goats, the beautiful wool rugs woven by the women of which we have many examples in our home in Decatur, and the turquoise and silver jewelry fashioned by the men. While there have been some apparent changes in clothing and attitude mostly in the past few years the majority of the fifty to sixty thousand members of this tribe have resisted so-called civilization and live as carefree, contented and unspoiled as they did at the coming of the Spanish Conquistadors. Long hair, native costumes and the soft spoken Navajo language are still the rule even in the white man's trading post or the fe wgovernment offices.

The women, as with all Indians, do almost all the work and own most of the property. Many are pretty and all show strong and intelligent character. Both men and women are kind and loving to a fault to their children. In the good old days when they were the scourge of this country they frequently brought back children from their raids on the surrounding tribes and adopted them into their families. Incidently the Apaches are an offshoot of the Navajo nation.

Some years back the government found it expedient the adopt the colonial policy of the British in dealing with the Indians. Instead of trying to convert them into civilized white men it now seeks only to make better Indians and interferes as little as possible with deep rooted customs. Accordingly, outside of pleasant persuasion little has been done to change the native practice of polygamy. We know one old buck who has four wives and some twenty-four children and is quite proud, with good reason I believe.

The Navajos have a very practical variant of the mother-in-law jokes. No man ever looks at his mother-in-law or she at him. If either sees the other blindness will result prevented only by a long and expensive ceremony. The foundation of this rule is the evidence of family quarrels and as a lawyer I can attest the soundness of same. When a mother visits her daughter the husband takes to the prairie. When there is a separation, unlike us, the man and not the woman, goes back to his mother.

Anthropologists maintain that all primitive people follow similar plans of progress and this sameness is quite evident in the type of home construction of tribes all over the world where they are about in the same stage of development. The most natural manner of building a strong weather and wind resisting insulated home without anything but the simplest tools is to use materials immediately at hand and fashion it in a round or dome form. For example we have the ice igloo of the Eskimo, the skin covered yurt of the Mongolian both of whom are supposed to be related to the Navajo, but we also have the mud or adobe shaped houses of many African tribes especially on the Island of Madagascar and the palm and rattan homes of the same shape of many other African and some South Pacific peoples who are very remote from our Indians. Following in order the Navajo uses cedar logs about four foot long set on end in a circle some eighteen feet in diameter topped with a dome of logs laid horizontally closing in the roof up to a four foot smoke hole, one opening for a door facing the east and the entire structure covered with clay to be baked by the sun into native adobe. It blends so harmoniously into the landscape that it frequently escapes detection by the tenderfeet driving thru this country.

A blanket is hung over the door opening which also serves to control the fire in the center of the hogan. This type of shelter is surprisingly firm and is used only in the cold weather, the Navajo prefering to sleep in the open with his flocks of sheep on the move in the summer or in the brush hogan set up temporarily near the small fields of corn and squash that he occasionally sets out in spring.

The most startling characteristic of the Navajo is his unconquerable fear of the dead. Everything associated with a person at the time of death is "tchindi," the native word for "taboo." If a person dies in a hogan a hole is broken thru the wall and the body passed out and the hogan is then burned if it is of wood construction or if made of rock as some are where wood is scarce it is destroyed, or in any event it is deserted. Never again will a Navajo so much as come close to the spot even generations after all traces of the building has disappeared. The body is buried or deposited in a rock niche along with saddles, horses and many personal articles and those attending the burial must undergo a long purification ceremony. Many of the present dances are revised versions of ceremonies for those who had looked on enemy dead in the tough old raiding days before Kit Carson changed their habits. Because of his fear of the dead the Navajo never took scalps which I understand was a custom established by the French and English as a bounty system by which they could measure the results of their Indian allies in the wars of the colonial era.

To-day the Navajo attempts to get the few white traders or government agents to do his burying. There are many tales of amusing incidents which have arisen because of this superstition too long, however, for this already lengthly epistle. It has served good purpose in the prevention of the spread of disease which may have contributed to the increase of this tribe while others are disappearing. This reservation is practically littered with ruins of the prehistoric cliff dwellers in which have been found many valuable artifacts including mummies and pottery all undisturbed because of the Navajo's fear of the dead.

Here at Tonalea in the desert at the comparatively low altitude of one mile the days are warm and dry and we have a fire only in the evening. Our first week was spent in the pine woods on the high plateau which I mentioned earlier. There was much snow although the days were warm and pleasant and the green woods beautiful with showers of glittering snow sifting down from the tufted branches in the bright sunlight. By day the wet clay was slippery and impassable but by sundown the temperature would begin to dive and the trails freeze hard.

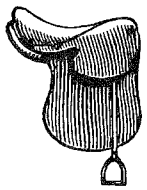
One night we bounced and lurched over a little used trail on the verge of car sickness to a scene well worth the ride and the trip out here. Two rows of immense campfires lined a cleared flat strip extending from a large log ceremonial hogan. Inside was a continuous singing chant by the Hahtahlis (singers or medicine men). Around the campfires were hundreds of squaws, their carefully washed and brushed hair shining in the firelight, children awake and sleeping and men in long hair tied in back and topped with ten gallon hats and everyone wrapped in brightly colored blankets. On most fires coffee pots were steaming, mutton ribs roasting and squaw bread baking. Outside of both lines of fires were covered wagons, horses, dogs and sheep, a typical Navajo camp. Down the center line from time to time came teams of ten or more dancers, heads covered with square fox skins decorated with grotesque faces, wearing green pine bough neck ruffs, ornamented hand woven breech clouts, moccasins and much silver and turquoise jewelry and arms and bodies protected from the biting cold only by a thin covering of white clay. Wild animal sounds announce their entrance, two majestic squaws anoint them with corn pollen, gourds begin to rattle, gutteral rhythmic chanting grows louder and you are transported back thru the ages as the dancers stamp and turn and sing in perfect unison.

The climate, beautiful scenery, the primitive unspoiled Indians and the warm pioneer hospitality of the isolated white people make this an ideal place for a complete change and rest.

Cordially yours,
Allen E. Hoban.



THIS WEEK

By Anna N. Moulton, Editor

Hon. Chase S. Osborn, Michigan's most unusual citizen and Grand Old Man of the state's entire history, was reported last summer to be approaching the end of his earthly career. He had fallen and broken a hip and that, after 85 years of wear and tear on his physical frame, was considered by many who wished him well to be more than any individual could withstand. But the fall broke only the hip, it did not break the spirit of this remarkable man.

Despite his injury, which occurred in his Georgia home, he came to Michigan for the summer, and on his return submitted to an operation for removal of the pins which held the fractured hip bones in place. Since then he has shown improvement, has surmounted his physical troubles and gone back to work.

One of his accomplishments for 1945 was the correction of errors in official area figures, and that was made the title of a book on the subject written by himself and daughter Stellanova Osborn and published by the Lancaster, Pennsylvania, press late in the fall.

The Foreword, which is quoted here, explains the purpose of the book and shows the tenacity with which our former governor holds to a cause that appeals to him until he sees a wrong made right.

THE FOREWORD

The total area of the United States of America is 3,082,809 square miles: 2,977,128 square miles of land and 105,861 square miles of water.

If you compare this total area figure with that in your atlas, or any current reference book, you will find that the two do not agree.

The reference books are wrong!

The same situation exists with regard to the total areas of the Great Lakes states.

The reason for it is still more amazing. The incorrect figures are based on tabulations issued by United States government bureaus.

Difficult as it is to believe, the currently quoted official total area figures for the United States and Great Lakes states leave out all the American-owned portion of the Great Lakes. This began years ago, perhaps originally through misunderstanding.

When the matter was first threshed out with the Census Bureau, they agreed to correct it in 1940. However, when the immensity of the region gave rise to statistical and political difficulties, they decided it was easier to continue, as in the past, to omit this part of the country from its total area figures. In other words, for statistical convenience they are ignoring established legal boundaries, sacrificing accuracy and justice, and still excluding from the picture of the total area of the United States a major possession of 60,422 square miles, which may easily be of greater value than any equal area in the world.

This book is published to spread knowledge of these errors in our national official statistics and to expedite correction of the inaccuracies.

The writer received as a Christmas gift a copy of the book with this inscription on the flyleaf, which makes it priceless,—

"....from his affectionate friend Chase S. Osborn (Uncle Chase), with his unending, heartfelt good wishes, and those of Stellanova Osborn.

Christmas, 1945."

Chase S. Osborn, who was governor of Michigan in 1911 and 1912, gives his profession as that of a writer. He may be known best as a writer, but he made a record as governor that is still referred to for the constructive and efficient work performed for his state, and he has been a traveler and philanthropist known throughout the civilized world.

He was born in Huntington county, Indiana, January 22, 1860, and in a few days will celebrate his 86th birthday. He has the hearty congratulations and sincere good wishes of the Republican.

THE SOO NEWS MAKES AN INQUIRY

If Gov. Osborn "found" the area of Michigan which stands to bring $9,000,000 to Michigan, what better use could be made of the money than to build the bridge the former governor wants over the water of the Great Lakes that Gov. Osborn "found"? Four of five years of that $9,000,000 income would be enough to pay for the bridge.

"SUPPLY"

Who is it that each day fulfills our every need?
Who is it that each day helps us to succeed?
It it not God?

Who is it that sends forth unlimited supply
And answers our petitions when we humbly cry?
Is it not God?

Then should we not accept the blessings we have here
Instead of always asking God to lend an ear?

His wondrous works are manifold;
So help ourselves we must—
Living each day the best we can
And in God above to trust.

The writer of this poem is a sister of Mrs. Chas. L. Dine of Decatur. She wrote the beautiful tribute to her nephew, Bernard Dine, who lost his life in Iwo Jima, and the lines entitled, "Birthday Surprise," dedicated to our townsman, Charlie. Both were published in the Republican.

A subscriber of many years, when renewing for the Republican remarked: "Sometimes we think we can get along without it, but when it doesn't come we miss it." Also when a subscriber fails to renew we miss that subscriber.

What is a more beautiful sight than the outline of a giant tree against the sky?

Did some one say, drawing a bead on a ten-point buck, or pulling a pickerel out of the water?

Since when did it become proper to spell "freight" f r a t e, and "bomb" with only one b? George Bernard Shaw and other literary freaks would like to change the English language, modernize it till the Old Continental boys and the Boys in Blue wouldn't have recognized even the swear words. But there are some things which cannot be improved upon, and one of them is the English language as the Puritans brought it over from Europe, as Patrick Henry and Daniel Webster spoke it, and as Longfellow, Whittier and other famous authors wrote it.

We have plenty of time to write "through" and "thoroughly" and "freight" and "bomb" as we learned them in school. It can be possible to travel so fast in this country that all the beauty it offers is lost for the speed.

There is no authority in Webster's dictionary for the so-called simplified spelling of English words and their beauty is gone with the abbreviation.

The bitter complaints of some Decatur land owners were recalled when reading this part of the weekly news letter of the state department of agriculture:

LAND DRAINAGE IN MICHIGAN

"Land owners of the state of Michigan apparently realize the importance of proper drainage as evidenced by the number of drains petitioned for during 1945. A recent report submitted to Charles Figy, Director of the Department of Agriculture, shows that at the beginning of January, 1945, the Drainage Division of the Department had on file 147 petitions for the cleaning out, deepening, widening, straightening, or extending of inter-county drains. During the past year 110 more petitions were received, making a total of 257 drains to be worked on during the year. Of this number, 90 drains have been constructed according to plans and specifications and 10 have been declared not practical by the drainage boards."

About the time the agricultural news letter was received there came also a letter from a friend in Detroit asking advice concerning a small property which she has owned here for many years. This is a paragraph of her letter:

"For many years, until last year, the winter tax was only about $25. Last year the drain tax brought it up to nearly $50, and this winter the Mud Lake tax raises it to about $150, and the assessed valuation is only $1,200. I received this year not one cent of income from it. Do all Decatur property owners have to pay at that rate?"

The Mud Lake drain tax falls heavily on about 25 land owners who were assessed for benefit from the drain. Its cost was around $5,000 and even those who favored it did not expect such a heavy expense. Several have been assessed from one to three hundred dollars on small acreage.

The drainage laws need some revision to protect property owners against unduly heavy assessments.

Jessie Savage, An Appraisal of Her Life

By Her Pastor, Rev. Leroy Cabbage.

It does not take a dictionary to describe the life and character of a truly great soul. A very few words suffice. In the case of Jessie Savage four words seem to summarize the principle qualities by which she will be remembered longest.

Mrs. Savage was one of the busiest people in her community. She was an example of the saying, "If you want a thing done well ask a busy person to do it." In her home, her church, her school and her community she gave unstintingly of her time and talents. Few people have done so much so well. She was never idle. One can not imagine her being unemployed. She was ever engaged in doing useful tasks. She embodied the spirit of Industry.

Mrs. Savage possessed an alert mind. Her success as a teacher was due, in large measure, to the fact that she was a great student. Her mind was always hungry for knowledge. No fact was too small to interest her and no problem too great to challenge her. Her advice to a young friend who was interested in one particular field of art was this, "Study world government also." She was at home in her garden among the vegetables and flowers, but she also was at home in the realm of ideas where the destiny of civilization is determined. She knew how to cook a good meal but she also knew the significance of the currents of world history. She embodied the spirit of intelligent inquiry.

Although she had exceptional ability and knowledge in many areas of life Mrs. Savage possessed the beautiful simplicity of a child. She was unspoiled by selfish pride and egotism. When for publicity she was requested for information relative to her accomplishments she recently replied, "I am only a country gardener." When elected to the highest office which her church could bestow upon its members she was reluctant to accept because she felt herself unworthy of the honor. And it was only when her pastor reminded her of the opportunity to serve the youth of the congregation that she accepted the office. She was not interested in prestige. Ostentation was foreign to her nature. She could laugh at pomp. She judged herself and others by truer standards. She embodied the spirit of humility.

Perhaps the outstanding characteristic of Mrs. Savage was respect for the opinions of those who differed with her. Her own ideas were well grounded. Her convictions were deep seated. She based her beliefs upon logic and reason. "She was not blown about by every idle wind of doctrine." But the spirit in which she held her views was always irenic. She could be a friend to those with whom she could not agree. She believed in free discussion. She knew the truth is too great for any one mind to comprehend. She followed the light as she saw it and expected others to do likewise. She regarded all honest thinking as a search for the truth and believed sincerely that the cause of truth is best served by encouraging people to think for themselves. She was always willing to share her ideas but refused to impose them upon others. Her life was a rebuke to bigotry. She embodied the spirit of tolerance.

The four words that seem to describe the life and character of Jessie Savage are Industry, Inquiry, Humility and Tolerance. Our best memorial to a great friend is to emulate the good which we have found in her. Let us not merely talk about her, let us put into practice the virtues by which she is best remembered.

THE PASSING OF MRS. H. H. SAVAGE

Decatur people were shocked last Friday morning when the news spread through the village that Mrs. H. H. Savage had passed away. She had seemed to be in good health and a recent check-up by her physician verified this impression. She had comjoyed another successful school year in June and was enjoying work in her garden and keeping up with the numerous activities which always crowded upon her. She was bright and active, buoyant with good cheer, the joy of living and doing for others. In her quiet way she did so much to give happiness to those with whom she came in contact that her own cup of happiness seemed always to be running over.

Two weeks ago Tuesday Mrs. Savage went to Lowell, near Grand Rapids, to spend a week with her daughter, Mrs. Richard Court, and family. Thursday evening they went to the movie, and when the play was about half over she fainted. She recovered sufficiently to walk out of the theatre and was driven home. The local physician did not at first consider her dangerously ill, but she did not improve. Mr. Savage went to see her Sunday and remained. Wednesday she took a turn for the worse and was taken at once to Blodgett hospital, Grand Rapids, where she passed away at 7:25 last Thursday evening. The cause of death was given as cerebral hemorrhage.

The body was brought to the Newell and Son funeral home Friday and a funeral service was held in the Presbyterian church at 4:30 o'clock Sunday afternoon. Rev. Leroy Cabbage gave an eloquent sermon in which he paid tribute to her upright generous life which had won the admiration and esteem of the community.

Early Monday morning the body was taken to Chicago for cremation.

Jessie Edna Kern was born in Volinia township, Cass county, Michian, October 28, 1886, and passed away at Blodgett Hospital, Grand Rapids, Michigan, July 18, 1946. She was the daughter of Frank L. and Edna Huyck Kern. Her early girlhood was spent on the farm of her grandfather, Richard Huyck, north of Nicholsville.

[illegible] graduation from Decatur [illegible] school in 1905, she attended [illegible] Michigan College in Kalamazoo.

She was united in marriage to Hollister H. Savage of Marcellus, October 23, 1907.

In 1923 the family moved from the farm home southwest of Marcellus to Decatur where she became a teacher in the Decatur public schools. During her teaching career she took an A.B. degree from Western Michigan College.

CARL SQUIER A WORLD LEADER IN AVIATION

Harry Stern writes from his home in Clinton, Illinois:

"I am enclosing some pages from the latest Time magazine as I believe you and some of your readers will be interested in reading about a former townsman and native son of Decatur who has done things in a big way. I hope you and my other friends in Decatur are enjoying the best of health."

The enclosure was the story of the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation and of Carl Squier, one of its organizers and one of the five men responsible for its remarkable success.

We received also a copy of the magazine from Merle Leighton who seldom lets anything of interest about the home town get away from him.

Carl Squier is a son of Harley Squier who now resides in Buchanan, but has lived the most of his life here in Decatur. Carl's grandfather was David A. Squier and his uncle Emory H. Squier, the two having held the office of supervisor of Decatur township over forty years. Carl went to school here, was in the first World War and afterward got his start in business in Detroit. He has made his way up in the business and financial world by his own efforts and unaided. His mother was the lovely Sadie Brown Squier, daughter of Amos Brown of Columbia township, who passed away many years ago.

Following is a portion of the Time story which refers to Carl Squier:

"In Burbank, Calif., one day last week, a big shark-bodied plane rose from the Lockheed Air Terminal, circled out across the San Fernando Valley and headed east over the mountains. It was a notable event and a red-letter day for Pan American Airways: that was the first of the fleet of Lockheed Constellations for Pan Am's globe-girdling routes.

"One day Bob Gross (a Detroit financier) got a phone call. The caller introduced himself as Carl Squier, general manager of the Lockheed Aircraft Co. Gross had never met him, but Squier, a crack salesman who made it his business to know people, had heard of Gross. Over the phone, Squier sold Gross the idea of forming a syndicate to buy the moribund Lockheed Co. He did, and they did—for $40,000. Bob Gross got 40,000 shares of stock, still owns 36,000.

"Bob Gross and gregarious, sport-jacketed Carl Squier began operations with 15 employes and only $800 in the bank.

"Gross knew what the trouble had been with Lockheed. It had been making planes for the small private-plane market, instead of for the big airlines. Lockheed could not hope to buck Donald Douglas, whose DC-2 dominated the two-engined field. The only hope seemed to be in the small transport field. Gross decided to gamble. He spent $139,400 on the Electra, a ten-passenger, all-metal plane for small airlines. The gamble paid off. Gross sold 40 of them the next year and put Lockheed into the black. Lockheed then tried a bigger plane, Model 14. It sold, too, and Howard Hughes dramatized the plane to the world by flying one around the globe for a new record: 91 hours, 17

The Big Time

"When war was near, Salesman Gross sent Brother Courtlandt to London to sell Lockheeds to the British. The answer was no, thanks, British industry was "quite adequate." Months later, Gross learned that the British were sending a commission to the U. S. to buy planes after all; the commission would be in California within five days.

"In that time, Lockheed's engineers turned out a complete wooden mockup of a reconnaissance bomber adapted from the Lockheed 44. When the British arrived at Burbank, those who liked golf were put up at the Riviera Country Club; those who liked city life were quartered in a midtown hotel. Result of these tactics: Lockheed got a $25,000,000 order for 175 military versions of the Lockheed 14, which the British called Hudsons. It was the largest single order any planemaker had ever received.

By spring, Lockheed landed another $65,000,000 order for Hudsons. Said Gross: "That really put us in business." When war came, Lockheed, like other plane companies, did not merely expand, it exploded.

The Job

Lockheed's payroll, which had risen to 2,500 workers in 1939, skyrocketed to a peak of 90,000. Its planemaking spread the plants over 7,688,000 sq. ft. of floor space (v. 59,600 sq. ft. in 1932). Still there was not enough to take care of the flood of war orders. The assembly line for the Lightning (P-38), a flashy two-engined fighter designed for the Royal Air Force, finally ran right out of the shops in a weird S curve. Eventually 30% of Lockheed's production was being done outside."

The men at the head of the Lockheed plant are Bob Cross who receives a salary of $112,500 a year, his brother Courtland, 41 years old, who receives a salary of $60,750 a year, Cyrel Chappellet, 40, salary $58,500; Hall Hibbard, 42, salary $58,500, and Carl. Of the last named Time says,

"Carl B. Squier, 52, the $58,500-a-year vice president in charge of sales and service. An Army pilot in World War I and later a barnstormer, Squier is the only top executive at Lockheed who can fly an airplane."

THE STORY OF DECATUR

(This brief but well written history of our village was written by one of our townsladies and read by her before a meeting of the rural letter carriers of Southwestern Michigan held at Grand Junction Saturday evening, March 16. The Ladies' Auxiliary to the Rural Carriers Association of Michigan is compiling stories of all of the towns of the state which have rural carrier routes, and this story of Decatur will be one of the collection. The writer's name is withheld at her request.)

The township of Decatur, which was named in honor of Commodore Stephen Decatur, one of the nation's naval heroes, was organized in 1837, by legislative enactment and embraced within its limits the present townships of Decatur and Porter,—the latter having been set off and organized into a separate township in 1845.

Joseph Beers and Samuel Sherwood of New York had become owners of a large tract of government land in which was included the site of the present village of Decatur. In 1848 the Michigan Central Railroad had been completed to Niles and these gentlemen conceived the idea of laying out and platting a village along the line of that road, which they did. They donated the site for the depot buildings which were erected the same year.

Two streets, one on either side of the railroad and running parallel, were laid out and named Beers street and Sherwood street. Buildings lots were surveyed and a few humble homes were erected. Hiram Lee was the first to purchase a village lot.

C. S. Tucker opened the first boarding house which later was converted into a hotel known as the Decatur house. A school was established for the twenty children with Miss Sarah Cook as teacher. Church services were held in private homes. Thus at the end of two years we find the beginning of a little community to be known as Decatur, being named after the township in which it was located.

Prior to the coming of the railroad, transportation was over plank roads and by stage coach, or if the distance to be traveled was not too great, oxen were hitched to the farm wagon. Shopping was done in Kalamazoo or at a little settlement about 12 miles distant known as Lafayette, later named Paw Paw.

This little settlement of Decatur, located at the edge of a large impenetrable swamp, was surrounded by forest on every side in which various kinds of game abounded. Many stories are told of encounters with panthers and wolves. Timber was plentiful and the hum of the steam saw mill soon became a familiar sound.

Other early industries were the manufacture of staves, hoops, barrels, heading, measures and various wood products. Two huge grain elevators stored the crop from the outlying farms and it was a familiar sight to see a long line of loaded wagons waiting their turn to ascend the inclined driveway to the storage pit. The first flour mill was destroyed by fire at an early date; was rebuilt only to be destroyed by fire the second time.

In 1849 a road was completed across the swamp south of the village, thereby giving the early settlers of Prairie Ronde access to a trading center. Decatur was growing slowly but surely. Cattle were driven in for shipment to market. Tan bark was hauled from Bangor to a local tannery where hides were made into leather.

At the end of five years after its incorporation the village had 75 buildings, including a new school house and church structure, within its boundaries. Stores, shops, taverns and a post office came into existence. Mr. Sherwood was the first postmaster. These were boom days.

Gradually the forests disappeared and the wood working industries faded from sight for lack of material with which to keep them going. Meanwhile the swamp lands were being cleared, drained and brought under cultivation, which was an enormous task.

Only the early pioneer farmers can ever know the true meaning of this reclamation project. Blasting stumps, pulling and piling roots for burning, water flooded areas, sink holes, mud shoes and rattle snakes were common topics of conversation. The dredge helped to channel the excess water into a main drain, smaller ditches were dug and tile was laid, turning this waste area into a vast garden.

Decatur is nearly 100 years old now and is planning to celebrate its centennial anniversary in 1948. Let's look at our little village today and observe the outcome of 98 years of progress.

We are located on the main branch of the Michigan Central Railroad (now N. Y. C.) between Detroit and Chicago, which gives us easy access to several large cities. M-40, a two-lane paved highway, passes through the town and good tarvia and gravel roads reach out in every direction. Our system of city water, electricity, gas and telephone are considered essentials and no longer luxuries. Our shops and stores supply our every need. Eight churches minister to the spiritual needs of the community, each has its own pastor and enjoys a goodly attendance.

We have one of the finest schools in southwestern Michigan, with two modern well-equipped buildings, college trained teachers and an enviable enrollment. From its doors many favored sons and daughters have gone out into the business world. Names like Dr. D. K. Rose, Film Editor R. J. Kern, Ventriloquist Edgar Bergen, Lockheed Vice Pres. Carl Squier and Financier Floyd Odlum were once familiar on the campus and in the halls.

Educationally ambitious, Decatur made a strong effort to locate the Normal College on the banks of the Lake of the Woods in 1903-4, but lost out to Kalamazoo. Excitement and interest ran high and in our dreams we pictured our beautiful lake shore the campus of today's Western Teachers College.

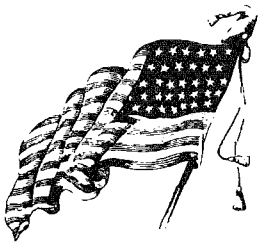
Our postoffice enjoys second class rating and does a prosperous business. Three rural routes are served therefrom covering a total mileage of 162 miles. The Decatur rural mail service was established in 1902 when William H. White was postmaster. Guy Calbetzor and Maynard Thomas were the first carriers, but three more routes were soon added and Stephen Calbetzor, Arthur Brigham and Hal Jones were made carriers. The office continued to support five carriers until about 1930 when two were retired on pensions and the routes re-arranged for 3.

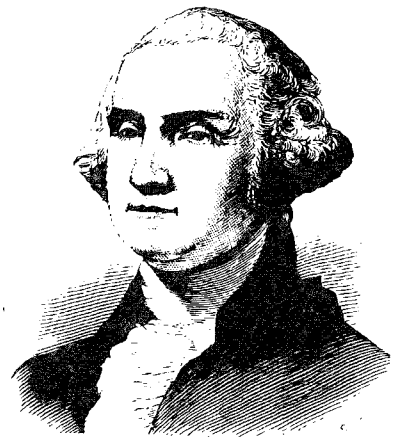
Decatur's industry today centers around her muck land. This fertile black soil yields every kind of vegetable, the principle one being celery. The Kalamazoo Gazette once said jokingly that "Decatur raised the celery that made Kalamazoo famous." Numerous cold storages and warehouses give employment to a limited number of people. Muck land farming is carried on mainly by farmers and gardeners of Holland descent, who have settled here in large numbers.

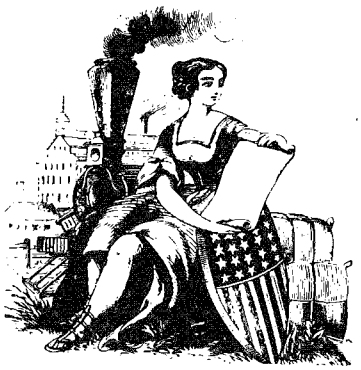
It is a fine sunny afternoon in the spring of 1946 and I shall invite you to take a ride with me over one of the several roads that today cross the big swamp. The deep sandy road bed has been replaced with tarvia and our '42 Chevy covers the ground much easier and faster than did old Buck and Brindle.

Soon we are at the foot of Fifield hill which we will ascend and seek a lookout at the top, enabling us to look back over the road traveled, toward Decatur. Overhead the skies are blue with perhaps an airplane skimming by. The sun is bright and visibility is 100%; such a view. Decatur unfolds before our eyes in a beautiful panorama. A big engine puffing great billows of smoke into the air and laboring with its 100 freight cars is pulling into the station. To the left spreads out the buildings of the big Iodent farm and to the right the sun reflects on the large Becker greenhouses where young plants are grown. In the distance is a tiny spire which proves to be the standpipe of the water works plant. Buildings large and small dot the landscape in every direction. If we remain until evening the electric street lights of the village may be easily seen.

When Stephen Decatur said those famous lines, "Our country! In her intercourse with foreign nations, may she always be in the right; but our country, right or wrong," could he also have had in mind "Our home town"?







LUCY MILLARD'S LETTER

Kendall, Michigan — Feb. 1, 1838

Dear Parents:

With what emotions of soul, I now attempt to address you, is known only to that Being who searches the heart and trieth the veins of the children of men. The Lord has sorely afflicted me, he has made me pass through the deep waters of affliction, he has brought me down to the dust — far from my native soil, in a land of strangers, the Lord God has made me a widow — and my children fatherless — He has taken the companion of my life — the partner of all my joys and sorrows, has taken his flight to the World of Spirit. OH, may that God who has afflicted me pour the balm of consolation into my wounded heart.

Our dear Calvin was sick only eight days and died on the ninth, he was taken ill on Wednesday — but kept out all day clearing timber. That night complained of a bad sore throat with a constant rising of phlegm in the throat. We sent for Mrs. Luke our nearest neighbor, who thought it the quinsy — We applied a piece of fat pork around his neck. Next day said he was better, his right foot then pained him severely — and swelled very large, we sent for Mrs. Luke again — she said it was the inflamatory rheumatism. We bathed it in red pepper and vinegar — she advised him to sweat over a pot of boiling herbs with a coverlet thrown over him. I tried to persuade him not to do it, but he was anxious to try every remedy. This was Monday that he took this powerful sweat. Said he felt better that night. Tuesday night thought he would lie in the bed. We put him to bed, bolstered him up, he was very restless all night. Said he felt an awful pressure upon him, and had a cold damp sweat upon him all night. I got up at two o'clock and made him a bed on the floor. I forgot to tell you that his left foot swelled the same as the other foot — except that it turned black and blue. Wednesday said he was better — appeared very comfortable. Thursday morning Mr. Luke called in to see him. He told him he rested better the last night than any night he had been sick.

I cooked some dried venison and he ate two or three mouthfuls and then we got him on the bed. He slept sometime. I then noticed he sweat profusely, asked him what made him sweat so much, said he did not know. I then felt of his hands and found they were cold and damp. He then wished to get up. I got a chair — said he would have a cushion in it — Louisa and I got himinto his chair and drew it to the fire. I then, for the first time began to be alarmed about him. I saw a change had passed over his countenance. I spoke to Brother Ralph and told him to go after Mrs. Luke, for I thought he was dying. He lived about one hour and half after we got him up. I asked him if he was sensible that he was almost gone and that we thought he had but a little while to stay with us — he bowed his head, but could not speak. Louisa said, "Father, father, have you not one word to say to me?" He was too far gone to notice it. I supported him in his chair until a few minutes before he expired. I was so overcome that Mrs. Butterfield took my place and supported until he breathed out his last. He expired without a groan, struggle or sigh. His countenance was placid and serene in death. He died Thursday, January 25, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon and Saturday the 27th, we followed his remains to the grave. He deceived himself with the idea that he should soon be about his work again, and we were deceived in the same way.

A few days after he was taken sick, said if his feet were not swelled, he would work on a shave horse he had begun. We sent 12 miles for a Physician but he was sick with the fever and ague and did not come — he gave it as his opinion that not any Physician on earth could have helped him. We sent 15 miles for a minister to attend the funeral — he was interned on a little rising hillock in front of our door. A spot that he and I used often to admire — and where he said in a few years he should build a handsome house for us. There on that spot of ground rests the mortal part of my beloved Calvin, he was carried to the grave by strangers and by strangers morned. Yes, here was a side field of usefulness open before him, at the time of his death he was much engaged in the foundation of a school — he used often to say that he felt so happy that his family were on a place of their own — and that he was to work on our own land. He was very ambitious and worked too hard. He said he intended if he had his health, to clear ten acres this winter. They have cleared about five of the ten. — It was my impression that his complaint was lung fever — he could not lie in his bed, unless bolstered up, like a person sitting up. I never saw any person taken so violently as he was and so distressed for breath. I have given you the particulars as well as I can thinking it will be a satisfaction to you. We did all in our power, but the arm of God alone could save him.

God has seen fit in His all-wise dispensation to remove him from the land of the living. He has, I doubt not, obtained an incorruptible crown. My earnest prayer is, that we may bow with submission to the will of Him, who has given, and who has taken away. Write me as soon as you receive this. In my next, I will write you what I intend to do. Whether to go back to Connecticut or not. Do not fail of writing us. Tell Julia to write me or Louisa. I am now writing to Hannah Martin and will tell her to show my letter to Betsy Russel.

The children all send love to you all,

Yours in affection,

THOMAS F. MAHONEY 25 YEARS IN BUSINESS

Thirty-five years on the business street of Decatur! That is the record of Thomas F. Mahoney, and Wednesday, January 22, 1947, he celebrated his twenty-fifth anniversary of being in business for himself. He, the editor of the Republican and Dr. Bope hold the records for length of service in the village.

Tom clerked in the Knight's Grocery Store five and one-half years, in the Potts Grocery Store two and one-half years and in the Rawson Candy Kitchen two and one-half years. On January 22, 1922, he and Jim Hooper bought the building of J.T. Fletcher and opened the Gem Cafe. The latter's health failed and Tom bought him out the first of June. He died in August of that same year.

When the business was formally opened on January 22, Hooper had a more important engagement, that of going to see his girl, and Harold Hudson took his place in greeting and serving the first customers. This week, twenty-five years later, Tom has sent greetings to his old friends, now president of the Alpena Savings Bank in Alpena, and invited him to a return engagement.

Tom Mahoney has stuck to his job through good times and bad, and Mrs. Mahoney has been his faithful helper. Their son, Mike, came home from the army about a year ago and is fitting nicely into the business. We look to see him keep it up and make another record of long and efficient service on the street.

Tom was seventy years old the twenty-ninth of last June. He went through a hard sickness last year but is now going along with his old-time enthusiasm, greeting his friends and serving them the best in his line. His soup is known from coast to coast and will not run out so long as there is water in the standpipe.

THE BELLING OF JOHN FRY

This is another of Ab. Moon's stories:

John Fry was a Decatur carpenter and a world renowned humorist. His son Charles of the Decatur schools resembles him.

John Fry lived in Nicholsville when that once thriving village was an infant, and this is the story:

Away back in the days from the forties to the sixties the belling of newly married couples on the prairie was a religious observance, and the couples who didn't get a visit of this kind felt slighted.

One notable belling was that given John Fry when he was married to Laura Lawrence. Both were highly respected young people and John had himself been a leader in many an affair of this kind and knew he would get his call.

So when he got married he secured a 3 gallon jug of whiskey, and when the boys arrived he came out lugging the jug. He invited the boys to help themselves, which they did.

Now there was something else in that jug besides whiskey, for no sooner had the boys begun to drink than pandemonium broke loose. They got to fighting and acting like crazy men. One fellow had a drunken fit which lasted till the next day and they thought his time had come. It was noticeable that John did not drink any of the stuff, but returned to the house and went to bed.

Some of the boys slept in the fence corners that night, and some slept in the door yard. They all had headaches the next day. John lives in Decatur now, respected and prosperous, and to this day has never told what was in that whiskey.—From the Republican January 12, 1911.

The Village Of Decatur

First Settled Ninety-nine Years Ago.

Accurate information concerning the beginning of the village of Decatur was brought to the Republican by Mrs. James Tweedy. It is in the form of a newspaper clipping of a paper read by Mrs. W. H. Tuttle at the meeting of the Every Tuesday Club December 26, 1899.

The first move toward creating the village was in 1847, one hundred years ago, and building began in 1848. It was because of the coming of the Michigan Central railroad that the settlement was established and the first train passed through here October 7, 1848. Next year being its one hundredth anniversary we can begin early to prepare for the biggest celebration in its history.

Following is the paper by Mrs. Tuttle:

I love to hear old people tell their tales of the past,. for history told by a man who has set his foot on the borderland, where the past and the future meet and blend, in a consciousness of both past and presnt, is more charmingly told than by him who recalls it from dry statistics or coldly stated facts.

The first settlement in Van Buren county was made in what is now the township of Decatur in 1829, and in 1847 Charles Tucker settled on the present site of the village and built a house. In 1847 Beers & Sherwood of New York City had acquired government grants for 5,000 acres of land, in which was included the present site of Decatur, and when the Michigan Central railroad began to push its way westward from Kalamazoo they determined to lay out a village on the line and call it Decatur, in honor of our country's celebrated naval officer of that name. They donated land for depot buildings, which were put up in 1848, in which year the railway was completed from Detroit to Niles. October 7 of that year an excursion train from Detroit to Niles, in celebration of the opening of the road, passed through Decatur.

Hiram Lee bought the first village lot in 1848, before the village was platted. The first village school was opened in 1848, on the lot now occupied by Mr. Greenman. A school was taught in it during the winter of 1848 and '49 by Miss Sarah Cook, who's pupils numbered twenty.

In 1848 L. R. Barker built a hotel on the corner of Phelps and Sherwood streets. In the following year Col. Phelps, who was the postmaster for a long time and for whom our main street was named, opened a store on the lot now owned by Mr. Brigham, and for a year it was the only store in town. At this time most of the trading was done in Kalamazoo and Paw Paw. The Dixon store now owned by E. P. Hill was esteemed a fine establishment for that day,. some thought it finer than was needed.

The completion of the swamp road in November, 1849, opened communication with the surrounding country and gave to the new village a decided impetus.

The village was first incorporated by the board of supervisors in October, 1859, and afterwards rechartered by the legislature, by an act approved March 16, 1861. The first president of the corporation was E. P. Hill, the first recorder, Orrin T. Welch. One curious provision existing in the act was that the president and trustees should receive no compensation, but may once a year have a free dinner at the expense of the village.

In 1850, Beers and Sherwood engaged Nathan Wilcox to put up a steam sawmill at the west end of Delaware street, just out of the village. This mill was afterwards converted into a distillery, which has happily disappeared, leaving only rank grass to mark the spot it once defiled.

Decatur's first physician was Dr. Bartholomew, who put up in 1848 a small office and drug store on Sherwood street, the building afterwards doing duty as Shulters' hotel.

During Dr. Bartholomew's time Dr. Wells of Little Prairie Ronde visited Decatur frequently to teach singing school and occasionally practiced the healing art in the town. In 1851 Dr. J. T. Keables opened an office in Decatur and for years had the field to himself.

In 1851 the main street of the village boasted the stores of A. H. Dixon, Theodore Phelps and E. Ingals and a bar room kept by Robert Willis. Mr. Willis was known as the wealthiest man in town. At that time the spot now occupied by the thriving village of Decatur was literally in the woods, and the sight of deer and wolves in the very heart of the village is said to have been no uncommon one.

Decatur's earliest newspaper was called the Van Buren County Tribune and its publisher was Charles P. Sweet. The Decatur Clarion, edited by Moses Hull, was the successor of the Tribune.

A postoffice was established about 1852 and George Sherwood appointed postmaster.

Previous to October 15, 1870, Decatur village had enjoyed only such limited banking facilities as were furnished by the private banks of Joseph Rogers and John Tarbell. On this dato the First National bank of Decatur was chartered with a capital of $75,000. A. B. Copley was chosen president and E. P. Hill cashier. Mr. Copley was a member of our state legislature in 1865, '71 and '75.

Oh, What's The Youth?

Visitor: "How old are you, sonny?"

Boy: "That's hard to say, ma'am. According to my latest school tests, I have a psychological age of 10. Anatomically, I'm 7; mentally, I'm 9. But I suppose you refer to my chronological age. That's 8, but nobody pays any attention to that these days."

THE JOLLY OLD PEDAGOGUE

'Twas a jolly old pedagogue, long ago,
Tall and slender, and sallow and dry;
His form was bent, and his gait was slow,
His long, thin hair was as white as snow,
But a wonderful twinkle shown in his eye;
And he sang every night as he went to bed,
"Let us be happy down here below:
The living should live, though the dead be dead,"
Said the jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

He taught his scholars the rule of three,
Writing, and reading, and history, too;
He took the little ones up on his knee,
For a kind old heart in his breast had he,
And the wants of the littlest child he knew:
"Learn while you're young," he often said,
"There is much to enjoy, down here below;
Life for the living, and rest for the dead!"
Said the jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

With the stupidest boys he was kind and cool,
Speaking only in gentlest tones;
The rod was hardly known in his school . . .
Whipping, to him, was a barbarous rule,
And too hard work for his poor old bones;
Besides, it was painful, he sometimes said:
"We should make life pleasant, down here below,
The living need charity more than the dead,"
Said the jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

He lived in the house by the hawthorn lane,
With roses and woodbine over the door;
His rooms were quiet, and neat, and plain,
But a spirit of comfort there held reign,
And made him forget he was old and poor;
"I need so little," he often said;
"And my friends and relatives here below
Won't litigate over me when I am dead,"
Said the jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

He smoked his pipe in the balmy air,
Every night when the sun went down,
While the soft wind played in his silvery hair,
Leaving its tenderest kisses there,
On the jolly old pedagogue's jolly old crown:
And, feeling the kisses, he smiled and said,
'Twas a glorious world, down here below;
"Why wait for happiness till we are dead?"
Said the jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

He sat at his door, one midsummer night,
After the sun had sunk in the west,
And the lingering beams of golden light
Made his kindly old face look warm and bright,
While the odorous night-wind whispered "Rest!"
Gently, gently, he bowed his head. . .
There were angels waiting for him, I know;
He was sure of happiness, living or dead,
This jolly old pedagogue, long ago!

Camp Lake Of The Woods and Camp Greenwoods

The Lake of the Woods camps were opened by Mrs. Florence Greenberg June 30 with an attendance of 145 boys and girls ranging in age from 6 to 16 years. The camping season is eight weeks. The camps were built and operated by Mr. and Mrs. Greenberg until the former's death six years ago, and since that time Mrs. Florence Greenberg has been the sole manager.

In 1934, a married couple purchased a tract of land about two miles from the town of Decatur in lower Michigan, with the purpose of establishing a boys' and girls' camp called after the neighboring lake—Lake of the Woods.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Greenberg were well qualified for the task that lay before them. Mr. Greenberg founded the first Jewish Orphan Home in Canada, and was head of the Marks Nathan Orphan Home in Chicago. Mrs. Greenberg had been a social worker in Chicago and worked hand in hand with Mr. Greenberg after their marriage in directing the home.

The first year at Lake of the Woods was successful enough to insure a bigger and better camp the following year, and this has been the order of events ever since. Two years later, a cornerstone was layed for a separate boys' camp,—Camp Greenwoods. The boys in Lake of the Woods were moved across to this camp, and Lake of the Woods became a camp for girls.

The children now live in lately rebuilt modern cabins with fluorescent lighting, as the camp has become increasingly modern. We boast of running water inside our cabins, separate shower and bath houses, electric cooking equipmentt, and the most modern tools and machinery. Our food is one of the main attractions in the camp due to its abundance, quality, and excellence of cookery.

An exceptionally distinguishing feature of the camp is the health department. When a child has any ailment whatsoever, he is examined by a licensed doctor with the assistance of a registered nurse. If he needs confinement to bed, he is sent to our infirmary which, upon remodeling this year, has been judged so outstanding by the Van Buren County Health Department that they are taking pictures with the purpose of sending them as examples of a model infirmary. We might here mention that the general cleanliness and sanitation of our camp was judged so commendable that a permanent health license is being issued to us, obviating a yearly renewal.

The wide variety of activities have distinguished this camp from others in quality.

We have one of the finest riding camps. It started when the camp was founded and has grown with it in size and quality. A large riding staff, a special site for barns and pasture, and an expensive supply of tack has made this department equivalent to the better riding stable two months out of the year. The horses were once kept all year—either rented out or moved to a neighboring farm for the winter, but at the present time they are bought at the beginning of the season and sold at the end of it. The riding instructors have always been experts in their field with varied types of experience behind them such as service in the Austrian Cavalry or western "bronc busting."

Swimming or waterfront activity is the most important of all in the camps, and one which we may be very proud of. Constantly under Red Cross supervisors, who hold degrees in life saving, water safety, and Red Cross instruction, there has never been a drowning or even a serious accident, although the campers sometimes swim as much as three or four times a day. The boating section has afforded much pleasure to the children, steadily enlarging the number and kinds of boats to include canoes, rowboats, motor boats and even sailboats.

Another important part of the camp may be grouped under the heading of "Athletic Activity." Almost every sport known to man is taught here, under the supervision of trained instructors who are usually physical education instructors or renown in elementary or high schools. They all have many years of experience in working and coaching both in school and out, handling classes in the form of clubs and organizations beside regular school. Such sports as riflery, under the supervision of ex-army instructors, archery, baseball, tennis, soccer, basketball, wrestling, boxing, volleyball, tumbling, ping pong, and others are taught to the boys' camp, and the more gentle ones on the girls' side.

Handicraft has always been an important part of camp. Both camps have set aside an entire cabin for the explicit purpose of teaching handicraft and harboring the materials. Such subjects as leathercraft, ceramics, craft strip, wood burning, plastics, plaster mold, painting, macaroni beading, drawing, and wood model building are taught. The children always have something to take home as a sample of their efforts.

Many outdoor camping activities are gradually being worked into the schedule, as the war has ended and equipment has become more available. A new station wagon has already arrived, and another is on order. With the use of these wagons, the children are being taken on all day "hikes" to Palisade Park, near South Haven, where they play, swim, and eat in the open air. Boat trips to a plot of land across the lake are made early in the morning, on which breakfast is cooked out doors and eaten. Similarly, a group may leave early the night before, and sleep overnight in this same place in bedrolls fashioned from blankets. All this valuable experience is topped by the fact that again we have trained and experienced guides to supervise and instruct on these hikes.

Cultural subjects are also stressed on both sides of camp. The girls are tutored in charm, dancing and dramatics, to develop self confidence and personality. A camp newspaper and library are run for boys and girls to help the campers develop literary skills. The addition of such activity helps to round out the camper's day and insure a full development of all his capacities. The teachers in all these subjects are professional degree holders in this field, and some are active as teachers and principals in the city.

A great deal of miscellaneous activities add variety to the camper's life. After supper activities include plays, stunts, athletics, campfires, quiz programs, contests, and movies. Almost weekly a special day is worked into the program such as "Pirate Day" on July 12, when the boys dressed up as pirates and played pirate games all day. Other special events include Visitor's Day, and several special dinners as the one on Mrs. Greenberg's birthtday. Inter-camp dances are held weekly, as are religious services. One of the most enjoyable events for the children takes place when they are allowed to go to town, see a movie, enjoy some delicious sodas, and mix with the friendly townsfolk.

It very rarely occurs that a camper leaves at the end of a season with any other feeling except that of exaltation at a very happy experience and a deep wish to return.

HIDE AND SEEK

Bushel o' wheat, bushel o' rye,
How swift those days have all passed by,
How I'd like to live those days once more,
The days of my childhood so long ago.
Those days so free from care and strife
So full of the mysteries of life,
Bushel o' wheat, bushel o' rye,
All tain't ready holler I.

On grandpa's farm at the close of day
How we loved to hide in the new mown hay.
Out in the cornerib, up in the mow,
In the horse's manger, beside the cow,
Behind some loose lumber ,or the pig pen door.
Seeking a place never thought of before.
Bushel o' wheat, bushel o' rye,
All 'taint hid holler I.

1, 2, 3, for Maggie and Clare
O, you have changed aprons, well I guess that's fair,
You both get in free for that clever trick.
One, two, three for Johnnie and Dick.
O, you have changed shirts, and pants too I see,
That puts you in free and the joke's on me.
A bushel o' wheat, a bushel o' rye,
All 'taint hid holler I.

Local History Papers to be Written by Junior High Pupils for the Norman E. Webster Award.

Norman E. Webster of New York City, graduate of the Decatur high school class of 1884, delivered the commencement address to the class of 1945 and at its close returned the check for $40 he received for traveling expenses with the request that it be awarded as prizes for the best papers by pupils on local history.

A definite plan has been worked out which is in a fair way to be developed as time goes on into an interesting feature of the school work.

Miss Catherine Howland has been given charge of the work and the papers will be written by pupils of the Junior High. The project is now under way and the pupils have become decidedly interested in it.

The money will be divided into four awards,—first $20, 2nd $10, 3rd $5, and 4th $5.

Two conducted tours will be taken in the school bus to points of historic interest near Decatur. The first will be to the south and include the Benj. Hathaway farm, the Anderson, Charleston and Nicholsville cemeteries, the site of the old town of Charleston, and of the Morris murder.

The second tour will be to the northwest and will cover the old territorial road, Indian tree near Haydon school, Haydon homestead, site of old Brown tavern, tavern on Rosevelt farm, Rosevelt homestead, early colored Baptist church, site of Millard homestead, etc.

Among the subjects suggested for history papers are the following:

1. Why we wrote these stories.
2. The founding and naming of Decatur.
3. Indian lore—in and around Decatur.
4. Embryonic life in Decatur.
5. Among our pioneers.
6. Early farms and industries.
7. Early churches and schools.
8. The Michigan Central Railroad.
9. The Decatur Republican.
10. The Duncombe House.
11. Men in Public Office.
12. The old town of Charleston.
13. The old brick yards.
14. The old Nesbitt sawmill.
15. Early colored settlement north of Decatur.
16. The old tannery.
17. Old taverns.
18. Saloon days in Decatur.
19. Our community in the Civil and Spansh-American wars.
20. Our Donnybrook fair.
21. Local men of achievement.
22. The Morris murder (unsolved mystery).
23. The old and new swamp roads.
24. The G. A. R. in Decatur.
25. Early lodges.

The Jont and Ellen Goble Museum

By Anna Broekhuizon

(This is the twelfth story in the Norman E. Webster local history contest written under the direction of Catherine Howland, teacher of history and science in the Decatur public schools.)

A quaint, rambling old frame house on Wheeler street houses some interesting antique pieces collected by Ellen and the late Jonathan Goble, both descendants of early pioneers of Volinia and Little Prairie Ronde,—the Gards and the Gobles respectively.

Ellen, her older sister Elma, and her father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. James Shockley, came to Decatur to live in 1871. In 1907 Ellen married Jonathan Goble, whose great grandfather and Ellen's great-grandmother were brother and sister.

After the death of Ellen's parents she and Jont occupied the house until his death in 1940. Since then she has lived alone.

Jont and Ellen loved to re-live the events and scenes of their youth and with that end in view they saved and collected family heirlooms of several generations. The house is furnished with old-fashioned furniture and handiwork of various periods.

Ellen has inherited from her mother an inherent aptitude for all kinds of needlework and handicraft. Besides this natural talent she combines originality and creativeness with a taste that amounts almost to genius.

One of the most unusual pieces of her handiwork is a picture of a girl in a hoop skirt on a black velvet background, made entirely of old and rare buttons. Two other pictures which show originality of design and materials hang in conspicuous places in the home. One has a frame which is made of scalloped black leather from outdated high-top shoes. An unusual cross fashioned of the same material forms the central point of interest. The other, made by her mother, occupies a prominent place over the sofa. Colorful clusters of fruit, birds, and flowers are arranged on a background of spatter work set in a rustic frame of natural wood made by Levi Lisk of Decatur about 1882. This type of picture is known as a "medley." Brass candlesticks, which came from her grandfather, Joseph Gard, occupy a position on either side of the picture. She also has several paintings which were done by her in pastel colors and oil paints.

An interesting ornamental piece in her living room is an old stone jar which was covered with putty and then, while the putty was still soft, was stuck full of small, odd household trinkets and a coat of gold bronze applied over all. Above this, hanging on the wall, is an oblong mirror which was made in 1857. As a decorative touch, a small picture in colors has been painted at the top.

A trunk in her bedroom contains old-fashioned bedding and a complete wardrobe of an early day. One of the prized articles in this trunk is a white linen, homespun, candlewick bedspread made by her grandmother when she was a girl in 1829. The design is an all-over pattern in leaves. She borrowed the idea from Mother Nature while boiling sap in the sugar bush. Her old-fashioned quilts are really masterpieces of needlework. Several of them were made by hand in intricate patterns by her mother before 1857. Other items of wearing apparel which deserve mention are two white cotton petticoats which are over four yards around. The tucked underflounce forms a background for very fine deep eyelet work which was done with painstaking care. The pattern was designed and executed by her mother's hand and she worked on it intermittently for 35 years. The trunk also contains a pair of white wool, homespun, knitted socks which are about 75 years old.

One of the hobbies which Mrs. Goble enjoys is making and dressing dolls. Some of them have been dressed in the authentic styles of the early 80's.

There are many valuable old pieces in the museum upstairs. Among them are the first clock owned by the Shockleys, a very old bed with a high head board, old chairs, and three authentic Currier and Ives pictures—"The Little Sisters," "The Little Brothers," and "The Bridal Couple," which are set in homemade walnut frames. One article of interest is an old, old butter ladle which belonged to Mrs. Sarah Goble Gard. It must have seen great service because one portion of it is completely worn away. In one corner of the museum room is a cast iron kettle which once sang its merry song from the "crane" over an open fire place. Near it are several old powder horns, old stone fruit jars, and pewter spoons. Books of great age, and old letters, some of them past the century mark, are among the other relics. Old newspapers form an interesting part of her collection. One paper, called "The Van Buren Republican," is dated back to December 3, 1879. Another, "The True Northerner," is dated December 5, 1873. One of the Decatur Republicans is dated October 6, 1886.

Mrs. Goble's grandfather, Joseph Gard, owned a small, embossed, leather-covered trunk which is among her treasured possessions. It is very old and is lined with a French newspaper which has the date, November, 1667, on one part of it.

The prized keepsake among her old dishes is a copper lustre pitcher which belonged to her Grandmother Gard. The latter died in 1842. Probably the oldest piece which she possesses is a handleless cup and saucer of blue willow ware. Other pieces of china are a Bonning ware teapot, a snuff jar which belonged to Grandfather Gard, and a heavy, stone beer mug.

One section of the museum is devoted to old-fashioned clothing. Hats which were worn at the turn of the century and earlier bring forth amused smiles from visitors. Yards and yards of ribbon went into their construction and feathers and plumes were popular too. At that time anyone who aspired to the milliner's trade had to spend several months as an apprentice before she could practice her art. Mrs. Goble was one of the accomplished milliners of her day.

Among the dresses are some which she and her mother made 40 years ago. They are long and heavy, each one containing many yards of material. Some of them are interlined and fitted with stays to give them shape. It required the precision of an artist to make a dress at that time. This trade, too, required careful training and a long apprenticeship.

One of the most elaborate of the dresses which she has is a fine, white, lace-trimmed graduating dress which was her sister's (1878). The skirt was done in fancy pleating, and the sister must have been very proud to wear a gown of such fine material and workmanship.

Many other interesting relics are to be found in this fine old home.

Jont used to run a column in the Decatur Republican which ran like this:

Jont says—

Does your mind get to running in certain channels such as to wonder how the telephone can talk to you over a wire of short or long distance?

Then there is the telegraph and last of all the phonograph.

Then there comes the radio that tells you all of the news from all over the world just by sounds in the air.

Did you ever stop to think how men and women have had all of these wonderful things for hundreds of thousands of years, that they can talk, and by signs impart everything that has happened in the world?

We would not enjoy any kind of flowers if we had no sense of smell or sight to see them. There is the ear that takes in all of the sounds, and there is the sense of feeling that seems to me to be ahead of all the other senses.

They created man and woman in this world and they are ahead of all other earthly things.

Did you ever ask yourself how many kinds of milk there are in the world? In counting them over do not forget the milk weed and the lettuce, then there is the milk of human kindness.

This is just to get you to thinking.

Jont Goble.

A famous psychologist had finished his lecture and was answering questions from the floor. A meek little man asked: "Did you say that a good poker player could hold down any kind of executive job?"

"That's right," answered the lecturer. "Does that raise a question in your mind?"

"Yes," was the reply. "What would a good poker player want with a job?"

LETTERS

RECALLING EAST DECATUR DAYS

The writer of this letter was one of our classmates in the Decatur high school, and at about this time 58 years ago we were getting our pictures 'took' and worrying over our graduating essays. Bessie was a good pupil and probably knew just what she wanted to say and how to say it. She has made her own way these many years since and has given a good account of herself.

Miss Howland served in the First World War as an army nurse, and now in her years of retirement she has a home in the Women's Cottage, Veterans' Administration Branch, at Los Angeles.

Los Angels, Cal., April 27, 1947.

Dear Arba:

Enclosed is for paper for coming year. Had intended getting it to you before receipt of notice, but as it is becoming increasingly difficult for me to write, I find it is getting much easier to put off writing from day to day. That is my alibi.

I was pleased to receive a call from Homer Howe a few days ago. He was one of my pupils when I taught in East Decatur school about fifty-six years ago.

Homer is well preserved and very active. Of course I would not have known him had I met him on the street. He says he would have been unable to recognize me had I been outside this home. We had a pleasant visit and recalled many of our former East Decatur friends.

I enjoy the letters in the Republican, and especially those late ones which tell of the old East Decatur settlers. I have most happy memories of the home of my uncle, James Howland, where I stayed during the time I taught in East Decatur.

I wish to add my congratulations, 'tho belated, to the many you have received upon the successful completion of 50 years as editor of one of the most interesting papers in the country.

Trusting this finds you well, and that you may edit the Republican for many more years, I am,

Sincerely yours,

Bessie M. Howland.

East Decatur Reminiscenses

The East Decatur picnic will be held at the grove on the farm of Mr. and Mrs. Fred Lemcke the second Sunday in August, which will be August 10.

The Lemcke farm is perhaps better known as the Lewis farm, John Lewis, father of Mrs. Lemcke, having bought it of a man by the name of Jones some fifty years ago.

The Lewises were among the early settlers of East Decatur. Mrs. Orrie Carpenter Clark gave the writer the following sketch of the family:

The spring of 1867 saw a stalwart young man, John Woster Lewis, by name, trek westward, leaving his family behind in New York state, to become one of the early settlers of Michigan.

He settled on an 80 acre farm in East Decatur, spent the summer there, and becoming convinced that it was a good place for a future home, returned to New York that fall for his family.

The family consisted of his wife, Orpha Jane Lyman Lewis and three sons: Millard, aged 13; Henry, aged 11; and Johnny, aged 2 years. That fall of 1867 saw the family settled and beginning in earnest the task of wresting a living from Michigan sand.

Sometime later John Woster Lewis' parents came to Michigan and he sold the south forty, with the buildings on it, to them. He built his own home on the north forty where he lived for over forty years, or until his death in 1910 at the age of 84.

His widow remained some years on the farm until her age and health compelled her to live elsewhere. She passed away in May, 1920, lacking only 20 days of being 91 years of age.

The oldest son, Millard, became a doctor in Boston where he made his home until his death in 1921. He married but had no children of his own and his widow passed on several years before his death.

The second son, Henry, made his home in Hartford, Connecticut, many years. A few months before his death he and his wife went to his only daughter's home in Rochester, N. Y., where he passed away in the early summer of 1930. He left to mourn his loss his widow, Nellie R. Lewis, the daughter, Grace L. Coachman, and two grandchildren, Lawrence and Martha Coachman.

The youngest son, John Lyman Lewis, spent most of his life on a farm in East Decatur, near the old homestead. He passed away in February, 1928, after a very short illness of pneumonia, leaving his widow, Mary Luella, two daughters, Bernice and Helen, and one grandson, Lewis F. Bissell.

A few years later Mrs. Lewis married Melvin Lyle and both are now passed away.

THE NEW POSTOFFICE

Decatur is scheduled to have a new post office location and it will be a jump from the north to the south end of the business street. When a government inspector informed him that he would recommend a new building for Decatur, Postmaster White was ready with a plan. He offered to build a building and rent it to the government for $328 a year. He was so sure his offer would be accepted that he went to Chicago and bought the Duffin lot of May Duffin for $675.

But the First State Bank made a lower bid which was accepted. For $300 a year and a ten year lease it proposed to erect and equip a building 22 x 60 feet with a pressed brick front, and the $300 per year included light and heat.

Postmaster White went on and erected his building anyway, and finally sold a part of it to Frank White, the barber, and the rest to O. W. New-

TRIBUTE TO THE DECATUR PAPER

Fifty years an editor,
Upon the selfsame paper,
With never one peep from you
(That was a naughty caper.)

I think our little paper sure is superfine,
Seems to me it's getting better all the time;

It isn't full of scandals and everything that's bad,
'Tis the nicest country paper, I think, we ever had.

"This Week" is interesting with different topics, nice;
And just that little column is worth the paper's price.
I'm glad to call its editor a sort of special friend,
May he continue many years, are the wishes I extend.

—Nellie Sibley.

When Jesus comes to claim his own,
And we gather 'round that great white throwm,
Will we be as pure as in day's agone,
When we played hide and seek in grandpa's barn?
As we look on those nail-scarred feet and hands
And gaze into the Promised Land.
What will our answer be as we hear Him cry
"Let all who are ready answer 'I'.

Forty Years Ago In Decatur

From the Republican of January 17, 1907, and the Memory of the Editor.

DR. ROSE

We met Dr. Gilbert L. Rose coming out of his office on the evening of New Year's Day forty years ago. It was about six o'clock and bitter cold. The wind was blowing furiously and the air was filled with snow which was relentlessly driven against the unfortunate ones compelled to be out in it.

The doctor had just returned from a drive to see a sick patient in Volinia six miles away,—a twelve mile drive in an open buggy in that terrible storm! He had sent his driver on home to care for the team and himself, while he stopped for a moment at his office. When he came out it was for the last time.

We walked along together to the Thomas (now Brigham) corner, where he turned west. He was suffering from exposure to the cold and could hardly talk, and said he was going to bed as soon as he could get there. He was a sick man. The doctor's home was in the second block on Delaware street.

He went to bed that night and did not leave it alive. A week later we were among the hundreds of sorrowing people who crowded into the big town hall to attend his funeral.

We have told the story of Dr. Rose and his great heart many times and never get tired of telling it. It was brought to our attention this year by T. J. Rosevelt who brought to the office a copy of the Republican of January 17, 1907, containing the tributes to Dr. Rose of Dr. Geo. W. Mahoney and Elder J. H. Hammond. They are both beautifully written and undoubtedly can be found in the scrapbooks of our older residents.

This issue of the Republican contained other news stories which might interest older readers.

Albert A. Abbott was in the real estate business here at that time and Roe Warner sold muck land.

Burrell Van Curen was a Volinia farmer and George B. Rogers was the Decatur township treasurer.

CARL SQUIER

Carl Squier received an appointment as page in the House of Representatives and his grandfather, David A. Squier, took him to Lansing Tuesday morning to begin his duties.

(We were sitting at the typewriter in the office writing items for the paper, even as we are today, when the telephone rang. It was a call from Lansing, and a call from so long a distance was a rare thing to this office in those days.

The call was from Representative Nathan F. Simpson and he said, "I have been given the privilege of naming one of the pages of the House of Representatives and am turning it over to you if you would like it." Somewhat excited we asked, do you mean that I can name a boy for that appointment? "That is right," he replied. Our next inquiry was how much time could I have and the reply was, until one o'clock p. m. It was then 10 a. m.

We rushed to the schoolhouse with two boys in mind, and after talking with Superintendent Hungerford, decided on Carl Squier. Next we saw his father, Harley E. Squier now of Buchanan. He too became excited and said that on a matter as important as that he should have a little time to think it over. We gave him a half hour in which to be at the printing office with his decision. He was there on time with the word that Carl could go. It was then about noon.

At one o'clock we called Representative Simpson and named the boy. At four o'clock we received another call that Carl Squier had been appointed a page in the Michigan House of Representatives, and to have him there the following Tuesday. The appointment was made Friday. It was quick work, and it was the beginning of Carl's unusually successful career.

Carl Squier today is vice president and sales manager of the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation and one of the most valuable men in the aircraft business.

The Old Measure and Stave Factory

Employs 25 Men and Manufactures 60 Dozen Measures A Day.

Taken from the files of the Decatur Republican, Sept. 14, 1899.

The enterprising citizen of our village enjoys a drive with his visiting friend past the vast fields of fragrant peppermint which our muck land so abundantly produces, and with a feeling of pride for his home village, tells of the great work which has been accomplished there, of the many men who find employment and the prosperity which this industry and its promoters have brought to our community.

He should not forget to stop on his return at the Hinckley, Roberts and Co. measure factory and show his visitor another of Decatur's industries which is enjoying a prosperous growing business and is giving steady employment to about 25 men. Mr. Roberts informs the publisher that their business was never better than it is now. Their output is 60 dozen a day and they are nearly 30 days behind with their orders.

A new feature of their business is the manufacture of candy pails which are made similar to the measures with the exception that they do not require the iron bands and are furnished with a cover and handle. The pails are used by wholesale candy houses for shipping candy and the company has sold large bills of them to firms in Chicago, Louisville and the East.

Roberts, Hinckley and Co. Purchase Timber

N. Peterson has sold 300 acres of timber to Roberts, Hinckley and Co., consideration $2500. The timber is on his land west of the village and is to be taken off within a period of five years. To the measure factory this is an important sale, it insuring them plenty of material for the factory for the next 5 years at least. It is also important to Mr. Peterson as it will hasten the clearing of the land which he is already planning to convert into a stock farm.

Reminiscences Of Volinia Township

From the Dowagiac Herald of January 5, 1911.

Two Iron Kettles

Volinia township has two iron kettles which have a history. One of them belonged to Amos Huff, father of Honest John Huff, and is now owned by Frank Judie. It weighs over 1,000 pounds.

The other was owned by Sammy Rich and also weighs over 1,000 pounds. They would hold over 100 gallons each. They are known to be over 75 years old and their origin is lost in darkness.

In the early days the Rich kettle, which now is owned by Will Wright, was used to make potash in. Later it was used in hog killing time.

Once, over 50 years ago, Bennett Copley borrowed it and in one day with the help of 12 men he butchered and dressed for market 65 hogs. Scalding a hog in this huge kettle was a short affair.

The kettle, which was four inches thick on the bottom, was cracked and lead poured into the crack so that its usefulness was not impaired. Loomis and Harvey Warner used this kettle for many years in their sugar bush.

(This story was first printed 36 years ago. Would like to learn the present location of these two kettles. Mrs. Will Wright (Clara Warner) is the only person we know who can bring the story of them up to date. Mrs. Wright had an auction sale of her household goods and farm tools last week Monday and Guy Rutherford was the auctioneer. She is residing in the home of Frank Curtis.

In the sale she advertised two 30 gallon iron kettles, but they have shrunk considerably if they are the 100 gallon kettles of the Dowagiac paper's story.)

Old Settlers of East Decatur

Nina Lee Wertz of Walkerville, Montana, was a daughter of the late Fred and Laura Barnum Lee, who lived in East Decatur from about the years 1870 to 1900. Nina and her brothers Van and Harvey, were born there. Perhaps there are more in the family and if there are will leave it to Nina to correct or add to this story.

Ira Roberts, who now lives in the home of Mrs. Florence High, will celebrate his eightieth birthday the 11th of next April. His parents were Thomas and Lidia Carpenter Roberts, but his mother did not belong to the Frank Carpenter family.

The Tomas Roberts family consisted of the father and mother, and five children. They were Mrs. Edward McAdams, Orris who conducted a meat market in Decatur for many years, Herbert, Ira, and Mrs. Rena Hayden of Kalamazoo. Ira and Rena are living. The family came from Chatham, New York, and located in East Decatur in 1870. They bought their 40 acre farm before they came here. The parents lived there all of their lives and when they died it became the property of Ira. He sold it to Asberry Gayner in 1936. It is located just west of the East Decatur schoolhouse.

Ira and the writer have been planning for some time to drive over the old familiar neighborhood and write a story about it, but the time and opportunity has not appeared. Mrs. Wertz wrote in her recent letter of the families she remembered there, expressing a desire to know more about them and their farms. So we decided to make our trip sitting at the typewriter in the printing office, and this is the story as Ira dictated it.

The families she spoke about were the Carpenter, Howe, Clark, Burhans, Gates, Graham, Ray, McGowan, Elliott, Tip and Levi Caldwell, Ackley and Dunnington families. We will take them up in the order she gave them.

The Carpenter Family

Frank Carpenter and family must have located in East Decatur about the same time as the Roberts family.

The family consisted of himself and wife, Susan Powers Carpenter, and children, Will, Mrs. Ora Clark, Mrs. Belle Barnum, Mrs. Maude Howe, Ross, Erwin, Mrs. Nellie McAdams and Mrs. Altha Elliott.

The Carpenter farm consisted of 80 acres located just south of the railroad and at the fourth crossing from the Decatur depot. They sold it to John Motycka about 15 years ago. The parents spent the last years of their lives with their daughter, Mrs. Elliott, and family in this village.

Ira says they were mighty good neighbors, and always willing to help others when they could. One thing that could be said about Frank Carpenter, and for that matter the whole family, was that if he could not say a good word about a person he did not say anything. He never said an ill word about anybody.

The Howe Family

Enoch Howe and his family lived at the end of the road and his farm adjoined the Carpenters on the north. Enoch's father bought the farm which consisted of 90 odd acres, some time during the sixties. Enoch took it over when the parents died. His family consisted of himself and wife and their children,—Will, now living in Kalamazoo and past 80 years old, Ora, Arthur, Homer, Edith Fletcher, Mary Miller, and Eva Tenpound.

Enoch Howe died on the farm and it was sold over 30 years ago to Ben Bosma. In 1917 it became the property of Joe Lapekas who has made considerable improvement on it. Joe and his wife have raised a big family there and they have all worked and prospered. Three of the sons served in the army and they are all fine young people. Ira expressed his opinion that Joe is one of the best Americans we have in the county, and that he bought the most war bonds. The writer concurs in his opinion.

The Clark Family

Marvin Hinkley owned an 80 acre farm about a mile north of the Joe Lapekas corners. He sold it to Ben Clark sometime in the eighties. Ben's first wife was a Tinkham, an aunt to Hattie Tinkham Hill of Seattle, Washington. She died there and Ben later married Ora Carpenter. Some 40 years ago he sold the farm to John Andrews and moved onto a farm north of the Ormsby school house. He died there and sometime later Mrs. Clark moved into a home in town. Ben had no children but adopted Clarence Clark when he was a baby.

The Burhans Family

The Burhans family lived on the farm next north of the Ben Clark farm. They lived in an old log house, locating there in the sixties. Ira cannot remember the first name of the elder Burhans. They were old people when he first knew them. They had two sons, Charlie and Ike, and two daughters, Anna and Stella. Anna married Bert Caldwell and he can't remember about Stella. Charlie had a daughter Minnie who lives in California and visited here a year ago last fall. Ira remembers that Stella was the first wife of George Crossman.

The late attorney Earl Burhans was a son of Ike Burhans.

The Gates Family

Michael Gates, senior, was a soldier of the Civil War. They were located in East Decatur when the Roberts family came here in 1870. The family consisted of Mick, Jr., and three daughters. One of them married Alonzo Lyle, one married Stephen Pepper and the other married George King.

The Gates farm was located on the town line just north of the Burhans farm. It contained more than 200 acres, and is now owned by Joe Matoucek.

Mick Gates, Jr., became the owner of the home farm and he and Mrs. Gates lived practically all of their lives there. They had three daughters and one son. The daughter Lilly died some years ago, and Allie, Jennie and Elmer live in Battle Creek.

The Graham Family

John Graham was also a Civil War veteran. He located in East Decatur before 1870. The Graham farm consisted of 80 acres and was located a half mile west and a half mile north of the schoolhouse. It has been sold several times since the Grahams owned it, and we do not know who lives on it now.

The Graham children were John, Lizzie, Elmer, Jennie, Marshall and Charlotte. John and Charlotte (Mrs. Sherman Deuel) have passed away.

The Ray Family

Edward Ray and family located in East Decatur before 1870. The farm consisted of 118 acres and was located across the road from the Graham farm. The children of this family were Alonzo, Edward, John, Ida, Eva, Jim, Will and Bert. This farm is now owned by Alex. and Louis Popp.

The Ray family are all dead.

The McGowan Family

The Garfield McGowan farm was the William Powers farm. Garfield McGowan married Anna Cook and they bought the farm in the nineties. Their children were brought up there. They are Ray, Ralph, Maurice, Emma, Edith and Alice. All are living but Ray and Alice.

The McGowan farm consisted of 80 acres and was located a half mile west of the East Decatur school house. It is now owned by Arthur Slaughter.

James Caldwell Family

He was always known as "Tip," but I do not know where he got the name. Most all of the old timers had nicknames.

The Tip Caldwell farm consisted of about 60 acres and was located on the corner just a half mile east of the school house. This Caldwell family came from Cooper township in Kalamazoo county in about the year 1870. The four children were Bert, Jay, Ina and Edith.

Bert married Anna Burhans first and they had one son, Verne, who was killed on the railroad about 15 years ago. The first wife died and Bert married a Williams of Kalamazoo. She also died and he finished his days in the home of his daughter-in-law in this village.

Jay now lives in Berrien Springs and will be 80 his next birthday in August. Ina and Edith both died when they were young women.

The farm changed hands a number of times and was owned once by J. G. Hirst.

Levi Caldwell Family

Levi Caldwell was a cavalry soldier of the Civil War. He came to this community after the war and was no relation to the other Caldwell family. He married the widow of Ed. Campbell who was killed at the second crossing from the depot when driving home, back in the seventies.

His first wife died leaving him two daughters, Nora and Mary, and so far as I know both are dead. Nora married Doc. Halsted.

The Ackley Family

Charlie Ackley came to Decatur with his parents and grew up here. He married Clara Jackson and moved onto the Jackson farm. They had two children, Hugh, now living in Kalamazoo, and Bessie Vanderwoude, who lives in Hamilton township and teaches the Lee school. Charlie Ackley, now well up in the eighties, lives in Kalamazoo.

The Robert Dunnington Family

Robert Dunnington's farm consists of 40 acres and is located on the town line just a mile north of the school house. He married Cynthia Sherburn and lived on his father's farm.

Bob Dunnington was what I would call a darn good fellow. Everybody liked him. He didn't take too strong to farming, but he and his brother-in-law, Leu. Salisbury, ran a threshing machine for many years. He ran a threshing machine when they drew the steam engine with an ox team. It was the first steam engine that came into East Decatur.

But what Bob Dunnington could do the best was to play the fiddle. He surely was a dandy fiddler. He and Neal Oaks were a team back in the last century. They played for dances everywhere within driving distance. I remember the last time Bob Dunnington ever played for a dance. He and Neal played for a barn dance at Ben Clark's. It was a wild party and didn't break up till daylight in the morning. That was in 1893.

The fiddlers were disgusted. When Mr. Dunnington got home he threw his fiddle under the bed and told his wife that he would never play for a dance again, and he kept his word.

Mr. and Mrs. Dunnington had five children,—Will, Nellie, Sadie, Arthur and Velma. Arthur and Nellie are living. Arthur is in the State of Washington and Nellie still carries on the farm. She taught school in East Decatur until retiring. She and Mabel Schuneman taught together for something like 30 years. Then the school was reduced to one teacher and Miss Schuneman is still there. All of this time her home has been with Miss Dunnington.

Colored People Of Decatur Give $1500 For Hospital

The colored people of this community are combining their pledges to the $200,000 Lake View Hospital Building Fund Campaign to dedicate a $1,000 Memorial Tribute in the name of the Colored Baptist church, it was announced by General Chairman George Schutt.

Mr. Schutt's announcement, made at the campaign's first report meeting last Wednesday night, brought forth a storm of applause from the assembled workers. "I think this is a splendid thing," said Mr. Schutt. "It thoroughly demonstrates that this campaign has no barriers of race, creed or color."

Already, $782 has been subscribed toward the memorial, according to pledge cards turned in by William Ampey, of rural route 1, Paw Paw, who is directing this special solicitation. The memorial, he said, will be the work room adjoining the nurses station and the pediatric ward.

Pledges totalling $50,180 were reported from the various divisions last Wednesday night. Chairman Schutt complimented workers on their soliciting accomplishments to date and urged them to boost the total to $100,000 by the next report session Thursday evening, August 7.

As yet, no solicitation of pledges for the campaign, aside from that by the Negroes, has been started in Decatur. Chairman Schutt said he is still hopeful that a soliciting organization will be formed for solicitation of business and residential sections of Decatur, saying, "I'm sure that Decatur wants to do its part."

Decatur and vicinity has had 792 patients in Lake View hospittal during the last six years.

The Passing Of Bessie Rogers

And Sketch Of The Lives Of A Once Prominent Volinia Family.

Written for the Republican by Helen Hathaway of Ann Arbor.

The passing to the higher life of Bessie Rogers, late of Los Angeles, California, formerly of Volinia, Cass County, Michigan, marks the end of the life cycle of a family that made a worth while contribution to the history of Cass county.

It may be remembered by at least a few of our community that it was Howard Rogers, who built Volinia's first store, and also wrote the county's first history, which was a work of recognized merit. Some of the older settlers may recall the days when Howard Rogers and his wife, Eliza, lived on a farm at the southern edge of our famed Newton Woods. Among the early memories of the writer were the occasions when she and her mother, Mrs. Kittie Hathaway, gathered bouquets of the beautiful and abundant wild flowers with which that woods abounded, when on visits to the Rogers home. A delightful little creek meandered across the Rogers farm south of the house—one of the joys of the younger generation at that time.

So much for the early setting of the Rogers family. Mrs. Rogers was a sister of the poet, Benjamin Hathaway, and at one time the Rogers family resided on the Hathaway farm. It was at that time that the well known "Dryer" was built, from which the apples of the Hathaway farm and of the neighborhood were turned out as "dried apples" for shipment to the big markets. The old dryer, which had had its day, was taken down in 1910.

The three daughters in the Rogers family were Emma, Ella, and Bessie. Bessie, the youngest, was born November 3, 1868, at Volinia. According to the writer's memory, all three of them taught school; Emma, for about twelve years; Ella, for perhaps five or six years; and Bessie, for just a short time.

A number of those who can remember back for a period of years will recall the Rogers store in Volinia, a general store where just about everything was sold—dry goods, shoes, groceries and candy, then a special treat for the children.

In 1893, the family moved to Copemish, in Manistee County, in northern Michigan. There they continued in the store business and also acquired a farm a short distance from the village. The writer recalls a very pleasant visit to their home in 1905. Mrs. Rogers was still living at that time, but passed on before many years. Howard Rogers had already met an untimely death by being struck by a passing train on a railroad track not far from the Copemish home.

After the passing of Mrs. Rogers, the three sisters made a number of trips about the States, including points in Florida, Texas and California, in search of a desirable spot in which to locate and spend the remainder of their lives together. Bessie spent one winter in San Antonio, Texas, and it is recalled that she spent several winters in Florida. Some of our Decatur people may remember that Bessie spent some time in the home of her uncle, A. B. Copley, in Decatur, helping to care for aunt, Mrs. Jane Helen Copley, during the protracted period of illness that preceded her death on September 20, 1890.

The eldest of the three sisters, Emma Rogers, preceded the other two sisters to California, in 1910. There she was joined by Ella and Bessie two years later. The three lived for a time in Pasadena and Long Beach, but eventually located for good in Los Angeles on North Figueroa Street, right in the heart of that prosperous and growing city.

Emma preceded the other two sisters to her Heavenly home a few years ago, followed by sister Ella sometime in the winter of 1940-41. Since then, Bessie has lived alone in her home, except for the near presence of tenants who rented one, two or more units in or about the home occupied by herself.

It was always considered by the other members of the family that the Rogers sisters were good business women, and the business ability of Ella, in particular, was recognized by all. She had acquired her higher education at what was then the Ypsilanti State Normal College, and her scholarship was, we understand, of a high order. While she taught for a few years, she did not make teaching her life work. Along with the business of the family which she was the major factor in managing, she did a great deal of writing, especially for the Michigan Tradesman, to which she was for many years a regular contributor.

During her later years, Bessie read and studied what is known as "Science of the Mind," which is somewhat on the order of Unity or New Thought. She was a dear, gentle little woman, whom to know was to love. As each sister had her particular part of the work about the home, Bessie did her part; and the writer recalls one letter from the sisters, in which it was related that "Bessie painted the high parts of the house" when it was being painted.

Bessie Rogers passed on May 29, 1947, at her Los Angeles home. Services were held for her at the Chapel of W. A. Brown & Son, on Saturday, May 31st, at 3:00 p. m., Dr. William H. Hunter officiating, with Miss Josephine Hovland acting as organist.

Cremation took place at the Rosedale Crematory, Los Angeles, and the ashes of the three sisters were to be sent back to Copemish.

The following poem appeared in the little folder issued by the Chapel "In Remembrance":—

THE OTHER ROOM

"In my Father's House there are many rooms." John 14:2.

No, not cold beneath the grasses,
Not close-walled within the tomb;
Rather, in my father's mansion,
Living in another room.

Living, like the one who loves me,
Like yon child with cheeks abloom,
Out of sight at desk or school-book,
Busy in another room.

Nearer than the youth whom fortune
Beckons where the strange lands loom;
Just behind the hanging curtain,
Serving in another room.

Shall I doubt my Father's mercy?
Shall I think of death as doom,
Or the stepping o'er the threshhold
To a bigger, brighter room?

Shall I blame my Father's wisdom?
Shall I sit enswathed in gloom,
When I know my love is happy,
Waiting in the other room?

The Michigan Central Railroad

By Kathryn Stanard

(This is the eighth story in the Norman E. Webster local history contest written under the direction of Catherine Howland, teacher of history and science in the Decatur public schools. It is the most complete history of the great band of steel that was laid across the state of Michigan we have yet seen, and it also contains other interesting reminiscences which should be preserved for future generations.)

INTRODUCTION

The story which is about to be unfolded to you is actually one of the Michigan Central Railroad, although there will be special mention of Decatur because of the importance this section played in the building of the railroad.

On March 28, 1846, the state of Michigan passed an act which gave the Michigan Central Railroad Company authorization to purchase the Central Railroad of Michigan for two million dollars. That railroad had been started in 1836 by the Detroit and St. Joseph Railroad company through a charter by the state of Michigan on June 29, 1832. This company was operated by our State Board of Internal Improvements, as property of the state and not of an incorporated company.

The Michigan Central Railroad was not the only one that was to cross the rivers and streams, pass over the hills and through the valleys; and carry the many products of this state. The Southern, Northern, and Central Railroads were also to perform these duties, although the Michigan Central was to play the leading role in the building and growth of the railroads in the Wolverine state.

The rails on those early tracks were not like those of today; instead they were strap rails. These rails were flat and were spiked onto wooden stringers. The rails often loosened and curled up, coming through the floor of the coaches, and quite frequently disabled or killed the passengers.

The early railroads were so dangerous that at last the legislature of 1842 made two resolutions, the first being that "the Commissioner of Internal Improvements be instructed to cause a train of passenger cars to run over the Central Railroad on the first day of the week, at the same hours that it does on other days," and the second "required the Board of Commissioners of Internal Improvements to restrain Sunday trains, when in their opinion, it was not for the interest of the state to run them."

The building of this railroad was very slow. It took nine years to complete the railroad from Detroit to Kalamazoo, a distance of one hundred forty-four miles. By the time the railroad was finished thus far, the funds of the state had been exhausted and the people were tired of having the state politicians build the railroads and wax fat, while the people of the state paid the bills.

The original route planned was not used and the only requirement was that the railroad be constructed at some point in Michigan which would make it accessible to steamboats. This one requirement proved to be somewhat of a hindrance to the state. Van Buren county, which was a new county, changed the route and made New Buffalo the western terminus instead of St. Joseph as was originally planned. This action caused the railroad to cut off only a small part of the southeastern corner instead of going diagonally across the central part of the state. New Buffalo was to become the terminus although it had no harbor of any consequence and never could have.

The success of the railroad is largely due to H. B. Ledyard. In the year 1848 when the state had more funds the road from Kalamazoo to Niles was completed and the next year it was completed to New Buffalo. In 1851 the road was extended to Michigan City, Indiana, and in 1852 extended to Kensington, Illinois. At the same time Michigan Central trains were run from Kensington to Chicago over the Illinois Central Railroad by agreement with that line.

In September of 1848 Mr. J. S. Tuttle traveled the distance from Detroit to Lawton, and gave the following account of the trip:

"In September, 1848, I came from Detroit to Lawton over the Michigan Central, the passenger trains running only as far west as Lawton. From there the four horse stage line took passengers westward."

Early in October the road was completed to Niles, and on or about October, 9, 1848, an excursion train went from Niles to Detroit. The Detroit railway officials furnished free tickets to a number of the citizens of Niles.

The following year the great gold rush for California occurred. The pioneer Californians have since been called the forty-niners.

The state of Michigan commenced railroad building and completed a road from Monroe to Detroit, and from Detroit on west, probably to Marshall, using the flat rail spiked to a piece of square timber laid on the ties.

The state sold the railroad to a New York Company and then continued extending the road west, reaching Niles in October, 1848.

By the time this great road was ready and on its way westward across Michigan, Sherwood and Beers of New York City had acquired a government grant for 5,000 acres of land including the site of Decatur. When the railroad line was laid out, Sherwood and Beers decided to lay a village out and call it Decatur after the famous naval hero, Stephen Decatur.

The Nesbitt saw-mill which for many years was the only one for miles around, ran day and night supplying the railroad's demand for lumber for construction work.

Mr. C. S. Tucker owned a boarding shanty a little way south of the depot in 1849. He kept boarders in a small building which was erected on the site of the Duncombe House by Beers and Sherwood, for an office.

In 1848 Mr. Hiram Lee bought the first village lot. It was the third lot west of the public square near the railroad side which made it the lot next to the livery stable.

Decatur became the main station for the railroad in Van Buren county. Decatur actually sprang into existence at the scream of the first locomotive in 1848.

The property for its depot was donated by Sherwood and Beers and because of all the things these men did for Decatur the streets on both sides of the railroad are named in their honor.

Decatur was an important wheat and lumber shipping point. One of the records of shipments from Decatur is included in this story.

Shipments from Decatur

July	10	22
August	70	15	9
September	58	22	12
October	68	19	17

In the early days the railroad engines burned wood only, and took on water from a big tank next to the stand where they took on wood. The tank was filled by a large horse walking all day on a treadmill.

All the land in early times was covered with oak timber. The owners cleared it away as quickly as possible so that they could put in crops. The M. C. R. R. bought all the wood and ties they could get. All the property south of the present station was covered by wood and railroad ties. Once every year the railroad would bring a sawmill and crew to saw wood into proper lengths for use in the engines. It was then piled in sheds to dry for use next year.

Today in 1947 we find Decatur still exporting much stock and produce, although lumber is no longer exported.

Decatur had two citizens who played an important part in the railroad business too. They were Mr. Hendryx and Mr. William Howland.

In the year 1853 the Michigan Central established an office in New York City, and Mr. Hendryx was given an important position in it. He accepted the position and advanced rapidly until he was contracting freight agent on this great road.

Engineer Wild Bill Howland

One of the outstanding engineers on the Michigan Central was William Howland, born in 1859 in East Decatur, son of Margaret Code Howland and James Howland. He hired out in 1872 as water boy for the section gang for his uncle, James Mahoney. This was followed by a job on the section gang. When he was old enough the following advancements were made: brakeman and later a switch fireman in 1881. He was promoted to fireman in the same year and engineer in 1887. He continued in this job until he was pensioned in 1929 with a record of fifty-six years and seven months. He piloted nearly all of the crack trains and was often called upon to take specials carrying visitors and officials. His pride was that he never over ran a station and had to back the train up. There were no offenses against his record after such a long career, and his time table was law. He brought the first train into the present M. C. R. R. depot in Detroit.

He said the first wreck he ever heard of on the Michigan Central was in the early fifties. A train and a road train met head on during a late November snowstorm at a place known as Spring Hollow about one and three fourths miles east of Dowagiac. The conductor was Lyman Rawson of Decatur.

A Tragedy of the Road

Dr. Mahoney of Chicago, a former resident of Decatur, gives the following account of one of the worst accidents which occurred there. It happened about 1889 or 1890. The fast train going east in the early evening was not scheduled to stop at Decatur, but for some reason it was ordered to stop so the telegraph operator turned on the red light as a stop signal. As the train slowed down, the conductor, Arthur Daily, a fine gentleman, stepped off to go into the office to get his order. He either slipped or made a mis-step, and his feet went under the wheels. The feet and ankles and both legs were mangled. He was carried into the waiting room at the station and laid on the floor. A boy came running up Phelps street for Dr. Rose, but he was not in town and so Dr. Mahoney was called . The doctor found him in great pain and so gave him a hypodermic of morphine to relieve him. Then four men carried him on a stretcher to the Duncombe House and put him in a room on the second floor where they made him fairly comfortable. About that time Dr. Rose came in and, after seeing the patient, wired Dr. Bonine, Sr., to come down from Niles. Dr. Rose did this because Dr. Bonine was division surgeon for the M. C. R. R. He and his son, Fred, also a doctor, came down. The patient was given a general aneesthetic and both legs were amputated about midway between the knees and ankles. He died about midafternoon the following day from shock. He was conscious Sunday so he made his will.

This poem expresses how people used to feel about the trains and perhaps some people feel the same today.

SEEING THE TRAIN COME IN

Oh they's fun enough in Bowersville
Ef you only know the way to find it.
You kin put in time
The whole enduring day
They's lots o' things a happenin'
To make a feller grin;
But the mos' fun's at the depot
When the train comes in.

Of course, they's some excitement
When the mornin' mail gits here,
An' 'lection day's a picnic,
But that's only wunst a year.
But you bet the population
'Ud regard it as a sin
Ef they wuzn't at the depo'
When the train comes in.

The bes' way is to git there
'Fore she whistles by the mill,
'Cause then you git to see her
Come a-sailin' down the hill.
An' she pulls up at the crossin'
Sorta puffin', "How've you bin?"
Oh, they're all down at the depo'
When the train comes in.

You see they wuz a brakeman
Met a girl f'm Bowersville,
An' he married her an' lives here
In that house up on the hill.
Yep, they're doin' well I tell ye—
'Twas Hen Roger's daughter Min—
Sence then all the girls is boun' to See the train come in.

There is very little more I can say except that ninety-nine years ago the Michigan Central Railroad made its way across Michigan bringing with it prosperity. It has, as have many other things in the world, stood the test of time and has lashed out its shining silver rails across the North Central portion of the United States and has indeed become the lifeline of those states which it crosses. The same road which many years ago began its existence as a road sometimes thought of as a folly, has lived to make a history all its own to enrich the world.

Early Churches of Decatur

By Marion Houseman

(This is the fifth story in the Norman E. Webster local history contest, written under the direction of Catherine Howland, teacher of history and science in the Decatur public schools.)

The first church services in Decatur township were held in the log home of Dolphin Morris, south of our village. Rev. William Sprague, a young Methodist, preached the first sermon there in 1830.

After that, services were held near the Morris farm often and people rode for miles to attend them.

The first church that was organized was the First Methodist Episcopal Church. It was started in 1833. Their first quarterly meeting was held in the home of George Tittle in that year. In 1860-61 they built a church on Delaware between Phelps and Williams Streets. It cost the 125 members $4,000. At one time the Sunday school had 170 members. The average attendance was 120. E. F. Ruggles, the superintendent, had eighteen teachers working under him.

The First Presbyterian Church was organized by Rev. Marcus Harrison, an Evangelist, in 1852. Mrs. Lydia Harrison, Mrs. Eli Rich, and Joseph McClintock, the ruling elder, were the first three members. Their first building was finished and dedicated September 18, 1856. The cornerstone of the second building was laid May 26, 1868 on Delaware Street. It cost $6,500 and was dedicated on September 1, 1868 by a Paw Paw pastor, A. C. Tuttle. Rev. Mr. Harrison left after serving three years. The church burned in 1918. It was rebuilt on the same foundation and is still used by the Presbyterians.

A priest from Marshall, Rev. Father Koopman started the Holy Family Church here in 1855. The sacrifice of the Mass was first offered in the homes of Dennis Jordon and Michael Mahoney. Father LaBelle from Kalamazoo served Decatur for ten years.

In 1877 they purchased a building from the Universalists. It was located on the corner of Mills and Delaware streets. Services were held every three months for twelve years. Then they were held every month. They now occupy the old Christian Reformed Church on Delaware street.

Rev. J. Merrifield organized the Universalist Church on May 12, 1868. It had twenty-seven members. In 1869 they bought the old Presbyterian building on St. Mary's street. They sold it to the Holy Family Church in 1877. Their church burned in 1891. It was rebuilt the same year. This building was sold to the Christian Reformed Church. They, in turn, sold it to the Catholics who occupy it now.

On February 10, 1869 a Baptist Church was started in Decatur. It was composed of twenty-six members and the pastor was Rev. Nelson Crandall. It was located on the corner of School and St. Mary's streets. This little church didn't last long.

The Protestant Episcopal Church was organized in 1877 as an auxiliary of the St. Marks Church of Paw Paw. There were thirty members. Trowbridge Hall was rented every four weeks for services. This church, too, has gone out of existence.

The Disciples Church or Christian Church had its beginning in 1855. In 1935 the membership was sixty. Elder J. J. Terry served as pastor. Many of Decatur's most prominent people belonged to this no longer existent church.

In March, 1909, Rev. A. Van Arendonk, Rev. William Pool, and Elder Niesink were commissioned by the Classis of Grand River to start a Reformed Church in Decatur. In years before, Dutch families had moved into this vicinity. They had joined other churches, but it seemed the right time had come to start a Reformed Church here. On March 30, 1909 the families that were interested in the new project met in the Adventist Church. People were received by letters from the former pastors and others were received as members through confession of faith. Some of these first members are still with this church. Mr. G. Mepjans and John Den Herder were the first elders. Mr. John Borst and Frank Vanden Berg were the first deacons. Rev. J. Meeter, the third minister called, became the church's first pastor. The church was first located on Bronson street. Some time the name was changed from The Holland Reformed Church to the First Reformed Church which it now goes by.

On December 12, 1926 a group led by Rev. Brink left the Reformed Church to form one of their own. They called it the Christian Reformed Church. Rev. Steen succeeded Brink in 1927. In May, 1930 Steen left. He was followed by Rev. Hoogland. John Steenwyk came in 1937 and stayed until December 2, 1946. They have no pastor now.

New York C. P. A. Society Honors N. E. Webster

We have received a copy of the Monthly Bulletin of the New York State Society of Certified Public Accountants which announces the retirement of Norman E. Webster as an officer of the society.

Mr. Webster was a resident of Decatur in his youth, graduating from the high school in the class of 1884, and Decatur has always been home to him. He came here from New York City in 1945 to give the commencement address, and returned the money received for his services to the Board of Education to be given in prizes for a contest in papers on local history. This spring under the direction of Miss Catherine Howland, teacher of history and science, the pupils have become enthused over the offer. The result is some very interesting stories on the founding and early life of this community which will be preserved for future generations, and they will all be published from time to time in the Republican.

To Norman Edward Webster

"The New York State Society of Certified Public Accountants on the occasion of the retirement of one of its most highly esteemed members, Norman Edward Webster, from the post which, for seventeen years, he has filled so admirably on the New York State Board of Certified Public Accountant Examiners, desires to record its appreciation of his outstanding services; Therefore, be it Resolved, by the Board of Directors on behalf of the Society, that we here record our appreciation and admiration of the skill and sympathy with which our friend and companion, Norman Edward Webster, has guided the activities of the Board of Certified Public Accountant Examiners, ever watchful of the rights of all who came under its influence, and ever careful to uphold and foster the dignity and independence of all Certified Public Accountants; and that we here extend our thanks to him for his lifetime of work for the profession which he has so signally adorned by service to this Society as vice-president and director and to the profession throughout the nation, through his writings, his wise counsel and his stimulating and inspiring leadership in all things that have to do with the advancement of our profession. The influence of his busy, eager life will continue through all the years ahead."

Hamilton Cemetery

I have been requested to give a little write up on the Hamilton cemetery which I will do now. I have worked in this cemetery much of the time for the past fifty years, and have been the sexton for the past 34 years. The first sexton that I know of was Philo Selby, my great uncle. John Young was sexton for a long time and so was my grandfather, S. W. Richmond, Sr. I took the job over from one of these men. Being sexton of Hamilton cemetery has been pretty nearly a lifetime job. There is something about the job, I don't know what, that one gets interested in it. It may be a desire to have the resting place of our relatives and friends who have gone before as well kept and attractive as possible. I know there is never a time that I cannot see something to do to make it more beautiful, and I am not always able to do everything I would like to do.

According to history, Hamilton township was first called Covington, and then Alpena, before its permanent named was fixed on as Hamilton.

The cemetery was laid out in 1840. The township was called Hamilton then, and the cemetery was named for it. It was laid out in section 16 on the Territorial road about half way between Decatur and Keeler.

The first plat consisted of 2½ acres and there have been three additions that I know of. I think the last one was added in 1910, and now the cemetery contains between eight and nine acres.

When I first knew about Hamilton cemetery it was enclosed with a nice board fence about four feet high. It had one double gate and a flight of stairs leading from the east and west side to a platform above the fence, and another flight of stairs leading down into the cemetery. I was told by the late Minnie Nesbitt that a Mr. Searles was the first to be buried there.

Calvin D. Millard once told me that his grandfather, Calvin Millard, died in 1838, two years before the cemetery was laid out. He was buried on the King farm northeast of Decatur, where he lived. His body was removed to the cemetery and may have been the second one buried there.

Some of the first settlers of the township who are buried in Hamilton cemetery are Robert Nesbitt, who became a resident of the township in 1835, Aaron Barney, who became a resident in 1835, Reason Comley, who moved to the township in 1836, Joseph McClintock in 1836, Philotus Haydon in 1836, Henry Collins in 1859 and G. G. B. Yeckley in 1860.

There are 675 lots and from 1,500 to 1,800 graves in the cemetery. There are a thousand monuments and markers of all sizes, shapes and materials. 56 veterans of three wars are buried there. Forty-five of them are veterans of the Civil War and I am unable to furnish the names of all of them.

The Spanish-American war veterans are Charles Cook, Henry Cook, William McIntyre, Curtis Johnson and Bret Cockett.

The veterans of World War No. I are Jay Hamilton, Clarence Broadhurst, Leland Johnson, Jack Kruger, Lawrence Grice and Norbert Neville.

People who have relatives buried in Hamilton cemetery are living in Arkansas, Texas, California, Washington, Florida, Indiana and Illinois, besides Michigan. Every city, town and village within forty miles of the cemetery have relatives buried there.

At Decoration Day time many of the relatives drive here for the day and it is the greatest event in the township during the year. One of the nice customs of the township, adopted many years ago by the township board, is that at Decoration Day time a flower is planted on every soldier's grave.

The Memorial Day observance is placed in the hands of a different committee each year. This year the committee is composed of Mr. and Mrs. John Vandenberg.

BROWN'S TAVERN

The old building once known as Brown's Tavern is being removed from its original site to the farm of Lyman Phelps.

It was built in 1837, the year Michigan became a state by Henry Coleman, father of Jerome Coleman who became a prominent lawyer of Decatur. Henry Coleman was also the great grandfather of Donald, Hal and Bess Kern.

The building was first called "Coleman's Stand." It was located on the stage road between Detroit and St. Joe. More through stage coaches stopped there each day than there are passenger trains on the Michigan Central today, and the 'Stand' was known the whole length of the line.

Horses were changed there.

Mr. Coleman sold the tavern to Isaac Hall and he sold it to John Brown (but not the John Brown who was hung to a sour apple tree.)

John Brown changed the name to Brown's Tavern and it became a noted place in those wild Civil War years.

After Brown's time the tavern was run by Bartholomew and then by Kirk Stearns, uncle of Frank and Bine, and Mrs. Chaffin of Niles. Finally Mrs. Lampham got it and has just sold it to Mr. Phelps.

The building was abandoned as a tavern and used as a dwelling house. For the past two years it has been vacant.

Many wierd stories have been told about the place when it flourished as the old Brown's Tavern.

The Oldest and Biggest Living Thing

By C. C. Evans

Through the lens of the camera we are shown and told the story of the giant Redwood trees. Chronology informs us that when Joshua demanded the surrender of Jericho, these giants were over 3,000 years old.

I stood beside the General Sherman tree, the oldest in the grove, estimated to be 5,000 years old. I thought for thousands of years these trees have been silently absorbing for their sustenance and growth the elements which nature has provided here in such abundance.

Some of the stupendous specimens, still healthy and vigorous were already giants when Cortez first stared at the Pacific, and all his men looked at each other with a wild surmise, silent, upon the towering peaks of the high Sierras. And here these same monarchs of the forest stand today in all their majesty and splendor, linking the present through the hoary centuries to a far distant past.

These trees are the supreme example of the earth's vegetation. They are remnants of an ancient family that now survive to "connect us by hand touch with all the centuries they have known."

Well I think I should first speak about Michigan's largest tree. You have merely to drive to a point about 8 miles south of Decatur, to what is known as Newton woods in Cass county. It is a tulip tree 6½ feet in diameter at a point about 5 feet above the ground and is 150 feet high. Geologists claim this tree is about 250 years old and contains some 8000 board feet of lumber.

Now for California I saw some trees in Redwood Empire that really dwarfed my mind when I think of our Michigan's largest tree. I saw one that measured 107 feet in circumference, and I saw one, the tallest tree on earth, 364 feet high, and estimated to contain 125,000 feet of lumber. Then I saw another tree called the Neckbreaker, 300 feet high, a splendid specimen of clear redwood, free of limbs for a distance of 200 feet, also the Cathedral group of 18 trees from one base. The base is 110 feet in circumference, height 300 feet, and said to be 4,500 years old. These supreme examples of the earth vegetation stands on the western slope of the Sierra Nevada range in California.

The Weaker Sex

"Women are not very strong physically."

"Perhaps not, but they can put the lid on a fruit jar so tight that it takes a man twenty minutes to get it off."

"You are not past hope mentally if you can remember that you have forgotten something, even if you can't recall what it is."

East Decatur Pioneers

(The chapter of the pioneers is written by Marietta McDole Taylor, whose ancestors located in East Decatur over eighty years ago. The Eastman family have been mentioned in several of the articles, and this more complete record of them comes in nicely here. Others of the younger generation are invited to follow Marietta's lead and help to keep the rugged pioneers from being forgotten. We owe much to them for clearing the land and building the homes in which today their grand children and great grand children and some entire strangers to them, now enjoy the comforts and luxuries of modern life. Our thanks to Marietta for her much appreciated congratulations.)

East Lansing, Mich.
Route, Box 363,
Feb. 28th, 1947.

Dear Mr. Moulton:

Just received this week's issue of the Republican and have been interested in the articles about "Early Settlers of East Decatur." I wondered how my grandparents' name had been omitted, but I notice that Mrs. Strang remembers the family in part.

I have a few dates and facts as Mother used to tell them.

My grandfather and grandmother came to Michigan from New York state, and before coming to East Decatur to live, they located in Grand Ledge, Michigan. My mother, Hattie Eastman McDole, was born in Grand Ledge in 1860. My uncle Will, mother's youngest brother, was born in 1864 on the old homestead in East Decatur, so the family of Lyman and Margaret Eastman moved to East Decatur between the years of 1860 and 1864.

The Eastman family or children were Anna, Lillian, Carrie, Hattie, Neuton, Charlie and William.

My mother was the last of the family to pass away, and she passed away at 83 at my home August 3, 1943, in East Lansing and was buried on the family lot at Lakeside in Decatur.

However, my aunt Celia Eastman, the widow of Neuton Eastman, is living at their old home in Arlington township, Lawrence, Michigan. She is in her late eighties and has partially recovered enough to be about the house since she broke her hip and collar bone about a year ago. Her daughter and family live with her and Myrta Eastman Alderman, the daughter, has the family Bible and might be able to furnish you with any additional information you might need.

My mother and father were married at the East Decatur home in 1880. She used to speak so often about the schooldays, singing school and neighborhood get-togethers they had at the old East Decatur schoolhouse with all the named families of the community you mentioned in previous articles. They must have had grand times.

She liked to attend the East Decatur annual reunions, held in recent years, and I have wondered if the secretary of that group ever had a record of the families. Perhaps Mary Roosevelt might recall, as she most always attended with her Mother, Allie Durkee Roosevelt.

My grandfather died before I was born, but I remember my dear little grandmother very well and after the East Decatur home was sold she bought a home in Decatur (present home of J. G. Hirst). The back acres on the farm were sold to the Lewis family. My grandmother Eastman died about 1905 in her home at Decatur.

There is not much sequence to these facts, but it may help you and Mr. Roberts to complete your story.

I have been using any spare time I had, these long winter days, making a scrap book of all our trips to the West and Southwest we have made in recent years. To make it more interesting, I am typing all the interesting details from our trip logs and inserting pictures (many in color) maps, racial customs, geographical data, etc. We collected plenty at our many stops in the various states. We crossed twenty states, some of them twice on different highways on return trips, all of them have their different climates, customs, crops, even wild flowers and we think this will be a nice way to keep such a delightful experience fresh in our memory,—sort of a preparation for "rocking chair days," which some days don't seem too far away.

We also have several movie films in color which we took on our trip last year. Some of the highlights were Rodeo and parade at Phoenix, Arizona and the Grand Canyon. Film was hard to get at that time or we would of had more pictures from Salt Lake City, which we found to be a most interesting city. It sets in a large valley surrounded by high snow capped mountains. We spent an extra day here and then had to leave plenty that we would like to return and see some other time.

On the way up to the Grand Canyon from Phoenix, we took the alternate route so we could go through the Oak Creek Canyon. By the way, the National Geographic says "The Oak Creek Canyon is the most beautiful 17 mile drive in the United States." We liked it even better than the Grand Canyon because it was small enough so you can ride along down in the canyon beside a lazy river, under trees and overhanging cliffs of the mountains of every color. As you ride along this awe inspiring highway you are so spellbound by its grandeur and beauty, that you feel out of this world. Often wish I had your gift of words to describe such scenery.

I just dashed this off to you for a little friendly tip on those East Decatur dates, and to let you know I still think you have the best little paper in the United States.

This being your 50th year in the business, you must expect congratulations all year long. You have been the hub in the wheel and kept it spinning well over all kinds of roads in good and bad weather, and here's hoping it keeps spinning well over these new highways we are building in our fast changing world of today!

In your Golden Year, and years to come, may it be a glistening, golden wheel rolling over smooth roads, and continue to shine out light to its readers, like the star in the hub that has worked so faithfully to make it roll and shine all the way.

Very truly yours,
Marietta (McDole) Taylor.

THIS WEEK

By ARBA N. MOULTON, Editor

This seems to be the right week to print the poem on shutting the door. It is printed once a year for the edification of some readers and a reminder to others. It has its followers who expect to see it in the Republican some time during the winter.

THE REFORMATION OF GODFREY GORE

Godfrey Gordon Gustavus Gore—
No doubt you have heard the name before—
Was a boy who never would shut a door!

The wind might whistle, the wind might roar,
And teeth be aching and throats be sore,
But still he never would shut the door.

His father would beg, his mother implore,
"Godfrey Gordon Gustavus Gore,
We really do wish you would shut the door!"

Their hands they wrung, their hair they tore;
But Godfrey Gordon Gustavus Gore
Was deaf as the buoy out at the Nore.

When he walked forth the folks would roar,
"Godfrey Gordon Gustavus Gore,
Why don't you think to shut the door?"

They rigged out a Shutter with sail and oar,
And threatened to pack off Gustavus Gore
On a voyage of penance to Singapore.

But he begged for mercy, and said, 'No more!
Pray do not send me to Singapore
On a Shutter, and then I will shut the door!"

"You will?" said his parents; "then keep on shore!
But mind you do! For the plague is sore
Of a fellow that never will shut the door,
Godfrey Gordon Gustavus Gore!"

Second Military Man To Be Secretary of State

Fr. Ceru answers the question asked in this column last week with the following information which we are glad to receive:

The radio commentator who stated that General Marshall is the second military man to receive the appointment of Secretary of State is right. President James Buchanan appointed General Lewis Cass in 1857 as his Secretary of State. General Cass held this office until 1860. Prior to this time General Cass served as Governor of Michigan Territory from October 29, 1813, to his resignation August 1, 1831, in order to accept his appointment as Secretary of War by President Andrew Jackson.

President Buchanan while not classified as a military man served as a volunteer in the defense of Baltimore in the War of 1812. He, too, became a Secretary of State in 1845 under President James Polk.

The Republican this week contains an announcement of the candidacy of Lewis R. Williams of Paw Paw for the office of circuit judge to succeed Judge Glenn E. Warner.

He is one of the leading attorneys of Van Buren county. In fact he is an outstanding attorney. He is known as a close student of his profession and enjoys a large practice. He has acquitted himself, both in civil and military service, with credit to himself and his fellow townsmen.

Attorney Williams' campaign is in keeping with the dignity of the office he aspires, he is in every way competent to fill it, and Van Buren county is proud to be able to present a candidate so well qualified to succeed Judge Warner.

Attorney Carl Benton writes from his home in Lawton to congratulate this editor upon attaining his "fifty years." His letter speaks the language of a long time friend and is deeply appreciated. He writes in part:

"I have been intending to write you for some time and congratulate you on your fifty years of 'successful operation.' I do not mean that you have acquired great sums of money, for this seldom happens to the editors of small town newspapers. Whether or not a person is successful is determined not by what he acquires in a monetary way, but the true measure of any person's success is determined by how much he has given to the world. And you have given your best, for you have brought cheer and hope to the sick and discouraged; you have given comfort to the unfortunate, and you have unfailingly pointed out to the young the paths that lead to happiness and success; you have always been on the alert for an opportunity to better the condition of your community, and have always been ready to lend a helping hand to those needing assistance and to any worthy project. You have stood firmly for right and justice and the preservation of our form of government. These things, the things that money cannot buy, are the only things of real value in this world.

"In return you have received the respect, the affection and the gratitude of your community, which money cannot buy, and which sickness or misfortune cannot take from you, to warm your heart and brighten your life for the rest of your days.

"I say these things to you while I may, for our time grows short and we still have much to do."

Thanks to Mrs. Vedah Dewey Rouse for a copy of the Bulletin-News, published in Los Angeles, California. It is the paper on which her husband, Eugene Rouse, works. Thanks to Mrs. Otis Howe for a kodak picture of Mrs. Rouse and her sister, Mrs. Elizabeth Dewey Rice standing in front of the Howe automobile, taken while the ladies were guests of the Howes during their recent visit to Michigan. The ladies are cousins of Editor.

Thanks to Mrs. Thomas M. Heap, better known in Decatur as Irl Hathaway, for a book entitled "Intimate Glimpses of Old Saint Mary's." Have been holding back to give a better account of this nice gift, but are being troubled for lack of time to do the things we want to do.

Thanks to Mrs. Leo Rose for an illustrated folder descriptive of Brownsville, Texas. That is where the Roses have gone to escape the winter. Mr. and Mrs. Harry Lurkins of Paw Paw township and Charles Haefner of Decatur are also there.

Brownsville is a city of 30,000 located in the most southerly point of Texas. It was founded in 1846 when General Zachary Taylor established a Cavalry Post there. It is on the Rio Grande near the gulf with the Mexican city of Matamoros just across the river.

Charro Day is Brownsville's annual fiesta. The city goes Spanish for this [illegible] colorful costumes,

THIS WEEK

The annual stockholders' meeting of the First State Bank was held Tuesday. E. B. Copley, A. W. Copley, A. E. Lawrence, A. W. Haydon and Mrs. Belle Baker were elected directors. The bank declared a semi-annual dividend of 6%.

The Citizens State Bank was also going strong 40 years ago. It had an annual election of stockholders and these were they: E. J. Rawson, A. J. Goble, J. E. Maxwell, S. J. Sherrod, S. B. Monroe, D. E. Brigham, J. C. Dunnington, George T. Pomeroy and George B. Rogers. The changes wrought by time are sometimes brought to light with startling clearness. Of these nine men, who 40 years ago were in their prime, only one, Dexter E. Brigham, is now living.

Durkee and Lammond, who conducted a drygoods store on the corner now occupied by the druggist Narregan, took a page of the paper to advertise their eighth annual January clearing sale. Mr. Lammond now has a lucrative real estate business in Lawton.

VOLNEY R. HUNGERFORD

In this paper also we introduuce Superintendent Volney R. Hungerford to the Van Buren county public as Decatur's candidate for county commissioner of schools.

The announcement states that Superintendent Hungerford was born in Branch county in 1874, and graduated from the Coldwater high school at the head of his class. After many years he went back to Coldwater, bought a farm there, and that city is his permanent address. The friends he made in Decatur 45 to 40 years ago, if they are among the living, are still his friends, and he has thought enough of Decatur to take the Republican all of these years.

JOHN BRITTON

John Britton of Bangor was sheriff of the county from 1903 to 1907. He was a rough and ready old fellow, a veteran of the Civil War, and as near fearless as a man can be. He once had a pistol fight with some thugs on a tug boat at South Haven and brought his man in handcuffed.

We sat near him in the county convention which nominated him for sheriff in a spirited contest with Charlie Chappell and one or two others.

Old Taverns of This Community

By Raymond Titus

(This is the ninth story in the Norman E. Webster local history contest written under the direction of Catherine Howland, teacher of history and science in the Decatur public schools.)

The taverns of the 1800's were similar to our small town hotels and were quite different from the modern roadhouses or taverns of our time.

These old inns sometimes were built with three stories and served both as eating and sleeping places.

On the first floor near the front entrance a small space was set aside for the bar where liquor was sold in abundance, and at a nominal price. Transients registered at a desk in this room. A large dining room and kitchen also occupied a space on the first floor. The dining room was furnished with a side-board, a substantial and cumbersome dining-room table and other furniture. The table was usually set with old-fashioned blue and white willow-ware and pewter dishes. Knives and forks had black handles and resembled our common kitchen variety. To the rear of the dining-room was the kitchen and here also was the ladder which led to the loft where the maid slept. In a prominent part of the room stood an old-fashioned cookstove. A host of pewter dishes, iron kettles and wooden milk pans were hung about in conspicuous places.

The second floor was devoted to sleeping space. Massive spindle or cord beds were the order of the day. Braided and hand-crocheted throw rugs were scattered around over a bare floor. Family pictures, in oval walnut frames, hung on the walls.

Gruesome tales are told of men coming into this country on horseback, as prospective buyers of government land. Quite often they met with mishap because they carried considerable amount of money on their persons. An occasional blood-stained floor gave mute evidence that some unsuspecting traveler had met with foul play.

The third floor was ordinarily used for a ball-room, and many a step was tripped to the music of some fiddler's lively tune. Often the parties were rough and a drunken brawl now and then added to the entertainment. A great deal of finery was displayed on these occasions. Ladies' gowns were fashioned from yards and yards of silks, satins, and laces.

There was always great excitement as the coaches approached the tavern to unload their passengers and baggage. Often from five to ten coaches, each drawn by four or six horses, passed daily. There was money in carrying passengers at five cents per mile and it was profitable for inn-keepers also.

Among the taverns of this vicinity were Reynolds, on Sand Beach Lake; Freeman's at Christie Lake; Brown Tavern of Fritzburg; Syke's Tavern at Keeler; Greenman Tavern south of Decatur where the Lewis Sherburn home now is located; Elkhorn Tavern on the John Rosevelt farm; and the Draper House, Brown Eagle, and Little Taverns of Charleston.

I shall now try to describe some of the taverns of this vicinity. There are many fascinating and exciting stories concerning them.

Brown's Tavern

This tavern was built on the Territorial Road in the township of Hamilton by Henry C. Coleman.

It was a part of the small town of Fritzburg. The tavern is still standing today but has been moved from the original site to the farm of Lon Phelps and is now used as a horse stable. An old-fashioned house marks the spot where it stood as a tavern.

There was a tavern in the town of Keeler which competed with the Brown tavern for stagecoach passengers but Henry Coleman won in the contest and procured most of the stage business. He enjoyed a profitable trade when the stages were running from Detroit to Chicago. Not only did he put passengers up for the night, but about a year after he built the tavern he borrowed seven hundred dollars to buy merchandise which he sold in one corner of the building.

Shortly after this he got a postoffice for Hamilton and he was elected postmaster. The postoffice was kept at the tavern until the end of stage days, then it, too, came to an end.

Coleman then moved to a farm where he died in 1857. After he left the tavern it changed hands several times, and finally came into the possession of a very old lady named "Teeny." Since the stage coaches were no longer running she, too, had to abandon the tavern because there wasn't enough business to make a living.

During its earlier history back in the 40's or 50's the tavern had an unsavory reputation. Sensational tales of men who disappeared after taking lodging there were widespread. One of the tales related runs like this:

The owner of the tavern knew that a stranger had considerable money. After he registered he was invited to sit in a special chair which was standing on a trap door. The man then fell into the cellar where he was probably robbed and killed.

There is another yarn to the effect that the tavern was probably a popular station for horse thieves between Chicago and Detroit. The stolen horses were hidden in the marsh nearby. There were two log taverns on the line of the Territorial Road between Decatur and Lawrence. They did business as long as the stages continued to run along that route. The first one was near Reynolds Lake and lasted for about ten years. The other was opened by H. N. Phelps in 1837 and was of considerable importance at the time, as it was a place where the stages changed horses. These stage houses went out of existence when the Territorial Road ceased to be a stage route.

John D. Freeman, during the prosperous times of 1837 and '38, tried to establish a town on the banks of Prospect Lake which he named the "Village of Van Buren." It was an ideal spot for a town and it contained 238 lots, some of which were actually sold to speculators for $150. apiece. Mr. Phelps, landlord of Phelps' tavern, became the purchaser of quite a number of them. Robert Christie and Charles Chadwick also were purchasers.

The village of Van Buren unfortunately never materialized and eventually fell into the category of "paper towns." Robert Christie finally exchanged his Hartford property with Phelps for the tavern, and Phelps' interest in the village of Van Buren. Christie converted the village lots into farm property and such it has ever since remained. Christie then became landlord of the tavern, until the stage coaches stopped running on the Territorial Road. He continued to live there with his family until 1865 when he died.

His five sons moved to three different towns, three moved to Lawrence, one to Hamilton, and one to Decatur. David Christie moved to the lake later named for him.

Elkhorn Tavern

The first white settlers to come into Keeler township were James and John Nesbitt in 1834. Mr. Keeler came from Vermont in 1835 and bought land from the Nesbitts at five dollars per acre. He then built his tavern in 1837 on part of the land known today as the Charles Rosevelt farm.

The Territorial Road was finished in 1836, and the stage coaches had started to carry mail and passengers, hence his desire to build an inn. An elk horn was found near a lake in the vicinity and was used as a sign for the tavern.

Mr. Keeler was the postmaster of the town which was named after him. He also owned a store there. He thought that the railroad would use the same route as the Territorial Road when it came through and was very much disappointed when it followed a course farther to the south.

In 1850 he sold the tavern and 400 acres to John Rosevelt. John Rosevelt and his family lived in the tavern until their own house was built. The tavern is now standing on the Rosevelt farm and is used as a tenant house.

The Rosevelts still have the elk horn which was used as the sign for the tavern. President Lincoln and Stephen Douglas once stopped there and stayed over night.

Taverns in Charleston

The Brown Eagle was owned, built, and run by Elijah Goble, and was one of the colorful spots of Charleston.

The stage coach came through and stopped there every day. A large crowd of curious spectators were always gathered at the tavern to watch the stage unload its passengers and baggage. The coaches carried the mail, too, which made it a double attraction for the Charleston residents.

Dances were held in the tavern on special occasions and they were well attended by wayward lads who seemed to be always looking for trouble. Our townsman, Mr. Albert Calbetzor, who lived in Charleston until he was twelve, remembers picking up coins off the ground in front of the tavern after some of these wild events. He also remembers a big Fourth of July celebration which took place in Charleston. A quantity of fireworks had been gathered together in one place and covered with a blanket to prevent contact with moisture. Some mischievous prankster drew aside the blanket and ignited the entire store of fire-crackers. The town boomed for a few moments.

Other taverns of Charleston were the Draper House and the Little tavern. The former was built and owned by Mr. Draper and his son. Jim Tittle operated the latter. The owners of both taverns put up travelers for the night and sold liquor at a bar in the front part of the building. The business of both places was very good while the stage trade lasted, but after the opening of the Michigan Central the stage trade became a thing of the past and so also did Charleston and its taverns.

Jim Chamberlain Will Visit Decatur Again

Ft. Worth, Texas, Dec. 27, 1947.

Dear Arba:

I wrote brother Oliver's obituary while waiting the arrival of the train in Omaha, Neb., without notes or references of any kind and as you well know we older people have lapses of memory, but as I recollect my brother Oliver was born on what was then known as the Scott Powers farm in Hamilton township. Scott Powers was the father of Fred Powers, the baseball pitcher.

My earliest recollection of Oliver when we were living there was when, at two years of age, he got his feet burned while walking through some burning chips. The scars caused by those burns remained throughout the remainder of his life. Leona Youells can locate that farm for anyone who is interested.

After leaving there, father moved the family to Martha Kendall's tenant house in Decatur, east of where Jarious Hallock now lives. This was in 1877. Later we moved to the Sanford house on Beers St., and later to W. Sherwood street where brother Will still lives.

These four places are the only ones that I remember of living with father and family. I was born on what was known as the Pat Kelly farm just across the road from where the Fred Payne family now lives. I got this information from my parents. From the time our family left the Pat Kelly place until we moved to the Scott Powers farm my memory is a blank, which is one of the many reasons that I want to make a perhaps final visit to Decatur.

If no one else does it, I will write a series of articles on the early settlers of the Lee (Hamilton) school district and the Christie Lake district. Dr. Greenman, Ed. Plopper, Jarious Hallock, brother Will, and Mary Peterson, I believe, can give me valuable data in preparing such a series. I should also have included Mrs. Charles Warner.

My health is so much improved that, barring unlooked for reversals, I can make that trip this coming summer, and if so, I ask that all who possess any facts concerning the history of these two districts either send them to me or have them in readiness for me when I come to Decatur.

One Hundred Years

This seems like a good place to mark this letter continued till next week and to urge the old timers who can to assist Jim with the information he wants. This will be an important year historically for this community. It is the 100th anniversary of the building of the New York Central, then the Michigan Central railroad through to Niles and of the founding of the village of Decatur. Work will begin soon on a big celebration to be held sometime this summer in commemoration of the anniversary and would suggest that it be held during August so that former residents and others may attend in vacation time. The Republican will announce the date as soon as it is set. Jim should plan to be here at that time. He is the one to write the series of articles he suggests.

The Decatur Republican

Written by Anna Broekhuizen for the Norman E. Webster local history contest, under the direction of Catherine Howland, teacher of history and science.

Rufus C. Nash was the first to try to publish a newspaper in Decatur. He started it in either 1859 or 1860. He printed a few issues in Paw Paw and circulated them in Decatur. He wondered why he had started it, because it ended so quickly.

Then sometime in 1860 C. P. Sweet started the "Decatur Tribune" which he published until 1864, when it went out of existence, and for a while Decatur was without a newspaper.

In 1865 Moses Hull from Kalamazoo started the "Decatur Clarion." He conducted it for about six months and then sold it to A. W. Briggs who published it about the same length of time and it, too, ran out of existence.

Then in 1867 E. A. Blackman and Prof. C. F. R. Bellows, the latter being the superintendent of the Public Schools, founded the "Van Buren County Republican." Mr. Blackman became sole proprietor as Prof. Bellows did not stay long with the newspaper.

As indicated by its name, it was a Republican paper. In 1872 both proprietor and paper turned Democratic.

In 1876 Mr. Blackman sold the plant to H. C. Buffington, who had been in the newspaper business in Cass county. The paper has turned to Republicanism since it was under the direction of Mr. Buffington.

After that Mr. Buffington sold the paper to A. M. Wooster in 1879. Mr. Wooster sold it to R. L. Warren and he to Andrew Johnson. Mr. Johnson sold it to O. W. and M. O. Rowland, father and son. The father had had several years of experience as the editor of the "True Northerner" and the son was an expert pressman who had some experience on different daily papers. Afterward the father sold the paper to the son who removed the plant to Paw Paw and once more Decatur was without a paper.

When O. W. Rowland and son took over the paper it was called the "Decatur Republican." Afterward Mr. Rowland became connected with the "True Northerner." The Decatur subscribers then took the Northerner because the Republican was suspended.

Soon afterward Secord and Dewey bought the paper and took it back to Decatur and started the "Decatur Independent."

Soon after that it was sold to A. N. Moulton who dropped the name "Independent" and took up the old name of "Decatur Republican," and it has so remained. Mr. Moulton is still the proprietor and editor, and under his skillful direction and management the paper has been prosperous and profitable. It is well equipped with power presses and all the material needed for first-class printing.

Here is a poem concerning the paper. The title is:

"THE DECATUR REPUBLICAN"

If golden anniversaries
Are much to brag about,
Decatur's many citizens
Should from their housetops shout.
Congratulations to their good
Republican today,
The paper which from year to year
Gives proof it came to stay.

For four score lacking five long years,
Decatur's citizens,
Have read both mild and startling news,
From facil pungent pens.
Portraying weddings, births and deaths,
Disasters, wars, and crimes;
The rise and fall of dynasties
Unheeding flight of time.

'Tis hard for one to realize
When it first went to press,
That Michigan was still quite young,
Whose future none could guess.
Nor that Detroit in time would be
A city of renown,
Or Decatur would become
A lovely thriving town.

No one had thought of airplanes,
Few railroads in the state,
No automatic telephones
By which to make a date.
No autos, movies, radios,
No bright electric lights,
And folks had never heard of tanks,
Air raids and black-out nights.

The editors were hardy men,
And stayed long on the job,
And no depression 'got their goat,'
So they'd lament and sob.
But they stood fast for principles,
And weathered every gale,
And never failed to go to press,
Before the news got stale.

Dean of Michigan Newspaper Editors

Arba N. Moulton, veteran editor of the Decatur Republican since 1897, half a century—has been tireless and stent in the building of his community. And his service to his home town is typical of more than 350 weekly newspaper editors of Michigan who safeguard the very grass roots of our democracy. Recently he was honored by other Michigan editors who paid tribute to his sterling character and his contribution to the newspaper profession. A real pioneer in the small town weekly field, he has always shunned the honors that high office might bring him, but has been fearless and bold in his fight for the right. —Printed from the "Michigan Tradesman.

Last week, June 5, 1947, the Decatur Republican was eighty years old. Mr. Moulton has been editor 50 years, while the newspaper has existed for 80 years.

East Decatur Pioneers

Ira Roberts and the Editor are collaborating on another chapter on the East Decatur pioneers. It is pleasant to recall the old residents of that community, to bring them back in memory and to live again the days of long ago.

We can see them as they came to town in lumber wagons and ox carts, and after they had lived on their farms a few years some of them began to come out with horse and buggy. They seldom came more than once a week. Saturday afternoon was farmers' day in Decatur. Most of the East Decatur farmers came here, a few went to Lawton and others to Paw Paw.

They brought their butter and eggs to town and traded them for sugar, tea, coffee, flour and other staple groceries. Few farmers bought meat, they butchered their own. None of them bought bread and very few bought any kind of bakery goods. Not much money changed hands, but the grocerymen were glad to have the farmers' trade.

Saturday morning was baking time. Cookies, friedcakes, pies and bread were the choice home baking that was done for Sunday and the week following. The women had this work all finished by noon, ready to start to town by one o'clock.

In the fall the clothing store of E. Smith and Company of Paw Paw drew a large percent of the farmers of East Decatur. They liked to trade with Old Captain Smith, and after he died his son-in-law, George Harrison, took over the businuess. They liked him just as well, and we wonder if Paw Paw people fully realized what an asset this store was to their village.

Following our first letter on East Decatur pioneers Miss Nellie Howland of Jackson wrote a letter to her niece, Mrs. D. S. Hanning (Margaret McAndrews) also of Jackson, giving more information about the early settlers.

James Howland and family moved into East Decatur in a very early day, probably before 1860. The children were born there. They were Maggie McAndrews, Mary Creagan, Anna Kelly, Nellie Howland, Will, James, John, George and Richard.

Their farm was in Decatur township but bordered on the Paw Paw township line. Miss Howland's letter follows:

To Margaret:

I never knew Nina Lee Wertz. She was of a younger generation. Her father, Fred Lee, went to the East Decatur school when Mary and Will did. A lot of those older ones had finished school before I started.

There were nine in the McAdams family and only one, the youngest, (she was Anna's age) went to school when I did. Carrie Durkee was also Anna's age. Her older sister, Libbie, taught school there later and I went to school then.

Your mother (Maggie) was born on the farm, I think in 1861, and the Rays and Grahams were living there before father and mother moved there.

Dan Carney and family lived near the railroad south of the school and Mallie Carney was one of your mother's classmates. The Carney family moved to town later.

Of the Eastmans I knew Hattie and Will, but there were older children. Ella Blades married Ned Lee. May Blades (Mrs. Will Clark) went to school when I did. Of the Lees, Lucy (later Mrs. Ellsworth Graham) and Herbert were in school with me.

Then there were the Gardners, Wiley Gardner and family. Mrs. Gardner (Louise) was a sister of Ira Roberts' mother. Lill and Earnest were their children. They lived just south of the Roberts farm, the farms joined.

There were three families of Newkirks. They lived on the Bert Andrews farm.

Then there were the Cordners and Lewises and many more. Abe Graham lived where the Waterses lived later. They moved to Paw Paw township, just north of the Threadgould farm which was north of Grandpa Howland's. The Thurston family lived across the street from Waterses, where Charlie Gibson now lives. Mrs. Thurston's grandchildren went to school with me.

The Murphys, all except Nell, went to the East Decatur school. They lived past John Graham's on the other side of the road, next to Will Lyle's. The Murphys moved to town when Nell was a baby.

Maggie Graham's grandfather and grandmother lived across the road from Rays and their children were older than any of our family. They were Tom, Maggie's father, and Sarah, Mrs. Rolla Norton. Addie Green and her mother lived near the school. Mrs. Green married a Mr. Wiles who had four children, Henry, Hattie, Josephine and Ida. Ida was in my classes.

The Rosses lived next to them. The Pepper and George Cross families lived north of the school. Then there were the Lewises, Millard, Henry and John.

—Nellie Howland.

THE OLD TOWN OF CHARLESTON

By Jack C. Rugg

(This is another of the local history sketches writen by pupils of the Decatur high school.)

On June 25, 1836, Jacob Morlan, Jacob Charles, Elijah Goble, Alexander Fulton and his brother, David, laid out Charleston, Michigan. The location was on Little Prairie Ronde in sections three and ten, Cass County, and about 4 miles south of Decatur. One reason why the town was laid out there was because of its rich soil. But the most important reason was because it was a stage coach route from Detroit to Kalamazoo, and on to Niles and Chicago. It stopped daily in Charleston at the Tittle Hotel.

Elijah Goble opened a tavern there in 1837 and named it the "Brown Eagle." It was one of the town's biggest buildings. The tavern had a good-sized dining room and sitting room which was cleared for dancing. Dinners were from two dollars and a half to three dollars. That was in 1865 and 1866.

The first house in Charleston was built by James Huff.

Before Charleston was a town the land was Elijah Goble's farm. There were one hundred and sixty acres which later became Charleston, then the land was divided into thirty-two lots.

Among the buildings in the town were four taverns, two blacksmith shops, one general store, a boot and shoe store, and a schoolhouse.

The taverns were the "Brown Eagle" owned by Elijah Goble, the "Tittle Hotel" owned by James Tittle, the "Draper House" owned by Mr. Draper and his son. Austin Charles and Doc Curry, a mischievous pair, had a special sign made for Hallowe'en to hang on the Draper House. It said, "Hot Hellity Bum, Kept by Draper and Son." The Charleston House was built by Elijah Goble. One of the blacksmith shops was owned by Ezra Lawrence. He wasn't paid for his work in money because not many people had much money so instead of money he was paid in meat, butter and wheat.

The Charleston schoolhouse was made of brick, the seats and tables were made by hand, and the boards in the floor were very wide. A big stove stood in the middle of the floor. The teacher who taught the children stayed at each pupil's home for about three weeks or more.

People came to town in wagons and sleighs drawn by horses and oxen. Some of the things they got were clothing, black molasses, brown sugar, but not much flour—maybe a gallon or two of whiskey.

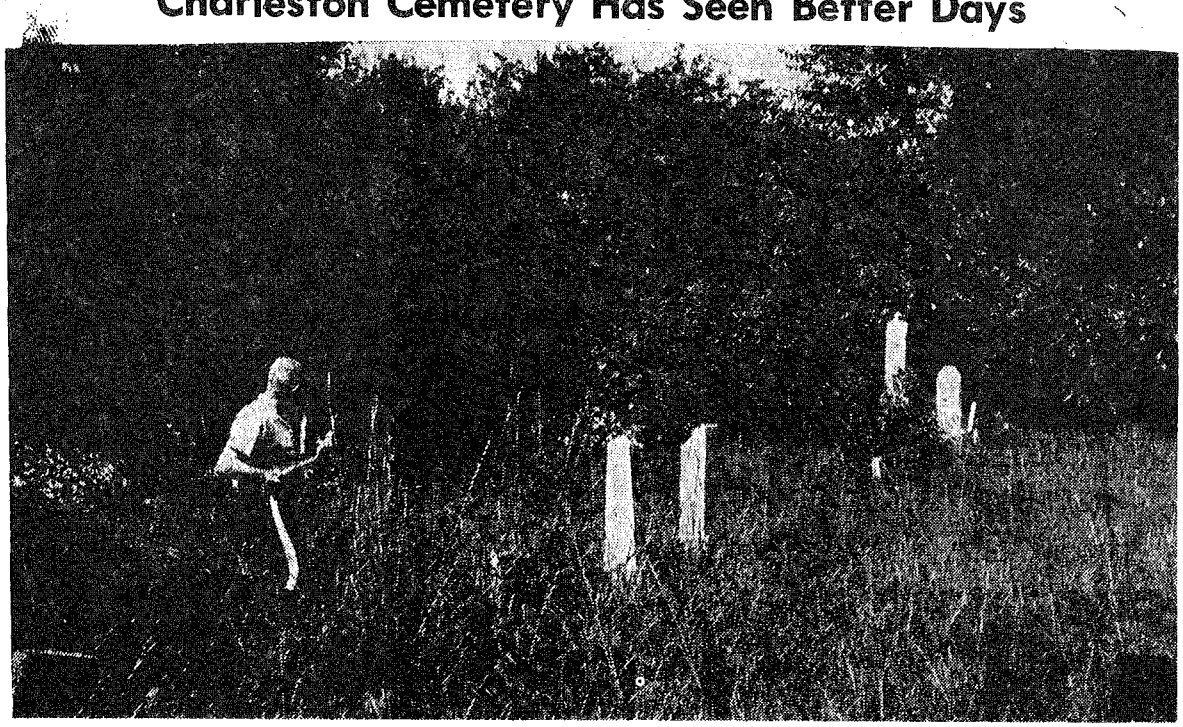
Charleston wasn't a dead town in its day. They had horse races from Main street to Morlan's corner. Fifty to one hundred people gathered to watch them. There wasn't a farmer who didn't have a horse in the race. Also they had sugar parties, spelling schools, sleigh ride parties, and dancing at Elijah Goble's tavern.

Some of the old timers say that there was a big circus once shown there.

Before the Civil War it was thought that Charleston would someday be a very prosperous town. In the early forties and fifties railroads were pushing their way all over the United States and the people of Charleston thought a railroad was going to be laid through their town. They were disappointed in this and gradually the town began to vanish.

Elijah Goble kept his tavern over twenty-five years, but in

Charleston Cemetery Has Seen Better Days



1869 not a building remained. Now it is only an historical record. It has only a cemetery and a foundation of a house next to the cemetery which used to be the old Charles farm.

Charleston is a ghost town today. There is nothing to mark its location but a cemetery and an historical plaque.

Miss Amanda DeBolt and her sister Rose have some furniture that came from Charleston and is over 100 years old. Their parents were Wm. and Cornelia DeBolt. Their father owned one of the blacksmith shops. Amanda DeBolt went to a dance once at the Charleston House but never went again because the people were too wild.

Mrs. Gertrude Charles Metzger, a descendant of the Charles family, attended many leading music schools in Southern Michigan. Later she went to Rome, Italy, to study music. She studied of Professor Moderati, and later sang before the elite of the ancient little city of Sala Umberto named after King Umberto the First. She sang four solos including one encore and two duets with Linda Chippa. Everything she sang was Italian except one solo. Nearly two thousand people attended the concert.

Grandparents of Mr. Norman E. Webster, who inspired this account of local history, lived in Charleston.

Sketches of Decatur's Fire Department

In the year of 1918 the only fire fighting equipment Decatur had was a chemical cart and a hose cart. My grandfather, Tom Elliott Sr. has told me the way the firemen got the equipment to the fires, they pulled it by hand.

Between the years of 1918 and 1933 Decatur bought two fire-trucks. One was an "American La France" and ithe other was a Model T Ford. The old carts were turned in to a museum somewhere near Detroit where there is supposed to be quite a little exhibition of old firefighting equipment. When the town hall and fire station burned in 1933 the equipment was destroyed.

In 1934 the village bought a Chevrolet fire truck. Then, in 1947 they bought another truck. It was an International with a front pump. Again in 1952 they purchased a new 1952 International fire truck. In 1957 they traded the 1947 truck for a new G.M.C. In 1958 they bought a 1951 jeep for a grass fire truck. They have four trucks ready to "roll" at the present time.

It was just getting dark on that winter day in 1933 when the shout "Fire" was heard in this small town of Decatur, Michigan. It was the fire station and the town hall. When the firemen arrived they found the doors were locked.

By the time the doors were unlocked the firemen couldn't get the trucks out because the flame and smoke would not let them advance. The only thing they could do was use the few lengths of two 2½ inch hose that were in the power house to keep the fire from spreading.

A call was put through to the Paw Paw and Dowagiac fire departments for the aid needed. Until the other departments arrived all the firemen from Decatur could do was stand by and watch the station burn.

Some say the way it happened was as follows: On a Saturday night two brothers were put in jail. They swore that nobody would ever be put in that jail again. Within the next couple of days the whole building burned to the ground.

It was in the spring of 1918, when the town had another disastrous fire. It was the old Presbyterian church which was constructed of wood. My grandfather was a fireman at the time of the fire. It was 2 a.m. when he heard the fire bell.

By the time he got there the equipment had just arrived. The heat was so intense that the men, including my grandfather, who were holding the hoses, had to have water sprayed on them to keep them cool.

It was a hopeless battle because the fire had gotten a good start before anyone noticed it. The wood was very dry plus the fact that the village did not have very good fire fighting equipment.

Decatur, through the years, has had quite a few big fires. I will list some; three churches have burned, a very big hotel, the fire station, the town hall, the high school building, a big store where the drug store is now, and an old mill.

Our Great Donnybrook Fair (Hamilton Township)

By Jeanette Dow

(This is the tenth story in the Norman E. Webster local history contest written under the direction of Catherine Howland, teacher of history and science in the Decatur public schools.)

This is the story my grandmother told me about the history of the Donnybrook Fair.

In the Spring of the year 1876 there was a sheep shearing festival at the home of one of the neighbors. Farmers and their families from miles around arose early in the morning in order to get an early start for the festivities. Many things had to be done in preparation for the day. The women had to prepare lunches, and dress the children. Men hurried with their chores, and assembled the horses and wagons.

The day was perfect for a spring festival. Cherry, peach, and apple trees were in blossom, and their fragrance scented the air. Laughter and gayety were enjoyed by young and old.

The affair was so successful that about a month after the festival the Grangers held a business meeting in the Hamilton Grange hall, and decided to hold a similar festival every year. It was commonly called "Hamilton Fair." The name "Donnybrook" was attached to it at an early date, probably through the efforts of the early Irish people of Decatur, who still retained fond memories of the Donnybrook Fair in Ireland. It was not an uncommon sight on the opening day of the fair to see a group of barefoot boys trudging along the road on the way to Donnybrook. They were up with the dawn, had milked the cow, and had done the other simple chores. At last they announced to their mothers, "Ma, we are going to Donnybrook," and so they were on their way. They were a sorry looking sight at night when they returned home, tired, dusty, and footsore, but still satisfied, as only small boys can be, after a day of sightseeing, baseball and horse races.

Because of rainy weather, the first two years of the fair were unsuccessful. In 1878 the first really successful fair was held. Everyone came by foot, buggy, or wagon, and everyone brought some kind of farm produce to display. In the morning the prizes were given for the best exhibits of livestock, handicraft, canned fruit, and vegetables. Baseball and horse-races were the chief features of the afternoon, and the old race track is still to be seen in the woodlot adjacent to Grange hall. Booths of home made candy, taffy, and popcorn were popular with the young folk. In the evening anyone who could play a fiddle or a banjo was invited to play for the dance, which was always well attended.

Several public officials including governors and congressmen were invited to speak at the fairs, and these speakers always drew a large crowd. At one time Congressman C. E. Townsend gave an address at the hall. These occasions had political implications, as the speakers generally were there to solicit the votes of the people.

The Hamilton Fair was popular for many years, but gradually the complexities and distractions of modern living edged the idea of a local fair out of the minds of the people.

October 7, 1897.

The following articles were taken from the files of the Republican.

HAMILTON FAIR

"Hitch onto the big wagon, boys, get one-half dozen good boards to put across for seats, get the lunch baskets, and we'll pile in. We can stop and get our more unfortunate neighbor who hasn't any wagon and his family; they will want to go too, and there will be room for all."

Such is the proclamation of hundreds of the whole souled sturdy farmers who live within driving distance of the popular Donnybrook fair. The attendance at the fair is not confined alone to the farmers, the neighboring villages are always well represented, and Decatur is generally represented by a great majority of her population.

Hamilton Fair has attained its great popularity from the fact that it was originated and has been maintainly purely on a social basis. Everything in charge of the association is free, and no gambling, or games of chance are allowed on the grounds. It's a place where old friends and acquaintances can meet without reserve and enjoy a good visit. The history of this fair is a good example of the true public spirit and energy which was characteristic of the pioneers of Hamilton township and which has been faithfully carried down to the present generation.

The plan for a fair was first conceived by the Grangers. A meeting of that association was called for purposes of selecting a site for Grange hall and A. W. Haydon suggested that the building be located where land could be secured for a fair ground. The suggestion was heartily endorsed by Captain Hendricks, Gideon Osborn, Henry Smith, Daniel

Lee, A. S. Wise, James Weeks and others, with the result that the present site of that building was selected and two years ago the adjoining land, 40 acres, which has been used for fair grounds and race track was bought of the state and is now the property of the township.

The first fair was held in 1876, and was successful beyond the expectations of its promoters. The exhibits were especially attractive, there being 436 entries. The officers of the fair this year were A. H. Williams, president; Royal Abbott, vice-president; Erastus Osborn, treasurer; and R. T. Riddle, secretary.

The following year it was decided to hold a sheep-shearing festival and plow match at the Hendricks farm, and captain J. R. Hendricks was elected master of ceremonies. This year improvements began to appear, a vegetable hall 18 x 22 feet, the material being furnished by R. Nesbitt, was built at the west end of Grange hall and several sheds were erected for use of stock exhibitors. There were 650 entries at the second fair.

At a public meeting in January, 1878 it was unanimously voted that the officers of the society should allow no gambling on the grounds. This rule has been strictly adhered to and has helped to make it a great success. The sheep shearing festivals were held annually. The fair continued each year to be more popular, the entries to increase and the crowds grew larger. Children and older people alike looked forward to fair time as the gala day of the year. In 1883 a race track was built north of the Grange hall, the races before this time being held on the public highway. It is said that for a number of years Dr. Keables with his invincible sorrel horse remained king of the track.

In 1886 the fair received the name Donnybrook Fair, and some people prefer to call it the World's Fair.

In 1896 the attendance was the largest in its history. Conservative persons estimated the number of people at 5000, and, the weather favorable, we pridict a still larger crowd in 1897.

The Hamilton Fair has become an event of which its townsmen may be justly proud. It is worthy the patronage and support of every loyal and public-spirited man. Its high standard of excellence will ever reflect credit on its founders and to all who are instrumental in continuing its success.

Officers' Report

Secretary Frank Cole of the Hamilton Fair Association has issued the following official statement:

The Association held their 33rd fair October 7 and 8, the eighth being the big day.

It drew a large crowd estimated at 4,000 people. It was said to be the most orderly crowd ever seen on the grounds and all seemed to enjoy themselves.

There was a good display in the hall which was under the able management of Mrs. J. O. Cooper. The scene in the hall was enlivened by music by Miss Ruth Gurney and others to whom the association wishes to return hearty thanks.

The horse department had a good display. In the department of cattle and sheep there was nothing. There was but one lonesome hog in the hog department, but the owner of him took home $1.50 for his trouble and had a chance to see the rest of the show, too. And now the cry is heard on all sides, "I wish that I had taken something." We will say right here that you should keep that cry in mind and not be caught napping in the future. Then the Hamilton fair will be a still greater success.

The department of foreign manufacture was represented by Rob. Johnson with his potato planting and harvesting outfit and Roy Bond with fine carriages. Come again, gentlemen.

The speaking was the best of all. Everybody who wished had the pleasure of listening to two of the best speakers that ever honored our fair with their presence. They were Lt. Gov. Patrick H. Kelley of Detroit and Congressman Townsend of Jackson. They were introduced to the audience by President Geo. Conway.

We wish right here to extend the most hearty thanks of the officers of the association to these gentlemen and would call the public's attention to the remarks they made that the fair is an institution of learning.

We would ask the people of Hamilton to put their shoulders to the wheel and make the fair better next year than this. You can do it very easily by bringing stock and produce and whatever else you have to show and not be afraid that someone else has something better.

Concerning Manager Wilton Geer's department, the horse racing, and why the races did not come off:—the secretary has been jumped onto about that with the complaint that Mr. Geer did not turn them down. The ones who wanted to race turned themselves down by not making their entries in time. The bills called for entries to close at 12 o'clock Friday. Mr. Geer tried all the forenoon to get entries for the race but did not get any. It looked as though the sports had gotten their heads together to see if they could not get the $15, but it was too late. Mr. Geer had instructions to call the race off, such instructions being given about 1 o'clock p. m.

Our concessions were not quite as large as usual. McDole and Newell were in great demand. Their cries were heard early, "Come and get your red hots, come up and save your lives, come here for red hot sandwiches and coffee."

All of the officers have worked hard for the benefit of the fair, but none as hard as our treasurer Luke Tinney.

He worked all of the week before the fair setting posts and helping to clean up the grounds and is entitled to much credit.

The financial statement of the fair is given herewith and shows that it will be necessary for the people of Hamilton to get busy if they want to keep up the fair.

History Of R. F. D. 1, Decatur, Michigan

By Frank Barber

The state convention of rural free delivery carriers was held in Grand Rapids July 1, 2 and 3. The Decatur carriers, as their part in the program, presented histories of their routes. The Republican has already printed the history prepared by Albert Dwight, Carrier No. 3.

The story of route No. 1 by Carrier Frank Barber follows, and we hope to print the story of Andy Kemp, Carrier No. 2 next week.

The Post Office Department authorized the establishment of route one Decatur, March 1, 1902, and the first trip was made on that date by Maynard Thomas. As was usual with most routes when started it was about twenty-four miles in length and this route had about 125 patrons. It covered territory to the North and West of Decatur. Soon after it was established there was quite a high percentage of the patrons that took daily papers, more perhaps than later.

Mr. Thomas used an old open buggy part of the time and part of the time a road cart. From the first and as long as horse drawn vehicles were used, the carrier had some place about midway on the route where he stopped for lunch and feed and water his horse. Sometimes it was a farmer's barn and sometimes a convenient place by the side of the road.

In 1909 Frank Brigham assumed the duties of carrier and through the addition of more routes from the office the routing was changed somewhat and the gradual increaese in mileage began having increased in 1909 to 29 miles. By this time there were four miles of improved roads, (improved roads meaning gravel). It was during Mr. Brigham's service that the experiment of using motorized equipment began, the first being a motorcycle with side car.

In March 1920 Elmer Graham was appointed to succeed Frank Brigham. Soon after this carriers were using the "old reliable" model T for service during the summer months. By this time there was two miles of pavement and an increase of gravel roads. It was during Mr. Graham's service that the mileage was again increased, first to 36 miles and then in 1935 to 47 miles. With this increase in mileage and the taking of the roads over by the county and the use of snowplows, the routes became strictly motorized routes.

Mr. Graham carried until 1937 when Frank Barber was appointed .Through two minor changes the mileage was increased to 49 miles. During the last ten years the volume of mail has nearly doubled. The number of collected insured parcels has increased nearly one thousand percent. The number of money orders has more than doubled although the peak was about 1940. The mileage of hard surface roads now is about fifty percent and most of the gravel roads are being improved some, but there are still too many miles of mud and poor gravel. While carrying mail now is not as tedious as it was in the horse and buggy days it is not yet that soft job that some of our friends think it is. We have the snow and mud and bad roads with us yet. But after all it is a pretty good job.

Jacob Charles of Charleston

By Robert Knight

A continuation of his story entitled "The Old Town of Charleston," first of the historical sketches of Decatur and vicinty. They were inspired by Norman E. Webster of New York City, graduate of the Decatur high school in 1884 and written by junior high school students, under the direction of Miss Catherine Howland, teacher of history and science.

Seventh Story

Jacob Charles and his wife, and at that time their only child Zerilda, and his mother, arrived on Little Prairie Ronde on the 27th of March, 1829. Mr. Charles took 320 acres of land of the government and built a log house on it.

Zerilda later became Mrs. Jasper Van Curen. She owned the west 160 acres of the land taken up by her father 118 years ago. The barn and tenant house of her property were on this quarter and her home was across the road from the tenant house and barn.

Mrs. Van Curen was a remarkable woman for her years. She was manager of her large farming interests and was a frequent visitor to Decatur.

Her brother, Austin Charles, owned the other quarter of the original grant of his father. In a little time Jacob Charles became one of the heaviest land owners on the Prairie. He believed with Mrs. Means in "The Hoosier Schoolmaster" that, "while you're getting, get a plenty."

The Charles family came from near Chillicothe, Ohio. The distance from there to the Prairie was about 300 miles and the trip was made in an emigrant wagon drawn by horses. The Charles and Morris families were neighbors in Ohio and Jacob's wife was Betsy Morris, sister of Dolphin.

In 1837 he built a sawmill on his northwest eighty in Volinia on the stream known as Red Run. Red Run came out of tamarack forests of Volinia. The roots of the tamaracks gave the water a reddish tint from which it received its name. He built a dam which supplied plenty of power, the stream being at that time much bigger than it is now.

This was the second sawmill built in the township and it did a flourishing business for three or four years till the dam washed out. Mr. Charles never operated the mill afterward. In 1843 he sold it to Henry Wood, father of Frank Wood.

Mr. Charles bought the Greenman farm in Decatur township in 1833 and built on it a large one story house. This house was on a stagecoach route from Kalamazoo to Niles and was a convenient stopping place for the drivers. The Charles family did not make a business of running a tavern, but the latch string of their home was always out and seldom a day passed but some stranger in need of food or rest was accommodated there. He resided on his farm till his death.

Jacob Charles was a very active man, a money maker, but honest and square in all dealings. He was also an enthusiastic horse jockey. He was always trading horses and matching up teams. If anybody for miles around wanted to buy a horse he went straight to Uncle Jake and if he wanted to sell or trade he went to the same place. Uncle Jake was always ready for a horse deal of any kind.

He was the ideal horse jockey of the old school. He never would misrepresent his animal in trading or selling. He seldom got the worst of a bargain and if he did he never mourned about it. He was absolutely game. When he knew a horse was sound and all right he knew how to impress the fact upon his hearers. When the reputation of the animal was a bit shaky he would say to a possible purchaser, "Look the animal over and take him if you want to; haven't had him long and don't know enough about him to recommend him."

A Horse Trade

One story of a horse trade in which Mr. Charles got the worst of it is told as follows: David Gibbs, the tavern keeper of Whitville, lived for a time on the farm of H. D. Wickett. He bought the place of John Lookridge who took it from the government. While on this farm Gibbs became acquainted with Mr. Charles and knew from experience his fondness for trading. One time while visiting with the loafers around the tavern stove Gibbs conceived a plan of going over to Volinia and doing Uncle Jake. He drove a nice looking sorrel mare that was not worth a shilling but was doped sufficiently to keep up appearances. He also took along a small bag of nails with a bag of money. Along toward evening he arrived at the Charles home and said he came over to buy a horse to match his sorrel, pulled the bag of nails out of his inside coat pocket and remarked, "and here is the stuff to pay for it." Mr. Charles said he didn't think he could match the animal but invited Gibbs to put his horse in the barn and stay over night. Gibbs, before going to the house, took the bag from his pocket and threw it under the buggy seat. Mr. Charles said somebody might steal it there and he had better take it into the house, and Gibbs replied that it was safer there than it would be in his pocket. That evening they told pioneer stories until a late hour but Gibbs managed to keep his horse dosed so that he was looking like a thoroughbred in the morning. Mr. Charles was not an easy victim. He had his suspicions and when [illegible] was sleeping he took the lantern and went quietly to the barn to examine the beast. To all appearances she was a beauty.

After the chores were done in the morning the dickering began. Gibbs opened by remarking of one of the Charles favorites, "There is a horse that will just match one I have at home but I want a match for this sorrel and I am going to have it if I can find it. Mr. Charles replied, "David, that horse will be a hard horse to match." Gibbs said he had been looking for two weeks and couldn't match her but could not find an animal anywhere near her equal. Mr. Charles said he knew of a horse over by Paw Paw that would match her but thought it doubtful if the horse could be bought. He was beginning to be worked and concluded he would land Gibbs horse at any price within reason. He said to Gibbs, "David, how will you trade for that brown hoss, that will mate the one you've got at home?" Gibbs said he was always willing to accommodate and if he, Charles, was willing to make up the difference they might trade. Mr. Charles met Gibbs' terms and later hitched up the good sound Charles horse and drove home.

The next day Mr. Charles drove the Gibbs mare over to the blacksmith shop at Charleston to have Clark Morris, the blacksmith, put new shoes on her front feet. When he led the horse into the shop the dope had worn off and the quick eye of the blacksmith first discovered the signs of the heaves. In another minute the animal was heaving heavy enough to operate a forge and Mr. Charles concluded she was not worth the price of a pair of shoes. He took the animal back home and turned her out in the field and nobody ever saw her again.

The Colored Settlement North of Decatur

By Rudolph Gant

(This is the third story in the Norman E. Webster local history contest written under the direction of Catherine Howland, teacher of history and science in the Decatur public schools. It is divided into two chapters of which the first is printed here and the second will be printed next week. Chapter II will be devoted to the history of the Colored Baptist church located 3½ miles north of Decatur.)

The people of the Colored settlement north of Decatur are descendants of a group who came from the South when this country was a wilderness, heavily timbered with beech and maple.

Among the early settlers were the Lowry, Weaver, Cotton, Winburn, Ampey, Vaughn, Jeffry, Lennox and Curtis families from Halifax county, North Carolina. The Mosses, Fosters, Coopers and Truman Smiths were from Ohio. The Mahoneys came from Pennsylvania to Ohio. The Revels, Manuals and Worrix families were from Tennessee. The two last named families were mountain people. The Hamiltons, Bradleys, Longs and Bennafields came from Kentucky. Stapleton Goens came from Virginia and Lewis Mallory who came from Kentucky was a slave. The families of Roberts, Brown, Watkins, Simpson, and Hill came from Indiana. One family of Wilsons came from Island No. 10 in the Mississippi River. All of these families migrated with either oxen or horses to Indiana, or in one or two cases, to Ohio, and then to Michigan.

There were only three slaves among them: Lewis Mallory, Henry Banks, and William Wilson. The former lived alone in a board cabin on the Hobart Millard farm until he died.

All of these families had a mixture of white, negro, and Cherokee Indian blood. These Indians were on the Atlantic coast at one time and then were driven farther west by the white man, and finally were sent to Oklahoma on the reservations. They are reputed to be the most intelligent of the Indian tribes.

These families took the oath of allegiance and became citizens of the country.

The authorities of the state of Kentucky thought that the colored people who owned slaves were teaching them to read and write so they passed a state law to give them one year to sell their property and leave the state. If they failed to do this the state would confiscate it.

Some of the families were compelled to leave before they had disposed of all of their property. The Hamiltons were one of those families. Years later a land agent came up from the South and paid them for the property that they had left in Kentucky so that there would be a clear title to the land. The late Sylvester Hamilton went back to Kentucky to see if the agent was paying them what they ought to get. It was settled to their satisfaction.

Because these people had Indian blood, another agent came through the country and told them that they had a certain amount of tribal money due them. When they investigated, they discovered that because they were citizens of the U. S. they could not draw the tribal money as the Indians did.

Mr. James Cotton, who gave me this information, is a mixture of seven different nationalities: Portuguese, Spanish, Irish, English, French, Cherokee Indian, and Negro. His Uncle Caleb Cotton, Civil War veteran, had the features and coloring of a Cherokee Indian. The Mahoneys from Ohio had Delaware Indian, Dutch, and colored blood.

Some of the farms occupied by these early people are now the Edward Lyle farm, settled by the Win-

DECATUR COUPLE MARK ANNIVERSARY

Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Goens, of Decatur, Mich., shown in the foreground center, celebrated their 48th wedding anniversary on March 24. They are shown in the photograph with their 11 children. Mr. Goens was born in Paw Paw township, Michigan, 77 years ago. His wife was born 65 years ago on the farm that is now their home in Decatur township, one mile from her husband's childhood home. All 11 of their children, six sons and five daughters, are living. They also have 30 grandchildren.

burns; the James McLeese farm, settled by Isaac Moss; and the Goens farm, first settled by Joshua Cotton. The Orr farms were settled by Jake Simpson and Martha Hamilton. Jane Williams owned the Sylvester Hamilton farm, and Alonzo Mahoney bought the Wilson farm.

The mother of James and Chloe Cotton (Mrs. John Bradley) was given the Quaker name of Penina by one of the Society of Friends in Indiana. She related the following story of an incident which happened on the long trip from North Carolina.

The family had two cows hitched to the back of the wagon. They milked them morning and night and put the milk into fruit jars. As they traveled along the motion of the wagon churned the milk to butter.

Quint Hamilton's mother told another story concerning their trip north. It was about a horse eating a fish. It happened on the way from Kentucky. The family were going to have salt fish for dinner, and the horse, who craved salt, snatched the fish and was going to devour it. The father took it from her and slapped her on the side. Later when a colt was born it had the imprint of a fish on its side. This makes a good fish story.

During the Civil War, ancestors of our colored population furnished their quota of soldiers. Peter Manual enlisted when he was fifteen, and was killed in battle. His brother Daniel enlisted too, and when he returned, married his brother's widow. She was the mother of Mrs. William Lennox. William Worrix was killed by a bullet in the forehead during the Battle of the Yellow Tavern.

Josua Cotton and one of the Winburns also enlisted in the Civil War. The former was in the same company with Maynard Southworth's grandfather. They were all in the First Michigan Cavalry.

James Cotton has a threadbare, silk handkerchief that was bought in the South by his father during the Civil War. The latter paid five or six dollars for it.

After the war these men returned to their homes North of the village where they and their descendants have lived in a prosperous and peaceful community. The people in this vicinity have always been a refined and law-abiding class of citizens. Sixteen of them have graduated from Decatur high school, nine from Lawrence and seven from Paw Paw.

Following is a list from Decatur high school: Gertrude Bradley, the first colored person to graduate from Decatur, taught school in Chicago for 25 years. Dr. William Bradley, graduate of Rush Medical College brilliant physician and surgeon of Chicago; Ella and Chas. Mahoney, the latter becoming a very successful attorney and business man of Detroit; Esther Goens, who taught school in Cass county and in Chicago, and Phyllis Wingate, who is a student at Howard University, Washington D. C. Others are Grace Winburn, Thelma and Luella Lennox, Elbert Sweat, Lena Earl, Harold Roberts, Viola Hamilton, Ruth Goens, Juanita Mahoney, Florence Wingate and Alba Mallory.

Adelbert Roberts, who was in the first graduating class of Lawrence, graduated from the University of Michigan law school and became state senator from Illinois. William Roberts his brother, had a position in the state capitol as auditor. He was also an expert penman. Thomas Ampey, also from Lawrence, is a postoffice clerk in Kalamazoo. Russell Ampey, who graduated from Paw Paw high school and Western Michigan College where he was a member of Kappa Rho Sigma honorary Science and Mathematics society is a professor in Louisiana. His sister, Maxine Ampey, has a position in Washington, D. C. Barbara Goens, also from Paw Paw, is a teacher in Detroit.

It is praiseworthy to note that descendants of these early colored people have attained distinction in the professional fields. Some of them have accumulated a fair share of material wealth. Lewis Goens' sister and three brothers lived in Arkansas and among his descendants are doctors, lawyers and dentists. His sister is a millionaire in Arkansas and maintains a beautiful home. She also owns a home in Chicago.

Harry Goens' four children of Benton Harbor were talented musicians and were known as the "Goens Quartette." They attained prominence in Benton Harbor and Chicago. They performed at the Century of Progress, and every summer they were booked at Mackinac Island. They entertained here at Eagle Lake several times and at entertainments in Decatur.

Prominent among our local people are Clifford Hamilton, Alonzo Mahoney, and Bert, Frank, Joshua and Howard Goens. They are successful as farmers and business men.

Howard Goens lives on the Cotton homestead. The present house replaces the old log house and was built before his grandmother, Mrs. Penina Winburn Cotton passed away. She lived on the farm fifty-nine years. After her death Howard improved and modernized the home, and today it is one of the outstanding farms in our community.

The colored Baptist Church is located about 3½ miles north of Decatur on the Decatur-Lawrence road.

For a number of years services were held only occasionally, but in the last year or two religious services have been revived. Mrs. W. Lennox says that the religious fervor isn't what it used to be. She says that people have too many other places to go now, and they seem to lack a deep religious spirit. She relates that the Baptist Association was held once a year in the old days and that delegates came from other churches in Southwestern Michigan. The Association would last a week and great crowds of people would come from miles around to attend.

It was not uncommon for forty to eighty people to stay at one house for a whole week. They filled old-fashioned ticks with fresh straw and slept on the floors and in the haymows. It kept the women busy with the cooking, but everyone had a good time.

The church wasn't large enough at such times to accommodate the crowds, so they built a "lean-to" on the side and covered it with brush. The minister stood in the doorway to preach. Sometimes a platform was built in the woods back of the church and on one occasion there were five-hundred people in attendance. Mrs. Lennox remembers when she attended the Association as a little girl. She and her mother sat under the improvised shelter. It was customary for the Association to hold its business meeting, and to appoint committees and delegates at this time. They also ordained their ministers during the week of the Association.

Following are two articles concerning the history of the First Baptist Church, which were taken from the files of the Decatur Republican.

Colored Baptist Church Settlement

The church was built in about the year 1868 on ground presented to the organization by Henry Lindsley. The gift was with the condition that it should stand so long as the organization is maintained and when it is no longer used as a church the land will revert to the Lindsley heirs.

There is not so much interest in the church as in the past. The old members have died or moved away. But the organization is still alive and services are held often enough to keep it in good standing.

The first of the settlers were two families of Winburns. They came from Indiana in 1850. Three families of Cottons came in 1852. Two families of Jeffries, two families of Vaughns, two families of Curtises, and one family of Lennoxes all came from Indiana about the same time. Four families of Fosters, one family of Coopers, one family of Mosses, one family of Battles, four families of Mahoneys came from Ohio; three families of Bradleys, one family of Longs, three families of Hamiltons, and one family of Bennafields came from Kentucky.

Granison Hamilton brought Lewis Mallory here as a slave in the early fifties and gave him his freedom, and for many years Mallory lived in a shack on the Hobart Millard farm and died there.

One family of Worrix, one family of Revels and two families of Manuals came from Tennessee, two families of Roberts, three families of Lowrys, two families of Browns, one family of Watkins, one family of Simpsons, and two families of Hills came from Indiana. One family of Wilsons came from Island No. 10, in the Mississippi River; one family of Ampeys and three families of Weavers came from Indiana. Frank Weaver, one of the descendants, was given an interesting nickname. Card playing was taboo on Sundays among the early people, so a group of young fellows used to sneak down to the tamarack swamp and have a game of cards. The nickname "Tammy" was indelibly fastened upon him.

We ought to include Aaron Burnett in this list. He settled in the village and so far as I know he was Decatur's first barber. He was a pretty nice old fellow.

Lived 130 Years

Henry Banks is another old-timer we ought to name. He was a slave and came to the settlement after he was freed by the Civil War. He lived around the settlement for many years and then bought 40 acres of land up in the northwest corner of Waverly township, known as the Garden of Eden, and lived there until he died in 1930.

He had three children, Nettie, Oliver and Jim. Nettie is in Chicago, Oliver is in Ohio and I can't say whether Jim is living or dead.

Henry Banks lived to be one-hundred thirty. We have to take his word for that but the evidence bears out his statement. Lewis Goens who is 82, says Henry was a middle-aged man when he was a little boy.

He, Henry Banks, said that when he was twelve years old he hauled soldiers from the surrounding country to New Orleans to fight the British in the War of 1812.

He used to boast that he had a lot of brothers and sisters and that he was the best looking of all of them. Those who remember him will smile at this as he was about five feet tall and so bow-legged that he couldn't stop a hog. His mouth extended almost from ear to ear, and he was always in good humor.

One time when he was about 80 he came upon some of the boys of the neighborhood and proceeded to be a boy with them. He jumped up in the air and cracked his heels together twice. The boys tried it after he had gone but none of them could do it.

One time when the Plopper school was in session and it was warm and the doors were open, Henry Banks came along and walked up onto the platform in front and made up funny faces where the pupils could see him. They laughed and the teacher went out to see what was causing it. When she saw Henry she rushed back into the room and Henry rushed off down the road. The teacher said to the pupils, "If you were as interested in your studies as you are in what is going on outside you would not see so much to laugh at.

Many years ago a crowd of boys had assembled at the depot to watch the fast train go by. As the train approached at a speed of about fifty miles an hour, the mail clerk threw off the mail bag and it came rolling on toward the station. Henry saw it and became wildly excited. He grabbed his cap from off his head, ran out onto the track, jumped up and down and waved his arms and shouted, "Stop her! Stop her! You lost something." He came very close to being run over for the train did not stop.

Back in the early days when the settlement was being formed most of the founders came here by train and a conductor remarked that the best looking colored people between Detroit and Chicago got off at Decatur.

History of First Baptist Church

In 1868 the First Baptist Church of Decatur was established and dedicated by a community of Christian people. It prospered and was very prosperous during that time. It grew and did a lot of Christian duty. It was a church of large majority which contained during its seventy years of existence about one-hundred fifty members and by the hand of Providence they have most all been called away. Only about 12 members remain. During this time the church has had thirty-six pastors and seven deacons. The organizers were Isaac Moss, Thomas Winburn, Nathan Lennox, Grief Foster, Joseph Mahoney and Dosen Brown.

The following were among the pastors from Decatur: Rev. Isaac Moss, Rev. James Burton, Rev. Nelson Brown, Rev. Dosen Brown, Rev. Henry Manual. There were also a large number of visiting ministers.

The deacons of the church were: Isaiah Brown, Dosen Brown, David Moss, W. Scott, Joseph Mahoney and Melon Bradley. Deacon Robert Lennox is the only surviving one who has held this position for fifty years. The church has held Sunday School B. Y. P. U. of great importance. Sunday school superintendents were Grandville Foster, Mort Stafford, Sam Brown, David Moss, Robert Lennox, Henry Manual and Charlie Evans.

There have been a great many entertainments during the sixty-five years the Association has been held here. The Bible bears a history of the church. It was presented to this church by Dennis Brown who was one of the members. During the whole seventy-eight years it has never been taken out. Three years ago it was reconditioned.

The transfer of the land on which the church stands was made October 31, 1868, from Henry and Helen Lindsley to trustees of the First Baptist Church. The transfer was recorded at Paw Paw, September 19, 1871. The plot of land is nine rods square.

In years past the church has been in repair as needed. Three years ago the church was in extensive repair. Rev. Slaughter was in charge and at the present time it is in repair by Christian helpers under the guidance of our present pastor, Rev. A. Riley.

The following poem was written by Mrs. Essie Smith:

The Church By The Side of the Road

Through the mist of years I can seem to see
The Church of my childhood day,
And its memory so with joy complete
Shall live in my heart allway.
There on memory's page I can see the Church
By the side of the road,
Wherever I roam, it is guiding me home,
The church by the side of the road.

CORRECTIONS AND ADDITIONS

Mrs. Essie Smith and Mrs. Lydia Lennox called Saturday and suggested two corrections that might be made in order to make the record letter perfect.

The first correction concerned Peter Manual, who the story said, enlisted in the Civil War when he was 15 and was killed in action. Our callers said that when Peter enlisted he was married and had three children and was probably between 25 and 30 years of age.

Mrs. Lennox furnished this additional information about that family: The Lennox family originated in England, came to Boston and most of them settled there. Nathan Lennox's father came to Canada and from there to Detroit. Nathan was born in Detroit. He came out here and bought the farm which is still owned by William and Robert Lennox and two grandchildren, Essie Smith and Edwin Hamilton.

This additional information was sent in by Mrs. Scott Monday: The farm two miles north of Decatur was first owned by the Foster family when they emigrated here. It was bought of them by M. U. Bradley in 1864 and is still owned in that family. The present owner is Eva Bradley Scott, daughter of M. U. Bradley.

Dean of Michigan Newspaper Editors

Arba Nelson Moulton, veteran editor of the Decatur Republican since 1897 — half a century — has been tireless and persistent in the building of his community. And his service to his home town is typical of the more than 350 weekly newspaper editors of Michigan who safeguard the very grass roots of our democracy. Recently he was honored by other Michigan editors who paid tribute to his sterling character and his contribution to the newspaper profession. A real pioneer in the small town weekly field, he has always shunned the honors that high office might bring him but has been fearless and bold in his fight for the right.

THE OLD DUNCOMBE HOUSE

By: Randolph Gale
June, 1947 – 7th. Grade

(This is the sixth story in the Norman E. Webster local history contest written under the direction of Catherine Howland – teacher of Science and History in the Decatur public schools.)

Charles Duncombe, the third child in his father's family, was born May 30, 1822, at Ancaster, Canada, and until he was thirty-five years old helped greatly in the support of the family. In 1849 he went to California and sold supplies to minors. He came to Michigan in 1852, and in 1855 married Frances Knight of Saratoga County, New York, who died at Keeler, Michigan Dec. 22, 1882. They were parents of six children, all of whom lived to grow up except one son who died in infancy.

Mr. Duncombe passed away Jan. 3, 1900 in his old home in Keeler, where the winery now is. The house there now is the same.

For several years he was cashier of the First National Bank and one of its first directors. In 1867 he was a member of the State Constitutional Convention and active in politics. He was supervisor of Keeler Township for twelve to fourteen years.

He was a very prominent man in Keeler, and Decatur owed many of its improvements to him. In 1867 he built a large grist mill which he ran until it burned down. In 1873 he put up a fine brick building for the use of the First National Bank.

In the '60s he had built a three-story frame building on the corner of Phelps and St. Marys to be known as the Duncombe House. The Gazeteer of 1869 advertises the Decatur and South Haven Stage Line with headquarters at the Duncombe House, also the Duncombe House hack, free, to and from the train. (Proprietor H. Galloway.)

trading center, an important grain purchasing point and one of the main stops on the Michigan Central Railroad. Shipments from this station for a six-months' period ending December first, 1879, were: 240 carloads of grain, 114 carloads of lumber, 53 carloads of stock. During 1878 Decatur shipped 10,000 barrels of apples.

There were already several hotels near the depot and after the stage line was discontinued Mr. Duncombe decided to move his hotel to the lots he owned on the corner of Phelps and East Sherwood street, to be near the station.

The moving of the hotel was quite a feat and caused lots of excitement and fun. It was done with horses and rollers and took about two weeks. All that time the hotel never shut down. Roomers slept in their beds, meals were cooked on the stove, and served as usual. Guests sat in their easy chairs by the open windows and in the big double front doors, laughing and joking with passers by, as the large three-story building moved slowly but gaily down the main street to its new location. From then on until its destruction the Duncombe House was the largest and best hotel in town. Mr. and Mrs. Howard Hall, fine actors of the early days, always put up there with the Tucker players, when their show came to town.

Ed Lindsley, Neal King, and Fred Mosier, young business men of the town, lived there before they were married.

There was a large entrance hall with an old bar on one side at the left and an open stairway on the right. Alumni and other banquets with Beckwith's orchestra of Dowagiac furnishing the music were often held in the large dining hall.

After the local option was voted in, saloons and bars had to go, when a lot of whiskey was sold illegally in soft drink places or in old barns and buildings hidden from sight and called "Blind Tigers." There was such a place back of the Duncombe House, separated by a hall from the rest of the hotel. In this hall all the lamps of the hotel were cleaned, trimmed and filled, so this part of the building was fairly well soaked with oil.

The pioneers of the town were hard-working, husky fellows and many were heavy drinkers. The old timers tell many stories about how the fire started in the old Duncombe House. This one is said to be the true one:

Four cronies had been drinking and playing cards in the back room, when one fellow said to his partner, "Go out and get a couple of the best chickens you can find and we'll cook them here for supper." Night after night this went on, until the fellow's wife complained that some of her chickens, as well as her husband, were missing every night. This made the fellow suspicious, and when his friend brought in the stolen chickens that night he saw that they were from his own flock. He accused his partner of stealing his chickens and called him bad names and threw a lantern at him. It missed and smashed against the wall. The flames quickly spread and ignited the kerosene-soaked hall.

The late Fred Mosier gives a first-hand account of the fire in an article he wrote for the Decatur Republican.

"We used to have an old hand pumper for fire protection that exhausted most all the willing workers who appeared in time of fire. A large cistern or reservoir in the ground in the center of our main four corners was partly filled with mud or sediment and often times clogged the apparatus and then we formed the bucket brigade getting water from pump and cistern. Time went on and changes came about. Waterworks were finally to be had in Decatur. A well was driven on the present site and a traction engine was set to pumping to test the water supply which was found to be inexhaustible and it still remains so. Trenches were dug and pipes for the mains lay along side them.

At this time fire started early one morning in the old Duncombe House. This was in March, 1895. I was living there and had a narrow escape. My room was on the third floor at the west end of the hall. George Rix was running the place and through the black clouds of smoke, Mrs Rix in her night clothes found her way to my room and woke me saying, 'The hotel is on fire! Get out ! Don't stop for anything!' I opened the door and couldn't see anything but smoke. Shutting the door quickly, I got into my trousers and grabbed an armful of my clothing, buried my face and head in it, and started down the hallway, bumping the side walls and banisters all the way down. At the foot of the stairs Mr. Rix grabbed me and led me out into the street. As I looked up the street I saw several traveling men dressing in the doorways of the stores. Around the band stand in the park stood the women employees of the hotel in their sleeping garments. Some had blisters on their feet and nearly all had chattering chins. I was the first one to give the alarm, all the others were too excited. The fire spread and burned all the buildings standing at that time as far as Buys Clothing store, and east on Sherwood as far as the Hotel Hart which at that time was the old Shelters Hotel. Mr. Shelters built the present Hotel Hart soon after the fire. Flying fire brands set the Universalist Church on fire.

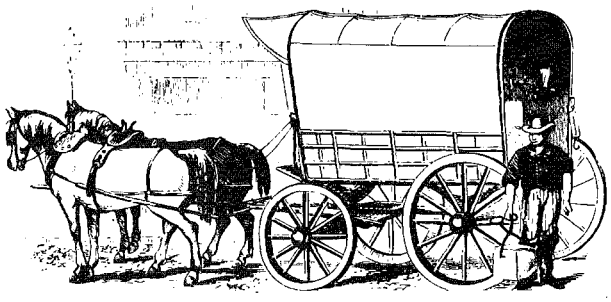
The countryside was lit up for miles around, so you could see to pick up a pin. The church bells were tolling to spread the alarm.

This was no doubt the worst fire in the history of Decatur and before it was under control, the Duncombe House, the Shelters House, the First State Bank, Edward Arnold's store, the John Shadd store, the Hotel Livery Barn, Niel Rasmusson's Wagon Shop, the Teed House, George Johnson's Shoe Shop on wheels, and the Universalist Church were in ruins. A strong wind was blowing to the East and other buildings were saved only by hard work. The Dowagiac Volunteer Fire Company came down on the morning train but did not get here in time to be of much help as we had no water. This was the last fire of the bucket brigade of which Frank Stapleton and Dr. Fisher were members. The waterworks plant was installed the year and the day of the fire.

A man who worked in the saloon part of the hotel went out to tell Mr Duncombe his hotel was burning and he replied: "Let it burn! It has made me a half dozen farms so I don't consider it owes me anything."

The corner lot where the old Duncombe House stood is still vacant and empty today.

Those who helped — Ellen Goble, Mrs Flora Taylor, Mrs. H. Hall, Mr. Neal King, Mrs. Cora Dwight, Miss Grace Weeks, Arba Moulton, Mrs. Fred Mosier, Mrs. G.R. Gale, Mr. Charles Duncombe, Keeler.



DEXTER E. BRIGHAM MASTER MUCK FARMER

Dexter E. Brigham, whose death at the age of 86 was recorded in the Republican last week, came to Decatur with the L. Brigham family in 1887 when he was 25 years old. His father had traded land in Barry county for the Hathaway drygods store in Decatur, and for a short time Dexter was the manager, but he soon turned his attention to muck land farming and it became his life work. He raised celery, peppermint and onions on his model farm on the Deuel road but finally decided to specialize in onions. He discovered that the varieties which he raised did not keep satisfactorily in storage and he decided to improve his crop by producing his own seed. At that time he had not thought of offering it to other growers. He chose the Southport Yellow Globe as the variety from which to select his strain, picking bulbs for seed production which were a little more globe shape than the original variety and which had shown no indication of sprouting after being kept throughout the winter. Soon his crop was recognized as superior to that of his neighbors and others sought to secure his seed. Gradually these requests increased until he found his seed business requiring most of his time. Onion growers from New York, Ohio, Indiana and other parts of Michigan found his strain superior to others. Seed companies recognized this fact and the Brigham onion was listed in catalogues.

At the fourth annual meeting of the Michigan Muck Farmers' Association, held in East Lansing some thirty years ago, Dexter E. Brigham of Decatur and N. P. Beebe of Niles were honored by selection as Michigan Master Muckers. As a part of the banquet ceremony suitable placques were presented to each of them. In 1926-27 Mr. Brigham was president of the Michigan Muck Farmers' Association.

In 1905 he was president of the village of Decatur and it was during his term that the village was replatted. The original plat bearing his signature is framed and hangs in the Republican office.

Mr. Brigham also served for a number of years as a member of the Decatur board of education and throughout his long and active life here he has been an honest, public-spirited, outstanding citizen.

Superintendent Dodge Goes to Bad Axe

Superintendent Frank E. Dodge was last week elected superintendent of schools of Bad Axe, county seat of Huron county, with a population of about 3,000 inhabitants, and will receive a substantial increase in salary.

There are 27 or 28 teachers in the system and the school will have a Class B rating the coming year. A new cafeteria has been installed in the high school and a new high school building is to be erected within the next few years.

Mr. Dodge has been superintendent of the Decatur schools sixteen years and that fact alone is about the best recommendation he could have. Under his guidance the Decatur schools have held a high place among the schools of its class in the state. He has enjoyed the friendship and loyalty of the teachers under him and the good will of the pupils.

His many friends, both within and without the school system, rejoice that he has received this well deserved promotion.

Mrs. Dodge has served as a teacher when teachers were hard to find and their three daughters have known no other home town. Decatur loses a good, active and public spirited family. They plan to move as early in August as possible.

REPAIRING THE HOUSE OF MRS. FLORENCE HIGH

Vay Morlan, the well known roofing man of Paw Paw, has put a 3 and 1 asphalt roof of shingles on the residence of Mrs. Florence High, southwest corner of Delaware and George streets.

This is a well constructed house and one of the old ones now standing in the village. William E. Trowbridge and family resided there as far back as the sixties and he might have built it. His daughters were Mrs. Nearpass, Mrs. W. H. White, Mrs. L. G. Stewart and Miss Ida Trowbridge. The last two were graduates of the high school in 1870 and 1869.

When the health of Miss Trowbridge gave out she became a resident of the Stewart home where O. W. Newell now resides, and her home was sold to Mrs. High, who now furnishes a home for Charles Killets and Ira Roberts, and perhaps some one else who lives alone. Mr. Stewart himself lived with her the last year or two of his life, and passed away there at the age of 96.

W. C. Bates, Covert New Supt. of Schools

W. C. Bates, superintendent of the Covert consolidated schools, will be the new superintendent of the Decatur public schools, his term of service beginning with the opening of the fall term in September. He was tendered the position several weeks ago and the Covert board accepted his resignation at a meeting held Monday evening. He will be succeeded at Covert by the present principal and coach, Elmer VanDyke.

Our new superintendent was born and raised in Covert, obtained his B. S. degree at Western and his M. A. degree at the University of Michigan. He went back to his home town to teach school and was coach for three years, principal for seven years and has been superintendent five years. He has been a member of the Michigan High School Athletic Association Council for eight years and a member of that body's executive council for seven years. He is a Past Master of his Masonic lodge, and a member of the O. E. S. and of the Congregational church

He is especially interested in athletics, is popular in his home town and his neighbors and lifelong friends are reluctant to have him leave there. The advancement from a Class D to a Class C school is one of the reasons for his decision to come to Decatur.

Superintendent Bates' family consists of himself, his wife and their three children, Willis, Jr., 12, Linda 10, and Carol 8.

The Passing of Thomas F. Mahoney

Thomas Mahoney is dead. One of Decatur's most colorful business men is removed for all time from the business street. The proprietor of the Gem Cafe has been known along the highways east and west and north and south for hundreds of miles. As he said in advertising his famous vegetable soup, he "is known from coast to coast."

He was born in Decatur June 29, 1876, a centennial boy, and from the time he was twelve years old, with the exception of a year or two spent in the west, he has been a familiar figure on the street.

In his early years he followed the trade of a grocery clerk. He began as a delivery boy in the store of A. M. Knights and Son, and every house in town was a familiar stopping place for him.

Later he transferred to the Star Grocery of Frank Potts where he and Dare Knights won the reputation of being the liveliest pair of grocery clerks in this corner of Michigan. They knew how to mix fun with service and they helped Frank Potts to build up the biggest business in town.

Those were gay carefree days, the golden era of American history.

But times changed and Thomas Mahoney went into other lines. Finally, on the first of January, 1922, he and Lester Hooper opened the Gem Cafe which from the start has been a successful venture. In a few months Lester's health gave out and Tom became the sole owner. With the loyal help of Mrs. Mahoney the business has always prospered, and now his son Mike will take over.

Thomas Francis Mahoney was a son of James and Mary Code Mahoney. He attended the Decatur public school and in 1919 was married to Anna Schonbok. They were parents of three children, Mary Angela Southworth, Loretta Newell and James Michael. Other survivors are: two sisters, Mrs. Mary Howland of Decatur and Mrs. Agnes Deering of Traverse City, and a brother, Will of Kalamazoo.

He had been in poor health for the past year, and about two months ago gave up his work and was taken to Borgess hospital. He was never able to return, and from that time on he gradualy failed.

He was public spirited and progressive, and his name carried weight in local municipal affairs. He served as a village councilman, was a member of the Elks and Knights of Columbus of Dowagiac, the Holy Family church and Holy Name Society of Decatur.

All of the business places in the village were closed during his funeral.

The Solemn Requiem funeral mass was offered at Holy Family church, Monday at 9 a. m., by Rev. Fr. Linus Ceru, assisted by Rev. Fr. Philip Cook, pastor St. Mary's church, Three Oaks, as deacon of the mass, and Rev. Fr. Justin Beauvais, pastor of St. Mary's church, Paw Paw, as subdeacon. The Rev. Fr. Albert Schmidt, pastor of the Immaculate Conception church, Hartford, served as master of ceremonies. Rev. Fr. William Cogley, pastor of St. Mary's, Morrice, Mich., and Rev. Fr. Michael Cassidy, pastor of Holy Maternity church, Dowagiac, assisted in the sanctuary.

Rev. Fr. Cook preached the funeral sermon. Miss Catherine Howland, organist of the church, sang and played the funeral chants, assisted by Mrs. William Snyder as soloist.

Nephews of Mrs. Thomas Mohaney were the altar boys.

A TRIBUTE TO THOMAS MAHONEY

The high regard in which Thomas F. Mahoney was held on the business street was shown by the liberal outpouring of money for flowers sent to his home where the body was taken from the funeral home Saturday morning to await the service at the church Monday morning. Charles Hughey asked for the privilege of accepting contributions and in a couple of hours had collected $45, and there were other contributions from friends on the street.

Monday morning, while the services were in progress at Holy Family church the stores were closed.

Removal of the Van Hise Cemetery

There has been talk for years about removing the Van Hise cemetery, but nothing had ever been done about it. This cemetery is a plot of ground set aside by the original owner of the Van Hise farm in East Valley for the burial of members of the Van Hise family. When James Forbes bought the farm of the Van Hise heirs some 40 years ago this plot of ground, one half acre in size, was reserved and the cemetery probably would never have been disturbed had it not been for the board of county road commissioners which had designs on that particular parcel of ground for a public highway.

Last December Supervisor Parker received a letter from Chairman Dubuisson which read:

At a meeting of the board of Van Buren county road commissioners Friday, December 12, 1947, the following resolution was made, supported and carried:

"That the chairman be instructed to inform Mr. Parker, Supervisor of Decatur township, to remove that portion of the Van Huis cemetery, Sections 24 and 3, Decatur township which is in the way of the county road."

The proposed road in question is to extend from State Highway No. 119 to the Valley road, a distance of about three miles, and this little private cemetery lay directly in its path.

To remove the cemetery required legal procedure and an order from the circuit court. The township board engaged Attorney Warren Grosvenor to obtain the order and the requirements of the state laws were complied with. The order was obtained May 24, and one of its provisions was that the remains must be removed by the first of June.

The town board decided to move the remains to Harrison cemetery. There were 12 tombstones and two full lots were designated for them.

Ward Knoll was given the job of doing the moving and he was assisted by Earnie Ball, and also by Sexton Avery Mullinex and his helpers, James Lennox and son, James, Jr.

Ward first removed the stones, placing wooden markers to indicate the locations. The remains were dug up, placed in boxes and marked, and re-buried in the new location. There were definite remains in each grave, although the coffins in which they were buried were decayed and partly mingled with the earth. In addition to the individual markers there is a Van Hise stone containing only the last name. This was placed in the center of the two lots set apart for the graves.

The stones were placed in one long row and reading from the south to the north contained the following inscriptions:

1. A double stone. Oakey Van Hise. Died Oct. 13, 1846. Aged 73 years, 10 months, 8 days. Anna, wife of Oakey Van Hise, died April 26, 1846. Aged 73 years, 5 months, 22 days.
2. Benj. F., son of John and Anna McKinney. (Date not legible.)
3. Sarah, daughter of John and Anna McKinney. Died Sept. 6, 1848. Aged 5 years, 3 months and 17 days.
4. Infant son of (not legible) and Eliza Van Hise.
5. James, son of J. and M. Van Hise. Died July 16, 1839. Aged 1 year, 10 months, 8 days.
6. Fannie E., daughter of J. and M. Van Hise. Died Sept. 3, 1857. Aged 3 years, 7 months, 16 days.
7. Mother. Born 1813. Died 1894.
8. Eunice A. Born 1839. Died 1912.
9. Ida May, daughter of J. and C. Van Hise. Died Dec. 30, 1872. Aged 4 years, 5 months.
10. Joseph Van Hise. Died April 14, 1873. Aged 67 years, 5 months, 4 days.
11. Runyan Van Hise. Died June 27, 1868. Aged 34 years, 6 months.

These remains were the best preserved of all.

On the skull of little Ida May who died 76 years ago, was a circle comb well preserved. The casket of little James was a hollow log about 3 feet in length and hollowed to a diameter of 18 inches.

The three heirs to the Van Hise property gave their consent to the removal. Mrs. Inez Van Hise Maguire, who resides on George street, Decatur gave oral consent. Attorney Warren Grosvenor sent notice to Otto Van Hise of Roscoe, California, and to Mrs. Jaredine Grimes of Chicago, of the family of the late Ralph Van Hise.

Otto Van Hise sent this informative letter to Twp. Clerk Elmer Adams:

Roscoe, Cal., Jan 1, 1948.

Dear Sir:

Received your letter a couple days ago regarding Van Hise cemetery. If you will go to Paw Paw and search the records you will find the title of the place in the name of Jared P. Van Hise. About 30 years ago we sold the farm to James Forbes, reserving (as I remember it) ½ acre for the cemetery. So I suppose it would be in my name and my brother's daughter's, Jaredine Grimes, 4521 N. Walden, Chicago. I would not want to try to cause any trouble although I think common courtesy would require moving the graves to a good cemetery where they would be cared for.

Respectfully,
Otto A. Van Hise,
9321 Sunland Blvd., Roscoe, Cal.

Looking Backward

From the Files of the Republican 36 Years Ago Last June.

June 29, 1911

The first time Mrs. Aaron Sweet visited Decatur there was but one house here, and the one family living here was that of Charles Tucker where she visited. That was in the summer of 1847. Later she came here to live, and now after 60 years she is moving away. She is going to Arco, Idaho, to live in the home of her son Willard.

Charles Tucker, who married a sister of Aaron Sweet, had taken a contract to furnish ties for the Michigan Central. The track was laid as far as Kalamazoo, but the Company had purchased and surveyed its right of way as far as Niles.

Mr. Tucker lived in Paw Paw, which was already a small settlement. To fill his contract to best advantage he decided to locate on the right of way, built a log house on the North side of the sink hole back of the Walter Brown house on Delaware street, and in 1847 moved into it.

The railroad was built through Decatur during the summer of 1848 and it reached Niles the same fall. Mr. Tucker built the first hotel here in 1848 and was its first landlord. The Sherwood boys boarded with him when they platted the village.

This land all belonged to the Beers and Sherwood Company of New York city, a wealthy company that made a business of buying and platting large tracts of new land. They bought the land of the government at $1.25 per acre and the entire village of Decatur cost them but $768.75.

Neither Beers nor Sherwood ever saw Decatur, but the latter's sons, George and William, are well remembered by Mrs. Sweet as bright and capable young men. In platting, the owners were given alternate blocks.

The street running parallel with the railroad the boys named Sherwood for their father. The street west of Main street was named for William and the street east of Main street for George.

Charles Tucker, in 1850, took up land South of the railroad and built the house which until recently has been known as the Moulton place. (Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Griffin live on it now.) Mr. Tucker was supposed to have discovered gold on this farm and great excitement prevailed throughout the community. The gold well which he dug on the farm was still there when the writer was at the imaginative age, and he and his brother Will dug it out again, but no gold was ever found there and the gold well became a joke.

Mrs. Sweet was Orpha White before her marriage which occurred in Otsego in 1845, when she was 16. Aaron Sweet and his wife lived five years in Mattawan and became residents of Decatur in 1851. They bought the property on George street, which Mrs. Sweet has just left, of the Sherwood estate fifty years ago.

Mr. Sweet worked for the Michigan Central as a track repairer, and later served 18 years as village marshal or nightwatch. He was a veteran of the Civil War.

Mrs. Sweet will be 82 in October. But two people are now living in Decatur (June 29, 1911) who were residents of the village when she moved here. They are Mrs. Mary McCormick Rumbaugh, who was but a few months old, and Mrs. Viola Pardee Smith, who was a child of six or seven.

The Cannon in the Railroad Park

This cannon is a relic of the Civil War. It was obtained from the Brooklyn Navy Yard and placed in the park in the fall of 1896.

The cannon was first fired in Decatur on Decoration Day, 1897. The Republican of June 3 following says: "In the forenoon the Grand Army boys satisfied a latent desire to fire the cannon on the railroad grounds. There was some objection to doing this, owing to the close proximity to Main street and the fear that it might break the lights in the nearby store buildings, but it was tested with a five pound charge of shot and proved that it could be loaded much nearer its capacity without danger."

Our Cannon

We take the following extract from A. B. Copley's historical report of the G. A. R. park cannon: There has been collected to date for the gun $158.63, of which amount $122.92 was paid for freight, $14.22 for unloading, placing in position and painting, leaving unexpended $21.22. The committee estimates a further collection of $30 in addition to that on hand to place the gun in a position befitting the gift, and a credit to the town.

This cannon is a 100 pounder Parrott rifled gun weighing 9,762 pounds, the carriage and mountings 6,208 lbs., and 100 balls, 13,000; total weight, 29,000 pounds. It was cast and fitted at the west point foundry at Coldspring, N. Y., by the inventor Robert Parker Parrott, superintendent of the works, and was shipped with five others to Boston or New York, presumably the latter place, on November 28, 1862, and was placed on the steamer Quaker City, August, 1863. This vessel was a side wheel steamer of 1,600 tons, chartered in March and purchased by the government in August 1861. The gun in question, No. 12, was placed on her in August, 1863, and remained till the close of the war. She served principally in the Atlantic blockading squadrons during the war, going to the western gulf blockading in 1865. The principal engagements in which she took part while this 100 pounder was on board were the two attacks on Fort Fisher, December 24 and 25, 1864. On the 25th of June, 1864, she captured forty bales of cotton, on the 5th of September she assisted in the capture of the steamer Elsie, a blockade runner; on the 12th of March, 1865, she captured the schooner R. H. Vermilyea; on the 16th of March, 1865, she captured the sloop Telmico; on the 17th of March, 1865, she captured the schooner General Burkhardt; on the 24th of the same month she captured the steamer Cora and on the 18th of May, 1865, went out of commission at the Philadelphia Navy yard.

In August, 1870, this gun, No. 12, was placed on the Brooklyn and remained there till July, 1873, when it was landed at the Boston Navy yard, where it remained till November, 1896, arriving at Decatur on the 6th of the month.

While on the Brooklyn the vessel was cruising in the European waters. She was a screw steamer of 2,000 tons, wooden, carrying a battery of twenty guns. In 1889 this ship was condemned and went out of commission, her name being perpetuated by one of the new iron clads.

To the young folks who were grumbling
O'er the failure of some plan.
'Taint gwine to do no good now

Huge Tulip Poplars

Near-Virgin Trees In Newton Woods.

From Prairie Farmer of Jan. 17, 1948.

"The Newton Woods," 700 acres of as near virgin hardwood timber as exists in lower Michigan, has been known to folks who live in Cass and Van Buren countes for many years. When the heirs of the Newton estate began selling or offering for sale this property, Mr. Fred Russ of Cassopolis bought 580 acres, later giving it to Michigan State College. They have renamed it the "Fred Russ Memorial Woods." The tract had 700 acres in the original area.

Three Distinct Areas

This timber is located about four miles north of Cassopolis on the road to Decatur. There are three different kinds of woodland. One tract has a distinct growth of beech, maple, walnut and elm. The person who wants to see the smooth, light-colored beech will be happy. Here is the kind of walnut the lumberman likes. It is tall, straight, without knots. In one place is an elm, six feet in diameter and 180 feet high.

Another tract is of solid oak, with black cherry undergrowth. Once these woods were all together. Why the difference no one knows.

One of the interesting trees growing in these woods is the tulip poplar, a white wood. This tree grows tall and straight, sometimes attaining considerable height. It has a rather distinct leaf. The fruit when it ripens looks like a tulip.

Before giving the forest to the college, Fred Russ collected tulip tree seed. He let the squirrels cut the fruit in the tree, and Russ collected the seed on the ground. They were planted in seed beds and the seedlings later planted to a permanent forest. Since 1936 Russ has been responsible for planting 130 acres of the tulip poplar and they are doing well.

A Mighty Big Tree

In the woodlot adjacent to the tulip poplar planting are many of these trees, one of which is six and a half feet in diameter at breast height. Its height is 150 feet. Lumbermen have estimated it would cut 8,000 board feet of lumber. Checking growth rings shows that the tree is about 250 years old.

If you want to see these trees go to Decatur on route 40 in Van Buren county. Turn south on the road to Cassopolis about eleven miles. The road runs through one part of the woods.

RAILROAD DAY

Thursday, September 9th, was Railroad Day and all are agreed it was a success. At 4 a. m. the official car of H. F. DeForest, assistant General Manager, accompanied by his wife and G. F. Wheeler, Freight Claim Agent, and wife, and W. E. Frackelton, General Passenger Agent, and wife, was set out on the stub track west of the depot. Under supervision of Supt. B. D. Maltby and Trainmaster John Dring, the exhibit arrangements had been completed by 10 a. m. This included flood lights, platforms, etc.

Visitors had access to the units of equipment on display between equipment and several hundred feet of snow fence which had been erected for safety. All passenger trains reduced speed through Decatur while the exhibit was open.

At noon the official car of Vice-President McKee and his guests arrived and was taken off the rear of the train by a switch engine and also placed on the stub track. Mr. McKee's guests were Mr. Hargrave, Mr. Munro and Mr. Roberts. The occupations of these gentlemen have been mentioned before. Mrs. McKee arrived shortly after by auto. The reception committee consisting of Queen Esther and her mother and Donald Stepnitz, Chairman A. C. Mack, W. T. Beek, E. E. Woolfe, Fred Pennell, Marshall Orr and E. C. Planck, together with their wives. After a brief visit at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Mack and niece, Miss Doris Dodge, the committee provided luncheon for Mr. McKee and Mr. DeForest and their guests, including Mr. and Mrs. Carter Jenkins of Niles. At the luncheon Mr. McKee extended an invitation to all those present to a buffet supper at 6:30 p. m. in the two official cars which invitation was readily accepted. Mr. and Mrs. Carl Wickett, Mr. and Mrs. James Hirst, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Buys, and Mr. and Mrs. M. S. Rudisill also attended on the invitation of Mr. McKee.

Directly after luncheon, cars were provided and the party taken on a trip in the country and stops included the Becker farms and storage after which the railroad officials and guests were assembled at the band stand and were present for the speech of Governor Sigler.

Fred Pennell acted as master of ceremonies and introduced those present to the Governor. After the buffet supper, which was thoroughly enjoyed as well as the visit with the hosts, Mr. McKee, his guests, Queen Esther and her court and Mr. DeForest and other officials assembled again at the band stand for the crowning of the Queen. This was performed by Mr. McKee who gave an appropriate speech embracing the relationship between the growth of Decatur and the Michigan Central railroad in the last 100 years.

Near the end of the program Edgar Bergen made a surprise appearance and impromptu speech which was greatly enjoyed. Later in the evening Mr. DeForest and Mr. Wheeler, also the three gentlemen with Mr. McKee, got into serious difficulties in the Kangaroo court and were summarily dealt with.

4,152 persons visited the equipment exhibit. Traveling Engineer Percy Elliott was in charge of the diesel units. He has 50 days to go before being pensioned. Mr. McKee, Mr. DeForest and others including Messrs. Hargrave, Munro and Roberts expressed to this writer and several others their appreciation of the hospitality and friendliness shown them by the people of Decatur.

DECATUR PUPILS OF LONG AGO

Jim Chamberlain of Fort Worth, Texas, has done another nice thing for the Decatur old timers of his day. He has had the school picture of the first primary pupils of 1877 enlarged, and has sent the Republican four copies, one for his cousin Jerry Halleck, one for his cousin Mattie McOmber, one for his brother Will and one for the editor.

He has them all identified and their names are as follows: Delos Nichols, Ed. DePue, Tom Carpenter, Cass Roberts, Andrew Long, Robert Acton, Frank Tuttle, Arthur Percival, John Chamberlain, Ed. Scott, Will Bottsford, Will Warren, Harry Smith, Albert Gantz, Leila Harlow, Flora Jacobs, Jennie Jackson, Kate Nesbitt, Cora Fry, Mary O'Leary, Kate Mahoney, Stella Maxham, Minnie Hawks, Kate Austin, Sarah Foster, Blanche Babcock, Jessie Hathaway, Pearl Hopkins, Winnie Babcock, Hattie Blue, Conde Upton, Arba Moulton, Sela Eckenberger, Louis Dwight, and the teacher, Ida Trowbridge.

They ranged in ages from five to seven years and of the 34 in the picture only seven to our certain knowledge are living. These are Delos Nichols, Albert Gantz, Leila Harlow, Stella Maxham, Minnie Hawks, Louis Dwight and Arba Moulton. Some of them we have not heard of for many years and shall be very glad if anyone can furnish information about others of the class. (Will and Mattie, call for your pictures.)

Jim also sends the following information about Aransas Pass, Texas, where Leo and Doris Rose and Dean and Lila Davidson went a few weeks ago with their house cars.

It is located on the Gulf of Mexico, near Corpus Christi, in Aransas Co., population 4095, 1940 census, has excellent fishing, shrimp and oysters also abundant. Settled in 1820 by Irish. Little population until railroad built in 1855. It has 18 foot sea wall, bay front surrounds town between north and south limits. It is the tide water terminus of several oil companies. Rockport is the county seat of Aransas county, population in 1940 1729.

Morgan steamship line company built Rockport in 1868 under guarantee of cattle companies that they would ship $1,000 worth of hides yearly and it soon became a flourishing sea port. Slaughter houses handled thousands of cattle taking the hides, rendering the tallow for shipment, making fertilizer of the bones and throwing the meat into the bay. Later, however, the meat was canned, cattle being bought at three cents a pound.

General Taylor camped for a short time at Rockport and a large tree under which he is said to have pitched his tent is named the Taylor Oak.

Your friend, Jim.

Van Buren Gazetteer—1869.

"The village of Decatur was first incorporated by the board of supervisors in October 1859, and afterward rechartered by the legislature, by an act approved March 16th, 1861. The first president of the corporation was E. Parker Hill; the first Recorder, Orrin T. Welch. Since its incorporation the village has grown rapidly, and now especially since the close of the late war, village lots have been and are in constant demand and new plots are being constantly laid out and put on the market.

It is safe to say that no town on the line of the M. C. R. R. enjoys a greater degree of material prosperity. It now contains a population of two thousand five hundred. Among its notable institutions there is none of which it is more justly proud than its Union grade school. It consists of five departments and employs one male and five female teachers. The school building is a massive brick structure, occupying a most eligible site, overlooking the whole village, with ample and delightful play grounds ornamented with beautiful shade trees. It was built in 1863-64 at a cost of $12,000. The staff consists of J. H. Bishop, principal; Miss Carrie Roberts, first assistant; Miss Emma Minor, second assistant; Miss Helen Bradford, first intermediate; Miss Emma Hewson, second intermediate; Miss Helen Beattie, primary; Fletcher Coney, janitor.

Edifice built in 1863-4 at a cost of $12,000. J. H. Bishop, principal. Miss Carrie Roberts, first assistant. Miss Emma Minor, second assistant. Miss Helen Bradford, first intermediate. Miss Emma Hewson, second intermediate. Miss Helen Beattie, primary. Fletcher Coney, janitor.

I received a card from Helen Hathaway from Almont, Mich., thanking me for sending the poem she wanted, "Talking In Their Sleep." Also a nice note from Elizabeth Price. Sister Elizabeth writes in such a generous way, with big round letters, I am sure Ivy May Monroe who used to write for the paper and understands graphology, could tell much of the character of Elizabeth by her writing. I am sure it would all be very good. I liked the way she closed her letter to me, "God bless you, yours in F. L. T."

NEW YORK CENTRAL PASSES BY DECATUR

A new schedule of New York Central trains went into effect Sunday. It strikes a blow at Decatur by removing the two east-bound trains on which the train-traveling public have depended in coming here from Chicago and going from Decatur to points east.

Train No. 44 due in Decatur at 12:09 and No. 358, due at 11:10 p. m. no longer recognize Decatur as a station. The only passenger train going east in the entire 24 hours is a night train leaving Chicago at 2 a. m. our time, and due in Decatur at 6:03 a. m., our time, and the only west-bound train is No. 23, due here at 6:05 p. m. No. 341, a local train for many years, has been taken off.

We believe Decatur is entitled to better treatment than this and hope the officials will reconsider their action.

Train No. 44 had three passengers out of Chicago Sunday noon. They bought tickets for Decatur and on the train were informed by the conductor that it would not stop here. It was a most inconsiderate thing to do. These people were compelled to leave the train at Dowagiac and get to Decatur in the best way they could. The irony of the situation is that the train continues to stop at Lawton, a smaller town than Decatur.

In the village and throughout the nearby country there are commuters between Decatur and Chicago. These people are left without train service and they feel considerably hurt over the situation.

Protests have been sent and are being sent to the General Passenger Agent at Chicago, and we are not without hope that officials will reconsider their action and restore to Decatur their former service.

HISTORICAL SKETCH OF DECATUR, 1869

"The site of the village of Decatur was originally obtained of the U. S. Government by Messrs. Beers and Sherwood of New York city in a grant to them of 5,000 acres. These gentlemen, though never residents of the place, seem to have left their impress upon it and to have, to some extent, given character to its institutions. In 1850 they built a steam saw mill in the southwestern part of the village, on the land now occupied by Anthony McKay. This mill was afterward converted into a distillery, which, in its turn, has happily disappeared, leaving only rank grass to mark the spot it once defiled.

"In 1854 the present business centre of the village was occupied as follows: Ira Nash kept a dry goods store on the corner now occupied by Abbott Bros.; Trowbridge and Harris kept a general variety store on the corner now occupied by Aaron Hathaway; W. C. Tucker, a general variety store on that now occupied by Trowbridge and Hill; and Henry Canoll, a drug store where Higgins and Squiers now keep a grocery store."

Some way it seems good to think of Nellie Nelson back in Montana, the Treasure State. "The greatest length from east to west is 540 miles. The area is 146,080 square miles, of which 770 sq. miles are water. The population in 1900 was 243,329 of which 11,343 were Indians. The territory of Montana was first visited by the French in 1742, and later by Jesuit missionaries, fur traders, and trappers. The first permanent settlement was at Fort Benton in 1840. In 1861 rich gold fields were discovered, and in the following year mining began in earnest. The territory was organized in 1864, being formed of a part of the old territory of Idaho. In 1876 the famous Custer Massacre occurred on the Little Bighorn River. The development of silver and copper mines and the construction of railroads brought prosperity to the region, and in 1889 Montana was admitted into the Union."

Somewhere I read "Beautiful as a Montana sunset." Remember, Nellie—

"This is the charm by sages often told
Converting all it touches into gold;
Content can soothe where'er by fortune placed
Can rear a garden in the desert waste."

A SONG BOOK AND THE GREENMAN FARM

The Republican published last week a letter from Miss Lucy Upton of Long Beach, California. It told of the search by Mrs. Wadsworth of that city, and the finding of a copy of the Golden Robin Song book. Mrs. Wadsworth wrote a few days later and her interesting letter is printed here.

William R. Greenman, to whom she refers, was one of the early settlers of Van Buren county. He came here from New York in 1845 and bought forty acres of choice hardwood timberland on the South shore of Christie lake. The story is that he traded a gold watch for it. He added to this forty until he had acquired around 400 acres which now comprise the fine farms of his grandchildren, Dr. Newton H. Greenman and Mrs. Doris Greenman Rose.

W. R. Greenman was a man of energy and business ability, but his matrimonial barques did not always have smooth sailing. One time while unattached, he decided to take a trip South to Louisville, Kentucky, where his son Miles, killed in action in the Civil War, was buried in a National cemetery. While there he met and married Mrs. Covington, a widow with two little daughters, Minnie and Cora, around 10 and 12 years of age. The older of the two is the writer of this letter.

Dr. N. H. Greenman was born on the farm and lived there until he went out to North Dakota to practice his profession. He was about three years old when his grandfather brought his new wife and the little girls to the farm. He remembers them well, although it is opening a chapter in his life which he had not thought of for many years.

Now that Mrs. Wadsworth has made this small start it may be that she will write more of these interesting reminiscences and they will be welcomed by the Republican. The impressions of childhood leave an indellible mark on our lives, and the older we get the more we look back to find pleasure in them.

It is probably in line with the thoughts of her childhood home that Mrs. Wadsworth expresses the desire that the Golden Robin Song Book shall eventually be added to the home town library. Her letter follows:

60 Via di Roma Walk,
Long Beach [illegible] Calif.

My dear Editor:

Some time ago I wrote your local librarian regarding the old Golden Robin song book they had in the Grammar school when I attended the school years ago. As you so kindly printed the letter I must compliment you on the circulation of your paper as I received many letters from different parts of the country. I subscribed to your paper for a short time. I wrote to the Congressional Libraray but was informed the book was out of print. They offered to photostat the book at a cost of $28 but I concluded that was a bit steep for just a whim to be satisfied. I heard of a fine old second hand book store in Boston and wrote them. They replied that they had a copy fairly well preserved they would part with for $3.50. I sent for it and have presented it to the Upton sisters here in Long Beach with the thought I'd like it willed to the Decatur Library as a memorial to my era in Decatur.

Miss Lucy Upton often sends me copies of the Republican and I have enjoyed so much seeing old names that remain in my memory. I do not see Dr. Greenman's ad any more. Has he grown rich and retired? I wonder if he is the son of George and Kate Greenman. She used to call him Newtie. His grandfather was William Greenman. I was the daughter of his 5th or 6th wife. I wonder if he remembers me, if so I'd surely love to hear something of him or from him.

Please excuse this lengthy letter, but you know as we grow older we love to reminisce. I am now in my 84th year and I ask your indulgence as to writing and spelling. All power to you and your good work.

Sincerely,
Minnie Covington Wadsworth.

Indian Trees

By Fred W. Green

Revised by Don Moline and Marvin Peterson.

(This is the 14th story in the Norman E. Webster local history contest written by the pupils of the Decatur public schools under the direction of Catherine Howland, teacher of history and science.)

Since many Indian tribes lived in and around Van Buren county, it is not strange that we have an Indian tree in our community. It is located on the Wooster farm in Hamilton township, and is now owned by Mrs. Phelps, Mr. Wooster's daughter. Its exact location is at the extreme eastern end of the farm, a little north of the center. It is in a good state of preservation. Its location was wisely chosen, as it stands on a little elevation, and was at one time in a densely wooded area. About 40 rods south there is a small hollow, evidently a small lake. No doubt this was the place where deer came to drink, and was the breeding spot for wild game. I draw this conclusion as so many arrow heads have been found there. They are picked up even today when the field is plowed.

It is wonderful what nature will do when given a little assistance from human hands. It will be noticed from the picture that the trunk of the tree was not allowed to grow too high. It is handy to the ground and was turned to the left as the first step. No doubt that was done when the tree was just a small twig. It was reinforced at the bend, and tied with some kind of lash probably made of reed or perhaps a thong from the hide of the [illegible] with which the country [illegible] at the time. After that branch was allowed to grow a certain length and was able to stand up by itself by being attached to the main trunk, it was again turned upward, indicating that the Indian had some idea that the Great Master was above.

The location is an ideal place for a camp. Even today there are wild lands that have not been turned into Agricultural usefulness. Wild berries and shrubs of all kinds abound there and no doubt the Indians put them to good use. I have in mind wintergreen, elder berries, blue berries, sassafras and all kinds of vegetation that grows in profusion in the Michigan lowlands.

Just how long the Indian made this location a hunting ground is unknown, but it must have been many years ago as the tree itself is at least fourteen inches in diameter and the first turn is about six feet in length. Another indication of its age is the fact that it stands up, paralleling the ground, without support except that received from the main stump.

The more one thinks about the Indians themselves, the more wonderful they seem. Reflect upon their idea about the Great Master being up there. They no doubt obtained their inspiration from the rising sun that awakened them from their slumbers. The eastern sun illuminated the world and was a symbol of activity; the setting sun was a signal of rest after the toil of the day.

It would be sad indeed if this Indian tree, which I visit very often, were to meet the fate of the woodsman's ax. There are very few left, and this is a wonderful specimen. Of those few that are left, there is one located in [illegible] marker. Another grows near Benton Harbor, and a third one is on the outskirts of South Haven.

THE WILL

E'er have the will to do a thing
And not the wish that it was done
And soon you'll find the thing complete
And then you may indulge in fun.

LIFE'S BEST THINGS

A better harvest comes to those Who fertilize the soil;
And life's best things are more enjoyed
When earned by honest toil.

OUR PART

Someone once said "Sight is a gift
But seeing is an art;"
So let us use our sight to see
How best to do our part.

KINDNESS

A little bit of kindness shown
To one in trouble or despair;
May light the flame of hope anew
So he again may do and dare.

AT PAR

Exchange may fluctuate a lot
In all the leading marts;
But smiles are constantly at par
Because they cheer man's heart.

THE MARCH OF DIMES

I am a little lame child and I cannot go
To school and to play as other folks do.
My poor twisted feet would not ache all the time
If each of you gave just one little dime.

Just one little dime is all that I ask,
I hope you won't think it too great a task.
Just think what it means to children like me
To live all their life in great misery.

And now, my dear friend, just let me ask you,
If I was your child just what would you do?
Is it asking too much of your wealth and your time
To make some child well by giving a dime?

This poem has been read over WTAD, Quincy, Ill., broadcasting station, the last four years. Read again yesterday. Last year it was announced that several hundred dollars had been received due to this poem.

IT PAYS TO ADVERTISE

Mister Moulton kindly tells us
In his fine Republican,
Buy a hen and gently boil it,
Or make fricassee, and ban
All the grief that looms before us
With regard to grain and bran.

Do I heed him? Yes, indeedy,
Quickly to the shop I run,
Get a hen and slowly stew it,
Add some noodles, oh what fun.
Tuck beneath my chin, the napkin—
And, the chicken soon is done.

—Harriet Eleanor Williams, 1143 East 65th Street, Chicago 37, Illinois.

(The poem refers to the article in The Republican's farm column last week entitled: "Stew Hens Plentiful; Easily Prepared." Mrs. Williams wrote "I just couldn't resist that news item. It really is important, but there was something delightfully naive about it, so the enclosed arrived on the wings of song. I dare you to print it.")

Jim Chamberlain Will Visit Decatur Again

Ft. Worth, Texas, Dec. 27, 1947.

Dear Arba:

I wrote brother Oliver's obituary while waiting the arrival of the train in Omaha, Neb., without notes or references of any kind and as you well know we older people have lapses of memory, but as I recollect my brother Oliver was born on what was then known as the Scott Powers farm in Hamilton township. Scott Powers was the father of Fred Powers, the baseball pitcher.

My earliest recollection of Oliver when we were living there was when, at two years of age, he got his feet burned while walking through some burning chips. The scars caused by those burns remained throughout the remainder of his life. Leona Youells can locate that farm for anyone who is interested.

After leaving there, father moved the family to Martha Kendall's tenant house in Decatur, east of where Jarious Hallock now lives. This was in 1877. Later we moved to the Sanford house on Beers St., and later to W. Sherwood street where brother Will still lives.

These four places are the only ones that I remember of living with father and family. I was born on what was known as the Pat Kelly farm just across the road from where the Fred Payne family now lives. I got this information from my parents. From the time our family left the Pat Kelly place until we moved to the Scott Powers farm my memory is a blank, which is one of the many reasons that I want to make a perhaps final visit to Decatur.

If no one else does it, I will write a series of articles on the early settlers of the Lee (Hamilton) school district and the Christie Lake district. Dr. Greenman, Ed. Plopper, Jarious Hallock, brother Will, and Mary Peterson, I believe, can give me valuable data in preparing such a series. I should also have included Mrs. Charles Warner.

My health is so much improved that, barring unlooked for reversals, I can make that trip this coming summer, and if so, I ask that all who possess any facts concerning the history of these two districts either send them to me or have them in readiness for me when I come to Decatur.

One Hundred Years

This seems like a good place to mark this letter continued till next week and to urge the old timers who can to assist Jim with the information he wants. This will be an important year historically for this community. It is the 100th anniversary of the building of the New York Central, then the Michigan Central railroad through to Niles and of the founding of the village of Decatur. Work will begin soon on a big celebration to be held sometime this summer in commemoration of the anniversary and would suggest that it be held during August so that former residents and others may attend in vacation time. The Republican will announce the date as soon as it is set. Jim should plan to be here at that time. He is the one to write the series of articles he suggests.

In consideration of what the Republican has in store for its readers this year there should be a thousand new subscribers added to its list at once.

The Harrison Family of Kalamazoo, Relatives of Two Presidents

(In this article Mrs. Lura Young of Decatur describes a visit she and Mr. Young and Mr. and Mrs. Truesdell of Kalamazoo made a few weeks ago to Mrs. Emma Longwell, who resides about six miles out of Schoolcraft. Mrs. Longwell is a grand daughter of Bazel Harrison, the first white settler and first Judge of Kalamazoo county. Mrs. Young also belongs to this family. Her grandfather was Joseph Harrison. He and Bazel and the President William Henry Harrison were own cousins. Mrs. Young wrote this interesting story of one of our country's most illustrious families at the suggestion of Nellie Truesdell who is always looking out for good stories for the Republican. Our thanks to both ladies.)

Having intended for some time to visit Mrs. Longwell, I decided that I must be about it if I was ever going to visit her. So not knowing whether or not she would care about seeing strangers, and not knowing the condition of her health, I determined to write Mrs. Nellie Truesdell and ask if Mrs. Longwell would be able to receive a visitor? I was surprised at the reply, for Mrs. Truesdell took the pains to drive over to see her at her home near Schoolcraft. Mrs. Longwell said she would be glad to see me and sent me a "History of the Harrison Family," also some cherished clippings concerning her family. All this I thought very kind in Mr. and Mrs. Truesdell and also in Mrs. Longwell.

On a following Sunday we went to Kalamazoo, picked up Mr. and Mrs. Truesdell and went to make the visit. I found that Mrs. Longwell had that true kindliness so characteristic of the Harrison family. And of all the descendents of this family I have known she exhibits the strongest characteristics of the pioneer spirit that led her grandfather and Uncle William to make homes for themselves in a wilderness unknown to the white man. I think she is the true grand-daughter of a pioneering grandfather.

Of the things she told me she had done through life, one was the weaving of over a thousand yards of carpet, when woven carpet was the regular floor covering. She wove one hundred yards for the floors of her fine home. Though badly crippled with rheumatism, she had the week before we were there painted the floor of her large porch by sitting in her grandfather's rocker and moving it about as she painted.

She reminisced somewhat of her grandfather, telling how badly they, the children, felt when he passed away at 103, and they couldn't feel that God was quite just to take such a good man. But she talked mostly of her Uncle William who was the oldest son of Bazel, and who was referrde to by every one as "Uncle Billy."

Mrs. Longwell mentioned, and we laughed together, about Uncle Billy's encounter with the bear. He, accompanied by his dog "Tearcoat," had gone to a neighbor's some eight miles away to grind his ax. While ascending a hill on his way home the dog growled as he did when wild animals were near, then rushed ahead. Through an opening in the upland shrubbery Uncle Billy saw a large black bear moving quite rapidly with the dog overtaking him. The bear turned, stood on his hind legs, and waved his paws defiantly. In an instant the animals were locked in a terrible struggle.

Catching the dog in his paws, the bear bit him in the shoulder until he yelped. Forgetting the ax "Uncle Billy" rushed to the dogs aid. He jerked the bear's hind legs and kicked him, whereupon the animal turned upon his human antagonist, biting off a boot heel. He fell down and the bear was instantly upon him. They rolled down the hill over and over, "Uncle Billy" finally getting free. The bear didn't seem inclined to continue the fight and climbed a tree. "Uncle Billy" remarked that both he and "Tearcoat" had learned something about bears that day.

Mrs. Longwell spoke of the courtesy shown Uncle Billy by the Grand Trunk railroad. She said the Grand Trunk would stop its trains anywhere for him, and my mind went back a good many years to a day when I was coming from Battle Creek to Scotts on the Grand Trunk. Part way between Battle Creek and Climax the train began to slow down and came to a full stop. I was wondering what could be the matter, when an old and much bewhiskered man came aboard and sat down very quietly. Some one back of me said the Grand Trunk will stop its trains anywhere for that old fellow. And I know now that I once saw "Uncle Billy." I have known of people having free passes on railroads, but I have never known of anyone else for whom the trains would stop anywhere along the line.

We talked on and Grace Harrison was mentioned several times. Grace married "Uncle Billy's" grandson and owns a large and very fine farm about four miles northeast of Climax. I had never known just where Billy settled, so as I had become interested in the Harrisons again, and Grace had visited in my home, I thought I would go and see her and find out just where he did settle. I found that his farm was just south of hers and faced on the next road south, making his home one mile north and 3 miles east of Climax.

Grace and I had never talked of the Harrisons before, and I was surprised to find she had an enlarged picture of the older sons of the four generations, Bazel, William, Joseph and Clarence. She also told me a story I had never heard before, but which showed the feeling of good will existing between Uncle Billy's family and the Indians. She said that when "Uncle Billy" went to Detroit with an ox team for supplies, that at night the Indians would come to his house, stack their guns outside the door, come in and lie down on the floor and sleep through the night, to protect the family from harm.

Mrs. Longwell came not only from hardy pioneer stock, but also from ancestors who were patriotic and prominent during the early history of our country. Her great grandfather's brother was a member of the House of Burgess, Signer of the Declaration of Independence, Member of the Continental Congress, and Governor of Virginia. Her great grandfather, too, was patriotic, but he was too old to go to the war, so he called his six older boys to him and told them that he couldn't go to the war because of his age, but that it wouldn't do to let the British get a foothold in this country. So they should go and fight and he would stay and raise the crops. Bazel Harrison cast his first ballot for George Washington, second term.

Mrs. Longwell showed us the picture of the first nice house her grandfather built. It was at that time the nicest house in Kalamazoo, and she was born in this house before it was all completed. She is now 86 years old. Later this house burned, and the present house was built.

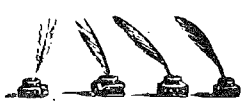
When we returned to Kalamazoo, Mr. and Mrs. Truesdell invited us in to see their home and it is most pleasant. They have some very nice pieces of furniture that Mr. Truesdell made himself. We asked them to come out to the farm, but they didn't find time. So I do hope they will visit us here in Decatur some time.

Lura Young.

P. S. The sad part of it all was that the following Sunday after our visit, Mrs. Longwell's son died very suddenly of a heart attack.

Bazel Harrison was born in Fredric county, Maryland, thirty miles from Baltimore in 1771, and died in Prairie Ronde, Kalamazoo county, August 30, 1874.

Bazel's grandfather, William Harrison was a native of Scotland, and his grandmother was of Welsh birth. William Harrison was a descendant of the Gen. Harrison who held a commission under Cromwell. These grand parents migrated to Virginia and settled either in Berkley or Charles City county, early in the last century. His father's name was also William Harrison and he was born in Berkley, Virginia, about 1730. William Harrison, Jr., was twice married and by his two wives was the father of 23 children. Bazel was the son of the second wife, whose name was Marlinda Davis. His father married her in Maryland about the same time his younger brother, Benjamin Harrison and father of the President and uncle of the judge, marrid her mother, Clara Davis, a widower.



ONE HUNDRED YEAR OLD FARMS

THE ROBERT CHRISTIE FARM IN LAWRENCE TOWNSHIP

Mrs. Leland Barnes of the fourth generation writes this interesting information to Marshall Orr who is collecting data on farms that have been in the same family 100 years or more.

Lawrence, August 26, 1948.

Dear Mr. Orr:

I am copying from a book I have and a portion of the abstract and adding a few facts told me by my grandmother. I trust that you will be able to get the date you want from this. If you still need more information I will try to get it from older cousins still living.

Robert Christie was my great grand father, Henry Christie was my grand father, and Bertha Christie Chase was my mother.

The first town laid out in Lawrence township was on the banks of Christie Lake to be known as Van Buren Centre. An 80 acre plot was laid out and some lots sold as high as $150 each. H. N. Phelps bought 23 of them. John D. Freeman and a Maj. Calvin Britain of St. Joseph did this and staked a site for a court house, published a map showing this village and a steamboat on the present Christie Lake.

Before any considerable result was reached wildcat paper money became worthless and Freeman's village failed.

However H. N. Phelps still saw prospects for this was on the Detroit-St. Joseph trail or old Territorial Road. He therefore erected a tavern opposite a store building previously erected by Freeman. This tavern, after it was purchased by Robert Christie became a very important factor in the old stage coach days. To the driver it meant a change of horses and to the traveler meals and an overnight.

In 1837 Robert Christie of Washtenaw County, came here with his family en route to Hartford where he had bought considerable land. He moved his family into the abandoned store building until the Hartford place was ready for habitation. He and his two eldest sons went to Hartford in July of 1837 and worked until Saturday night, then returned to spend Sunday with the family. They and the rest of the family were stricken with ague and from then until January lay helpless with fever. During this time the Hartford property was exchanged for the 23 village lots and tavern. Robert Christie became landlord and operated it as long as the stage coaches traveled.

This was in Sec. 26 where a portion of our farm is and the residence.

Robert Christie died in 1865.

Henry Christie purchased a portion of this section 26 of his father in 1855, and the portion of Sec. 35 that I gave you yesterday at an earlier date.

The abstract shows the owner of each of the lots and from whom my great-grandfather purchased them. I nave found looking this up for you very interesting.

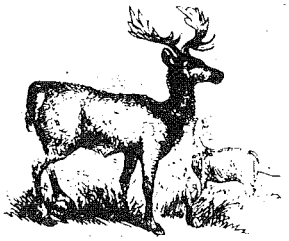
You asked for the range, town, etc. I find these entries in the abstract. South fifteen acres of the S. E. quarter of the S. W. quarter of Sec. 26 (1837).

Also the N. forty-nine acres of the E. half of the N. W. quarter of Sec. 35 all in Town Three south, Range fifteen West.

Yours truly,
Mrs. Leland Barnes.



Bonine Elk Farm One of The Show Places of State

From the Prairie Farmer

The elk, native to Michigan, is being preserved in Cass Co., Mich., and probably will be for many years to come. G. Elwood Bonine, owner of the elk from which his farm gets its name, says, "We've thought many times about doing away with the herd. But public opinion has always said no, so we have yielded."

"This herd is a landmark in the minds of many folks," Bonine added. He pointed out that the farm has been known as Elk Park farm since shortly after 1862. It was in that year someone gave his grandfather a pair of elk, from which the present herd is descended.

"Grandfather fenced in a 12-acre lot and grandmother took care of them with the result that a fair-sized herd was soon developed," Bonine says.

Though elk are native to Michigan, they are not very prolific in captivity. In the wild state each female would normally have a calf each year, but in captivity less than 50 percent of the cows average getting with calf annually. Nevertheless it has always been necessary to maintain a consistent butchering program.

The meat has generally been used for dinners and banquets of a public nature, such as conservation club affairs and service club dinners. The Boy Scout camp located in Cass county always gets a share.

Bonine says there are a great many little-known facts about elk. For one thing they can outrun a horse. While he has never timed one, he estimates that at top speed they travel as fast as 50 miles per hour. During the summer, elk will not eat hay, which means that if the pasture gets short they are apt to go hungry. This one factor has forced Bonine to keep the herd down to about 25, as he has only 40 acres enclosed in the park.

Will Not Eat Grain

Once when there were 35 animals in the herd, a drouth cut the pasture so short some of them actually suffered. They will eat some hay in the winter time, but will never touch grain or most of the other feeds accepted by cattle.

At two years of age the average elk has reached a weight of about 450 pounds, the age they are usually slaughtered for meat. The biggest ones never get any larger than eight to nine hundred pounds, regardless of age.

Elk shed their horns every year, another little-known fact, according to Bonine. He says they have a habit of rubbing their newly-grown horns on the side of a tree until the points are as sharp as a spear. "They have one tree that they all use to sharpen their horns on," Bonine said, adding, "It is going to be interesting watching what they will do this year, as the tree they have used for years was recently cut down."

Dogs, Beware!

Elk are normally shy and will not attack man, except during the mating season when the bulls are really dangerous. They are, however, death on dogs, which Bonine believes is a hangover from the days when they had to protect themselves from wolves. "They simply run down and paw to death any dog that happens to get in their way," Bonine said.

He also pointed out that the horns on an elk are pointed back enough so he can run through the thickest underbrush by simply tipping his head back a little.

LET ME SING MY SONG

I shall not tarry with you very long
Nor shall I ever pass this way again.
So let me sing to you my little song
And do my best to ease and entertain
My fellow pilgrim, on the lonesome way;
To have him trust me to the very end.
And when I'm gone, for him to speak and say
"I miss that man, he was my loyal friend."
To be a friend to someone is a boon
We cannot price or ever comprehend.
To walk with him is pleasant, but too soon
The journey ends and friend must part with friend.
The time is short, so let me sing my song,
To comfort those who climb the mountain steep
To mingle with the weary, hard pressed throng
And scatter sunshine ere I go to sleep.

Early Decatur Days

From a Letter Written to Miss Catherine Howland by Dr. Geo. W. Mahoney, Well Known Chicago Physician.

It takes the older residents of Decatur to personally remember Dr. Mahoney, but in his youth and early practice of medicine he was an active and prominent resident of this village.

He graduated from the Decatur high school in 1878 and practiced his profession in Chicago far more than fifty years. We shall not here go into a sketch of his interesting life, for it will be one of our feature articles some time during this Centennial summer.

Dr. Mahoney is now retired and is a resident of Hines Hospital, Hines, Illinois. A letter received from him last week gave the welcome information that he would send the Republican sketches of two leading Decatur young men of his early Decatur days, Maurice Sheahan and William Brown, and they will be published soon.

The Doctor has also written his cousin, Miss Catherine Howland, a letter containing interesting local history from which the following is taken:

Hines Hospital, Hines, Ill.

My dear cousin,—

I have your letter mailed in Kalamazoo, and some things in it am sure I never answered.

You ask about the Cold New Year (1864). All I know about it is what my father told me. I must have been a very small child then and he said it was the coldest day he thinks he ever knew. His mother at that time was living in a house facing the railroad tracks, and a block or more east of the street at the mill crossing. (The old flour mill.)

She was living there alone and he was afraid she would be out of wood and cold, but he found her warm and comfortable. He was greatly relieved. This house in later years was the home of Christopher Reece and family. They had a son Fred who died quite young, and a daughter Aicea, who died of tuberculosis at about 14 or 15. Both the father and son worked for my father for some time on the railroad.

Regarding the old livery barn, I don't know who built it. The first man I knew who ran it was A. D. Scott. He ran it for many years and did a big business there.

In those days merchants bought their goods largely from traveling men who came around regularly with samples. As an example, an agent would get off the train at Decatur, and after finishing his business there he would hire a horse, buggy and driver and go to Paw Paw; then drive to Lawrence, Hartford, etc. So the livery business was very good. You could hire a horse and buggy for all day, drive it yourself, for $2.

Out to Riley's

When I was in high school, and a little later when clerking for Freschel Brothers, then Henry Stern, then Roberts and Stewart in their grocery store, four of us, after closing time would hire a team and two-seated buggy and drive over into Volinia to a farm home where a man lived named Riley who was a spiritualist and gave seances. We went for the entertainment. It was free and people from Dowagiac and many other places, even as far as Niles, went there.

One evening a man was there named Nesbitt. I don't remember where he came from, but he was a brother of Robert Nesbitt who built the Nesbitt flour mill in Hamilton and the big brick house. We from Decatur left Riley's early that evening because it was not entertaining enough.

A short time later we went out again and this same Mr. Nesbitt was there. He came up to me and said, "O, you should have stayed the other night, it was grand, it was wonderful! I met my brother Robert." I said, "Are you sure it was your brother?" "O, yes," he said, "I put my hand right on his shoulder and talked to him." There was something in the Riley family I cannot understand.

Going back to the old livery barn. I remember S. D. Scott very well, and a man, Meeker Shookman, worked there for a long time. Buggies were a luxury in those days and few people had them. Farmers and their families rode in lumber wagons. A farmer was quite well fixed when he could afford a spring seat in front for himself and wife, and children or others sat on a board across the box with a horse blanket covering it.

Those were the days when the circus would come to town for a one-day stand. Everything was moved by horses and wagons. For instance, a circus would show in Paw Paw one day and evening. Then, after the evening performance the tent and everything would be torn down, loaded on the wagons and with the animal cages, driven to Decatur. It would be set up again and after the day and evening performances, the next drive would be to Marcellus.

No circus moved by train in those days and we had no paved roads through the country.

In those early days many farmers did not have horses, they had ox teams. The best ox team I remember was Hobart Millard's.

(This letter from Dr. Mahoney brings a flood of memories. Readers are urged to help. Let us record this year all the interesting local history possible. Write a letter to the paper. Tell your reminiscent story in your own language. We will do the rest. This is one way that every old time resident of Decatur can help make the celebration of Decatur's 100th anniversary a success.

Two Bright Decatur Young Men of Long Ago

In the one hundred years that are past many bright young people have grown up in this community. Some have found other localities in which to develop their energies and some have gone on to the Great Beyond. The names of many of them are familiar in the community today, others have passed from the stage of life and are unknown to the present generation.

Two of the latter, friends of our childhood, were Maurice Sheahan and Will Brown. In their boyhood they lived on Beers street near the road we traveled daily on foot enroute to our home on the farm.

We remember Maurice Sheahan as he sat beside the window at his home, a hopeless invalid, but always with a friendly smile on his face, and we last saw Will Brown when he came back from England to go to Alaska in 1898.

Our thanks to Dr. Mahoney for the sketches. The story of Maurice follows and that of Will Brown will be printed next week.

Hines, Illinois,
Hines Hospital,
July 20, 1948.

My dear Sir:

My cousin, Miss Catherine Howland, has told me you would like to have me write you about the life of Maurice Sheahan who as a neighbor I knew very well, and of the life of Wm. Brown, also a neighbor in early days. In the case of Maurice Sheahan I knew him well not only as a boy but all his life until death claimed him, which seemed all too soon.

He was the only child of Patrick and Mary Sheahan. They lived on the south side of Beers street, the west block, and our home was on Beers street, next block east on the north side of the street. He was never a strong active boy, always of a retiring nature, never entered much into the sports and games of the boys of his age but he was always studious and did well in school.

In his first two terms in school, also mine, we attended a private school on west St. Mary's street, west block south side of the street in a house of two rooms. Our teacher was Miss Carrie Trowbridge, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Philander Trowbridge and sister of Theodore Trowbridge, a well known druggist of Decatur in later years. The reason we went to that school was that our parents thought it more convenient and safer than to make the long trip to the north side of the village and walk through the business street to the old red brick school house. That ——— was many years ago.

There were several others who attended this school, Will and Belle Chadwick whose father was one of the Chadwick brothers, dry goods and millinery merchants in the store now occupied, I think, by Mr. Gale. Others who attended were Lillian Hendryx, whose father had a tannery on the south side of Beers street, east block, Lottie Young, whose father was the village carpenter, and Frank Priest. I never was very friendly with him for one day he stepped on my slate and broke it.

Miss Trowbridge later married L. D. Roberts who with L. G. Stewart was in the grocery business in Decatur for many years. After I finished school I clerked for them for some time and kept the books.

Maurice graduated from Decatur high school class of 1878. We were classmates, but I don't recall that he ever did much active work after graduation. He was not well but he had an active keen mind and worked a great deal on something he hoped to invent and get a patent on.

Soon after I located in Chicago I became very well acquainted with Dr. Archibald Church, one of the leading neurologists of this country at the time. I induced Maurice to come to Chicago for an examination by Dr. Church and made arrangements with Dr. Church to see him. I met Maurice at the train and we kept the appointment. Dr. Church took a careful and complete history of his life, then made a careful and thorough examination, very thorough and complete and he let me know that Maurice had some progressive and destructive changes going on in his nervous system, that he would never be any better, that he would never get well.

So with that dark cloud before him Maurice returned to Decatur. He had some arthritis in addition to his other trouble. I have always felt that if Maurice Sheahan had lived for a number of years longer he would have invented something that would have been of value to his fellow men. He might not have been a Thomas A. Edison or a Wright, but he would have invented something that would have been of benefit to the world.

Relatives and Friends Meet After Many Years

A Letter from E. W. Plopper.

About the time of the Civil War a family by the name of William Loveland came from the state of Ohio and settled on the southwest side of Four Mile Lake in Paw Paw township. He had two boys and one girl,—Wallace and William and Laura. Two boys, Horace and Cyrus, were born after they came here. They all grew to manhood and womanhood on the bank of Four Mile Lake. This lake is now commonly known as Lake Cora, after the daughter of John Ihling. The name was changed in 1884.

Wallace moved to Bangor, William lives on part of the old place, Laura remained single. Horace and Cyrus went to the state of Oregon many years ago.

Cyrus came back to Michigan to see the residence, and Sunday, June 20, a reunion was held for him at Milham park, Kalamazoo. About 60 of the children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren were there, and they had a big dinner and a great time.

William married my sister Cora and they celebrated their 61st wedding anniversary June sixth. They have about 75 children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

Horace and myself started to school the same day. There was only 16 days difference in our ages. He was 78 January 12 and I was 78 January 28. We grew up together and were pals all of our lives. Horace sent a letter and Cyrus read it at the dinner Sunday. It made me think of old times. I will send it to you and hope you can print it.

E. W. Plopper.

Instead of sending the letter our old time friend brought it over one day last week and we are printing a goodly portion of it here:

Porterville, Calif.,
June 16, 1948.

Dear Cy, and Julie,—

I should have written you last week but time goes fast and I didn't get to it. I hardly thought you would be in Grand Rapids so soon. I sure would like to have been with you when you looked the old place over. It must have given you a queer feeling to have seen such a change. I would like to have taken a boat and gone out on the lake. I think I would have felt more at home there. I have many pleasant memories of the things we used to do there, swimming and fishing, and even sailing the old boat, and washing the horses and the buggy.

I take it from what you wrote that part of the farm near the lake has grown up to locust trees. There used to be quite a quantity on the shore at the landing.

I sure would like to see Roll and Cora and a few others. Ed. Plopper for one, and I don't know who else. I would of course like to be present at a reunion, if you can get the clan together. There would be Wallie, Floy and Edith and Lila, and perhaps Earl and Lou and William and Grace and Mina, and I forgot to mention Emma.

Tell Willie that his Aunt Clara, better known to him as Mrs. Shreeve, sends her best wishes to him and the rest of the family, and all the gang.

We are having very nice summer weather now. We have been canning quite a quantity of fruit of late, and have plenty of garden stuff. Have a number of fine tomato plants and tomatoes as big as walnuts and plenty of beet greens, berries and apricots, and some figs are coming in to market. Almost any kind of vegetable you can think of can be bought if you have the price.

We are between the orange harvests—the navels will come on this fall and the valencies in the spring. The orange crop alone here is worth around three million dollars. That is just in Tulare county.

California is one of the largest cotton producing states and also a big stock country. Lemons, persimmons, figs and grapes are all raised in large quantities, and also olives and potatoes.

I suppose you will be in Paw Paw more or less. If you get a chance call on Labe and Fannie Mentor and give them our best regards.

You no doubt know all about the Portland and Vanport flood. It sure was an awful thing to happen to such a peaceful town and country. There was another break a couple of days ago that sent the workers on one dyke scrambling to get out of the way.

I had a letter from Phil this week and he said that Yakima also had a flood, took out a couple of bridges. We haven't heard from Doris lately, but they are high enough up so the water cannot reach them.

Hoping you and Julie will have a grand visit with all the folks, we remain

Sincerely your brother and sister,
Horace and Clara.

FARMS OVER A HUNDRED YEARS IN ONE FAMILY

THE HOWARD HOMESTEAD
1838 — 1948

Hosea Howard, the second, and his wife Elizabeth Leonard Howard came to Michigan in 1837. Hosea came from Feltsmills, a manufacturing community near Watertown, New York. Elizabeth came from Rossie in St. Lawrence County, New York.

They lived in Kalamazoo county (postoffice was Sweetland), for a year and in 1838 purchased 160 acres in Lawrence township. They bought this land from a Mr. Clark. There was a small log house on the place and there was several acres of cleared land along the present road. Their neighbors were the Dopps who lived where the Cullinane place is, the Marshalls, Irishes and Lamphears. They had to go to St. Joseph to have corn ground. One time they sold a wagon load of hogs and from them got enough money to buy goods for one calico dress. They walked to Keeler to attend church services.

At this early date there was nothing but dense forest all around with a few small clearings. The only way for them to get around was to take the foot paths that had been made by the Indians and wild game. One day Elizabeth went blackberrying, she got lost and after wandering for hours came upon a log house. She hesitated to go to it and wondered who lived in that shack, finally she went around the side to the door and found it to be her own home.

Following is a copy of a letter Hosea wrote to a friend in New York, giving instructions as to how they should come, things to bring and some of their own experiences in making the trip west to Michigan.

Dear Brother and Sister,

I received yours of the fifth inst. in which you wish my opinion of the route and things to bring. If you come by water come to Detroit, from there to Ann Arbor to Jackson to Marshall to Kalamazoo to Paw Paw, to a tavern eight miles from Paw Paw on the main road you can get directions to my place.

If you come by land it will be the shortest route to come to Buffalo and thru Canada. If on the American shore after you cross the Mamme River come to Adrian to Jonesville to Marshall then as before respecting a town. If you come by water you had better sell your team, put wagon and goods on a boat and buy a good yoke of oxen near Detroit. Oxen will be the best team until you get started you will get them cheaper there than here.

A tax receipt dated 1843 was for $2.90 on this 160 acres. In 1928 the taxes on 120 acres of this land were $201.00.

Hosea and Elizabeth had four sons. Hosea, the third, helped to build a new house in 1851. After that he enlisted in the Civil War, contracted an illness and died somewhere in the South. Turner Howard was the only one to live to old age. He married Marcia Cornelia Place whose family lived across the road to the south from where Lyle Stickney now lives.

When Turner was a boy he attended a 'donors' school where the Morrill house now stands, each family paying according to the number of their children attending. He used to walk to Decatur with eggs and sell them for six cents a dozen.

Turner and Marcia had five children, George, Effie, Fannie, Isa and Frank. George died in 1909. The two sisters Isa and Frank still live on the old homestead which is now 120 acres. They are the third generation of Howards to own this land. Richard Howard, son of George owns 40 acres of the 160 and he is the fourth generation of Howards.

These two Howard sisters have preserved many letters and documents, one dated 1791. In reading over some of these I made the following notes:

1837—Wheat 12 to 14 shillings a bushel; oats 3 to 4 shillings; cheese 9 dollars a hundred; butter 22 dollars a hundred.

1841—Butter $12.50 per hundred; cheese $5.00 to $6 per hundred; pork $4 to $5 per hundred; beef $3 to $4 per hundred; wheat 81c to 90c per bushel; corn 37c to 44c; oats 19c to 25c; cows $18 to $22; yearling colt $52.

1865—Receipt for a barrel of dried apples shipped to Mitchell, Iowa.

1872, New York.—School teacher got $3.00 per week and had to board herself.

Among the papers is a poem entitled "Lady Washingtons Lament," tells of the death and funeral of George Washington.

Captain's commission papers of Hosea Howard, the first, dated 1791. Captain in the regiment of Militia in the county of Herkimer, New York, signed by Geo. Clinton, governor.

1793.—Capt. of a company of light infantry in the Battalion of Militia in the county of Herkimer, N. Y.

1824.—Capt. of Riflemen, in the Militia. Signed by Jos. C. Gates.

There also are the various bugle calls for the Revolutionary War.

Among the things Hosea and Elizabeth brought from New York there are: a cherry bed stead, a cherry desk, a tea canister, sauce plates, hand made mortar and pestle, hand made tuning fork, hand made long handled fork for use in fireplace, spinning wheel, flax wheel, cards and hetchels.

Written by Marcia Helen Wild Tinker, as told by her great-aunts Misses Frank and Isa Howard.

A History of the Decatur Township Library

By Charlotte Huyck, Sec.-Treas.

About 1934-1935 the Decatur township library started as a WPA project with Mrs. Zella Benton of Lawton as county head. Space in Kaplan's store, located in the building where is now Gale's hardware store, was used for the showing and dispensing of not more than twelve books with Mrs. Martin Knoll in charge. After about a year, the few books which had accumulated were moved to Mabel Arnold's shop across the street where they remained for a short time before being taken to the Town Hall where they were dispensed from the front room on the west. The small collection was then moved to the Decatur Village Hall, then under construction, in which a room to house the library was provided in the front of the building.

On Monday evening, September 14, 1936, Mrs. Bessie Lawrence, appointed as librarian by Mrs. Zella Benton, under the WPA, with Mrs. Martin Knoll as assistant, called a meeting in the Decatur Republican office. The members of the library board, newly selected by Mrs. Benton, met for the purpose of organizing and discussing business concerning the library. The board consisted of Arba Moulton, Supt. Frank Dodge, Mame Bope, and Charlotte Huyck. Mrs. Bessie Lawrence called the meeting to order, after which it was moved and seconded that Arba Moulton act as chairman of the board and Charlotte Huyck as secretary-treasurer.

A check of $165.28, carried over from the emergency fund of World War I, and contributed by the citizens of the village, also the sum of $19.10, representing the balance from the funds of the old Ladies' Library destroyed by fire, were turned over to the Board.

Plans for furnishing the new library room were discussed, which eventually resulted in the purchase of the two oak tables and ten chairs from the Gaylord Library Supply Mfg. Co. of Syracuse, N. Y., through their agent, Miss Mildred Walker of Three Rivers. The order was received November 17, 1936, but not in time for the formal dedication of the Decatur Village Hall, including the new library room, on October 3, 1936.

E. R. Washburn, president of the village, dedicated the library, followed by brief talks by Miss Bement of Kalamazoo, WPA head of library work in southwestern Michigan and by Mrs. Zella Benton, who spoke briefly of the aim and work of the county library system. About forty books were contributed at this time by citizens of the town. Miss Walker gave thirty-five books, and J. R. Jones Sons & Co. of Kalamazoo gave twenty-five new books. Book clubs were organized in the village, each member contributing one book which eventually became library property, and in this way 120 books were added to the collection. Other gifts came from clubs, churches, and lodges of the village. Money was raised for books by the Board sponsoring basket-ball games, concerts, and yearly baked goods sales at the Celery Festival to which the entire community contributed.

Interested patrons and former citizens also contributed sums of money. The Village Council gave the library $200 for the purchase of a set of the Encyclopedia Americana, Compton Encyclopedia, and a Webster's International dictionary. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace gave 100 books. The Kellogg Foundation, which was a tremendous help in furthering the growth of the libarry, gave 577 books, besides loaning several hundreds of adult and juvenile books.

In June 1942 the first check to the amount of $102.60 was received from State Aid which had increased to the amount of $438.87 in 1948. Hamilton township also made gifts of $25 and $50 yearly. All of these gifts were an immense help in carrying on the library work.

On January 15, 1937 the WPA notified the Board that they were discontinuing the salaries of the librarians after January 18. The librarians worked for $5 a month each for a short time, and young people on the NYA, also paid by the WPA, were selected to help periodically with the work until other arrangements could be made.

On April 16, 1937 the WPA notified the Board they would resume payment of one librarian and Mrs. Knoll was accordingly dismissed and Mrs. Lawrence became the full-time librarian in which capacity she served until December 12, 1944, when she resigned.

July 14, 1941, notice having been received from WPA headquarters in Grand Rapids that they had definitely discontinued paying the librarian, steps were taken to see what could be done to provide a salary for the librarain. As the result of a meeting with the supervisor, Lyle Parker, a combined meeting of the members of the township board, school board, and library board was held in the council room. At this time, the township board voted to pay the librarian's salary until the library could be permanently reorganized as a township library, and regular funds be provided to pay expenses. The first check of $65 was paid August 1, 1941 to Mrs. Bessie Lawrence for the month of July.

A special library board meeting was called February 27, 1942 to consider the first steps to be taken in having the township assume the responsibility of the library. It was decided that a petition to establish a library (really take over the one already established) should be circulated to the township electors to be presented at the township election April 6, 1942. The ballot read, "Shall a tax in the amount of ½ mill be levied against the taxable property of the township of Decatur, Van Buren county, Michigan for the purpose of maintaining a free public library in said township?"

The proposition carried by a vote of 401 for and 148 against it and thus the Decatur township library was founded.

As the law required six persons to be on the board, two more persons, E. R. Washburn and Jessie Savage were added to the old board, all of whom were appointed by the township board to serve until the next election the first Monday in April, 1943.

The library was to continue opening, as it had always done, from 1:30 p. m. to 9 p. m. daily except Sundays and holidays.

In the April election of 1943, Mrs. Lyle Parker was elected in Frank Dodge's place, but failing to qualify for the place, Mr. Dodge was again elected to fill the vacancy on the board which placed Mrs. Bope as chairman and Charlotte Huyck as secretary-treasurer.

The $500 Edgar Bergen fund acquired in 1941 from his entertainment here at the Celery Festival was put into a G bond as the Bergen Bond in the name of the Decatur township library, to be used to enlarge the library when conditions would permit.

Mrs. Bessie Lawrence resigned as librarian December 12, 1944 after long and faithful service. Mrs. Salome Cabbage filled the vacancy until Gertrude Van't Zelfde was appointed by the Board as librarian on March 15, 1945.

After the April election in 1945, Frank Dodge, Marian Merriman, Beulah Hemenway, Arba Moulton, Charlotte Huyck, and Jessie Savage constituted the board. Arba Moulton was made permanent chairman and Charlotte Huyck secretary-treasurer.

Under adult educa[illegible]n library sponsorship the Study C[illegible] was organized and launched [illegible]ence in October, 1939.

At a mee[illegible] October 20, 1945, [illegible]r Dalton K. [illegible]ately accepted to be used for th[illegible] scientific investigation, [illegible] magazines were according[illegible] for both the school and township libraries. Later, speakers from the extension department of the University of Michigan were brought to the school under this project. The original Rose Fund was eventually increased to $2,500 by gifts from both Max and Dalton Rose to be known as the Dr. G. L. Rose Memorial Fund, to be handled by the library board, its use having broadened to encourage instruction in soil conservation and its practices. Under this project the Board sponsored a series of lectures during the winter of 1947-1948. This work will undoubtedly continue for some time.

After the April 1947 election the board consisted of Arba Moulton, Beulah Hemenway, Frank Dodge, Charlotte Huyck, and the two newly elected members, Ethel Ireland and William Beck. Organization resulted in the election of Beulah Hemenway as president and Charlotte Huyck as secretary-treasurer.

From a small beginning as a WPA project with twelve books the library has grown in 1948 to have approximately 2,000 volumes belonging to the Decatur library and 1,500 volumes belonging to the county library, with a circulation of 10,000 volumes yearly. Most of the current magazines are also on the table for circulation.

The library is meeting a real need of the community and since about half of the circulation consists of children's and young people's books, its influence is incalculable.

RECOLLECTIONS OF DECATUR (EARLY DAYS)

By: Dr. G.W. Mahoney

The first school as told to me by the late Charles M. Rawson was on the north west corner of St. Mary's and School streets. He went there the first day it opened and had to wait until someone unlocked the door. (Early 60's)

The first school I attended was a private school on West St. Mary's Street. It was a small, white, painted house near the Methodist parsonage. There were about ten students; among them, Lillian Hendricks, Lottie Young, Will and Bell Chadwick, Frank Priest, Maurice Sheehan and myself. I never forgave Frank Priest for he broke my slate one day. Our teacher was Miss Carrie Trowbridge who was a cousin of Miss Ida Trowbridge. The latter was a first-grade teacher in Decatur for many years. Miss Carrie Trowbridge was a delightful, charming lady who later married L.D. Roberts, who, with Mr. L.G. Stewart were in the grocery business for many years in Decatur. In later years, I clerked for them and kept the books.

In early times all homes were fenced in and nearly everyone kept a cow to supply the family with milk and butter. There were no dairies and no milk wagons. As all homes were fenced in, cows were allowed to run in the streets and feed on the grass. If a cow broke into a garden and did any damage, the village Marshall put the animal in the village pound and the owner paid one dollar to get his cow back.

In that era, all railroad engines burned wood (no coal burners) and all engines took on water through a large tank next to the stand where they took on wood. The tank was kept filled by means of a large horse walking all day on a sort of treadmill, which kept the pump going to keep the tank filled.

As all the land around Decatur at that period was covered with oak timber, the owners of the land cleared it as quickly as possible to cultivate and put in crops. The Michigan Central Railroad bought all of the wood and ties they could get. The entire area south of the present passenger station, for acres, was covered with wood and railroad ties were made each winter. Once a year the M.C.R.R. Co. would bring a saw mill and a crew of men to saw the wood into proper lengths for use in the engines and pile it into very large sheds at the west end of the ground to dry for use the next year.

Decatur had no water supply at that time except from wells and cisterns. Inasmuch as there had been two or three small fires on Phelps Street, the village installed a very large cistern in the center of the square at the crossing of Phelps Street for fire protection. The old "bucket brigade" method was used in case of fire.

There was a large hotel at the southeast corner of St. Mary's and Phelps Street. After a number of years this hotel, a two-story building, was moved down Phelps Street and placed at the northeast corner of Phelps and Sherwood Streets. It was called the Duncombe House. It did a good business there for several years but burned one Sunday morning many years ago. I believe the ground is still vacant. In Decatur's cradle days all merchants bought their goods from traveling men, so the hotel had a good transient trade.

There was a large livery barn at the corner of Sherwood Street facing the park and this did a lively business driving traveling men to surrounding nearby towns; so the "drummers" traveled by horse and buggy as well as by railroad.

As the land was cleared of timber, it was taken to a stave mill and cooper shop which were located at the east end of Sherwood Street.

As most farmers set out apple orchards early when they cleared their land, there was use for apple barrels and things of that kind. Then, as apples were plentiful, a firm by the name of Henning, built a large building near the railroad for the purchase of apples. Each autumn they shipped out carloads almost daily. Decatur was a good apple market and it was a common sight to see several wagons standing in line waiting to unload.

The same was true of wheat. Our village was known as a great wheat market. L.T. Rawson and A.N. Chamberlin were the principal buyers. L.T. Rawson's warehouse was just west of the present baggage rooms; A.N. Chamberlain stored his wheat in the Michigan Central freight house. It was a common sight to see twelve to fifteen teams in line, waiting to unload at each place of business.

In a very early day, Decatur had a distillery operated by L.T. Rawson. It was on the north side of the railroad just west of the railroad crossing near Mud Lake and piped needed water from the lake, for Mud Lake, in those days, was a nice body of water. I remember this very well for one day another boy and myself found a piece of pipe sticking out of the ground. We dug out a lot of it and took it to S.N. Thomas' hardware store and sold it for old iron.

In days when Decatur was a great wheat market, there was a large flour mill on the south side of the railroad track. After being in operation for many years, it burned one Sunday evening. This mill was conducted by a Mr. Abbott a few years later. A Mr. John Bickhart had a flour mill across the railraod tracks on the east side of School Street. East of this mill for some distance was a buggy box factory called "Decatur Buggy Box Factory," making only buggy boxes. Some of the merchants put money into it but it lasted only a few years as it was not profitable.

Just north of the flour mill that burned was a measure factory owned and operated by L.D. Roberts and Marvin Hinckley for manufacture of peck and half-bushel measures and, I think, made some butter tubs. It did a good business for a long time, as conducted by two of Decatur's leading citizens.

A great change south of Decatur was the draining of the great swamp beginning some distance south of the Moulton farm and extending a long distance — south to higher land north of the valley road near the foot of Chevelier Hill. There were no trees to be seen here in this great acreage but hundreds of black birds feeding on the wild rice which grew to be as high as four or five feet. Finally it was drained by putting in an immense ditch, which was about twenty feet wide across the top and of considerable depth, extending from or near Pickeral Lake west to connect with or empty into a creek in Cass County. Often the land was drained so it could be plowed. Horses wore large, flat, iron shoes about the size of a dinner plate which were clamped to the horse's hoof. They were called mud shoes so the horses would not sink into the soft earth. In plowing, great stumps, large limbs of trees, and trunks of trees were brought to the surface. They were gathered into piles all over this area and allowed to dry so they could be burned. It was apparent that this swamp was once heavily timbered, and it would not be surprising if, later, it was a lake and the timber drowned out. These mud shoes for horses were invented by Mr. L. Brigham who introduced them to Decatur, shortly after moving here from or near Plainwell, Michigan.

Among the early merchants of Decatur was S.N. Thomas, who had a small hardware store on the east side of Phelps Street in a one-story, wooden building. On the west side of Phelps Street, in the store now occupied by Mr. R. Gale, were the Chadwick brothers' dry goods and millinery, John, Fred and Theodore, who built the building. L.G. Stewart had a grocery store there at a later date. D.W. Levin's drug store and W.H. Clark's furniture store were in the Poor block, north on Phelps Street. A.S. Hathaway's dry goods store was on the north west corner of Phelps and Delaware Street and Peter Pardonette's harness shop was on the east of Phelps Street, opposite Levin's drug store. A fine two-story brick building was built on the southwest corner of Phelps and Delaware Streets. The first floor was for groceries and the second floor was used for offices. In the front two rooms, Dr. N.E. Hooper, dentist, had his office. The balance of the floor space was used by Dr. Rose. Before that time, Drs. Rose and Hooper had their offices across the street over Hathaway's Dry Goods store. Next, north of Hathaway's store, was a shoe store owned by Samuel Ellis, who was a paralytic. He lived in a wheel chair in a room above the shoe store. Charles Pritchard had a photograph gallery next door. Mr. Ellis was an uncle of Gladys Lincoln and she lived with them. Mr. Ellis built the house at the N. E. of Phelps and St. Mary's Street. (Now Webster Library). He had the sidewalk from the street to the door of his home built on an incline so he could wheel his chair to the door without aid. I think Gladys worked in the post office many years. My father told me that the first time we ever had Mass in Decatur, it was celebrated in a small house on Phelps Street north of the Ellis home. A family named O'Neill lived there.

When I was in the 8th grade, it was a rule for each student to write an essay to be read before the entire room of students. The teacher chose the subject and it was to be read the following Friday. The topic was "grammar" and one student from East Decatur, who was not overweight mentally, arose to read his essay. He started out by saying, "You can always tell a 'grammared' man from one who is not 'grammared'." He was hooted down by the whole room of pupils, and the poor fellow took his seat.

In an early day Phelps Street was not so wide as it is now, and farmers hitched their teams on both sides of the street, as there were hitching posts all the way along. It made the space between very narrow, so the village decided to widen the street twelve feet by having all store buildings on the east side of the street moved back twelve feet, which was done by every one except Mr. Arnold. He refused, so his store stood in the street twelve feet out for many years. He finally moved it back but I think his attitude hurt his business. In all those years we had no paved streets nor side walks.

The worst accident I think that ever happened in Decatur was about 1889 or 1890. The fast train going East in the early evening was not scheduled to stop at Decatur, but for some reason it was ordered to stop so the telegraph operator turned on the red light as a stop signal. As the train slowed down to stop, the conductor, Arthur Daily, a fine gentleman, stepped off to get his order. He either slipped or made a mis-step and his feet went under the wheels. The feet and ankles and both legs were mangled. It was on a Saturday evening. He was carried into the waiting room at the station and laid on the floor. A boy came running up Phelps Street for Dr. Rose, but he was not in town, so the boy found me in the barber shop. I had just gone in to get shaved. The boy told me the trouble so I said to the barber, "Wipe me off and let me get out of here." I went to the station as quickly as possible and found him in great pain, so I gave him a hypodermic of morphine to relieve the pain, and four men carried him on a stretcher up to the Duncombe House to a large, front room on the second floor, where he was fairly comfortable. About that time Dr. Rose came in and after seeing the patient, wired Dr. Bonine, Sr. to come down from Niles. Dr. Rose did this because Dr. Bonine was Division Surgeon for the Michigan Central Railroad. He and his son, Fred, also a doctor, came down. We gave the man a general anesthetic and amputated both legs, about midway between the knees and ankles. He died about midnight the following day from shock, for the feet and the lower part of his legs were badly mangled. He was conscious Sunday, so he made his will and gave other instructions.

Decatur once had a brewery owned and operated by William Griffin. It was one-half mile north of Decatur as you proceed north on Phelps Street.

When the Michigan Central Railroad was put through, two men from New York set aside ten acres of ground for a village site. This was part of a large tract of land which they had bought. Their names were Messrs. Beers and Sherwood and they sold lots to home builders.

Decatur had a tannery at one time on the south side of Beer's Street about one-half block west of George Street. It was owned and operated by H.J. Hendricks who did a good business. His home was on the north west corner of Sherwood and Williams streets and was subsequently owned by Thomas Browning and John Brigham, respectively. I am told that hemlock bark was used in the tanning process and the workers had great racks on the vacant ground in front of the tannery for drying the hides.

Our town had a saw mill in the early days on the west side of School Street at the village limits, owned and operated by Henry Bull. The town also had a planing mill once, beside the railroad tracks, owned and operated by L.T. Rawson. It fronted on an enclosed yard extending from Rawson's ware house west to the planing mill. This included an entire block.

At that time we had two blacksmith shops, one on West Delaware Street by Theodore Harlan, and one on Beers Street by Thomas Callicott. There was plenty of work for them keeping horses shoes well sharpened in slippery weather and setting tires on wagon and buggy wheels, in hot weather. We saw many oxteams in early days; the last I remember seeing, being Hobart Millard's.

The doctors of early days were Dr. Rose, who did not keep a horse for country calls at first, but a man, George McKay, living on St. Mary's Street, had a horse and buggy and he drove Dr. Rose on his rural calls. The doctor gave him one-half the fee for his service. Other doctors were Doctor's Baker, Broderick, Keables and Dillon.

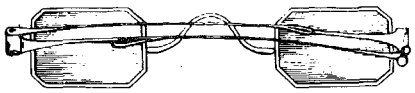
In my day from 1888 to 1893, country practice was hard work. There were no paved roads, no telephones and no automobiles. Winters were more severe than they are now. The snow was deep and often the horse could not follow the road. Sometimes we were compelled to drive across the fields and sometimes over fences. In the springtime mud was deep. Only occasionally did a road have gravel on it, and then only in bad places.

Dr. G.L. Rose came to Decatur directly after his graduation from the Cincinnati College of Medicine and Surgery, and all at once he found himself in a busy active practice. He worked seven days a week, and never took a vacation — but one — a short one — because he was forced to do so. He died at fifty-one, when he should have lived twenty-five years longer, but hard work night and day took its toll! As the philosopher said, "It was to be!"

The Decatur Republican was not always called by that name. I cannot recall the earlier names. Arba Moulton edits and publishes an unusual and outstanding small-town paper. There are not many towns that can "top" him!

During my practice I made many trips from Decatur to Glenwood on the hand car to administer to emergency cases and accidents which happened on the railroad. The section men took me there and brought me back as it was faster than going with horse and buggy.

There are many more "sweet memories" of Decatur but I'll save them for a later date.



ANOTHER INDIAN STORY

By Nellie Sibley

Mr. and Mrs. Lyman Sanford who lived in the woods near Detroit before coming to Decatur over 100 years ago, had some exciting experiences with bears wolves. and Indians.

One day Mr. Sanford was out hunting small game for food, when he saw a big bear climbing down a tree (they always climb down backward, or tail first.) Mr. Sanford was so frightened that he dropped his gun, and just stood there watching the bear slowly coming down. Something whizzed past his head, which frightened him still more. It was an arrow shot by an Indian from behind Mr. Sanford.

The Indian was a very good marksman, for the arrow pierced the skull of the bear which fell to the ground. The Indian rushed past Mr. Sanford to the bear, and finished him with a long knife, (which an Indian always carried.) Uncle Lyman said he never saw any one skin and dress an animal so quickly. After that the Indian gave half of the bear to Mr. Sanford with just a grunt. When he tried to thank the Indian, he had disappeared in the woods.

Another time Uncle Lyman, who was hidden behind some bushes, watched about a dozen Indian boys 12 to 15 years old, torment a porcupine. They had surrounded the porcupine and with their bows and arrows, kept shooting near the poor frightened animal, who was wildly running hither and yon, and throwing his quills in all directions. The wonder was that not one quill touched any of the boys who were shouting and laughing, and running about.

When they tired of their cruel sport, an arrow killed the poor animal which probably was eaten later. Indians will eat almost any kind of animal. Fortunately they (the Indians) never seemed to get hurt by any of the wild animals.

At another time Mr. Sanford saw a band of Indians—about 20—running and yelling like mad right toward him. He was too frightened to move for he thought they were after him. They were chasing a pack of five wolves. The wolves and Indians passed near Mr. Sanford, not noticing him at all. When he reached the cabin, he was still white and shaking. Aunty Sanford had heard the shouting, and she, too, wondered if they were after her husband. It was a long time before he could tell what happened.

THIS WEEK

By Arba N. Moulton, Editor

A few weeks ago some one left a package of papers on the office desk. No one was in at the time and no one connected with the office knows who left it. It was several days before we found the time to investigate, but when we did look into the package we immediately set down on our date calendar a call to make.

The package contained two copies of The True Northerner, published at Paw Paw and once the leading publication of Van Buren county, together with several clippings and notes by the sender.

The notes were signed only by initials, but that was enough to identify the sender. One of the papers was dated October 20, 1876, the other August 30, 1878. The papers must have had an editor, but his name was not found. The subscriber was James Shockley, Decatur, Mich.

That was seventy years ago and now the sender lives alone, surrounded by antiques of which she is one, with few to break the monotony for her of a lonely existence. Seventy years ago the big house on Wheeler street was a lively place, made so by two young school girls, the writer of the following note being fifteten,—

WIDOW'S LAMENT

"The days are cold and dark and dreary,
It rains and the wind is never weary."
How well we remember those lines of long ago,
But now, alas, those days are past
And we are old and weary. Old friends are gone.
Why are we left to be the last of that old crowd,
Who met with us not many years ago?
They are gone from us forever.
How much longer must we stay
Here below where we are not needed?
We old folks have had our day.
—E. G.

We have thought that way at times, but are convinced that it is a mistake. As long as we are able to breathe and to be about, we have a mission in life, we can be helpful to somebody and are needed. The purpose of the Almighty is too incomprehensible, too vast for us to question; therefore it is wise to believe that while we are permitted to remain on earth it is for a purpose. We should not give up and say we are not needed, but rather we should seek more diligently to learn what that need is, and to do what little we can to fulfill it.

This packet from an old friend has opened our eyes to the fact that we are not doing all that we can to show gratitude for the many blessings received.

We like these lines written by Emily Dickinson and hid away in a bureau drawer to be brought to light after her death:

If I can stop one heart from breaking,
I shall not live in vain;
If I can ease one life the aching,
Or cool one pain,
Or help one fainting robin
Unto his nest again,
I shall not live in vain.

REMEMBER OR FORGET

I sat beside the streamlet,
I watched the water flow,
As we together watched it
One little year ago:
The soft rain pattered on the leaves,

The April grass was wet.
Ah! folly to remember;
'Tis wiser to forget.
The nightengales made vocal
June's palace paved with gold;
I watched the rose you gave me
Its warm red heart unfold;
But breath of rose and bird's song
Were fraught with wild regret.
'Tis madness to remember;
'Twere wisdom to forget.

The streamlet now is frozen,
The nightengales are fled,
The corn fields are deserted,
And every rose is dead.
I sit beside my lonely fire,
And pray for wisdom yet:
For calmness to remember,
For courage to forget.

—Hamilton Aide.

We meet old friends at funerals and relatives meet who have not met before for many a month or year. We say we are glad to meet them and we are, but back of the remark is the thought that the occasion might have been a happier one.

Most of the relatives and friends who came from other places to attend the funeral of Thomas Mahoney were former residents of Decatur, or have relatives here, but one who came from Kalamazoo said that even the relatives had moved away and some were in the cemetery. Most Decatur people of seventy or over can count more acquaintances in the cemetery than out of it. Father Cook, in his funeral sermon, said in substance that we all have to die. There is no comfort to be gained from that. The comfort may come from knowing how we die, do we so live that we are ready to meet this journey from which there is no return?

It has been a long time since the passing of a Decatur citizen has brought out as many people and as beautiful an array of flowers in tribute to his memory.

The Potawatomi Indians and Their Early History

(Entered by Donald Moline and Marvin Peterson, as a continuation of the 14th story in the Norman Webster local history contest.)

The Potawatomi Indians (Otho Winger), from the books of Harvey Franz, Benton Harbor, Mich.)

The Pot-a-wat-o-mi Indians were a tribe of the great Algonquin race, whose tribes stretched from the Atlantic to the Mississippi and beyond. The Potawatomi and the Ottawa were closely related to the Chippewa who were the Ojibway of Longfellow's Hiawatha. The three were probably one tribe in ancient days when, according to the legend of Longfellow, Hiawatha was their national hero.

Just when the Potawatomi left the parent family and became a separate tribe is not known. The usual explanation of the meaning of their name is "people of the place of fire." They were often spoken of as the "fire builders" with various explanations as to how this name applied to them. Perhaps the most likely explanation is that when this group decided to become a tribe, separate from the parent family, they decided to build a council fire for themselves. So the name was suggested from "puttawa," blowing a fire, and "mi," a nation; that is, a people able to build their own national fire and exercise the right of self-government. The council fire was a very important thing in the life of a tribe, for it was the center of their national decisions. Some say that the Potawatomi were jealous of their national council fire, and never allowed it to go out. If so, the name "Put-ta-wa-mo" is significant. The name has been variously spelled, but the most prominent authorities in recent years have used the more simple form, Pot-a-wat-o-mi, with the accent on the first and third syllables.

The original home of the Potawatomi was with or near the parent tribe in the Great Lakes region of Northern Michigan, on the western shores of Lake Huron. From here they were driven west by the powerful Iroquois. They were met by early European explorers on the western shore of Lake Michigan near Green Bay, Wisconsin. Again they were found at Sault Ste. Marie, in the peninsula of Northern Michigan, where they were fleeing from the powerful Sioux who came from the west. The Potawatomi, like some other Algonquin tribes, were found in various places, where they were trying to escape the vengeance of one or the other of these two great tribes.

The Potawatomi themselves became known as of two divisions. Those who moved South from the forests of Northern Wisconsin into the prairies of Northern Illinois and Western Indiana became known as Prairie Potawatomi, or Mascoutens. Those who remained in the forests of Northern Wisconsin and Michigan became known as the Potawatomi of the Woods, or Forest Potawatomi. In language, traditions, and customs, the Forest Potawatomi retained a closer relationship with the Chippewa and Ottawa. The Prairie Potawatomi became the more important group and with them the early white men had important relationship.

By the close of the 17th century, the Potawatomi had moved south from their northern homes into the Illinois country and around the southern end of Lake Michigan into Southern Michigan. Already they were occupying lands formerly owned by the Illinois and Miami Indians. They were increasing in numbers and power.

In the French and Indian war, the Potawatomi, like most of the tribes of the Northwest, took the side of the French. After the war, when the English had placed garrisons here and there, the Potawatomi joined Pontiac in his conspiracy to drive the English from the Indian lands. They were given the work of capturing Fort St. Joseph near the present Niles, Mich. They did that with all savage cruelty, massacring eleven of the fifteen soldiers stationed there. After the fall of this fort these same Indians hastened south on the old Indian trail to take part in the capture and massacre of Ft. Miami, now Fort Wayne, May 27, 1763.

The Potawatomi were much devoted to Chief Pontiac who was from their kindred tribe, the Ottawa. When Pontiac, fleeing from the English, went west he was slain at Kaskaskia, Illinois, by a Kaskaskia Indian. The Kaskaskias were a branch of the Illinois Indians who shielded the one who killed Pontiac. For this reason the Potawatomi, aided by the Miamis and Kickapoo, made war upon the Illinois. It was a war to the death and the Illinois were almost exterminated in 1765. The last fight was at the rock on the Illinois River, where LaSalle had gathered all these tribes to fight back the Iroquois. In those days the place was known as Fort St. Louis. This large rock rose above the Illinois River more than 100 feet. The top, which covered almost an acre, could be reached by a difficult path on one side only. Here the last of the Illinois took refuge, but were finally starved into a desperate attempt to escape. Only a few were able to do so. So this picturesque place has been called Starved Rock.

The Miamis who helped the Potawatomi destroy the Illinois had been for many years the most powerful of the Algonquin tribes in the West. They claimed all of what is now Indiana, the western half of Ohio, the eastern part of Illinois, and the southern part of Michigan. They were a proud race and claimed many rights. After the destruction of the Illinois they quarrelled with their former allies, the Potawatomi and the Kickapoo. In the war that followed the Miamis were repeatedly defeated and had to retreat to their lands along the Wabash.

After the defeat of the Illinois and the Miamis, the Potawatami reigned supreme in what is now southern Wisconsin and Eastern Illinois, from Milwaukee to the sait licks on the Vermillion River, where Danville, Illinois, now stands.

On the west they were friendly neighbors to the Kickapoo who had their center on Peoria Lake. Farther north they were in friendly relations with the Sacs and Foxes. On the East they gradually extended their territory into the lands once held by the Miamis in Northern Indiana and Southern Michigan.

Almost from the first the Potawatami became opponents of the Americans. Although at an earlier period they had assisted Pontiac in his war against the English, they now aided their former enemies in the war with the U. S. Because they were farther removed, they did not come into immediate conflict with the Americans as did the Miamis and other tribes. They were ready to fight against the states whenever they could. They had encampments around the Miami village, later Fort Wayne. They joined the Miamis in their raids along the Ohio and in Kentucky. They went hunting in Miami lands south and east of the Wabash. In their first treaty at Fort Harmar, Jan. 9, 1789 they were recognized as having some right to all the lands of the Northwest.

In the wars that followed they were active. They took part in the Treaty of Greenville, 1795. They were granted $1,000 for their claims upon lands ceded to the U. S. Among these cessions was one in their territory 6 miles square at the mouth of the Chicago River. 24 Potawatami chiefs signed this treaty. Their head chief then was Topenebee whose name was spelled T-hu-pen-e-bu.

In the next 15 years the Potawatami took part in 6 different treaties but in none of them were they primarily interested, nor did they lose much land. Most of these treaties had to do with lands lying south and east of the Wabash. But it was quite evident to their chiefs that the time would come when they would have to cede land of their own to the U. S. So they came to share in the general dissatisfaction of the tribes in the N. W. Territory.

This dissatisfaction had been growing ever since the wave of immigration westward had begun about the close of the Revolutionary War. While the Indians had welcomed the French traders for 100 years or more, it was quite a different feeling that then saw the Americans come pouring into their lands, clearing up the forests and establishing permanent homes. They saw their hunting lands disappearing. They had given expression to this dissatisfaction in the years of attacks upon the settlements along the Ohio. The defeat of the Indians by Gen. Wayne and the Treaty of Greenville somewhat cooled their opposition. Succeeding treaties only showed them that they were destined to lose their homes and hunting grounds to the greedy white men.

The Indian who was to be the leader in opposition to the Americans was the great Shawnee chief, Tecumseh. He and his brother Tenis-kwah-ta-wah, better known as The Prophet, were born in a Shawnee village west of what is now Springfield, Ohio. Later they moved westward and at times were at Greenville, Ohio, and again on White River near Anderson, Indiana. During this time Tecumseh was increasing his opposition to the Indians selling their land to the Americans. To the courageous opposition of Tecumseh, his brother added religious zeal that stirred many Indians into bitter hatred of the Americans. In the spring of 1808 they located on the Wabash River about 2 miles below the mouth of the Tippecanoe R. This place had been the site of former Indian villages. It now became a great center for the Indians who were opposed to the Americans. Many Potawatami were among the prophet's followers.

In 1810 Tecumseh with many followers went to a conference with Gen. Wm. Henry Harrison at Vincennes. Tecumseh was bold and daring. Gen. Harrison was brave and firm. There was almost an open rupture and war at the time. Again in the summer of 1811 Tecumseh approached Vincennes with a large number of Indians. Gen. Harrison was ready, however, to meet him with force. Tecumseh again spoke strongly against the treaties that were being made. Nothing was accomplished. It became more evident that open conflict could not long be avoided.

After this conference Tecumseh went to visit the southern Indians hoping to secure their support. His mother was a Creek and he hoped for help from her tribe. He supposed that there would be no fighting in his absence. But reports of growing hostilities in the North caused Gen. Harrison to march northward with an army of about 1000 men. He came near the Prophet's town and the Indians seemed surprised and asked for a conference. Harrison withdrew across the way to higher ground and encamped for the night. Early next morning the Indians attacked with much fury and bravery. The Prophet had promised them a great victory. On a rock near by he spent his time during the battle in chants and mutterings. Although the Indian force was as large as that of Harrison and had the advantage of making the surprise attack, they were soon driven off. After the battle, Gen. Harrison burned the Indian village and returned with his army to Vincennes.

Several Indian tribes took part in this battle, the Shawnees, Winnebagoes, Kickapoo and Potawatami. The Miamis claim they were not in this battle because they were advised by their great chief Little Turtle not to join Tecumseh and the Prophet. Just what part the Potawatami had is difficult to determine. Zachariah Cicott, a half-breed Potawatami, was one of Gen. Harrison's scouts. On the other hand Abraham Burnett, another half-breed Potawatami, was one of the leaders in the Indian attack. His name is given to the creek near Harrison's encampment and along which the Indians gathered for the attack. Some claim that the Potawatami chief, Winamac, led the Indians in the battle. He had, however, been considered the friend of the Americans. There was another Chief Winamac who was a bitter enemy to the whites. It is more likely that he was the Winamac who fought against Harrison. There is no doubt that many Potawatami were in this battle. Years later, when the first settlers came into Potawatami lands, they heard many stories from the chiefs and warriors about their part in the battle of Tippecanoe.

THE POTAWATOMI OF THE WABASH

(Taken from "The Potawatomi Indians" by Otho Winger, from the books of Harvey Franz. Continuation of the 14th story in the Norman E. Webster local history contest.)

The Potawatomi were often spoken of as having three territorial divisions: the Potawatomi of the Wabash, the Potawatomi of the St. Joseph, and the Prairie Potawatomi.

The Potawatomi coming south from the Wisconsin territory around Lake Michigan, and also from Northern Michigan, entered what is now Indiana. A large increase in their numbers, pressure from other tribes, and perhaps an invitation from the Miamis explain this movement. Or it may be that the Potawatomi just moved into Miami territory and crowded them southward. The Miamis moved the center of the activities to the important village called Ke-Ki-on-ga, where the city of Fort Wayne now stands. The Potawatomi followed closely. Along the Tippecanoe they had many villages and later many reserves. They continued southward until they reached that important tributary of the Wabash known to the Miamis as the Ke-na-po-co-mo-co, but in present day geography as Eel River. This long Indian word means snake fish. Along the northern bank of this river the Potawatomi built their villages. They did not cross, in any large numbers at least, for on the south side of this river the Miamis had their villages and were ready to repel the invaders.

The Tippecanoe was a Potawatomi River. Along its banks were located a number of Potawatomi reservations and villages. The name of the river is derived from the Potawatomi word, Ke-tap-i-kon, meaning the place of buffalo fish. The water of this beautiful river is the clearest of any river in the state. It flows out from a beautiful lake and by many lakes, yet the Indians preferred to build their villages along its banks rather than by the side of a lake. Beginning on its upper course where it flows out of Lake Tippecanoe, we will notice the various villages with their chiefs.

Three miles north of Warsaw, where the present state route 15 crosses the Tippecanoe, there was the largest of these Tippecanoe villages. Here Men-o-quet was chief. The early whites estimated the number of Indians in this village to be 150. Menoquet, like many of these Potawatomi chiefs, fought against the Americans in the Battle of Tippecanoe. But whereas Mesquabuck and others became reconciled and friendly, Menoquet never did. He was morose and sullen and much given to drink and quarrels. His death took place after a night of carousal in which a young Indian squaw from a northern tribe took part. His people began to suspect that she had bewitched him. When she heard of their suspicions she attempted flight. Two young braves pursued her and tomahawked her at the edge of a swamp one mile south of the present Leesburg. Early settlers know the place as the spot where the Indian princess met her death.

Menoquet was buried with pomp and ceremony. He was set upright against a tree in the small field just south of the present Menoquet bridge. His horse and dog were killed and placed beside him. Hunting arms and food were placed by his side and a fence of branches was built about to keep it from being disturbed. But the few white men in the country would not permit such a condition to remain, and set fire to the whole. Here on the site of the old Indian village, the pioneers built the village which they named Menoquet after the old chief.

Menoquet had received his four sections at a treaty made on the Tippecanoe River in 1832. It was ceded to the U. S. at a treaty made at the Tippecanoe village, Chip-pe-wa-nung in 1836. The price paid to the Indians was $1.25 per acre, and they were to remove west of the Mississippi within two years. Menoquet did not sign this treaty, and it is altogether likely he had gone to the happy hunting grounds in the manner already described.

Chippewanung was the site of a village on the Tippecanoe where the old Michigan road, now US-31, crosses the river three miles north of Rochester. This was also known as Camp Tippecanoe. Here nine different treaties were made between the Potawatomi and the U. S. More land changed hands here than at some better known treaty places.

Here today is a large boulder on which is this inscription:

Site of Indian Village
Chip-pe-wa-nung
1836
Where treaties were signed which transferred
The Potawatomies
From the territory to land in the west.
Here soldiers camped with one thousand Indians
On removal of the last
in 1838.

Along the lower course of the Tippecanoe were villages and encampments here and there at what is now Buffalo, Monticelo, and other places. Almost every community has some record of such village sites.

CHRISTMAS

Three wise men journeyed eastward,
Their hearts were full of love,
And on and on they hurried,
Led by the star above
That shone high o'er the manger
Wherein the Christ child lay
With Mary, virgin mother,
That far off Christmas day.

When Bethlehem they entered
And found the new born King,
They knelt beside the manger,
And gifts that they did bring Bestowed they on the Infant
To prove their love was true—
Their love should be a guidance
Each day for me and you.

The faith of those three wise men
Before Christ proved his pow'r
To heal the sick and dying,
And in that awful hour
To ask for full forgiveness
("They know not what they do")
For those who crucified Him,
Should make our faith more true.

So let us meet together
This blessed Christmas day,
And glorify our Saviour
With sweetest roundelay;
Forgetting all our troubles,
And with much joy let's sing,
That Christ is our Redeemer,
Our Saviour and our King.

THIS WEEK

By ARRA N. MOULTON, Editor

Three quarters of a century ago Decatur was a lively village and nearly as large in population and wealth as it is today.

Decatur's population in the early years has, however, been the subject of some discussion by persons interested in local history. In its formative years great things were expected of this village. There was no limit to which the enthusiastic early settlers expected it to go in population and wealth.

The Van Buren County Gazetteer published in the office of the Decatur Republican in 1869, contains this paragraph:

"The village was first incorporated by the legislature by an act approved March 16, 1861. The first president was E. P. Hill, the first recorder, Orrin T. Welch.

"Since its incorporation the village has grown rapidly, and more especially since the close of the late war. Village lots have been laid out and put on the market. It is safe to say that no town on the line of the Michigan Central enjoys a greater degree of material prosperity. It now contains a population of two thousand five hundred." This last statement that did the mischief was published right here in Decatur in 1869.

The census reports for Decatur village and for Decatur township are as follows:

Year	Village	Twp. including village
1860	564	1,216
1870	1,420	2,512
1880	1,267	2,248
1894	1,336	2,158
1910	1,286	2,100
1920	1,270	2,253
1930	1,582	2,618
1940	1,599	2,565
1950	1,664	2,756

It is plain that in giving the population of Decatur as 2,500 the combined population of both the village and the township was meant, but it was not so stated. A few years later a patriotic citizen in praising Decatur claimed for it the larger population, and this further spread the mistaken belief that we are in part a "deserted village."

A few weeks ago mention was made of a call from a member of the Chadwick family, prominent residents of Van Buren county. He was the grandson of Frederick

M. Chadwick and son of Will Chadwick. They resided in Decatur for about twenty years following the Civil War, then moved to Minneapolis. The man, accompanied by his wife, was trying to locate the place of business and homes of his relatives here, but they were in such a hurry that we failed to get their first name and address.

The story of the Chadwicks interested Decatur old timers. Several asked for further information about them. One desired to send them a piece of silverware with the name "Chadwick" engraved upon it, which had been in his family for many years.

Another wrote: "Will you please send me the address of Mr. Chadwick, if you have it, as I would like to write to him. I am much interested in the family but did not know that I could ever contact any of the descendents."

Would like to bring the family back to acquaintance with Decatur people, if possible.

For many years they occupied a prominent place in its social and business life. Will the reader help?

Grace Chadwick was once an efficient clerk in the Decatur post office. She married John O'Leary and they moved to Cassopolis. Both are now dead, but we think they left two sons who may be in touch with readers of the Republican.

Have enjoyed getting in touch again with the Ruggles family. Eli Ruggles came into this county before the Civil War and acquired a farm in Hamilton township. Money came in slowly from the farm, too slow to meet the needs of a growing family, and the desires of an ambitious hard working man like Mr. Ruggles.

Then came the Decatur boom and the Ruggles family sold the farm and came in on the [illegible]. In his story of a busy life he says: "I have stated that we moved to Decatur to speculate and make money easier. We didn't get it, but lost all we had. Soon after going to Decatur other railroads were built which shut off its trade in all directions and Decatur was left with but little territory to support it. Property went down. Houses and lots could be bought for a song, and the Ruggles family finally moved to the growing town of Oak Park, near Chicago.

In Chicago, Harry Ruggles became one of five men to found the Rotary Club. Now he is the oldest living member of the club, and has been invited to be the guest of honor at its Golden Anniversary to be held in Chicago on May 29 to June 2, 1955. He resides in Los Angeles, California, and was 83 years old the 16th of last September; but his health to date is good and he expects to be there. We hope he can come and will come to Decatur to visit the scenes of his boyhood.

The Ruggles home is the pretty house among the trees at the south east corner of George and Wheeler streets, now the home of Asa Root and family. Eli Ruggls set out those trees.

Noises in the night. I was awakened in the night by a rumbling noise that might have been caused by the beating of rain on the roof, the gas giving off heat from the furnace, or an engine under steam on the track. These three noises are much alike. It is also difficult to judge the distance of a sound in the silent night.

Our former townsman, Charles H. Mahoney, American representative of the United Nations, has drawn the fire of the Chicago Tribune for a speech he made before that organization last week.

Mr. Mahoney argued that the member nations aid countries that are victims of future wars by providing arms for any troops willing to help defend them but unable to arm themselves.

The Tribune's editorial was the first one in the issue of Sunday November 7. The Tribune is quite liable to be on the losing side of an argument and Mr. Mahoney will undoubtedly be able to defend his side should he care to. He has the backing of President Eisenhower.

A little poetry for the close:
I think that I shall never see
A billboard lovely as a tree.
Indeed, unless the billboards fall
I'll never see a tree at all.

Menominee and the Trail of Death

By Warren Peterson, Donald Moline

Taken from "The Potawatomi Indians," by Otho Winger. (Courtesy Harvey Franz, Benton Harbor, Mich.)

Continuation of the 14th story in the Norman Webster Local History Contest.

Among the Potawatomi who settled in various places in N. Indiana, none has attracted more attention than Menominee and his band who inhabited the country around the lakes a few miles southwest of the present city of Plymouth. The famous Indian missionary, Isaac McCoy, visited Menominee in 1821. At that time his band was small. There were but four small huts where Menominee lived, but not far away were other wigwams and camping places. McCoy's description gives us a good view of the very primitive condition under which these Indians lived—poor huts, cabins and tepees; often poor food, if any at all; and often without any good water to drink. McCoy found Menominee having two wives—sisters—a common practice among the Indians, as Menominee explained.

Menominee had, however, been endeavoring as best he could to lead his people out of savagery and paganism. He had come under the influence of the French Catholic Missionaries. He said he had felt a call from the Great Spirit to preach to his people. He had been preaching to his people against the sins of murder, theft and drunkenness. He showed McCoy a long stick on which he had cut a notch for every sermon he had preached. He was much interested in knowing that McCoy had a little book in which he had recorded the number of sermons he had preached. He had regular hours for worship, and observed Sunday as a time for such worship. These Indians were very devout and attentive at these services.

It must have been interesting to see these two preachers in earnest conversation—the one representing the very best that education and the Christian Church could give; the other trying to see the light of truth after having spent so many years in paganism. Menominee insisted that McCoy should locate a mission among them, but this missionary had already decided to locate his work among the Potawatomi of Southern Michigan.

About 1827, under the direction of Father Badin, a chapel was built. It was rudely constructed of logs, with a clapboard roof. The timbers were tied together with skins. It was a one-story building but at the west end, over the assembly room, there was a room for the Missionary. The room was reached by a ladder only, and had within only the poorest accommodations, but he had books and papers from the best of French libraries. Here was a man educated in the best universities, giving his life to help these poor Indians. This chapel was located about five miles southwest of the present city of Plymouth.

Because Menominee would not sign the treaty at Tippecanoe in 1832, which would force the Indians to move west, the government appointed Gen. John Tipton with a force of soldiers to wrench their lands from them.

Of Menominee it was said that his savage nature showed itself in his attempt to defend himself and resist arrest. He stood at bay with a dagger in hand. But the soldiers threw a lasso over his head and bound him hand and foot. He was thrown in a wagon and hauled off from his home and from the work that he had done. He went with his people into captivity. What finally became of him, we do not know.

Sixty wagons had been assembled to transport the women, children, and the aged and infirm. Many of the Indians had ponies, but most of the men had to walk. Before they left on the morning of September 4, the soldiers set fire to all the huts and cabins, so there would be less temptation for the Indians to want to return. But what must have been their feelings to see their homes which had become so dear to them, go up in smoke? And what must have been their impression of a class of people who claimed to be civilized, many of them professing Christianity.

The experiences of the march may be sensed by the records of Gen. Tipton himself. At the close of the first day he wrote: "Sept. 4, 1838. Left Twin Lakes, Marshall Co., Indiana, early this morning. Traveling today was attended with much distress on account of scarcity of water. Provisions and forage were scarce and of poor quality. The distance traveled, 21 miles." They spent this first night on the banks of the Tippecanoe, 3 miles north of Rochester. For Sept. 5, Tipton wrote: "Fifty-one persons were found unable to continue their journey on account of lack of transportation. Most of them were sick, and someone was left to care for them. On account of the difficulties of finding water, a distance of only nine miles was traveled. In the evening a child died and was buried." This evening they encamped at Mud Creek south of Rochester.

The records of the following days were much like this, only worse. At almost every camping place one or more of the Indians were left in nameless graves. Through Logansport and down the Wabash the sad procession continued. Not only was the physical suffering terrible, but the mental anguish was more so. To be driven from the homes of their ancestors and to be on the march hundreds of miles to a land they knew not where nor what, were about all human strength could endure. Often these Christian Indians would be seen looking in vain appeal to heaven as if imploring a higher power to help them in distress.

In 15 days the march had reached Danville, Ill. Here Gen. Tipton left them and turned them over to others to continue the journey westward. On across Illinois, by way of Springfield and Jacksonville, across the Mississippi at Alton, across the Missouri at Independence, and on to Kansas. They reached the Osage River in eastern Kansas after a march of 60 days. It was now winter time, and without proper shelter or food their terrible sufferings continued.

Mention should be made of the sufferings of Father Petit in behalf of these exiled Indians. Though but a young man yet in his twenties, he had been a sympathetic father to all of his Indian children as they were driven from the homes and graves of their fathers. He was too weak to follow them into exile. But after the march began, so great was the suffering of the Indians that even Gen. Tipton sent back to have Father Petit come and give them comfort. Though unable for the strenuous undertaking, he hastened after them and arrived at their camp Sunday, Sept. 16. He has left us a vivid description of the sufferings of these Indians due to forced marches, dust, lack of water, sickness and mental distress. He continued with them until they reached their new home in Kansas. Here another priest took his place, while he started to return to Indiana. He reached St. Louis, but could go no farther. He was tenderly cared for by his Jesuit brethren. After 4 weeks of suffering he passed away at the early age of 27, a martyr to the cause of bringing Christianity to the Potawatomi Indians.

In the pioneer efforts to built up an American civilization on lands taken from the Indians, the original owners were all but forgotten. In 1905 Daniel McDonald of Plymouth began a movement to have the state of Indiana do justice to those whom the forefathers had so unjustly treated. By state appropriations and private donations a fine Memorial monument was erected in 1909 not far from the original home of Menominee and his band.

On the monument is the following inscription: "In memory of Chief Menominee and his band of 359 Potawatomi Indians, removed from the reservation, Sept. 4, 1838, by a company of soldiers under Gen. Tipton, authorized by Gov. David Wallace."

THIS WEEK

By Anna N. Moulton, Editor

Will Moulton's letter printed last week, was entertaining reading to our oldest residents who go back in memory to the time when Decatur had the most famous amateur baseball club in the state of Michigan. The heart of that golden era was the summer of 1887, sixty-one years ago. Of the great team only two are living, Frank Thomas, the pitcher, now in Chicago, and Frank Stapleton, the catcher, still in Decatur .

When Stape read Will's quiz questions he knew the answers at once and they are given here, together with remembrances of our own:

Question No. 1. What Decatur merchant offered a prize to the player who made the most stolen bases for the season?

Answer. Charles Schuster, "Schuster, the Square man." That was his trade mark and the Republican printers made a square man out of rule and ran it in his ads. Schuster was the most outstanding Decatur business man of his day. He began his business career by going about the country selling needles and thread and buttons and pins from a bandana handkerchief. He came to Decatur with $300 and opened a drygoods store with a partner named Bermann. The firm name was Bermann and Schuster. That was about the year 1880. Ten or twelve years later he sold out and went to Chicago with $25,000 in cash, and four years later still he was again broke, as he expressed it, "not worth a dollar in the world."

Schuster was a man of great energy and ambition. He never was satisfied. To own a store the size of Marshall Field and Company was none too large a goal for him. He no sooner had one men's furnishing goods store established in Chicago than he established another in another part of the city. He may have had the original chain store idea, and if the business had expanded with his ideas the name of Schuster might, like that of Field or Woolworth, have been a household word.

But Schuster ran into the panic of '93 and it laid him low. He was too old to start the climb up the ladder again, and ended his days as manager of a store for his brother Isaac in Milwaukee.

It took men like Schuster to make America great,—men of indomitable will, of courage and energy, men of vision, tireless men who would work into the night, and get up in the morning and work through the day, that they might accomplish big things.

Schuster failed. He could not foresee a panic, but he was better and bigger, and the world was more prosperous for his unbounded effort. What if he did fail! 'Tis better to have strived and lost than never to have strived at all. Despite his failure he maintained his reputation as "The square man," and that name will stand for Schuster in the history of this village as long as the record is kept.

In that summer of '87 Schuster was at the height of his prosperity. His drygoods store, now Dyer's, on the corner, was drawing trade for miles around, and he had opened the clothing store, now Buys', in the building adjoining. He was a leader in all Decatur activities, and we think that that year he was manager of our baseball champions.

Schuster offered the prize to the player who made the most stolen bases for the season and Stapleton won it.

The prize was a clock set on three baseball bats in a big baseball, and it was displayed in the front store window all summer. In the course of time it has disappeared and the winner of it does not know where it is. Can anyone furnish the information as to where it can be located. It might be brought out and placed on exhibition again.

We are not getting along with the questions very fast. Could go on indefinitely writing about those golden days of our boyhood.

Question No. 3. What man from Paw Paw did we hire for $1.50 and his supper to play third base?

He was Stanley Briggs, who with his father, had the big flour mill at the bridge. Stan. had an interest in Decatur, having married his wife, the charming Mabel Neff, here. He did not play on the nine regularly. We had two good third basemen in John O'Leary and Harvey Taylor, but sometimes the extra player was needed.

Will leave it to Stape to name the players and substitutes. Charlie Rawson had a picture of them in a frame on the wall of his Candy Kitchen next to the printing office for many years. Would like to locate that picture, and sometime, when the Decatur museum is built, it should be placed among the relics.

Students of the land have awakened to a new menace to the public in the depletion of the soil. Men like Max and Dalton Rose, whose boyhood in Decatur was more or less associated with their father's farm, have in their later years seen how the farms have been cropped by farmers whose vision has not extended beyond the season's harvest. These farms have 'run down', from good to poor and from poor to barren. This does not mean loss of income to them only, it means loss to the country at large, and will in time if not checked, mean that the land will be unequal to the tax upon it of supporting the population.

Men of thought and vision realize the seriousness of the situation, and with their time and money are making a determined effort to turn the tide of soil depletion to soil reclamation.

Three years ago the Van Buren County Soil Conservation District was organized by the farmers to carry out a cooperative program of soil and water conservation. T. J. Rosevelt of Keeler is the chairman and it is doing a good work.

Right in line with the work of this organization will be the efforts made by the committee in charge of the Dr. G. L. Rose Memorial Fund. A nationally known lecturer will speak at the high school auditorium Saturday evening, February 7, and the public is invited to hear him.

Since helping to carry out the plans for this and other lectures we have come to realize the importance of soil conservation and intend to devote more space to it in the Republican. Last week we read in the 1948 Everyman's almanac these comments:

The Making of a Hungry Nation

Close observers warn that this country is rapidly approaching the time when our farms will not be able to produce the food needed by a nation of healthy people.

The record breaking production during and after the war years was secured at excessive cost.

And the food value of that record production was far below what it should have been.

Depleted land does not produce food containing the minerals that are necessary to the health of the people.

The mineral and, to a large extent, the vitamin value of farm produce—vegetables, grain, or meat, is determined by the mineral content of the soil.

Eroded and depleted top soil produces crops and livestock deficient in the minerals that have disappeared from the land.

Much of the top soil of thousands of acres of the rich corn belt land has been carried away by sheer erosion.

Where the top soil has been entirely carried away gullies have crept in and the land has been completely ruined beyond restoration.

Without humus and organic material chemical fertilizer is of no value.

Soil washed and blown away is taking billions of dollars—in agriculture subsidies and unpaid taxes on abandoned farms—out of the pockets of the people of the United States.

And that is not all.

It is keeping the calcium out of the bones and the phosphorus out of the brains of the people of the United States.

People who eat the products of depleted soils gradually become physically and mentally deficient.

A nation cannot be healthy and strong on food produced on land whose soil has been blown and washed away.

General Eisenhower has withdrawn himself from the list of candidates for the Republican nomination for president. We hope that what was said about him in the Republican last week did not discourage him. But in seriousness we think he has done the wise thing, and believe he will rate higher in the history of his country for the course he has taken.

The three leading condidates are now Dewey, Taft and Stassen, with Warren and MacArthur trailing.

It is almost an exact duplicate of the line-up in 1920 when the three leading candidates were Wood, Lowden and Johnson with Hoover and Harding trailing.

Senator Harding was nominated on the tenth ballot, and Senator Johnson of California was offered, but refused, the nomination for vice-president. Had he accepted he would have had in two years the office he coveted.

A lone delegate from Oregon stood on a chair in the rear of the convention hall and yelled, "Coolidge!" The name struck like fire and shouts of "Coolidge!" filled the air. In two minutes, out of a clear sky Calvin Coolidge became the nominee for vice-president. After he had served two years as vice-president and six years as president he refused to break the precedent of serving more than eight years by announcing, "I do not choose to run."

Mrs. Lucy Foster Guilliford read some poetry in the Republican that she did not consider entitled to the classification of poetry. "Some folks," she said, "don't know the difference between poetry and rhyme. Poetry doesn't have to rhyme. Some of the best poetry doesn't rhyme at all." Mrs. Guilliford writes poetry that does not always rhyme, but you can tell it is poetry by the even click of its cadences. Most of her poetical efforts are too lengthy for the limited space available for poetry in the Republican.

Decatur's Wonderful Centennial Celebration

By Fred W. Green.

We feel that all who visited the Centennial celebration just closed will agree that it was a success from start to finish. Those who conducted the big event did a wonderful job and few will realize the amount of work it took. It took many weeks to get the wheels in motion to bring it up to the final signal to go.

Three important factors were responsible for the unusual success of the event. First, the idea of a queen. Second, the interest taken in the event by the New York Central. Third, the coming of Edgar Bergen; and we might add a fourth, the big parade which would have done credit to any city.

Going back to the beginning of the activities. When Queen Esther and her court were chosen the success of the celebration was assured. Then the officials of the New York Central promised to send the newest type of railroad equipment and the children were not forgotten and they greatly enjoyed the rides that were given them.

The railroad officials were gracious to Queen Esther and her mother, giving them a trip to the railroad exhibit in Chicago.

A souvenir of Decatur and her history was proposed by Rolland Haefner and was sponsored by the celebration officials. He put much time and thought into the books and it contains interesting data which will stand for all time.

We want here to speak a word for our band. There could be no celebration without a band. A band with W. T. Beek as director was organized and it was conceded to be the liveliest and best band that Decatur ever had.

Wednesday it rained and the outlook was anything but promising. But concessions arrived and were set up and all preparations were made to go on with the show. The certificates of honor for farms in one family 100 years or more were scheduled to be given from the band stand, but because of the rain this part of the program was taken to the town hall and it proved to be the best place for it. A report of this event was given in the Republican of September 9th.

Thursday came out a perfect day and the big event of the afternoon was the speech by Governor Sigler. He left out politics and spoke as a governor should in an event of this kind. It made him friends and we are proud of his ability and what he is trying to do for Michigan.

Queen Esther was crowned in the evening by J. L. McKee, vice-president of the New York Central, and in response she spoke a few words of appreciation and thanks. The writer was standing on the side lines and heard many loving words spoken about her Majesty, among them being, "Ain't she beautiful, I did not know that she was so pretty." I thoroughly agreed with these remarks. Truly Decatur is proud of its queen.

The Kangaroo court was then set up to try some citizens who had not lived up to the edict that all men must grow a beard. One victim was your humble editor who had to face Judge Hughey and plead his case why he should not be severely dealt with. He was found guilty, but the Governor, who was present, pardoned him and he escaped with a fine.

Friday was a fairly good day and the pet parade was the big event of the afternoon. The children were happy to show what they could do to make the day interesting. It was a very nice part of the week's program.

I must say a word here about the relics in the store windows. In the First State Bank was a marvelous collection of old books and letters and Mr. Copley informed me had had many more of them. This feature of the celebration, I understand, is being prepared by Mr. Scott, so I will pass on to the Bergen show.

Eight years ago I estimated that 15,000 people attended the Bergen show of that year. This year I will not attempt to make an estimate of the crowd. However, it was a wonderful show and Edgar was at his best. He, Charlie and the queen with her court had a whale of a time.

Charlie tried to date one of the court ladies and was reprimanded by Bergen. Later on a special interview will be obtained from her Majesty and court as to how it feels to be so celebrated.

The Decatur band played under the direction of W. T. Beek and I can't say too much about the fine music they made under their skillful leader.

There was another band furnished by the committee, so the audience was not without entertainment, but of course Bergen, Charlie and Mortimer were the attraction for which the audience was waiting.

Mr. Eagan of the RCA was master of ceremonies. He was introduced by our Fred Pennell and the program was under way. Notable entertainers were present, among them being magician Jim Sherman, a lifelong friend of Bergen, and who accompanied him in entertaining the soldiers in their camps during the war. They went overseas with Ercel Twing and made a show all by themselves.

Mr. Chick Dougherty of Kalamazoo, which hereafter may qualify as a suburb of Decatur, was another entertainer and there were others equally good whom your reporter did not meet. Mortimer Snerd was unusually shy, but said he liked Decatur and may locate here sometime. And so the entertainment came to a close and everybody went away happy.

The sun came out at nine o'clock Saturday morning to insure success to the last day of Decatur's Centennial celebration. Edgar said he was here to have a good time as well as to help Decatur with its celebration, and there was great fun for all when he was around. After the show, when he was headed for the home of Dr. Bope, he was picked up by the Kangaroo court. He failed to give a proper explanation of why he did not wear a beard and was fined $5 which was changed to other forms of punishment. Then he said he would have to go home as he didn't want Charlie to find out what had happened to him.

Saturday morning there were two or three hundred children around him at the band stand where he gave a bubble blowing contest.

The parade Saturday will need special mention. It far exceeded anything of the kind ever given in Decatur, and will received a special mention elsewhere.

An Early Indian Mission

By Rev. Louis Baroux.

Excerpts taken from Father Baroux's letters to his supervisor concerning the history of the Potawatami in Silver Creek, north of Dowagiac. The introduction was written by Rt. Rev. E. D. Kelly of Detroit.

Written in 1913.

(Entered by Donald Moline and Marvin Peterson under the direction of Catherine Howland, teacher of history and science, as a continuation of the 14th story in the Norman E. Webster local history contest.)

INTRODUCTION

Near by a sandy road some miles north of Dowagiac, Michigan, may be seen the Silver Creek church, a pretty little red brick building which balances itself, so to speak, on the farther edge of a saucer-shaped cemetery. Over this grave yard the little edifice acts as a sort of watchful mother who has tenderly laid away her loving children for their long night's sleep after having first signed them with the cross and chant. Occasionally, the music of a requiem or a misirere floats out through the opened stained glass windows over the consecrated, restful tombs. It means that some other child has wearied of the garish day and its good parent croons until earth's coverlet has been drawn around the chilly form. "Remember man that thou art dust and unto dust thou shalt return." Crooked little graveled walks divide the family lots from one another. Wild brier flowers out into wreaths or crowns which link themselves in confusion over the mounds, and large weeping willows trail their frail, long-fingered branches on the piping blades of grass.

But there is no monument over the grave of him who made this situation possible. Father Baroux had planted both Christianity and civilization in this neck of the woods, he had struggled through, and endured with patience, the hopeless winters of the 50's and 60's, he had been the faithful shepherd of untamed flocks, he had been a pioneer in advocating religious education; he had willed his body to be buried in the little grave yard at Silver Creek beneath the shadow of the sanctuary which he loved and served through many years.

When "littla" Father Baroux died there were found those who aided in carrying out his last will and testament and he was buried side by side with the Indians and whites to whom he had brought religious peace and life. The mission still contained many who remembered him, even if he had been in a distant place for years, and when the mortal remains of the good missionary father were brought in through the sand dunes of Silver Creek, Indians and whites seemed to vie with one another in showing respect and homage. The descendants of his "enfants des forests" loved him equally well with the Celtic children who had drifted into these oak-openings from the waste and famine of Ireland.

The lack of a monument over the grave of Fr. Baroux became evident to me last summer when I passed through this district on an auto trip to Chicago, I motored through Hartford, Rush Lake, Watervliet, and the "Irish Settlement." I passed by the very house in which I was born. Then the auto was headed through Keeler, which is remarkable for its good roads and wonderful shade trees and we arrived at Silver Creek. There are a great many diamond lakes rosaried together in this wide district and it was a pleasure to follow up the string of beads so to speak, and count them o'er and o'er, a sort of pleasure penance on him who had not worshipped at the lakes shrine for many years.

One could not help thinking that if the roads had not improved much since Fr. Baroux's time the modes of transportation had. At certain seasons of the year Fr. Baroux had spent a whole week on a sick-call to some poor Indian in the parish of Rush Lake. In places the road would be impassible on account of floods or deep mud, or possibly snow drifts. In such emergency he would appeal to the farmers who always helped out generously. Food was furnished, fences opened up, and a new pathway found through the fields. Today the sick call which is made by auto, trolley or train, demands no such sacrifices and indeed by means of telephone we may sometimes get a neighbor to make the call for us, if he be not too particular.

But how erect that monument? That question came into my mind again and again as the speedometer told the miles. At last I said to myself, why not translate this book into English, and with the proceeds, if there be any, erect a monument over the grave of this brave, good priest-hero?

SKETCH OF SIMON POKAGON'S LIFE

Chief Simon Pokagon was born in the old Pokagon Indian village located on Pokagon Creek about one mile from St. Joseph River, Berrien County, Michigan, in 1830. He is a full-blooded Potawatami Indian, and the last chief of the Pokagon band. At 14 years of age he could speak his mother tongue only; he was then sent to Notre Dame school near South Bend, Ind., where he remained three years. Returning home fired with zeal for a good English education, he succeeded through his own efforts, aided by his mother, in going to Oberlin College, Ohio. Here he remained one year and then went to Twinsburg, in the same state, where he remained two years longer.

His father, Leopold Pokagon, was Chief for 42 years, and during that time, made many important treaties with the U. S. He died when Simon, the present Chief, was only 10 years old. His son, the present Chief, was the first red man to visit Abraham Lincoln after taking the presidential chair. His mission was to procure if possible the amount due his people from the sale of Chicago and the surrounding country by his father to the U. S. thirty years before. Just before Lincoln's death, near the close of the Rebellion, he visited him again. During the year 1866 he succeeded in procuring partial payment of 39 thousand dollars. He afterward visited Gen. Grant while president, with whom he smoked the pipe of peace receiving thanks for Indian soldiers furnished during the war.

After patiently struggling for years, through opposition and poverty, a portion of the balance due, one hundred and fifty thousand dollars without interest, was finally allowed by the Court of Claims, appealed to the U. S. Supreme Court, and there affirmed; but was not paid until the fall of 1896.

The old Chief was present at the opening of the World's Fair, May 1, 1893. He saw with a critic's eye aliens and strangers from every land take their seats on the great platform in the shadow of the gilded dome of the administration building; he saw the Duke of Veragua and suite as well as foreign commissioners take the platform of honor in front, while he and a few others of his race, the only true Americans, stood in the background, unnoticed and unprovided for. When all was ready, the orchestra struck up the "Columbia March," prayer was offered for all nationalities in a general way, which I suppose of course must have included the Indians. After President Cleveland had responded to the address of welcome by the director, he touched the electric button, and the World's Exposition was born, filled with life and spirit.

From the time the Columbian Fair was first talked of, the old Chief had had a great desire to have the educated people of his race hold a congress there, so as to inform the world of what they had accomplished along the lines of civilization, but he was doomed to be disappointed. On that memorable day he saw all nationalities provided for except the original Americans. It almost broke the old man's heart.

While he stood sadly considering the great wrong to his people, a little girl of his own race, unnoticed before, stepped quietly up to him and, seemingly in pity, handed him some wild flowers. On relating this singular circumstance to a friend on his return home, he added: "I can not fully explain to you why it was, but on receiving the flowers I could not refrain from tears; and even now as I think of it, that same tearful feeling creeps through my soul." It was in such a frame of mind he was inspired to write "The Red Man's Greeting," fitly termed by Professor Swing of Chicago, "The Red Man's Book of Lamentations." It was published in a booklet made from the manifold bark of the white birch tree. The little unique rustic book has been read with great interest, and highly complimented by the press, both in this country and in Europe, for its wild, rough imagery and native eloquence.

Owing to his disappointment in not securing for his people a congress, he did not take kindly to the World's Fair being held in the city of his father, which is expressed in no doubtful terms in his birch-bark booklet. It was through the spirit breathed out by this little volume that he was solicited by Mayor Harrison and some ladies friendly to his race to attend the Fair as a guest of the city. He finally gave consent and went.

It is estimated that during his lifetime Pokagon has interpreted into his mother tongue at least a thousand sermons as they were delivered; he was also organist at all church services during the same period. All Indians who have ever heard him speak in their native language, declare him to be a great orator.

During the past five years the Chief has addressed many pioneer meetings, always attracting large crowds. He has furnished many contributions to such leading magazine as the Arena, Forum, Harper's Magazine, Review of Reviews and many others, which have been highly complimented both in this country and in Europe. He has been called by the press, "the red-skin bard," the "Longfellow of his race," and the "grand old man."

True to his Indian nature, the old Chief never exhibits vanity, or appears in any wise puffed up or boastful over any honors conferred upon him; neither does he refer to them unless interrogated, when, like an unbiased witness in court, he simply answers the questions asked him.

In a history of the removal of the Potawatami Indians from northern Indiana, published by Daniel McDonold, of Plymouth, Ind., about the year 1900, appears the following:

"The Pokagon Potawatami village, one of the earliest Indian villages in northern Indiana, and where many of the most stirring scenes occurred prior to the removal of the Indians to the Western country provided for them, was located on the line between Indiana and Michigan, north of South Bend and about one mile west of the St. Joseph river.

"Leopold Pokagon, the elder, was the second in rank among the chiefs of his tribe, To-pin-a-bee being the first. Pokagon and his people were noted as being the farthest advanced in civilization of all their race in the St. Joseph valley. He has been described as a man of considerable talents, and in his many business transactions with the early settlers was never known to break his word. He set a good example to his followers by not indulging in "fire-water" (whiskey). He was particularly distinguished for his devotion to the traditional teachings of the Jesuit Fathers. Pokagon made several visits to Detroit, especially to ask that the black-gowns (missionaries) be again sent among his people. The last of these appeals was in July 1830. Detroit was then the residence of M. Gabriel Richard, vicar-general of the bishop of Cincinnati, and to the church official Pokagon poured out the deep yearnings of his soul. "Father, father," he exclaimed, "I come to beg you to send us a black-gown to teach us the word of God. In accordance with his request a missionary was sent in 1830 to minister to these urgent spiritual demands. Pokagon died in Cass County, Mich., about 1841.

"Simon Pokagon, a distinguished Potawatami Indian, still living near Hartford (1899) is the only living son of Leopold Pokagon, having been born at Pokagon Village in 1830. He has the distinction of being the best educated and most distinguished full-blooded Indian, probably in America. He has managed the band of about 300, of which he has for many years been the acknowledged head, with much skill and ability; and although the band, of which he is the most prominent member, has not made much headway in keeping pace with the rapid advance of civilization the past 50 years, yet had it not been for Pokagon,—it is likely it would have disintegrated, and would undoubtedly long since have been scattered to the four winds of heaven.

While the old Chief has his faults, "even as you and I," yet when his history comes to be written in the years to come, he will be accorded the highest round on the ladder of fame among the great men of the once powerful tribe of Potawatami Indians."

One of the missionaries among the Potawatami of southern Michigan for several years, has left on record that Pokagon's father was in reality one of those noble red men we read about; that he was talented, and that with his many transactions with the early settlers, was never known to break his word. It is further stated in the record that each year while he was among these Indians, a large body of Sioux passed along the old trail that ran through the Pokagon village, on their way to Canada, where they received small annuities from the English government for fighting against the U. S. in the war of 1812; and that when this body of Sioux passed through in 1827, they had a boy about 10 years old with them, a prisoner they had taken from some other tribe; and that Pokagon, out of pity, bought him for four ponies, saddles and bridles, and adopted him as his own son, taking care of him until old age.

While the old Chief lived, no trader dared bring whiskey among his people, as he would order it seized and destroyed.

Notwithstanding Pokagon has labored so many years to procure payment due his people, he has only received an equal share with each member of his band; or, as he states it, "The last child born received the same as I," in consequence of which he has had a hard struggle to gain a livelihood.

JIM'S STORY ON G.A.R.

Fort Worth 6, Texas,
Feb. 18, 1948.

Dear Friend:

In response to your request as to the part John A. Logan took in the organization of the G.A.R., I will state that he took a very prominent part, but as the first notable work of the G.A.R. was the establishment and observing of Memorial Day, it is best first to consider the origin of this day of honoring the memory of those who fought and sacrificed to preserve the Union.

During the War many women of the South sought relief for their saddened spirits by strewing flowers upon the graves of their sons, husbands and fathers. Defeat increased this practice which soon became customary. The Northern troops of occupation moving South in April and May of 1865 observed that Confederate graves were being decorated in almost every community. This decoration commended itself to the Union troops and they thought it fitting that the lonely graves of Federal soldiers buried in the South should be remembered. So unorganized bodies of Unionists, frequently single individuals, joined in decorating the graves of those who had shed their blood to save the Union.

The most noteworthy of these decorations, which attracted nation-wide attention and which introduced the idea of Memorial Day to the North, took place in Charlestown, S. C., May 30, 1865. James Redpath, accompanied by a large number of Negro school children, went to a dreary spot on the outskirts of the city where reposed the remains of several hundred Union soldiers in four long trenches. The rude mounds were quickly and quietly covered with flowers strewn by black hands who thus sought to honor the dead that had released them from slavery.

The practice of decorating the graves of the soldier dead spread rapidly to the North and the G.A.R. eagerly sponsored the practice and accordingly May 5, 1868, the Commander in chief of the G.A.R., John A. Logan, issued a general order to this effect.

Lawrence, January 22, 1948.

Friend Arba,

Of the Decatur pupils of long ago I remember Castle Roberts, Andrew Long, Harry Smith, Albert Gantz, Kate Nesbitt, Estella Maxham, Minnie Hawks, Arba Moulton, Sela Eckenberger, and Louis Dwight.

About the Chicora lost in Lake Michigan 53 years ago the 21st of January, 1895. That was Monday.

Thanks to our friend, Nellie Truesdell, for remembering my birthday. I never saw her either, but feel acquainted with her.

I am glad to hear our friend Lily C. E. and her husband are in Florida having a nice time. I have not seen her in fifty years and never saw her husband. I wish them many years together.

I went to see my great gandson, born January 9 and named after me, Edwin William, 3rd, Loveland. Born in Kalamazoo.

I live with my daughter Nettie and her husband Frank Struble on the farm where I was born. My dear wife passed away July 3, 1946, but her spirit is with me all the time, and I know that I will meet with her in heaven.

E. W. Plopper.

HOME TOWN LOYALTY

2250 83rd St.,
Brooklyn 14, N. Y.,
January 18, 1948.

Dear Mr. Moulton:

I am enclosing a check for $2.00 for this year's subscription to the Republican. I do not believe that it is necessary for me to tell you that the Republican is one of the closest ties with home that those of us who live elsewhere, have. Many others have done so, but I hasten to tell you that the arrival of the Republican is as eagerly awaited as is my daily session with the New York papers. Actually there is more news, of interest to me, per square inch in it, than in all of the large New York dailies put together.

Thank you for a wonderful job of reporting local events which are dear to my heart, even though many miles separates me from them.

Best wishes for your continued success.

Willard H. Graham.

(Thanks, Willard. It is because of loyal friends like you that we keep on doing our best to make the home town paper interesting.)

This is a welcome letter from an old friend. Not many like Ed. have lived 78 years in one place, and he is rich in memories.

A writer in the South Haven paper says the Chicora went down on January 21, 1895, but that the day of the week was Wednesday. Ed. has a way of reckoning days of the week of any year. It is a system that never fails and if he has figured it out according to the system he is correct.

The Edgar Bergens and Charlie

By Louella O. Parsons in The Los Angeles Examiner.

(This story about Edgar and his family came in a letter postmarked Burbank, California. There was no writing with it or anything to indicate the identity of the sender, but we thank him or her just the same, and are passing the story along for the pleasure it will give to Edgar's other friends who read the Republican.)

When Edgar Bergen married pretty Frances Westerman, one of the most eligible bachelors, not only in Hollywood, but in the country, was removed from the list of possibilities.

For a long time, Edgar had escaped many designing mammas and eager-to-be Mrs. Bergens until Frances came into his life. The moment he met the charming girl, he was hooked. He never so much as looked in the direction of anyone else.

He fought marriage because he didn't think it was for him. Moreover, Frances wasn't anxious to get married, either. She wanted to continue her career as a singer. When they did marry, they kept it a secret to give the bride a chance to go on with her singing career, but when the stork came winging their way, they had to admit Frances was Mrs. Bergen and had been for almost a year.

The Bergens and I were in New York at the same time a few weeks ago so Edgar and I had lunch together. He was in rare good form.

"Edgar," I said, "your marriage has worked out wonderfully."

"More than that," he replied, "it was the best thing I ever did in my life. Frances has the good sense to know that there would never be any happiness for either of us if she were the type of girl who played cards all afternoon and was constantly on the go—to luncheons and cocktail parties.

"So that's why you let her go into the dress business," I said.

He laughed. "Frances is a good business woman. Almost too good. You see I own the building the shop is in and have never been able to collect a cent of rent. What's more the dresses are all in her size, and she buys most of them for herself."

"That's certainly good business, and good advertising, too," I said, "because Frances is about the best-dressed woman in New York." At the theatres and parties in the gay whirl of New York, she was greatly admired for her youth, her beauty, and the way she wore the 1947 new look gowns.

When I said as much to Edgar, he said, "Frances will like that." "And you do, too," I added.

The Bergens really captured New York. I saw them at all the parties. Edgar has overcome his shyness. I used to think he was self conscious, self-effacing and unhappy with crowds. For a great artist, and such a successful one, he seemed so frightened of people.

Well, marriage helped him there. It helped him overcome his fear and has given him the poise and assurance in private life that he has always had when he lets Charlie McCarthy do the talking.

When we were talking I asked him how his two-year-old daughter Candace was. He "just happened to have some pictures of her in his pocket." She is a beauty and, like every doting father, Edgar tells everything she does. He used to talk about Charlie, but Charlie has been relegated to the background. Even the room that Edgar used to have in his home for Charlie and all his clothes, has been turned over to Candy.

I had a chance to be proud, too, when Edgar told me he owes a lot to Harriet Parsons. Edgar says Harriet was the one who wanted him to play the amorous but pathetic Norwegian undertaker in RKO's "I Remember Mama," and wouldn't give up until he was signed for the role.

I think he is secretly delighted that he did something without the scene-stealing dummy. I seem to remember that Edgar even gave up a trip to Sweden to play in George Stevens' picture. But, Edgar and Frances are going to Sweden this summer.

He tells me he is going to travel on a Swedish boat so he can brush up on his native tongue. As a child he spoke the language fluently, and while his mother was alive, they often conversed in Swedish. But, he says he has now gotten rusty. Seems I heard him jabbering with someone in Swedish not so long ago as fast as only a Swede can talk.

In taking his show around the country, he found that's the only way to get the tempo of the people. He said you get rusty if you only broadcast from Hollywood, while if you travel around to the key cities in the East and West, you find out from the people themselves what is popular.

Maybe that's why year after year Edgar and Charlie have gone on and remained at the top.

Bergen Show a Hit

The Visit of Edgar Bergen to His Old Home Town

Edgar Bergen and Party

The visit of Edgar Bergen and his friends stands out as the biggest event that has taken place in Decatur since his first visit on that memorable day in August seven years ago. In writing the story of this second visit we felt incapable of doing justice to it. More might have been done for him to show the appreciation felt for the time and expense he so willingly assumed to be with us on the big day of the celebration. But we know he enjoyed his stay here and there never was a dull moment while he and his party were in town. They were royally entertained at the home of Dr. and Mrs. Bope, and have fittingly expressed their thanks for that.

It was the first time that Edgar's brother Clarence had been back since the boys and their mother moved to Chicago some 30 years ago. Clarence met many boyhood acquaintances and thoroughly enjoyed his visits with them.

Bergen was paid nothing for coming here. He gave, not only his own services, but brought Pat Patrick from Hollywood and Jim Sherman from Chicago at his own expense. The latter is an outstanding magician and also a manufacturer of equipment for magicians. It was he who took the microphone from Elmer Woolfe and made the announcement about parking during the parade, rather than Pat Patrick, as was reported last week.

Edgar Bergen and party went from Decatur on Saturday afternoon to Colon, where a magicians' show was in progress.

DECATUR ONCE CLAIMED ODLUM

In picking up the news of former Decatur residents we came upon this note by Luella Parsons, nationally known columnist:

"I just heard that while Howard Hughes and Floyd Odlum were busy working on the RKO deal, Mrs. Odlum was working, too. She broke two world flying records in India. Of course, I mean Jacqueline Cochran, the famous flyer.

"I am told that Floyd Odlum will remain as chairman of the board of directors of RKO, by request of Howard."

The outstanding event of the Centennial celebration was the coming of Edgar Bergen. The Bergen show was held at the athletic field Friday evening and brought out an immense crowd from his old home town and visitors from throughout the North Central states.

Bergen was at his best, and Charlie McCarthy and Mortimer Snerd were masters of repartee and wit in his hands. The crowd laughed heartily at Charlie's sallies and Mortimer's bashfulness. Bergen's jokes were brilliant, and interspersed among them, could be discerned sentiment which he surely felt. He said that "Decatur is a grand town. I certainly enjoy coming here. After all, it's my old home town."

Pat Patrick, who is "Prof. Ercel Twing" of the radio show, came with Bergen and did his part toward making the show one never to be forgotten in Decatur's history. Others on the program were the Tone Poets, a vocal quartet from South Bend, Charles Daugherty, harmonica player, Tom Paxon, novelty drummer, and Jim Sherman, magician.

"Red" Egan, former NBC announcer and now an RCA executive in Grand Rapids, acted as master of ceremonies.

Edgar Bergen went from Hollywood up to Wyoming hunting antelope. He spent two days at it but gave no report on how many he shot. That was Tuesday and Wednesday. Thursday he came to Chicago by plane in three relays, met his brother Clarence, who came from Hollywood by train, Prof. Twing, Jim Sherman, and Joe Leighton of NBC publicity. From Chicago they came by auto to Decatur, arriving at 7 p. m. They were guests of Dr. and Mrs. W. P. Bope. Supper for the entire Bope party was served at Dine's and then Edgar made his surprise appearance at the band stand where the evening program was in progress. A cheer went up from the crowd when he was recognized and from that time on he was the star attraction in Decatur.

Saturday the Bergen party went to Colon to attend a convention of magicians, thence to Chicago on Sunday, and from there to New York City.

After the show Friday evening the jolly entertainers came up to the business street. A program was in progress and they all took part in it. The serious minded Chief was passing out over the loud speaker some instructions in parking when "Prof. Twing" took over and gave the word to park anywhere and the village would pay the driver who parked in the wrong place a $5 prize. The crowd roared.

The irrepressibles stopped at the airplane ride and all piled in. Somebody passed the word to the operator to "speed 'er up" and they had a wild ride. Then they went to the Bope residence again and were still going strong when Saturday morning arrived, and they went to the Rolland Haefner home. At 3 a. m. they turned in at the restful Bope home for a few hours' rest before beginning the next day.

Radio station WHFB, Benton Harbor, was represented by engineers at several of the high spots during the week. On Thursday afternoon WHFB recorded the talk given by Governor Sigler and had it on the air in just a few minutes over telephone lines to the station. In fact, the governor was just finishing his interesting speech as it started on the radio.

The Bergen show was also put on the air over the Benton Harbor station, with special permission of Edgar Bergen. WHFB helped greatly in publicizing the festival and centennial all the week.

Sherman was full of tricks when he came to Decatur and unloaded a lot of them about town. As a pickpocket he cleaned up on Dr. Bope and took everything from him except his false teeth.

Pat is a comedian and the only time we caught him serious was when he had tears in his eyes when he was leaving Decatur.

How many pictures were taken during the Festival and Centennial? That would be hard to determine, but everyone must have noticed that all of the features of the four-day affair were snapped from every angle, day and night, by professionals and amateurs. It was estimated that the light generated by all the flash bulbs used during the past week would put the sun to shame. Movies, stills, color pictures, black-and-white. A complete record of Decatur's biggest celebration is now available in picture form.

Two thousand reserved seats were provided and placed on sale at $2 each. The seats were rented of the Acme Chair Company of Detroit for 7½ cents each, total $150. Myron Southworth went after them and took them back. Van Graham also assisted in bringing them here.

PET PARADE

The feature of the Friday afternoon program was the pet parade, in which there were over a hundred entries. Under the direction of the chairman, Mrs. Archie McWilliams, the children gathered at the railroad park and lined up back of the signs listing the several divisions. At two o'clock, with the Decatur band leading the way, the parade wended its way through the crowd to the north end of Main street and returned.

The judging of the entries was done by Miss Maxine McWilliams, Mrs. Harry Schmidt, Mrs. Henry Goud and Mrs. Archie McWilliams.

Winners of the pet parade were:

Tricycles—1st prize, Tommy Snyder; 2nd prize, Florence Aducci; 3rd prize, Sharon Cole.

Wagons—1st prize, Timmy Washburn; 2nd prize, Lynette Shanahan.

Pets—1st prize, Jo-Ellen Hemenway; 2nd prize, Janet Ickes; 3rd prize, Ronald Walters.

A feature of the pet parade was the surrey with the fringe, drawn by Lynnette Shanahan. The driver on the front seat was Charlie McCarthy. His china lady passenger on the back seat was a doll which was given to Lynnette's great grandmother, the late Mrs. Charles Lake, Dora Pugsley Lake, 84 years ago by her uncle, John Pugsley, who came here with John Lyle.

The active life of Charles O. Haefner came to a peaceful end within the last hour of 1948. He was enjoying a remininscent evening at the country home of Mrs. Ella Graham, a lifetime friend and neighbor. Earlier in the year he had suffered a severe heart attack, from which he had made a remarkable recovery, and his sudden passing resulted from a recurrence of this affliction.

Chas. Haefner was born in Vollnia township on October 5, 1875, son of Mr. and Mrs. Chris. Haefner. On March 17, 1902, he united in marriage with Nellie Graham. They are survived by three children, Rolland, Graham, and Rachel (Mrs. E. E. Leason), for on September 15th, 1940, the wife and mother passed away.

Chas. Haefner was a pioneer developer of muckland south of Decatur and practically his entire life was devoted to mint growing. In the early '20's the family moved to Burbank, Calif., where Mr. Haefner was engaged in the real estate business with his brother-in-law, A. R. Graham. A few years later the family returned to Michigan, residing in Decatur.

In 1943 he was married to Mrs. Mamie Northrup; a companionship that was brought to an untimely end three years later with her death. The immediate family surviving the deceased are the three children and four grandchildren, a brother, Leslie Haefner, and two sisters, Mrs. Mary High and Mrs. Eva McNulty.

Mr. Haefner was ever solicitous of the welfare of his many friends and the community in which he resided. He had served as a member of the village board and as its president. He was deeply mindful of the salutary worth of the Masonic fraternity and very active in its work; was a past master and held a Life membership in Decatur Lodge No. 99.

The funeral services were held at the Methodist church Tuesday afternoon with Gerald Jacobs officiating. The last rites of the Masonic lodge were conducted by Leroy Cabbage, and burial was at the Wayne cemetery.

Rev. Leroy Cabbage

Mr. Cabbage Finishes Work in Decatur

On Sunday, September 5, Rev. Leroy Cabbage conducted his final church service in the First Presbyterian Church here. It was an impressive event to the many who attended and climaxed a very happy five years for the congregation. A large choir composed of those girls who have sung during Mr. Cabbage's ministry presented two lovely anthems during the service and the Junior Choir sang "Prayer Perfect." Both choirs were conducted in this fine special music by Mrs. Rolland Haefner. Special organ music and baptismal services were also a part of the worship and Mr. Cabbage's sermon "Finally Brethren" was a dynamic conclusion to the unceasing effort he has made to uplift and liberalize the religious and educational viewpoint of Decatur.

The service was attended by many from other churches, outstanding of which was the First Baptist Church of Decatur who abandoned their own worship services to attend the Presbyterian church. The veteran's groups attended in a large body, and many from the Lions Club, the Masons and the Decatur Youth Organization were present in tribute to Mr. Cabbage.

In the afternoon, the Westminster Guild were hosts at an open house honoring Mr. and Mrs. Cabbage. In the course of the afternoon as well as during the past week, they were the recipients of many individual gifts as well as useful and lovely gifts from many groups including the two Veterans' groups, the Lions Club, the Decatur Youth Organization and the First Presbyterian Church. The beautiful tiered cakes which served as centerpieces were the gifts of Mr. and Mrs. Elwood Scott and the Westminster Guild. Punch and coffee were served during the afternoon and the basement was attractively decorated with colorful autumn flowers. About 250 guests were received during the afternoon and Mr. and Mrs. Cabbage were presented with a guest book containing the names and good wishes of those who called.

It is to the credit of the Guild that the afternoon was a delightful occasion for all who attended and it was remarked by several that Mr. and Mrs. Cabbage could never doubt the friendship and gratitude of those Decaturites who have known and profited by association with them. We deeply regret their leaving this community and the good wishes of their many friends go with them.

Mr. Cabbage began his pastorate in Decatur on July 4, 1943. During the five years of his ministry 101 members have been received into the fellowship of the church. Among the improvements which have been made is the installation of a men's rest room, the remodelling of the heating system for increased efficiency, installation of a hot water heater in the kitchen, redecorating of the basement, furnishing and redecorating of the Social Room and Sunday School rooms, the formation of the worship center in the sanctuary including offering plates, cross and candle sticks and communion table, and new light fixtures. The quality of the music and the order of worship have been greatly improved during Mr. Cabbage's ministry and the whole service has taken on a dignity and meaning of immeasurable worth through his guidance and effort.

Until a pastor may be secured permanently, the pulpit will be supplied by Dr. Russell Seibert of Kalamazoo who is no stranger to Decatur people.

The John Rosevelt Homestead In Keeler Township, Van Buren County

By Kathryn Stanard.

(This is the eleventh story in the Norman E. Webster local history contest written under the direction of Catherine Howland, teacher of History and Science in the Decatur Public schools.)

This old homestead is one of the most charming and picturesque of the early homes of the community. It is constructed of red brick in the Victorian style, and its massive height and beauty of design is typical of the dignity and majesty which characterized the early homes.

The spacious green lawn which forms a setting and background for this lovely old home is dotted here and there with trees which Mr. Charles Rosevelt, son of the builder, planted in an early day. Among them are two Norway pines, and a coffee tree which was brought from the South. Large whte oak and burr oak trees grow along the road near the homestead. The home and surroundings present a picture quite like an old painting or a picture from a history book.

The interior of the house has a charm equal to or greater than that of the exterior. The rooms are large and high with windows extending from the ceiling to the floor.

At the front entrance there is a large arched door, with no special architectural design, but fitted with rose-colored plates of glass which give one the feeling of looking at the world through rose-colored glasses. Beyond this entrance is a large, beautifully carved mirror and umbrella stand. Here also the staircase starts, which leads to the cupola on the top of the house. A fine view of the surrounding country is to be had from this point. The stairs are made of whitewood and are beautifully stained and polished.

Sleeping rooms on the second floor are furnished with spindle beds and old-fashioned bureaus. Near the back stairway there is an interesting room containing an old secretary desk, and a built-in gun closet.

The next room of interest is the "parlor", as it was called in an earlier day. It is furnished with charming old-fashioned horsehair furniture, consisting of a settee and chairs. A grand piano occupies one end of the room and pictures in old-fashioned walnut frames hang on the walls.

The dining room has a quaint charm all of its own. The arched windows extend the entire length from the ceiling to the floor. Wainscoating in stained whitewood forms a part of the walls. A built-in cupboard contains some of the pewter ware and old silver which are heirlooms of the Rosevelt family. An old-fashioned roll-top desk stands in one corner. The really prized piece of furniture in this room is an old drop-leaf walnut table which still serves as the dining room table.

The kitchen has been modernized and contains all of the equipment necessary for speed and efficiency in present-day living.

The stables and the farm buildings occupy quite a large space, and one of them is of interest because it is a part of the old Elkhorn Tavern. The original hand-hewn timbers which form the beams and the rafters are still serving. At one time the Rosevelts had twenty-two head of horses including several riding-horses. The elder Rosevelts liked fox-hunting, a sport popular at the time.

Traces of the old Indian Trail could still be seen at the time when the earlier Rosevelts settled there. The present Territorial Road closely followed the path laid out by the Indians.

pioneer Rosevelt family of Keeler township was written in the first person by Mary Rosevelt, grand-daughter of the man who built their pioneer home in 1868 in which the family still resides.

KEELER, Jan. 1. In 1834, the first white settlers came to Keeler township. They were James and John Nesbitt, who located and entered land in Section 14 which is now a part of the Clarence Baker estate.

In June, 1835, Woolcott H. Keeler came from Vermont and bought the Nesbitt land for $5 per acre. Besides this, Mr. Keeler located and entered land in several adjacent tracts—about 1,000 acres all told. He built his cabin on section 13 where our house now is.

About this time, probably in 1835 or 1836, the Territorial Road was finished through Van Buren county and stage-coaches began to carry mail and passengers past Mr. Keeler's cabin. He decided to build a tavern.

Neighbors Have Raising Bee

I think it was in 1837 that the tavern was finally built. It happened in this way. A town meeting was held at Mr. Keeler's home to organize the township and elect officers, as Michigan was about to become a state. The township at that time included the present townships of Lawrence, Keeler, Hamilton, and Hartford; and was called Covington.

The meeting was attended by Tom Conklin and B. A. Olney of Hartford; Isaac DeLong of Lawrence, Philotus Hayden and Robert Nesbitt of Hamilton, and Tobias Byers, Woolcott Keeler, and Ira Foster of Keeler. After the meeting, these men helped Mr. Keler to raise the framework of his new tavern. This was said to be the first frame building between Paw Paw and St. Joseph. The lumber for its construction had been sawed in Paw Paw.

The new building was called the Elkhorn Tavern, and an elk horn found near Magician Lake was displayed as a sign of the tavern. A part of the old tavern is still in use as a tenant house on our farm.

Still Possess Relics

We still have the elk horn, a wooden milk pan, and Mr. Keeler's whiskey jug as relics of the Keelers. Mr. Keeler also had a store and was postmaster. He platted a village which he christened Keelerville, as he thought the railroad would be built from Detroit to St. Joseph by the same route as Territorial road. He was greatly disappointed when the railroad curved southward to New Buffalo instead of continuing westward to St. Joseph.

In 1850, he sold the 400 acres where the tavern stood to John V. Rosevelt and moved to Decatur.

Rosevelts Sturdy Stock—

John Veeder Rosevelt was born in Barry, Orleans county, New York, on February 22, 1826, the son of Isaac and Maria Veeder Roosevelt. He came to Keeler in June, 1850, a young man of only 24 years, and in January, 1852, married Mary Sloan, the daughter of Alexander Sloan who had settled in Hamilton township in 1839.

John's brother, Ormond, had come to Keeler about 1844, and in 1847 had married Nancy Sloan, the sister of Mary. Another brother, Jacob Rosevelt, came also and bought land adjoining John's on the east.

John and Mary Rosevelt were the parents of two sons, Charles, born in 1858, and Hugh, in 1865. John and his family lived in the house which Mr. Keeler had built for a tavern until 1868, when the present brick home was built.

Wife's Hand Shaped Home

The new house was of brick of the Victorian type, with the walnut woodwork and furniture so popular at the time. It was so well built that it still is in good condition. (It was Mrs. Rosevelt, rather than her husband, who had most to do with the way the home was built, according to Mrs. Alma Rosevelt, her daughter-in-law who passed away in 1943. She said a country carpenter, Keeler neighbor of the Rosevelts, executed the plans he designed under her guidance. Visitors to this show place express surprise that the high-ceilinged, big airy rooms and winding staircases of its wide hall were done without the assistance of an architect.)

Charles, who was then 10 years old, drew many wagon-loads of building material from Dowagiac over the old road which ran diagonally across the swamp and entered town by way of the Gage neighborhood. The new corduroy road, straight across the swamp (now M-40) had not yet been built.

Sportsman and Supervisor

Mary Rosevelt liked to raise flowers and to entertain friends in her new house. John Rosevelt often left the arduous labor of clearing and breaking and tilling the land to join in fox hunts and fishing trips which were popular diversions of his day.

He was well liked for his generous nature and his ready wit. He was supervisor of Keeler township several terms. He died in 1895 and his wife in 1899.

In 1886, Charles Rosevelt married Alma Durkee, daughter of Rudolph and Paulina Kirtland Durkee who had come from New York state with her parents at the age of two years to live in Decatur township.

They lived first on a farm in the northern part of Keeler township where their three children, Mary, Ruth, and Ted were born.

On Home Farm Since 1898

In 1898 they came to live on the homestead farm. Charles Rosevelt loved nature and always preferred to live on the land. He practiced soil conservation in all his farming. He felt the greatest contempt for farmers who depleted the soil to fill their pocketbooks, and left their farms "worn out" for the next generation. He was one of the first farmers in the township to grow alfalfa.

He died February 21, 1930 following a long illness. Mrs. Alma Rosevelt died in 1943 on the farm which her son Ted manages. One daughter Mary, lives on the farm, and Ruth, who is a social worker, lives in Washington, D. C.

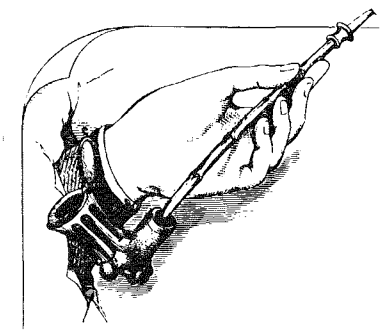
The Long Indian Trail



Written by David Woodman, a pioneer of Paw Paw township, and taken from the files of THE REPUBLICAN by Catherine Howland. Credited to Donald Moline and Warren Peterson, as one of the local history stories.

Previous to the occupation of Western Michigan by the white people, an Indian trail crossed this country from Northeast to Southwest, crossed the Paw Paw river where the West bridge now is and heading through what is known as the Pe Pe Yah farm, thence through the belt of timber land, later the farm of William Lyle (Decatur), and others in that vicinity.

The trail led through Pokagon and was deeply worn in the soil in many places, showing it had been used for ages as a thoroughfare for the dusty race that used it. On that trail we have seen red men stealing silently along, followed by their ponies loaded with the squaws, papooses and camp equipage, their dogs bringing up the rear.

The timber in that vicinity was magnificent. There were the great oaks, black walnut, whitewood, butter nut, sugar maple and other kinds of timber all standing in its grandeur. I cut a white wood on land that I owned which scaled 6000 feet of lumber. John Sherrod sold scores of these splendid trees for one dollar each. Such trees could be sold at fifty dollars each now.

Squaws Did the Work

Previous to its purchase and occupation by the whites, this region was one of the Indians' great sugar making camps during the sap season. They had made sugar there for years and were loath to leave their old camps but they had to go.

It was quite a novelty to visit their camps and see the process of sugar making. They used bark to catch the sap and they gashed the trees without mercy. They evaporated the sugar water in anything that would answer the purpose, pails or kettles holding from four quarts to four gallons each. They were hung in a compact body in the center of the wigwam and were from ten to forty in number. Under this number of kettles or pails a brisk fire was kept by using white ash wood (they used no other). The smoke escaped through an opening at the apex of the wigwam, which was built out of bark peeled in sheets from trees and this was their dwelling place during the sugar-making season.

The squaws did the entire work of sugar-making, cutting the wood and bringing it to camp. It was tied up in bundles slung on the back and held in place by a thong passing around the forehead. But someone may wish to know where the "noble redman" was all this time. Well, he was either resting (they were brave in this respect) or off on a hunt and the game he killed he laid at the cabin door, then his work was done.

In their dealings with the whites, it was swap, giving and taking the same measure whether sugar, flour, meat, cranberries, or other commodities. Many years ago one of those noble redmen had the misfortune to lose his squaw by death, and being too lazy to hunt, he concluded to try and sponge his living, so he got a friend to write a certificate, stating that he was needy, etc. The friend wrote in substance that the bearer was a poor Indian whose squaw had died and he had no one to support him, and therefore he was an object of charity. How well this poor unfortunate Indian succeeded the reader can judge.

It was amusing to see the family eat hulled corn. Gathered around a kettle of it with one wooden ladle the company would help themselves, passing it from one to another and around it would go until all were satisfied.

Indian Chiefs

Pe Pe Yah was chief of this tribe of Pottawattomies and Pokagon was a great chief. He was quite a gentleman and was held in high esteem by all who knew him. He visited the sugar camps before mentioned in the spring of 1836 and died at Pokagon a few years later. It is said that his remains lie buried beneath the altar of the Silver Creek Catholic church.

Among the Indians who had sugar camps in the Southwest part of this township in the spring of 1836, I remember Pe Pe Yah, White Wolf, Cah Cah, and Ash Ka Pe.

Old Shavehead

Old Shavehead was there also. He was an ugly looking old fellow with a head as void of hair as a pumpkin. He claimed to be 100 years old and a great warrior, claiming to have slain an even 99 men before he died. But he died at one of the sugar camps in the Spring of 1837 and his body was carried by my camp wrapped in a blanket and resting upon a section of an old store counter. He was buried on the Pe Pe Yah farm. Others might continue his history if living, but I think they are not. Perhaps his cranium is yet in the possession of some of our physicians.

The old fellow received a severe punishment at the hands of a Mr. Shaefer on Big Prairie Ronde in an early day. He met Shaefer on the road and demanded some provisions he had in his wagon. While seeming to comply with his demand Shaefer got within reach of the old rascal and with the butt of his whip knocked him down and punished him to his own satisfaction.

In the spring of 1836 Joseph Luce and myself opened a sugar camp on the land now owned by George or William Lyle, and I made sugar there every year with two exceptions for over thirty years.

Naming Eagle Lake

During the sugar season of 1936 I constructed a canoe at my camp which three of us carried on our backs to Eagle Lake and we were probably the first white men that ever floated on its waters or fished in them. Henry Rhodes and myself had a cold bath there soon after. While fishing one night, our canoe overturned spilling us, fish and all, into the lake.

During that spring a pair of bald eagles built a nest in the forks of a great white wood which stood on its Southern shore and there reared its young. We attempted to dislodge them with rifle shots but failed, hence we called that beautiful sheet of water Eagle Lake, and no one has attempted to steal or change its name as with some other lakes in the township.

Mound Builders

Concerning the mounds and garden beds that were so plentiful here in an early day, history is silent and so is tradition, the Indians having none concerning them. There were several mounds on my farm between Three and Four Mile Lakes. They were about four feet high and two or three rods across. On them were growing oak trees two feet in diameter. There was no sag or depression around them, therefore the earth must have been scraped up from the surface of a large space. We opened one of these mounds when we first came here. Even with the surface of the ground surrounding it, we found a mass of bones, arrowheads and a few trinkets.

The skulls were intact with the teeth all in place. One could be placed over an ordinary head. The arm and leg bones were each some inches longer than those of the men of the present day. The field where these mounds were has been cultivated for forty years, and they are quite prominent mounds yet.

The John Rosevelt Homestead In Keeler Township, Van Buren County

By Kathryn Stanard.

(This is the eleventh story in the Norman E. Webster local history contest written under the direction of Catherine Howland, teacher of History and Science in the Decatur Public schools.)

The original farm consists of 80 acres of timber and about 300 acres of farm land on which stock and grain are raised. The principal crops are corn, Poland China higs, and alfalfa. Some wheat is usually raised, but not so much as in grandfather's day. There are sheep also and some Guernsey cows.

Ted Rosevelt is a graduate of the Agriculture department of Michigan State College at East Lansing. Like his father, he has a definite soil building program. At present he is supervisor of Keeler township as was his grandfather before him.

The following is a copy of the land grant given to Mr. Keeler by the General Land Grant Office:

ELKHORN TAVERN NOW 102 YEARS OLD

Where First Settlers Here Held 'Secession' Meeting Planning To Form New Township.

Elkhorn Tavern still standing on the T. J. Rosevelt farm in east Keeler is now Van Buren county's best preserved relic of historic stage coach days. It was built in 1836 and Stephen A. Douglas once wrote his name on its window pane with his diamond ring, and the brick mansion that John Rosevelt built with $20,000 in "greenbacks" accumulated during the Civil war, relics of stage coach days still stand in Keeler.

Lone relic of the days when as many as twenty stage coaches daily rumbled over Territorial road through Keeler township, still one of the most scenic highways in all southwestern Michigan, historic Elkhorn Tavern stands on the farm of Supervisor T. J. (Ted) Rosevelt, two and one-half miles east of Keeler village.

It is a tenant house now, its frame of hewn oak timbers standing as plumb and foursquare as when it was erected 102 years ago.

A lean-to that formed the tavern kitchen and the dining room where fatigued travelers refreshed themselves, has been moved back and is a tool shed. The old stage barn, where horses, weary after the first lap of the stage carriage run from St. Joseph, were stabled and fresh horses were harnessed for the dash to Paw Paw, is still the horse barn on the Rosevelt place. Both are built of the same heavy timbers, laboriously hewed by hand long before saw mills began eating into Keeler's virgin forests.

The spreading antlers of an elk, which hung above the tavern door as the insignia of Elkhorn Tavern, still repose in the attic of the Rosevelt home.

Many dignitaries of the period passed beneath those elkhorns to gain the hospitable shelter of the tavern. Among them was Stephen A. Douglas of Illinois, famed in American history as United States senator and presidential opponent of Abraham Lincoln.

Upon the only occasion that he is known to have been a guest there, Douglas scratched his signature upon a tavern window pane with his diamond ring. For 50 years that signature was pointed to as proof that the country's celebrities once traveled by stage coach, but years ago some vandal stole the window pane and the most prized relic of Elkhorn Tavern was lost.

The tavern was built in 1836 by Wolcott H. Keeler, who arrived in Keeler from New York on June 20, 1835. It is conceded that John and James Nesbitt, natives of Ireland, were the first white settlers in Keeler in 1834, but there is an old feud as to whether Keeler or Tobias Byers, a Pennsylvanian came next. Records in the land office at Bronson indicate that the home belonged to Byers by at least a week's margin.

Keeler bought 40 acres of land from the Nesbitts, who had just homesteaded a large tract for $5 per acre. Going to the Bronson land office he located 440 acres more at 10 shillings per acre.

In 1835 John Allen of Brush Creek, now Lawrence, took a contract for carrying the mail from Lawrence to St. Joseph and established a stage coach line. The stage road, a sandy trail, was then being opened as the Territoral road from St. Joseph to Keeler. Allen built a road from Reynolds Tavern on the east line of Lawrence township to Brush Creek, and from there to Keeler, meeting the Territorial road blazers from St. Joseph near the subsequent site of Elkhorn Tavern.

Taking advantage of the promised development in transportation, Keeler built his tavern. Lafayette township then comprised practically all of Van Buren county. Planning 'secession' and the formation of a township of their own, the early settlers of Keeler, Hartford, Lawrence, and Hamilton gathered at Keeler's place for a rump "town meetin'." At the conclusion of their deliberations they held a 'raisin'' and put up the frame for the tavern.

Their "secession" meeting bore fruit. The following year the legislature divided Lafayette into two townships and Keeler and Hamilton were set aside as Covington township.

In 1839 Covington was divided into Hamilton and Keeler townships and Hartford was taken from Lawrence and made a part of Keeler. Twenty-nine men attended the first town meeting in 1839 and 3 Hartford men, B. A. Olney, T. Conklin, and R. B. Evertes, were elected to township office. Keeler men elected to other offices were J. Hill, first supervisor, E. H. Keeler, Lyman Hill, B. F. Chadwick, W. H. Keeler and Tobias Byers.

Hartford was set aside from Keeler township in 1840, four years after Elkhorn Tavern was erected.

To Wolcott H. Keeler the tavern was the nucleus around which a village was to be built. He opened a store and plotted the present Rosevelt farm into Keelerville, which proved to be only another paper town.

A few bodies were buried in the cemetery plot he set aside, but these were moved a few years later to the present Keeler cemetery where Keeler center sprang up and proved the more popular town site.

But landlord Keeler continued to run his tavern and cater to travelers. As many as ten coaches each way a day ran over the route and guests were plentiful for his tavern was one of the most popular on the route.

In 1850 a young man, just 21, and who had come into possession of an inheritance, stepped off a stage coach to spend the night at Elkhorn Tavern. He was John Rosevelt from New York enroute to Illinois. The young man bore news from the east and he and Keeler spent the night visiting.

By that time the M. C. R. R. had been extended from Kalamazoo to Niles and stage coaches and travelers were growing fewer. Tavern trade was falling off. Young Rosevelt learned that Keeler wanted to sell and before daylight he used his inheritance to buy Elkhorn Tavern, and Keeler's 480 acres of land.

Rosevelt was not interested in Tavern keeping. He wanted a farm and began clearing the land, which was among the most fertile in the township and is still rated as one of Keeler's finest farms.

Young Rosevelt endured all the hardships of a pioneer farmer but by the time the Civil War opened, his land was largely under cultivation. Then prices began to soar. Wheat raced up to $3.50 per bushel and Rosevelt had broad wheat fields.

By the time the post war boom began to wane John Rosevelt had $20,000 in the bank and all debts paid. In 1868 he set about the building of a house for his family which was to be the finest round about. It was to be of brick and of mansion proportions.

When the house was finished his fortune of $20,000 laboriously accumulated in the green backs of that period, was gone. It is a family tradition that he never saw $20,000 in surplus funds again.

But the brick house still stands as one of the show places of Keeler and is known as one of the most hospitable homes in the countryside.

"Ted" Rosevelt, present supervisor of Keeler township is the third Rosevelt to operate the place. His father, the late Charles Rosevelt, inherited it from his father, John Rosevelt.

W. Keeler gradually drifted away from Keeler, but the township continues to bear the name of that hardy adventurer who chose a site on the then new Territorial road stage coach route and built a tavern that still stands.

On June 20, 1935, one hundred years to a day after the arrival of her grandfather, Wolcott H. Keeler, upon the site of what he platted as Keelerville, Mrs. Charles Palmer of St. Charles, Iowa, came to visit the old tavern and the Rosevelt home, a centennial commemoration of the important part her ancestors played in the founding of Keeler.

The Rosevelt family with its long list of distinguished ancestors has built and furnished a home of historic interest of which this community may well be proud.

Early Day Killing Told on Tombstone

(This is a newspaper clipping brought to the Republican by a reader. It appears to be 15 or 20 years old. We think it was written by Mrs. Rena Smith of Paw Paw. The killing was one of the sensational events in the history of Decatur. We remember Daniel Carney well. He was a powerful man, even in his later years, but Joe Pierson has become rated in succeeding decades as a man of giant strength, almost a Paul Bunyan, and of course our home town mason was no match for him. From early boyhood we knew the story of the fight, between Carney and Pierson and admired the iron nerve of our next door neighbor for his fearlessness. Daniel Carney and Harvey Taylor, masons, and Sidney Sweetland, carpenter, built the Republican office in 1900.)

PAW PAW, Aug. 4.—In the Clapp cemetery, one of the oldest in this community, situated 1 mile north of Paw Paw, is a headstone with the strange inscription, "Joseph P. Pierson, killed by Aaron Sweet February 25, 1869, aged 28 years."

Why the victim was buried in the local graveyard, no one is able to tell, as Pierson was a native of Decatur.

As the story goes, Pierson was a powerful man about the town and when under the influence of liquor there wasn't a man who could handle him.

No Man Match For Him

One evening when Dan Carney, Sr., a stone mason and a very strong man, told a group of onlookers that he could take care of Joe, the crowd left the saloon and closed the door. They kept the door shut and in a few moments Dan called for help. The next call came "Let me out, he's killing me."

The gang outside would not give in and open the door; they were bent on seeing Dan keep his bargain, so they kept the door shut. Ed. Carney, however, a brother of Dan, drew a gun and shouted, "Let him out or I'll shoot to kill." The crowd knew he meant that. They opened the door. It took several of the strongest men to conquer the man from across the Decatur swamp.

Shot By Night Watchman

The night that Pierson was shot was a bitter cold one in February. Dick Ecker was the bartender in the Downs House, in Decatur. There were the usual number of loungers in the saloon and lobby. Among them were Capt. Beebe and Edward Farmer who were waiting for the night train. They were going to Washington, D. C., to get the postoffice for Beebe.

Pierson was in a fighting mood and Ecker sent out for the night watchman, Aaron Sweet. Sweet was a little man, but went fearlessly into the barroom, where Pierson made a rush for him.

He chased Sweet around the billiard tables and finally made one leap onto a table and another onto the officer, crushing him to the floor.

As they rolled onto the floor, Sweet worked his revolver out of his pocket and brought it to Pierson's head. With waning strength he pulled the trigger.

The mighty fighter died almost instantly.

The Downs hotel, a wooden building located across from where the Decatur post office now stands flourished for many years. The Charles Brigham building has now replaced the old hotel.

In the days when Joe Pierson was in his prime, Decatur was a lively frontier town. It had no less than five hotels, as many lawyers, and 11 saloons, and men like Pierson to provide the excitement.

The story behind the strange marker which stands today quite forgotten in a Paw Paw cemetery was authenticated by Dana P. Smith, local historian, and Editor Arba Moulton of the Decatur Republican.

CARNEY, Mr. Henry M. Sr. 919 Stockbridge Ave.—

Passed away Friday morning at Bronson Hospital after a two week illness. Mr. Carney was born August 22, 1878 in Decatur, Michigan, son of Edward and Rosetta Ann Campbell Carney, moving to Kalamazoo in 1901. He was employed by the Michigan Central Railroad for 45 years and was yard master in Kalamazoo for several years, retiring in 1943. He was a life member of Anchor Lodge of S.O. No. 87 F&AM. On March 9, 1900 he was married to Amanda Grossman of Jackson. Surviving are: his wife, Amanda; 3 sons, E. Seaton Carney of Waukesha, Wis., Henry M. Carney, Jr. of Dundee, Oregon and Kenneth Carney of Kalamazoo; one daughter, Mrs. Naomi Alderman of Westwood, Los Angeles, Calif.; 4 grandchildren; one great-grandchild. Friends are being received at the Wagar & Clark Chapel where funeral services will be held Monday morning at 11 a.m., Dr. Charles Johnson and Anchor Lodge of S.O. No. 87 F&AM officiating. Interment in the family lot, Woodland Cemetery, Jackson.

CELEBRATION BEGINS TODAY

Decatur's Centennial celebration is going strong today and the village is expected to entertain many visitors during the remainder of the week. The rides and concessions are furnished by the J. C. Weer Amusement Company of South Bend.

Mr. Weer is in charge and he is ably assisted by Mrs. Weer and about a dozen capable employes. He arrived from Walkerton, 25 miles southwest of South Bend, Sunday.

The work of setting up the rides and concessions began Monday morning and furnished some excitement and diversion from the regular routine of a hot summer day in town. All of the attractions are on Main street which will be closed to traffic while the celebration is in progress.

The merry go round is at the crossing of Main and Sherwood streets, the Ferris wheel is at the Delaware street crossing and the chair-o-plane near St. Mary's street.

J. C. Weer stands high in the entertainment field. His rides are attractive and the concessions he brings are carefully selected. He refused to sponsor a chuck luck game. He has been in the business ten years and this is the only town he has worked in this year which has been a "first appearance." He has the concessions in his line at the Hartford fair this fall.

ADVERTISING THE CELEBRATION

Decatur's Centennial celebration was advertised in the surrounding towns last week Thursday afternoon. Six auto loads including the home made band started out from the Ford garage at one o'clock.

The route was from Decatur to Cassopolis, Marcellus, Lawton, Paw Paw, Lawrence, Hartford, Keeler and Decatur.

Those who drove their autos were F. G. Rafter, Elmer Woolfe, S. N. Eckenberger, Russel Calbetzor, A. R. Woolfe, Warren Mosier and Kermit Washburn.

At each town the band played and young people distributed bills. The band has been worked up for the occasion. The members have been practicing at the school house under the direction of S. N. Eckenberger for the past month and their playing is so good that many people ask why we need an outside band for band concerts.

Those who played on the advertising trip were W. T. Beek, S. N. Eckenberger, William Cooper, cornets; Warren Mosier, Kermit Washburn, Harold Cooper, trombones; Max Kinney and Oliver Shumway, altos; Margaret Schonbok, Jean McKee, flutes; Arnold Hamlin, clarinet; Howard Walbridge, bass drum; Elmer Woolfe, Joe Knoll, Marian McKee, drums.

Decatur Had Fine Display of Relics In Local Store Windows

By Elwood Scott.

Many of the antiques on display during the celery festival were not mentioned last week for lack of space, but Kenneth Lyle with numberless old family treasures had an entire window in Dyer's store filled with reminders of the past. Among them was a copper kettle which was much preferred by the old timers for making apple butter, because they felt certain the coloring and flavor would be better. In those early times stone jars and lids were used to can fruit because glass cans had not been invented. The first Mason jar has the date, November 30th, 1858. That early type crockery jar had the lids sealed with clay before sealing wax became common. Mostly dried fruits and preserves were all our ancestors had. In the Vernona Shop, Florence High had a syrup pitcher with a pewter top which first poured its sweetness in 1672, a trifling 276 years ago.

Gale had a Paisley shawl, highly prized by the ladies of a century ago, and Abrams store had a silk piece work quilt made in 1820. Newell's had a jar of flat candies with mottoes on them which were popular until sixty-five years ago. Beek's window had a full set of white china doll dishes which little girls "played house" with seventy-five years and longer ago. John Smith loaned a wicker doll cab which never had any metal for the wheels, and was modern a long time ago. He also had a glass kerosene can with outer tin casing, patented in 1831, and many people still living carried their lamp oil in just such containers before anyone had seen an electric light.

Lowell Mattox had an exact copy of the famous Bowie knife, the original of which sold in pioneer days at $100. These knives had a cutting edge probably never equalled in world history. The inventor died while trying to tell a friend how they were made.

Ted Rosevelt had two hand-forged wolf traps which were brought to Michigan by his grandfather in 1835, and no telling how old they were then.

Also there were two husking pegs from the times when all corn was shucked by hand, and without gloves, but on cold mornings it was no job for a sissy. One of these pins was made of deer horn and the other of bone, with carved ornamentation. To tell their age is pure guesswork.

Hugh Cory had a Seth Thomas clock that probably started to tick before your grandfather was born. He also had a cast iron toy railway engine with free running wheels. Not so old, but it first delighted boys about sixty-five years ago. Mrs. Murl Abrams furnished a heavy crockery-faced washboard that was bought when Lincoln was elected president. Bert Kidman had a plow from the early nineties that by a clever arrangement always threw the furrow down hill.

Charles Abrams, of Corwin, brought in a dinner bell that was cast right here in Decatur in 1876.

Rusty Calbetzor had a typewriter that did not have separate letters on flying arms, but wrote with a revolving cylinder, an inch and a half across, with the letters and figures on it. John Rice had a pair of wooden top skates with the runners curling high over the toes, Klein's patent, 1856; Herschel Morris had another pair, imported from Holland, with extremely long thin runners, which must have been purchased when rail fences were the only kind known in the rural sections.

Nev. Everett had a land grant signed April 1st, 1831, by Andrew Jackson; there was another signed the same day, but we have forgotten the name of the owner. Newell's had an old flat oilstone in a dugout wooden case with carved date, 1781. The American Express company sent a miniature stage coach, complete with old time trunks and chests, with driver and armed guard, and drawn by four horses. It was a reminder of the times when railroads were few, or had not reached many parts of the country. Decatur was highly honored by the New York Central by the arrival of a train composed of a modern freight car, a new auto carrier, the latest type passenger car, and a monstrous and most up-to-date Diesel engine.

Just to remind you that times and customs have changed, Hazel Kelsey loaned a tinder box with the flint and steel. The latter was probably a piece of an old hand-made file, and the flint was a spearhead, the prized possession of some Indian brave of the far distant past. In the early days of this country people kept fires constantly, though often deeply banked in ashes, as fires had to be lit with flints. The alternative was to go to a neighbor and borrow live coals. Brimstone matches had been known a long time, but each match stick had to be whittled separately, and dipped the same way. In 1842 a machine was invented which did this work, but matches were far from common a long time after that. The old time smokers prided themselves on their ability to pick up coals with their fingers to light their pipes. Papers were made into tight little rolls and crimped over at the large end, to be used as a lamp lighter. Often they were used several times; no good housewife would use more than two or three matches a day.

For a long time in the country's history all cooking and heating of homes was done by fireplaces; often doors were built in on both sides of the huge fireplace and a horse, or ox, dragged in the heavy backlog. All the houses were built of logs with the chimney laid up with stones set in clay, for there was no lime for making mortar.

It is difficult to realize the vast changes that have taken place since some of those relics we saw last week were made. Indeed, some of those articles formed by the white race were used long before there was even a cross-country oxcart road in Michigan. Those old wagon trails paid no heed to section lines, or directions. They merely wound through the limitless expanse of trees, avoiding the hills, lakes, creeks and ponds; some of those old shallow lake beds are plowed fields today.. Several attempts at making stoves proved unsuccessful. The first ones were merely round-bottomed kettles with a movable cover. Benjamin Franklin invented one in 1744, but it was 1850 before heaters made much improvement. Much of the food of those bygone days was soup, or stews. Meat was roasted on a turning rod of iron, then called a "spit."

Hay was cut with a scythe, small grain with a cradle, both being raked with a wooden toothed hand rake. Also both were handled with wooden pitchforks. Charlie Killitts showed one in Gale's window. Machine reapers did not amount to much until 1855; these cut the grain and dumped it in bundles to be tied by hand. Wire binders came out in 1870, but pieces of wire in the threshed grain often ruined the mill stones. The Appleby knotter for using twine came in 1859, but those binders had little common use until the 80's.

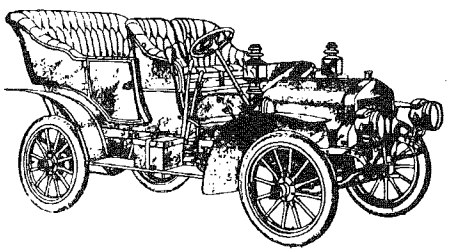
Plows have been used for four thousand years, but they were only forked trees which stirred the ground and did not throw a furrow. Our American forefathers added strips of steel, or iron to the points; along about 1800 the wooden moldboard made its appearance, and later this was covered with sheet iron.

The founder of the Oliver Plow Works, and John Deere have both been credited with producing the forerunner of the modern plow.

Most homes had only rough handmade stools and benches,,and in those days tomatoes were considered poisonous, and were grown for their beauty, as "love apples." Axes cut most of the fuel for the fireplaces, as the early crosscut saws were backbreakers, and few knew how to file, or adjust them. Three cords per day was big production. The Tuttle toothed saw, invented right here in Van Buren county, differs little from the saws of today, and was considered a revelation; men drove miles to see the new implement that could cut seven cords per day much easier than the old type could cut three.

In Weaver's window was a very long barreled gun which was proudly carried in the Revolutionary war as a primitive flintlock. Later it was converted into a percussion cap rifle, and no doubt used for many years. What strange tales it could tell if it possessed memory and speech.

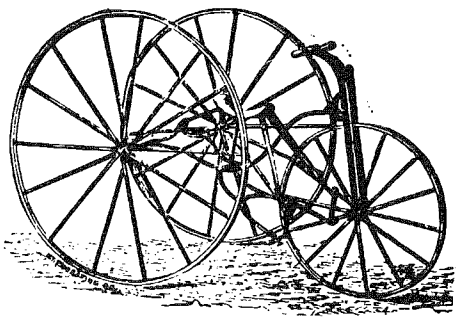
The old days of hardship are gone, and we should be thankful for the comforts and luxuries of today, which in the olden times were unknown.



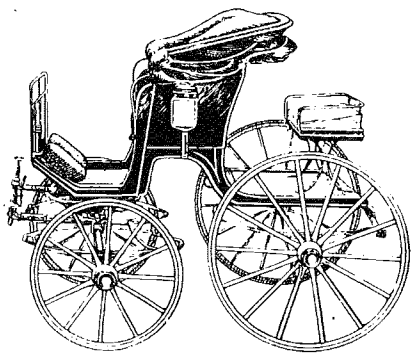
Antiques on Display

Decatur's Centennial week has passed and the store windows were filled with treasures from grandfather's day and older times. These precious heirlooms opened the floodgates of memory, and brought back scenes of long ago, and not a few sighs of regret.

What window had the finest relics? What bit of antiquity was dearest to your eyes? No one can answer that but you, your own heart must make that choice. What object should be the most revered, what was the oldest made by human hands? There was a half inch thick piece of copper in Glenn Weaver's window that may have been brought here by glacial action; yet it might have been fashioned by the clever hands of some ancient craftsman, or was it the work of that mysterious Power that we call God? . There were hundreds of arrowheads ranging from poor materials and poorer workmanship up to rich volcanic glass, or black flint, the exquisite creations of true artists. Judging from the many types of stone age implements, many waves or different tribes of Indians must have surged through Michigan when the magnificent, unbroken forest had only the beaten trails of wild animals skirting its lakes and rivers. There was a little hardened copper knife with a tiny hole drilled in the handle end, and forged by the Mound Builders; the groping mind of men had made an important discovery in first learning to use metal.



There was a heavy round stone the squaws used to roll back and forth in a hollow log to crush corn and acorns into meal; but the White Man came with the steel axe, and other marvellous inventions: There was an old heavy up and down saw run by the waters of the creek had converted the logs into splendid boards; strong arms hewed other logs into beams with broadaxes; the frow was invented to split three foot whitewood, or white ash logs into "shakes," or shingles, as they were called later. And there was a contraption with the handle like a plane, with a knife in it that was used to cut thin boards into lath, all by hand;; now houses were plastered, and man was improving.



Not unimportant were the guns which protected the pioneer from the attacks of savages, and provided deer and bear meat for his table; what a sight these were for the old timer to view.

Prominent in the scene were the carders that readied the wool for the spinning wheel that spun the yarn to make the clothing when buckskin was not used.

The little reading that was done by the first generation of pioneers was often from the Bible, and before our eyes were the various patterns of candlesticks that once held the tallow dips, or the candles often cast in tin molds, two dozen at a time. In Oscar Newell's window was an extremely old primitive kerosene lantern, probably one of the first of its kind; no doubt it was the pride and joy of someone in the days that are gone. In other windows were old oil lamps that once were proudly set in the center of the table when important company arrived for the evening.

Beautiful old dishes suggested feasts of roast pig, venison, or wild turkey, topped off with a big piece of pie made from wild blackberries. Also there were old jugs of strange shapes that came from "York State" with the first settlers, and it is one guess that they once held the old timer's favorite snakebite remedy. Just to name the numerous utensils and implements would require several pages, but they bring back the recollections of days when fourteen hours of hard, steady work was called for each day, and luxury was unknown. The founders of the country would have starved to death if they had tried the eight hour day and the five day week.

But those old hardy ones who hewed their homes from the tough, resisting forest loved grace and beauty, even as they toiled the back aching, heart breaking hours. Every tool they had, metal or wood, had to be made by hand, but in the spare time of winter days they turned out many choice pieces of craftsmanship.

Needlework from the days long before the sewing machine was invented made the eyes stare in wonderment; long dresses for the babies, lace caps for the grandmothers, bed spreads, and baby shoes worn by feet that have long since traveled back to the dust. There were fancy gowns worn by the belles before the Civil War, and several wedding dresses worn by great women who raised large families of true Americans and toiled incessantly with primitive household furnishings. Three legged iron skillets and kettles for the flagstone fireplace hearth, tall tin, or stone dash churns, a crockery washboard, bought when Lincoln was elected president.

The styles of clothing worn by those old cabin ladies cause us to smile today, but much of our modern stuff will seem ridiculous and outlandish a hundred years from now.

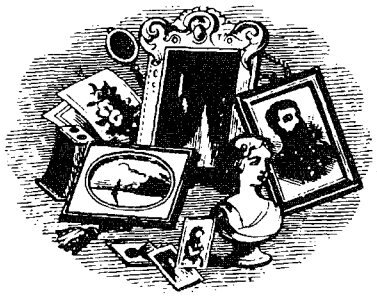
J. G. Hirst loaned two curly black walnut boards about three feet wide that would have been prizes from the first day of Michigan's first sawmill. The windows were filled with rare old books: arithmetics and readers studied by our great, great grandfathers; religious books and bibles, some of which bore dates of more than three hundred years ago.

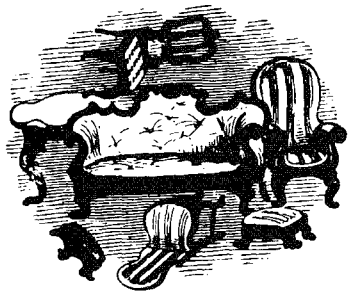
Outstanding in the toy line were two rag dolls made by loving hands about 1855. One with huckleberry pattern cloth was the original dress, the other was perhaps thirty years younger; representing the modes of that day, these feminine playthings wore white pantalettes, the new look of ninety-odd years ago; there were from the Broks Photo Studio in Dowagiac.

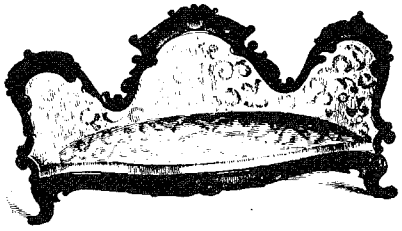
Fox's store had a complete ox yoke, ox split shoes, and a pair of brass trimmed ox horns, each with nearly a four foot and a half span. And Gale had a two wheeled outfit pushed by hand to pick up the grain after it was cradled so it could be bound by hand. Kaplen had a lot of stuff like the old fashioned groceries.

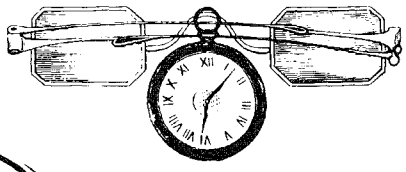
Earl Copley had a lot of old account books, photos, and other old historic papers reaching back into Decatur's youngest days.

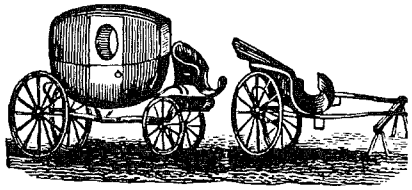
Many fine interesting objects have not been mentioned for lack of room, but we should all be grateful to the merchants who gave so generously of their window space.

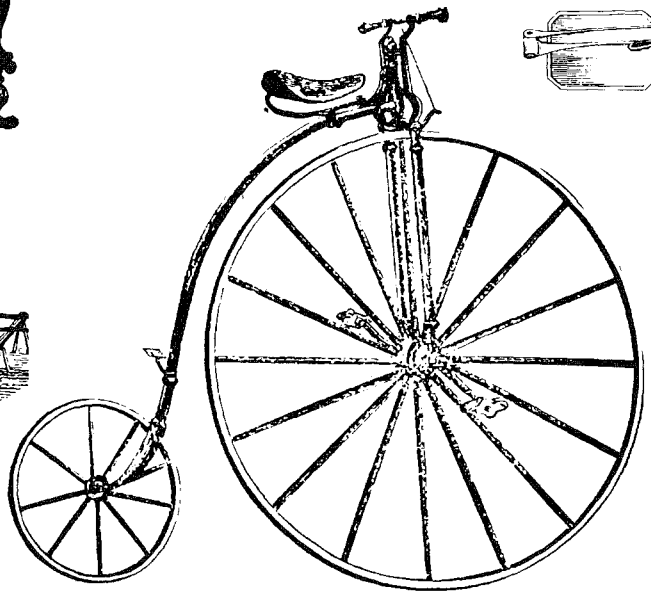


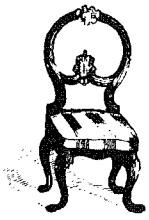


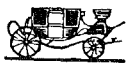












Christianity and Civilization Among the Potawatami of Indiana and Michigan

Excerpts taken from Father Baroux's letters to his supervisor concerning the history of the Potawatami in Silver Creek, north of Dowagiac. The introduction was written by Rt. Rev. E. D. Kelly of Detroit.

Written in 1913.

(Entered by Donald Moline and Marvin Peterson under the direction of Catherine Howland, teacher of history and science, as a continuation of the 14th story in the Norman E. Webster local history contest.)

Father Baroux began missionary work in America in 1848.

My dear Superior:

Since receiving your letter about two years ago, I have frequently reproached myself for my silence. I have keenly desired on the one hand to satisfy your wishes by writing the history of the tribe of the Potawatami confided to my charge here in Michigan, but on the other hand it is distasteful to me to thus come out of my sweet retirement and exploit myself in the broad light of publicity.

I believe, however, that duty on my part impels me to accede to your wishes and entrust to you the history of these poor savages. I must be mindful that in giving you this pleasure I am not releasing myself from a debt of gratitude.

You, even you, have evangelized these dear children of the forest during my absence preaching to other people in the tropical East Indies; you have consoled them; you have visited them and your appearance in the midst of them was an unspeakable good fortune which they will never forget. Through the inscrutable designs of Providence I was destined after long suffering to return to Asia, to pass one year in France recuperating my strength, and finally to return to this mission which my enforced absence had made more dear to me.

And you, Monsieur le Superior, after having labored with such zeal in this so interesting Michigan mission, have left us but only to labor in a similar cause, the preparation of other missionaries in the American College of Louvain. If you are now far away from the center of your 1st Apostolic labors your offections continually recall you here, and I appreciate the desires of your heart demanding fresh sacrifices in the interest of a country so dear.

During your very short sojourn in America, it was easy for you, Monsieur le Superior, to understand and perceive at a glance the needs of our missions in Michigan. You are now able to see what an extensive and fruitful field expands itself before the zeal of the missionary who desires to consecrate his entire existence to the glory of God. With me, during two years, you have visited my dear people of Silver Creek and Nakanek-Kenbess. The piety of the Potawatami has touched you; their lively faith has made impressions upon you as I can see by your letter. It is necessary to understand the history of their persecutions, to see face to face, the victims of the white man's double dealing, to consider well their patience and their saintly resignation, in order to comprehend the sublimity and nobility of these newly made Christian souls.

To accomplish properly the task you demand from me, time and reflection are necessary. Long drives and various occupations distract me in doing a work so long expected by you.

It is more than six years since I first came among the Potawatami . I was young then. I arrived in America with impressions more or less erroneous concerning the Indians whom we call the Red Skins. When I came face to face with these children of the forest I experienced an indefinable sensation and one which cannot be expressed in any sort of language. When we left Europe we had strange ideas of savages! Our imagination represented them as barbarious. I often laugh at the simplicity of those who in 1848 believed in my country that my Indians had devoured me. To a great many people in Europe Indian or Savage is always synonymous with Man Eater. Indeed there are not in Michigan savages who would devour one, but there are nevertheless, in America 300,000 Indians or more, who are plunged in the darkness of infidelity. The very interesting letters of Father de Smet are full of knowledge on the conditions of these Indians. A great number of their tribes cultivate a dislike towards one another, they pursue one another with unrelenting hate; they are continually at war and threaten mutual destruction. We find a reason for these wars of extermination in the disparity of the tribes, and the vast solitudes of the forests formerly traversed by them.

They say in France that in 100 years this race of people will entirely disappear. That is not my way of thinking. The teachings of the Gospel will give them a new viewpoint and perspective and introduce them to civilization, and the race will perpetuate itself in the oncoming cycles. We have Christianized Indians whom we do not see decaying and race-suiciding any more than the European colonies transplanted to these far off shores. Superficial and unfounded opinions which the world conceives as incontestible truths only prove that the Europeans have a very limited knowledge of America.

One serious thought often gives me pain: it is to understand or comprehend the future of these American states where civilization has penetrated, and where we have 300,000 pagan savages in immense as well as distant solitudes. We have an abundant harvest but the Gospel workers are very few in numbers and the spiritual wants of the civilized states are so great that they cannot be fulfilled. Hence some few missionaries must take the initiative in the conversion and direction of these Indians in their remote and almost inaccessible districts.

I have been much disturbed by reading a book which was brought back from Washington by Simon Pokagon, one of my Indians. It is a complete exposure of the efforts of American officials to propagate error among these savages. These proselyters show a zeal worthy of a better cause, while we Christians, doing little or nothing, look on as the work of Satan progresses.

Four years ago, as you remember, this part of Michigan which you have seen was a deep wilderness. You have traveled through these virgin forests for a whole week without finding any trace of civiliaztion. The savages were the lords of the country. They then possessed all the vast territory in the South of Michigan and in the North of Indiana.

White men coming from the old world desired a still greater expansion of territory here. Their inordinate ambition could not be content with the possession of more than 300 miles of country and so the poor Indian had to submit to the law of greater force. Might is right where no other principle is recognized; it was the survival of the fittest, at the expense of all justice. The Indian was compelled to sell, or have his land taken away from him by a presumed title which meant spoliation. Insignificant amounts were offered, promises made, treaties signed, but the whole transaction for the most part resembled rather a comedy than a serious act and the poor savage was finally forced to give up his forests, and to roam over the immense tracts of the West. If this forced exile had been planned with dignity, he would be fortunate, but the white man from the old world adds cruelty to spoliation by making an insolent and cruel soldiery accompany these unfortunate victims into their place of exile and to treat them with indignity. It does not astonish us today if the U. S. is receiving a fitting chastisement for these injustices.

They say it is better to see civilization prevail, and the forests cultivated than to permit the Indian to be master of the forests and to lead the life of a useless vagabond. I am perfectly of this opinion, but first of all make the savage appreciate our civilization. It is not robbing him with indignity and chastising him with cruelty that he will appreciate us. The savage has in his conscience an idea of justice and rights, of falsehood and of truth. We have taught him the vices of civilization and instructed him by our actions to despise us.

Of late, in Minnesota, the Sioux would perhaps not have committed such cruelties if they had not previously been the victims of revolting injustices. When I think of the conduct of the Europeans in regard to these people, I blush at our haughty pretentions.

We believe ourselves called to convert them; our American agents during their visits take the liberty of preaching to them, wishing to make them appreciate our civilization, and in all their preaching there is one moral only on their lips. These agents are accompanied and followed by a large number of merchants and adventurers who sell their goods, often of a questionable quality, to say nothing more, at fabulous prices. Here is one instance among many others which shows the profit made by one of these merchants, whom I knew in Indiana. In his jewelry shop he had some needles which greatly aroused the curiosity of the savages. For the first time in their lives these childish people saw a great many attractive objects. They came to sell a portion of their land and to receive a certain sum of money; just like children who wish to possess and to buy everything they see, they pressed forward to make their purchases. The crafty merchant knows their weakness, he knows that the savage wishes to have the object of his curiosity at whatever price it be; then he asks an exorbitant price; each needle is sold for a dollar, that is to say a little more than five francs. Some of the Indians, however, are amazed; they cannot understand how so small an object can be sold at such a high price; but the clever knave is not disconcerted; he replies that the maker of needles is dead and that these are the last there are in the world; then all wish to procure some of them and the shop is soon exhausted. This is a sample of the thousand clever tricks resorted to by a great number of such adventurers, all of whom have made great fortunes. But Divine justice sooner or later takes its course and ruin is inevitable as I have often seen in this country. Brandy is sold largely under these circumstances and the usual consequences are always disputes, blows and sometimes murders.

My Potawatami were also obliged to suffer the same as the other Red Skins; they had to see their lands taken away and themselves driven to the Western Plains.

In 1827 an agent sent by the government of Washington made the savages the first propositions. They were at that time divided into five tribes each having its particular chief. All the first propositions were rejected as the savages were wise enough not to be deceived by words and false promises. The agent seeing his efforts useless had recourse to another expedient which reminds one of the history of the foundation of Carthage from the first book of the Aeneid of Virgil, verse 366:

Moenia surgentemque novae Carthaginis Arcem,
Mercatique solum, facti de nomine Brysam
Taurino quantum possent circumdare tergo.

He made a fine proposition to the savages. He promised them $200, that is to say a little more than 1000 francs, for a small space just large enough to be covered by a buffalo hide. Not suspecting any trick, these poor Indians consented willingly to the sale of this small space on such favorable conditions. The agreements were stipulated and signed on both sides and the agent prepared to take possession of his property.

The Red Skins could not understand the folly of the agent. They were not able to explain how a pale face, considered so clever, could pay a sum so enormous for a few feet of ground. They laughed at his simplicity to be so duped. Our sharp Yankee (American) laughed quietly to himself and prepared to play his trick. He cut the buffalo skin with care to reduce it to a fine thread of prodigious length; then with the aid of his accomplice he extended it in a way to make a circle of considerable size. The savages thoroughly dumfounded were not able to recover from their surprise. In vain they wished to protest. The agent set his stakes, he was now the owner of the land. "What does he intend to do," said the savages among themselves. What use can he make of a little land lost in the woods? It was not any mystery for our Yankee. He alone knew his plan of attack. Gold and silver could not win the savages but he resolved to try another means. He arranged to build a house on the new property and become a landlord or rather an inn-keeper. He distributed whiskey or brandy in profusion and very soon his aim was accomplished.

Four of these savages fell into the trap set for them. They became intoxicated frequently and their will power weakened. Pokagon, one of the five Chiefs, had enough strength and courage in his character to despise these means of corruption. The agent seeing him immovable obtained a kind of badge for him from the president at Washington, but this did not succeed either. Our agent tries again with the four chiefs. He lavished brandy on them and these men under the permicious influence of whiskey were very willing to sell a certain portion of their land. Pokagon was indignant at the weakness of his compatriots and his repeated efforts became powerless against the perfidious snares of our American. A longer resistance was useless. He was obliged to submit to sign that infamous treaty, of July 27, 1827, but he imposed one condition, that he be left in the country with the tribe which he governed. The agent did not wish to consent to this restriction but he could not conquer the obstinacy of Pokagon, and finally submitted to his wishes.

The first treaty was only a prelude to many others. They overcame the first difficulties. The government was patient and prepared the way for a treaty of much greater importance. The savages could not withstand the force of concessions. A larger tract of land was demanded; recourse was had to the same means. Brandy was poured out with profusion and the same results obtained. The second treaty was signed at Chicago the 26th and 27th of September, 1833.

Pokagon in spite of certain conditions in the treaties of 1827 and 1833 found himself the target of persecutions from the Government agents. He had reserved the right to remain in the country with his tribe but they wished to intimidate him and came upon him several times with an armed force to drive him West. The Government often regretted having made any concession to the chief and so had recourse to corruption. They offered $20, that is to say, 250 francs, to every person who would succeed by persuasion, fear or any species of fraud, in making an Indian join the Potawatami in Missouri. Twice with my own eyes have I seen well dressed men attempting to obtain this prize, by making themselves, in the language of the savages, merchants of human flesh; but all their efforts and threats failed before the innate love of the Indian for the forest in which he was born.

In the space of five months they had lost four chiefs and their tribe had been driven away. Pokagon saw himself isolated in a lonesome forest, and the remembrance of calamities which had come upon him and his people overwhelmed him. He sees far away for more than a dozen leagues on every side the land which he had sold, tilled and inhabited by people whose homes augment his vexation. The chief could not be comforted in the presence of such reverses; his life had become miserable; he ardently desired to depart from this world of corruption and iniquity so that he might see the Great Spirit whom he had loved and served so faithfully ever since he had known Him. His desires were soon gratified as God called him from this earth on July 8th, 1842, at the age of 62 years. So ended the life of a noble red man.

Note:—Father Baroux whose correspondence is translated above was born at St. Michel, France, March 25, 1817. August 13th, 1845, he became a novice at Notre Dame and made his profession in the Holy Cross order, March 17th, 1848. He died September 14th, 1897.

By proximity Notre Dame put him in touch with the Indian missions at Bertrand, Pokagon and Silver Creek. He organized the Indian mission at Rush Lake and Saugatuck and procured money from the Society of the Propagation of the Faith for the Churches in these two places.

AN OLD SONG

My name is William Halloday
As you may understand
I was born and brought up in Waterford,
In Erin's happy land.

I, being young and in my prime
And beauty on me shone
My parents doted on me
I, being their only son.

My father bound me to a trade,
In Waterford's fair town
He bound me to a cooper
By the name of William Brown.

I served my master faithfully
For eighteen months or more,
Till I shipped on board the Ocean Queen
Bound for Belfrasier shore.

And when we reached Belfrazier shore
I met with Captain Moore
Being captain of the Flying Cloud
Going out from Baltimore.

He asked me if I'd sail with him,
On a cruising voyage to go,
To the burning shores of Africa
Where the coffee seeds do grow.

Now the Flying Cloud was a skipper barge,
Five hundred ton or more,
She could easily sail by any ship
Going out from Baltimore.

Her sails were like the driven snow,
And on them were no specks,
She had twelve twenty-four pound cannon guns,
She carried on her decks.

'Twas after six weeks sailing
We reached the African shore,
Five hundred of the natives from
Their native home we bore.

We made them walk our plank, my boys,
And stowed them in below
Scarce eighteen inches to a man
Was all they had to go.

'Twas after three weeks sailing
We reached the Peruvian shore
We sold them to the planters there,
To be slaves forever more.

All for to hoe the rice and corn,
Beneath the burning sun:
To lead a tired and wretched life,
Till their careers were done.

At last our money all being gone,
We started out again;
When Captain Moore he came on deck,
And said to us, his men:

"There is a fortune to be had
For all who will remain,
We'll hoist aloft a pirate flag,
And scour the coast of Spain.

We all agreed but five young men,
Who wished to go on shore,
Oh, two of them were Boston lads,
And two from Baltimore.

The other was an Irishman,
Who had just come from Tymore,
How I wish I'd joined those five brave boys
And went with them on shore!

Oh many a ship we plundered,
Down on the Spanish main,
And many a widow and orphan left,
In sorrow to remain.

We made them walk our plank, my boys,
Gave them a watery grave,
For a saying of our Captain was,
That a dead man tells no tales.

'Twas early one morning,
When a gunboat hove in view,
She fired a shot across our deck,
The signal to give to.

But we gave to her no answer as
She flew before the wind,
When a chain shot struck our mizzen mast—
We soon did fall behind.

Our decks being cleared and ready,
As she sailed up 'long side;
And soon across our quarter deck,
There ran a crimson tide.

We fought till Captain Moore was killed,
And eighty of his men;
When a bomb shell set our ship on fire,
We were forced to surrender then.

And next we were brought before New Gates,
Bound down in irons strong,
To answer for the murdering and plundering,
Down on the Spanish main.

'Twas whiskey and bad company,
That made a wreck of me,
Beware then boys of my sad fate,
And shun bad company.

No more I'll see the hills and dales,
Or the girl I love so well;
And music, sweet music
Will reach my ears no more.

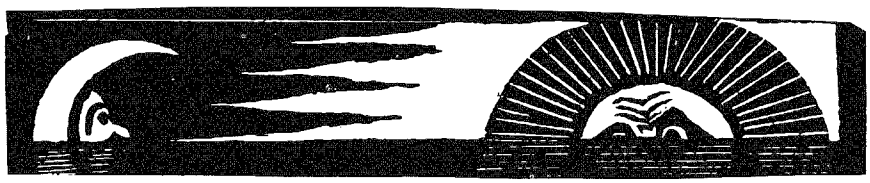
No more I'll kiss those ruby lips,
Or press that silk smooth hand,
For I will meet my fate,
Way down in a foreign land.

This old song we learned over fifty years ago. My brother, Fred, and I recalled it as we sat in front of the fireplace a few evenings ago. An open fire seems conducive for memory, and together we completed this long song. It may be too long for the space allotted me. However if it finds a place in the Republican I would be glad to know if any who read the paper are familiar with it. It has a real Burl Ives tune.

—Nellie Truesdell.

Jim—"When you asked the wallflower to dance, did she accept quickly?"

Jack—"I'll say she did. She was on my feet in an instant."



EAST DECATUR REMINISCENCES

Following up the East Decatur reminiscences Miss Nellie Howland of Jackson has written the following letter to Mrs. Florence High:

March 30, 1947.

Dear Florence,—

This isn't for the record exactly, but wish you would ask Ira Roberts if he remembers a Mr. and Mrs. Walter Hatch who, strange to say, lived in Grace's (Mrs. Roy Hinkley) house for a time. There were two children, Mable and Walter. They were younger than us. I thought they may have lived there during the years Grace spoke of.

Mrs. Hatch's maiden name was Sarah Doolittle and I think she was related to the Kirtlands.

Several years ago when in Decatur I went out to Grace's to see her mother, Mrs. Orris Roberts, and they showed me the napkin ring the East Decatur school children gave her. As Grace said it is beautiful. One could hardly realize it could retain so much beauty and lustre after so many years. We hear so much of the international silver on the radio I think it must be of that make.

Ira Roberts' sister's husband and family (the Ed. McAdams family) were our nearest neighbors for some years and always our closest friends.

March 24, Old Man Winter put in his hardest work here. We had some storms that were bad enough, but nothing like that. Not a wheel turned in Jackson from midnight Monday until Wednesday p. m. No mail, busses or transportation of any kind. Jackson seemed like the city of the dead. Things are just getting back in motion, and I hope winter is over for this season.

Your friend,
N. M. Howland.

The Hatch family could not have lived in East Decatur very long. Ira Roberts remembers the name but not well enough to say anything about them. He also remembers the Doolittles and they are associated in his mind with the Durkees and the Kirtlands. Perhaps others can tell more about these families.

Edgar Bergen Tells His Story

Joseph Kaye Put It On Paper and It Appears in the December Issue of True Story Magazine.

We were not long in learning of Bergen's life story as published in True Story magazine. One copy was loaned to the office and another purchased. It is on sale at the news stand, if there are any left. Several were impressed with the fact that he passed up Decatur, where he lived 11 years of his boyhood, without comment. His only mention of it being this line: "My father was in the dairy business in Chicago and previously had a farm in Decatur, Michigan." This might have been due to the fact that the writer did not know much about his young life here and failed to ask Edgar about it. Bergen surely has been good to Decatur and his visit here at our Centennial celebration in September gave the village national prominence.

The magazine story covers his entire life to date. The following are the opening paragraphs:

I always enjoy the chance to speak about myself and my family, for it's got to the point where I have to convince myself that I can stand on my own feet without Charlie's help. Sometimes I think I'm playing dummy to Charlie McCarthy. Once I introduced him to Eleanor Roosevelt—jokingly, I thought—and instinctively she held out her hand to shake his.

Some scholarly gentlemen have undertaken studies about me and Charlie; they think I'm growing jealous of him. And I do believe they're right. I know I try to branch off into all sorts of activities and enterprises just to make people understand that I'm a person in my own right, not just Charlie's stooge.

I try to be an actor without dummies—I was the undertaker in "I Remember Mama," I raise alfalfa, honey, dates, as a business—not good business so far. I've even dabbled in gold mining. And just to whittle away Charlie's importance, I've created competition for him in the personalities of Mortimer Snerd and Effie Klinker. But Charlie's a hardy gent and he keeps dominating me.

So it's a pleasure to talk about myself and Frances, my wife, and our little daughter, Candice Patricia. Of course, it's impossible to cut Charlie out altogether, but I'll keep him down to the little shaver he ought to be.

It seems to be the general impression that I am Swedish, but only my parents are from Sweden. I was born in Chicago. My full and unsimplified name is Edgar John Berggren. My father was in the dairy business in Chicago and previously had a farm in Decatur, Michigan.

So far as I know, no Berggrens had any yen for the stage. I got into show business by the simple method of dividing my school work with reading about magic. In my boyhood, books and pamphlets about "How You Can Be Popular Through Magic Tricks" were standard equipment with the youth of the country, and most of these volumes had a chapter on how to be a ventriloquist.

When I was about eleven, I tried to "throw" my voice according to instructions. One day Mother went to the door to answer a voice on the other side, and when she opened the door no one was there. It was then I knew that I, too, could be a ventriloquist, for the voice in the hall had come from me.

I went through grammar and high school a fairly diligent student, but I practiced the art of magic with equal care, and with special attention to "voice throwing," as it was mistakenly called. (Ventriloquism is a method of speaking with the mouth closed so that the voice seems to come from some distance.) I did indeed become somewhat popular at parties and dances through my new skill, and so I was launched on my future life work.

When I was sixteen I decided to design a dummy of my own, instead of working with a ready-made product. I knew a redheaded newsboy in Chicago who was pretty fresh in his general outlook on life, and one day in school, while the teacher wasn't looking, I sketched out Charlie McCarthy on my exercise book, making him as closely kin to the newsboy as I could.

I took the drawing to a man named Charles Mack who did wood-carving jobs in addition to his regular work as barkeeper. I told Mack I would call the dummy after him, hoping this honor would influence him to forego his fee. Mack said it would be a real pleasure to carve a namesake, but carefully specified the job would cost me thirty-five dollars, a fairly large sum to me then.

I got the money together and Charlie emerged out of a block of pine. Despite my disappointment in Mack, the name "Charlie McCarthy" seemed to fit, so I let it stand. Charlie at that time was not the suave man-about-town he is today, but a young roughneck (which he still is at heart).

With the new dummy I did better in my amateur performances. But as I grew older, I began to have some vague dreams about a dignified profession, and thought doctoring would give me a chance to be a credit to my family and community.

After I graduated from high school, I entered Northwestern University with the intention of laboring through a premedical course. My parents could not afford to spend much money on me, so Charlie and my magic tricks came in handy. Through them I was able to help out on my college financing.

I managed to graduate from the university with a degree, but by that time I was hopelessly involved in ventriloquism. I shelved the degree and set out to make a living through Charlie.

Old Time Parties

By Capitola Fassett

(Inspired by reports of the ready response of so many friends and acquaintances of Mr. and Mrs. George Goodrich of Hamilton when called to a wedding anniversary of this worthy couple. It was a regret not to be able to be there.)

Nothing like an old-time party
To keep us hale and hearty,
And take us back to days when we were young;
To awaken loving memories—
Recognizing old acquaintance,
And remind us of the songs we've left unsung.

'Tis refreshing to remember a long ago December
When young folks could enjoy a household dance;
With a sense of the protection akin to real affection,
Which the homefolks, by their manner, would advance.

So where we're hale and hearty
And our kinfolks give a party,
Although we may be old and rather prim;
While we may have long been single
Our feet commence to tingle,
Responsive to a vibrant violin.

So let us cherish ever,
(Though they be repeated never)
The happenings that to us were so
dear,
As like moonbeams, memories gather
In fair or stormy weather,
And tide us o'er the dark days of the year.

Though sometimes the world seems hollow,
We can strive His steps to follow,
Whether gaiety or sadness rules the day;
And know The Spirit ever
Comprehends our least endeavor,
And holds a blessing ready all the way.

"And now, among the fading embers, these in the main are my regrets: when I am right, no one remembers; when I am wrong, no one forgets."

JIM'S STORY ON G. A. R.

Fort Worth 6, Texas,
February 18, 1948.

Dear friend:

In response to your request as to the part John A. Logan took in the organization of the G. A. R., I will state that he took a very prominent part, but as the first notable work of the G. A. R. was the establishment and observing of Memorial day it is best first to consider the origin of this day of honoring the memory of those who fought and sacrificed to preserve the Union.

During the war many women of the South sought relief for their saddened spirits by strewing flowers upon the graves of their sons, husbands and fathers. Defeat increased this practice which soon became customary. Northern troops of occupation moving South in April and May of 1865, observed that confederate graves were being decorated in almost every community. This decoration commended itself to the Union troops and they thought it fitting that the lonely graves of Federal soldiers buried in the South should be remembered. So unorganized bodies of Unionists, frequently single individuals, joined in decorating the graves of those who had shed their blood to save the Union. The most noteworthy of these decorations, which attracted nation wide attention and which introduced the idea of Memorial day to the North took place in Charleston, S. C., May 30, 1865. James Redpath, accompanied by a large number of Negro school children went to a drear spot in the outskirts of the city where reposed the remains of several hundred Union soldiers in four long trenches. The rude mounds were quickly and quietly covered with flowers strewn by black hands who thus sought to honor the dead that had released them from slavery.

The practice of decorating the graves of the soldier dead spread rapidly to the North and the G. A. R. eagerly sponsored the practice and accordingly May 5, 1868, the Commander-in-Chief of the G. A. R. John A. Logan issued a general order designating the 30th of May as a national Memorial Day 'for the purpose of strewing with flowers the graves of comrades who died in defense of their country during the late war of the rebellion and whose bodies lie in almost every city, village and hamlet churchyard in the land.'

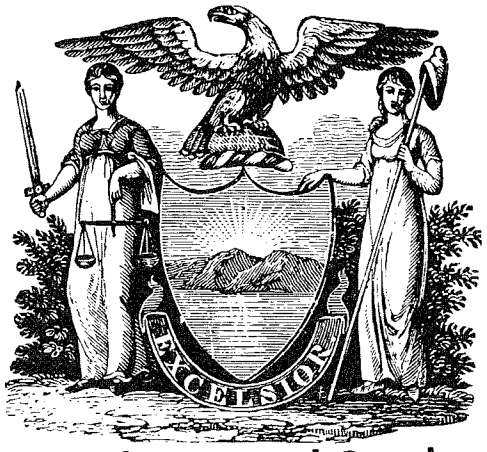
As the G. A. R. perfected its organization it fostered the observance of Memorial Day until it became soon a national holiday in every Northern state. John A. Logan took a very prominent part in promoting the expansion of the G. A. R. and as he was a gifted orator and a shrewd politician his efforts resulted in a very rapid growth of the organization. His earlier speeches had saved southern Illinois for the Union. It may be of interest to some to know that John A. Logan and Robert G. Ingersol were both admitted to the bar in Marion, Ill., and both were colonels in the Federal army.

I was much interested in your brother Will's baseball article. I, too, am an ardent fan. We have had good teams in Fort Worth in the past but as you should have learned from my former articles that the Brooklyn Dodgers own the Fort Worth club and as they have taken the cream of the club—what the draft didn't get—we don't know what we will have this year. We will miss the most our valuable catcher, Andy Anders, who goes to Cincinnati this year. You baseball bugs watch his work this year. He was our only catcher who could handle the knuckle-ball offerings of Willard Ramsdell who will wear a Brookly Dodger uniform this year. The Pittsburgh Pirates paid $50,000 for Monty Basgall who was Fort Worth's capable second baseman last season. Several other of the Fort Worth Cats have been drafted or sold but President Rickey of the Dodgers has promised Fort Worth a young and fast team. I live about a mile from the Cat ball park which is one of the finest in the minor leagues. Several major league clubs will play in Fort Worth this Spring, among which will be the Dodgers April 3rd and 4th. I expect to see last year's No. 1 rookie Jackie Robinson, play in these games.

No one seems to have answered your request for data on the regulars and the substitutes on the famous Decatur team of the late eighties. I have, in former articles, given that information, but for fear someone may have "tuned in late" I will repeat. The regulars of '87 were Stapleton, catcher; Thomas, pitcher; Hughes, first baseman; Haydon, second baseman; Taylor, third baseman; Carney, shortstop and captain; outfielders, Chadwick left, Rawson center, O'Leary right, and Kruse right in absence of O'Leary. Later Briggs played third base, Howard Smith helped with the pitching, Ralph Slater, Orra Acton and Carl Warner were substitutes. I frequently wondered why Carl Warner's heavy and timely batting together with his aggressive playing and general baseball ability didn't make him a regular player.

More hash soon.

Your friend, Jim.
James Chamberlain.



Remains of Sgt. Carl Southworth Brought To America

Sgt. Carl R. Southworth, the bright 19 year old son of Mr. and Mrs. Maynard Southworth, lost his life in fighting for his country in the far East on the 16th of April, 1945. He was a member of the crew of a B-29 that was making a raid on the city of Tokyo, Japan.

Mr. Southworth has received from the government the following letter concerning his death:

WAR DEPARTMENT
Office of the Quartermaster General
Washington 25, D. C.
30 November 1948.

Dear Mr. Southworth:

The Department of the Army desires that you be furnished information concerning the resting place of your son, the late Sergeant Carl R. Southworth, ASN 36,901,285.

With deep regret I must inform you that, although the records of this office disclose that the remains of your son were reverently interred, it was not possible, because of the manner in which he met his death, to identify his remains individually.

The remains of your loved one and other fallen comrades are currently resting as a group in the United States Armed Forces Cemetery, Yokohama No. 1, located at Yokohama on the island of Honshu, Japan.

The American Graves Registration Service exhausts every possible clue which might lead to the individual identification of United States deceased personnel, however, if further research fails to establish their individual identity, the remains of this group will be returned to the United States for final interment in a national cemetery designated by The Quartermaster General. All legal next of kin will be advised at a later date of the national cemetery in which final interment will be made and will also be notified of the time of burial.

May I extend my sincere sympathy in your great loss.

Sincerely yours,
JOHN O. HYATT,
Colonel, QMC,
Memorial Division.

There were eleven members of the crew and all lost their lives in the crash of the plane. The mothers of several of them, having a bond of sympathy, have corresponded and become friends. Since the letter from the War Department was sent out Mrs. Southworth has received a letter from Mrs. Margaret Berelen of New York City, mother of the radio operator of the ill fated plane. In it she says:

Dear Mrs. Southworth:

I think of you and all of our boys' mothers often and appreciate the letters and cards you have written me. You no doubt have the latest word from Washington, too—that our boys are coming home.

Being quite dissatisfied with the conflicting stories and lack of final facts, my brother went to Washington a year ago Thanksgiving time and went through the files on our boys.

Armed with further questions, my other son Al went with him again this last September.

And then just recently a missionary friend in Japan who speaks Japanese well visited the place where our boys crashed and asked further questions.

The concensus of opinion is that the plane was going north, but later swung in a circle and came back, burst into flames and dived into a hill near the arsenal near Yokohama City, the place being called "Nara Cho," in another report "Sohuku-Ku," which may be the same.

Some bodies were found outside the hill and some in the wreckage in the hill. One boy either jumped or was thrown clear of the plane and he was taken prisoner and later died and was buried. This boy they believe to have been Warren.

Only two other bodies were intact enough for any identification. One they believed to be Sepleton and one MacLeod. This from certain available identification.

The Missionary found the priest at the Buddhist Temple where our boys were buried by the folk of the village.

The priest said he read the Buddhist ceremony for the dead over our boys and later someone told him that a Christian grave should have a cross on it and that it should be painted white. So he made a cross and painted it white and the townspeople kept flowers on the grave and later put up a plaque reading:

"For the Spirits of those who died on the B-29,
We pray a blessing on these unknown dead."

Nara Association.

It was in this quiet spot near the top of the hill in this simple and respected grave that these bodies remained until after the war when our searching parties traced them and removed them to the United States Cemetery in Yokohama. This cemetery was made out of an athletic field.

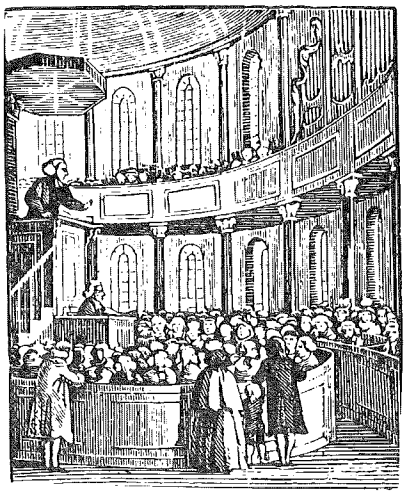
It has been established beyond any shadow of doubt that these were our boys and their plane. They found the engine number, also machine gun numbers and all kinds of parts from the plane which they identified.

I don't know how you feel but to me it is a great comfort to know that the plane was actually found. There are still many questions unanswered and always will be but it seems we have answers to the most important ones now and I for one will be glad to have what is [illegible] in a final resting [illegible] today I saw my [illegible] time.

I hope this finds you and yours well and may you have the best possible Christmas. Perhaps we shall meet when the boys come home.

With every good wish, I am,
Fondly,
Margaret Perelen

Definite information as to which national cemetery the boys will rest in their last resting place has not yet been learned. They will probably be brought to San Francisco and be buried in a cemetery in the west. Mr. and Mrs. Southworth are planning to attend the burial.



The National Baptist Convention

By C. C. Evans.

It is off again, on again, gone again, home again, with our home town traveler, C. C. Evans. This time it was a short journey to Houston, Texas. Off Wednesday, back Tuesday, just the dates when he should have been taking in the greatest celebration ever staged in Decatur.

But he discovered that he could not be in two places at the same time, and the 68th annual session of the National Baptist convention of the U. S. A. had a powerful pull on him. It was a spiritual call which he could not resist, and he was there.

The convention was held in the Sam Houston coliseum, with Dr. D. V. Jemison presiding.

In wending my way to Houston, largest city of the South, I passed through miles of cotton fields and rice fields. When the soft, invigorating breeze set in from the gulf there was a moment's pause to pay tribute to the great Texas city where 17 railroads meet the sea. Houston has lived under six flags. It was founded 112 years ago by the Allen Brothers who named it for General Sam Houston. They realized even then that if it were to become a great city it must have a harbor, and so dug a canal 50 miles long to the sea. They brought ocean going vessels to her door, and today Houston leads the world as a cotton market and terminal.

Houston has grown from a little town with pitched tents to the me-tropolis of the South. This great convention of over 4 million members, which I attended, is devote' and dedicated to the study of words of our Lord. It is a beac of light in a world densely shrouded in darkness. The convention was attended by delegates from every state in the Union, and missionaries from many foreign lands.

There were 15,000 delegates and over 2,000 preachers. Hosts of songsters filled the colossal coliseum with music. 500 voices of Christian musicians heralded the story of the love of the Lord. Through the intense fervor of their adoration for Him they sang the messages of love, and the old time camp meeting songs.

An outstanding feature of the glorious service was the address of Dr. Mordecal Johnson, President of Howard University, Washington, D. C. Well, I saw and heard a plenty that I must abridge. The collection was $425,546.71, not counting SS board money.

"SOUTH SEA PARADISE"

Out on a windswept island
CENSOR is the spot.
Battling the terrifying winds
In the land the Lord forgot.

Out with the French and natives
Out where the boys get blue.
Out on a windswept island
Eight thousand miles from you.

At night the wind keeps blowing
The rain is more than I can stand.
No, we're not convicts, we're sailors,
Defenders of our land.

We are the men of the NAVY
Earning our meager pay,
Guarding the men with the millions
At a dollar or two a day.

No one knows we are living
And no one gives a damn.
Back home it is soon forgotten
That we are loaned to Uncle Sam.

We are living for tomorrow
Desiring to see our gals,
Hoping that when we return
They're not married to our pals.

JOHN GRAHAM — CIVIL WAR

John Graham was born in Antrim County, Ireland in 1827. John came to America in 1847 and lived on Long Island for two years, then moved to Livinton, County, New York. From there he moved to Michigan.

On August 15, 1862 John entered service in the Civil War as Sergeant, Co. G 19th Infantry and was promoted to Second Lieutenant. June 15, 1863 John fought in eighteen Murfreesboro siege of Gettysburg and Peach Tree Creek where he was wounded.

In one battle when the eight color bearers had been shot and the ninth refused to bear the colors, he picked up the flag and bore it across the open plains and placed it upon the breastworks, the last one of the ten color bearers to do this.

John Graham was honorably discharged June 10, 1865 and returned to his farm near Decatur where he has since lived.

History of the G. A. R. in Decatur

By Robert Lutz.

(This is the 13th story in the Norman B. Webster local history contest written by pupils of the Decatur public schools under the direction of Catherine Howland, teacher of history and science.)

The following account of the organization of the Grand Army of the Republic was taken from the encyclopedia "Americana":

It was a patriotic association, organized in the interest of the surviving representatives of the military and naval forces of the Civil War, the families of those dead, and such objects as they think are related to these. The membership is of soldiers and sailors of the war, honorably discharged or continuing, and State Militia on active duty subject to National Call during that time.

It was organized in Illinois in the winter of 1865 by Dr. B. F. Stephenson and Rev. W. G. Rudolp, the surgeon and the chaplain of the 14th Illinois Infantry. The first post was organized in Decatur, Illinois, April, 1866. The first National encampment was held at Indianapolis, Ind., November 20, 1866. Its assigned objects are fraternity, commemoration, and assistance among the above classes; and it has aided in establishing soldiers' homes and memorials and maintaining and educating soldiers' orphans. It also instituted Memorial Day.

It ruled in 1869 that it should not be used for partisan work, nominations or debates, but naturally it has been a powerful factor in political calculations and the shaping of party conduct regarding both nomination of candidates for office and legislative action. It has also given out strong utterances against restraining liberality in pension legislation and has used its influence to prevent official restriction in the expenditure of money under such legislation. It has headquarters in the State House, Boston, Mass.

At one time it numbered its members by the hundreds of thousands. At the begnning of 1930 it had only 21,080 members in good standing. There are 2,238 posts throughout the country, almost every state being a department with a commander. During 1930 deaths were about 16,000. It holds annual meetings in the chief cities; the uniform is dark blue with black slouch hat. Its badge is a bronze star hung from a strap and ribbon flag; on the star in relief are a soldier and sailor clasping hands in front of a figure of Liberty, with two free men in the foreground, and the U. S. flag on the sides.

D. W. Brodhead, in his history of the Decatur post to be printed next week, says that the Grand Army of the Republic was fathered and sponsored by General John A. Logan, and that was our remembrance. Can anyone inform the Republican just what active part General Logan did take in its organization?

WOMEN'S RELIEF CORPS

This was an organization created in 1883 by the mothers, wives, daughters, and sisters of Union soldiers of the Civil War of 1861-65 for the purpose of aiding and assisting the Grand Army of the Republic and to perpetuate the memory of their heroic dead, to extend needful aid to the widows and orphans, to find them homes and employment, and assure them of sympathy and friends, to cherish and emulate the deeds of our army nurses. There are at present about 220,000 members.

THE G. A. R. IN DECATUR

One of the first G. A. R. posts to be organized in Michigan was Burnside Post No. 27 in Decatur. Most of the G. A. R. posts throughout the country were named after generals of the Cvil War. The organization flourished for a number of years and, as the number of Civil War Veterans diminished, it was finally dissolved by the two remaining members—Daniel Webster Broadhead, and Gilbert (Gib) Mead—who broke up the post, and discarded old furniture and Civil War relics.

The editor of the Republican looked out the window one day in August and saw Mr. Broadhead and Mr. Mead coming across the street with two antiquated pictures. They were old steel engravings in metal frames of Washington and Lincoln. They stll hang on the wall of the Republican office.

The last G. A. R. hall was located in the basement of the L. G. Stewart building where meetings had been held continuously for about fifteen years.

The old post had a membership of about one hundred ninety-two men when it was in its prime; only Civil War veterans could belong to the organization. It was very active during its early days and accomplished much for the good of its members. In the first few years the men, dressed in uniform, drilled every week on the green which extended about half a block, beginning where the Church of God now stands on St. Mary's street, and ending at Eli street near the school house. There were very few houses built in that block at the time.

The G. A. R. supervised Memorial Day programs for years and, with the cooperation of Arba Moulton, always secured prominent speakers for these occasions. The veterans always marched in a body to the cemetery until their numbers dwindled to the point where there was only a handful left. To my knowledge, there is only one Civil War veteran left in the state of Michigan, and he is past the century mark.

Daniel Webster Brodhead, who was one of the most active members and commanders of the G. A. R., wrote an account of the history of the organization and its activities in Decatur.

He was born in 1848, and at the age of fifteen or sixteen joined the army. He belonged to the 19th Michigan Infantry in the Civil War, and took part in Sherman's famous March to the sea. After returning from the war he attended school, and graduated in the class of 1869, after which he taught in the rural schools for several years. Afterward he specialized in peppermint farming, and for many years he was the competent manager of the A. M. Todd Campania Farm in Allegan county. Later he bought muck land in Decatur. He had a keen mind, and became one of the most efficient and successful muck farmers in Michigan.

History of Burnside Post No. 27 G. A. R.

By D. W. Brodhead.

The Post was organized September 19, 1881, with twenty-one charter members as follows:

H. B. Babcock
L. A. Roberts
David Cheney
Enoch Howe
M. S. Crittenden
Daniel Knight
Alf Myers
C. W. Willison
W. W. McCune
Aaron Eweet
Wm. Gilbert
Geo. Steele
W. E. Cary
A. B. Hopkins
Henry Burbridge
Chas. Dyer
S. M. Rawson
Reuben Calbetzor
John Grotzinger
Oscar Caldwell
John Wiles

H. B. Babcock was the first commander; W. W. McCune, adjt. Of the charter members eight were over fifty years old and three were sixty or over; A. B. Hopkins, the oldest, was sixty-two; Aaron Sweet and Alf Myers each sixty-one. The whole number enrolled as members of the Post in the forty-two years from its organization in 1881, to 1923 is one hundred and ninety-two, and at this writing (Dec. 1923) we pay per capita tax on twelve members. At the annual election of officers Saturday, December 8, only four were present, hence all officers hold over. Of the 21 charter members only one is living—George Steele.

The records show a soldiers' organization preceding the G. A. R. in Decatur called "Custer Encampment No. 17 O. C. D."

The first meeting recorded is April 17, 1880. From reading the proceedings of subsequent meetings we infer the lodge was just started, not long before this recorded meeting in April, 1880, and that it was a national order with state headquarters to which it paid dues and to which it made reports and when merged into the G. A. R. had around forty members.

At this first recorded meeting in 1880 officers were elected and twenty-three ballots were cast, H. B. Babcock being elected commander. Other officers elected were S. M. Rawson; A. K. Conklin, adjt.; Wm. Gilbert, officer of the day. New recruits were admitted at almost every meeting during the year. The last meeting of Custer Encampment was held Nov. 15, 1881, the G. A. R. having been informally organized somewhat near two months before. At this last meeting the Encampment voted to disband and turn their property over to Burnside Post. Most members of the Encampment hastened to join Burnside Post.

Of the 192 who at various dates joined Burnside, so far as I can ascertain, only 19 are now living.

On December 31, 1884, 69 members were in good standing and the Post had their meetings in Trowbridge hall, over what is now Carney's drug store.

September 30, 1886, membership was 82, and for some years after the number was between 90 and 100.

One court-martial was called September 12, 1885, Barney O'Dell, judge advocate and a court of 12 comrades to try Steve Parmater on some charge. No trial or statement of the charge is on record.

It may seem strange and unaccountable that so long a time elapsed before the soldiers of the Civil war organized, as the G. A. R. had been organized and in active operation for over ten years, fathered and sponsored by Gen. John A. Logan, a high officer in the army and prominent in national politics. Yet in spite of its favorable impression among the people and the impetus of the name and fame of its founder—Logan—it was 10 to 15 years before the G. A. R. got fairly started, and that Burnside Post was one of the earlier ones in Michigan is attested by its number, 27. There are 462 posts in Michigan. Some have disbanded, but 462 have been in active operation at one time and most of them were organized between 1880 and 1890.

But the reason why the boys did not organize soon after the war is very plain to me. They were 'fed up' on war. War has no charm for the American people, young or old. The pomp, glamor, and circumstance of war never at any time appealed to our nation. The boys in blue were sick and tired of war, of camp life, hard tack and sow belly. To even think of their army experiences fairly nauseated them. They wanted to get it out of mind and memory. Home and home pursuits were their whole thoughts. It took years to overcome their repugnance to army life and all its bitter withering memories. My own experience and observation confirms this view.

I arrived home from my final discharge at Detroit on July 2, 1865, and attended a 4th of July celebration at Decatur. Of course it was a two-fold celebration—the joy of peace, of victory, and the boys in blue were home to stay and hundreds of them were in Decatur that beautiful July day, but of those hundreds only 8 or 10 were in uniform. The committee finally persuaded us few who had on uniforms to head the marching parade, from Main street to the school grounds where the speaking was staged and other exercises also. We were preceded by the "sheep skin" command and I remember Mr. Nutting was one of the fifers. Of the hundreds of citizens in that parade, how many were ex-soldiers? Of all the hundreds of the boys not more than 25 marched in line. You see, they even wouldn't wear their uniforms, much less march in line; but most of them heard the speaking and heard Dick Lyon sing "The Star Spangled Banner" in his best form. Here is what they said and how they felt—thumbs down on marching after that drum corps, 'we've done our marching.

It took long years to change the view-point of the boys and soften their bitterness towards the seamy side of war, but finally their hate and anger softened, and tender memories of comrades, of friendships formed in camp or on the march or in the din of battle prevailed and they longed to get together again and tell the story which, after all those years was so vivid in their memories, and they wanted to get together and unitedly voice their need of financial aid from the government which they saved from defeat and ruin, but which doled out only small sums after an endless and distracting tissue of red tape and often years of time. So in the '80's the boys in blue organized thousands, not only in Michigan, but in every state in the north and west and thousands flocked to the standard and the national G. A. R. became a political force that had to be reckoned with and its demands largely granted, and finally in 1890 the general disability pension bill became a law entitling all soldiers to $12.00 per month who were incapacitated for manual labor. This helped thousands who could not be pensioned under the old law, which only recognized defects in service in the line of duty.

Further the boys got together every year in regimented reunions and the camp fire was looked forward to as the real center of interest of these annual reunions. Memorial Day exercises and ceremonies were expanded and the deceased soldiers graves decorated yearly with flags, and the Woman's Relief Corps became a mighty force.

And so I might go on; what I am saying is just a sketchy touch of some of the high lights. It has been a great and fruitful power in the nation for over 40 years this old G. A. R. It has glowed with patriotism. It has upheld the flag. It succored the helpless and needy. It has fostered civic pride and good citizenship. It has been staunchly and fully 100 percent American. It has fully vindicated its motto of "Fraternity, Charity and Loyalty."

And now when the active life of the G. A. R. is near its close, when its lines are melting away like snowflakes in the throat of a volcano, each one of us can proudly say, "My life belongs to my country," and we still carry the old banner of the Union, and as the stars on the blue plains of heaven light up the world for the glory of God, so the stars on the blue ground of the Old Flag still light up the pathway to glory with honor and justice between man and man of all races and colors.

Queen Esther is a daughter of Mary and the late Al. Schuur. She was born in Decatur January 1, 1928, and has lived here all of her life. She attended the Decatur public schools from kindergarten through high school, graduating with the class of 1945. She is now beginning her senior year at Michigan State College, where she is taking an elementary teaching course. She went to East Lansing Saturday to begin the semester.

The newspaper's radio station, WHFB, also carried many of the programs, including the Bergen show, on its regular broadcasts.

This is the moment that stopped the show during the coronation ceremony on Thursday evening. Edgar Bergen, famed stage and radio personality and Decatur home-town boy, made a surprise appearance at the bandstand and striding quickly across the stage planted a fulsome kiss squarely on the lips of beauteous Queen Esther Schuur, as the huge and dumfounded audience of thousands packed into the streets below roared its approval. "It's all right," Bergen cried, "I went to school with her mother!"

DECATUR

WITHIN a stone's throw of Southern Michigan's beautiful "Lake of the Woods" is situated the village of Decatur, Van Buren County. Established in 1848, eleven months after Michigan received Statehood, it is rich in historical background and fertile soil. Though predominately an agricultural center and one of the world's largest shipping centers for celery and onions, the 13 lakes within a radius of five miles of the village each summer bring vacationists seeking rest and relaxation.

Decatur's population is 1599. It has sent forth into the world many interesting and famous "sons". Most famous, perhaps, is Edgar Bergen and his stooge Charlie McCarthy of radio fame. Eddie spent his youth amid the surrounding of the picturesque village . . . attending school, fishing, hiking and working at odd jobs for the local merchants and farmers during the summers.

It can be said that Decatur is one of the few "complete villages" of the State. Southwestern Michigan's vast network of highways and its location on the New York Central Railroad's main line make the town accessible in a matter of minutes to the large and metropolitan cities of Detroit, Chicago, South Bend, Kalamazoo, Benton Harbor and St. Joseph.

The town is replete with modern stores, utilities, lumber yard, railroad station, bank, newspaper, industry and some of the United States' largest celery, onion, peppermint, spearmint, sugar beet and cabbage cold storage plants.

Congratulations to Chase Salmon Osborn, born January 22, 1860. Today, Thursday, celebrating his 88th birthday.

He has had a notable career which is still far from closed, and the Republican wishes him many more birthdays. He may not care for them, but he is an outstanding character whose whole life has been one of making records, and he is making a record in the number of his years on earth.

He is probably the most eloquent orator who ever came down from the Northern Peninsula. He struck fire with his words and backed them with his dominating personality. Thirty-seven years ago he became governor of Michigan. He found the state deep in debt and left it two years later with a surplus.

But Governor Osborn was not at his best within the confines of a public office. The world was his foot stool, and he must be free to meet and master its problems anywhere and everywhere he found them. He mined the earth. He reported the wars of Africa and the Orient, he fought the toughs and demagogues who crossed his path, he made money and gave it away, he wrote books and kept abreast of the times.

Now at 88 he lives on his plantation in Georgia, which he has deeded to the state for future possession, and we shall expect and hope to keep hearing from him till his rugged frame is laid to rest in the sleep that knows no waking.

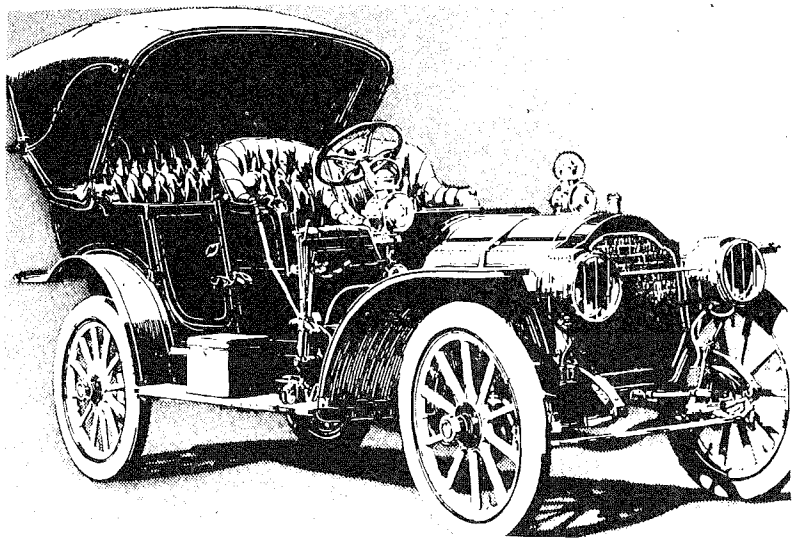
In the long list of governors of Michigan Chase S. Osborn will stand out with Lewis Cass as do Lincoln and Washington among the presidents of the nation.

The Atlantic Monthly celebrated its ninetieth anniversary with its November number. The first issue appeared in November, 1857, James Russell Lowell was the first editor at a salary of $2,500 a year, and Longfellow and Holmes were among the first contributors.

The Republican has the January, February, March, April and May, 1858, numbers bound in one volume. It is as interesting reading as are the late numbers which are highly prized in the Republican office.

Among the impressive comments of Capt. Charles Haydon in his diary written at the front in the Civil War were his frequent references to reading the Atlantic Monthly. Todty, after ninety years, the Atlantic ranks among the best in literary excellence.

A writer in the November number gave a list of magazines having over a million circulation. The Readers' Digest stands at the head of the list with an estimated 10,000,000. Life has 4,699,688, Ladies' Home Journal 4,463,950, Saturday Evening Post 3,710,392, Woman's Home Companion 3, 691,238, American 2,482,544, Look, 2,300,592.



Dr. Rose Memorial Fund Series Ends with Farm-Community Forum

Written for the Republican by Waldo Phillips.

The Farm and Community Forun held at Decatur high school, Wednesday, March 23, scored a hit. Judged by several standards, it was an unusually successful program.

Due to the full cooperation of a number of people it was well planned. No substitutions were necessary: Every person scheduled to participate was on hand and prepared. The audience was very appreciative and generous with complimentary remarks.

The school, 4-H clubs, Hobby club, Extension Service and Soil Conservation Service, each demonstrated their activities by exhibits arranged in the corridors. They were attractively placed and drew much favorable comment.

The G. I. training class under the instruction of Bert Kidman exhibited a wagon and rack and several hand tools which they had made. This exhibit was on the school grounds at the north end of the school house.

The film, "By the Land We Live," was pleasing and instructive.

The morning address by George McIntyre was well received. He traced the development of agriculture from the crooked stick and sickle to the present mechanization, from the self-sufficiency of pioneer days to the present inter-dependence of all groups in our economy, and pointed out the basic position of agriculture. All people are dependent on the farms, not only for food, but for fibre, for clothing and for supplies for many industrial uses. He pointed out that we have nearly reached a balance between arable land and population, indicating the importance of conservation of all our resources.

The panel discussion, "Better Rural Living," was supreme. "The best thing of the kind I ever heard," was remarked by several hearers. Each panel member was particularly qualified to handle his or her assignment and responded in masterly fashion.

Dr. Ulrey of Michigan State college, is a veteran discussion leader with a broad experience in the field of rural sociology. His expert opening and closing of the discussion tied the various phases of community life together to form a pattern for "Better Rural Living."

John Woodman, discussing the position of Agriculture with respect to the community, stressed the responsibility of the farmer as trustee or custodian of the soil to present and future generations. "As the principle source of new wealth in a rural community and because the quality of its products may affect the general health, the public generally has a great stake in agriculture," said Mr. Woodman.

Marion Davis covered the part that education plays in "Better Rural Living" so well that apparently his hearers felt there was little more that need be said, judging by the attendance in that group in the afternoon. His presentation was well organized and took his subject into consideration in a broad sense.

John Flemming of the County Health department very ably brought out the importance of Health to "Better Rural Living." The matter of health directly affects the happiness and prosperity of the community," he said.

Mrs. Leona Washburn knows youth. This was so very evident in her masterly analysis of the problems and reactions of young people. She pointed out the responsibility of parents, teachers and the public generally and suggested means to meet this challenge. Said Dr. Ulrey, "The best discussion of this subject I ever heard."

Henry Houseman adopted a very realistic approach to the place of the Church in the community and very clearly and emphatically suggested the contribution it could make to "Better Rural Living." By broadening its activcity beyond the sphere of spiritual leadership, the Church increases, rather than diminishes, its power for good over the hearts and minds and souls of men.

W. C. Bates, superintendent of the Decatur schools, brought out the need, in our present day society, for people to work together. They must work together in groups having common interests. This is essential to the accomplishment of worthy purposes, as well as to the growth of the individual. But, said Mr. Bates, "A coordination of effort is frequently necessary, coordination of the thinking and action of the various groups, in order that worth while community goals may be attained. Otherwise, with groups as with individuals, effort will be expended and wasted in cross-purpose activities."

All together, this panel presented an unusually fine and able appraisal of the resources of a community, both actual and potential, and, what is more, suggested very practical ways of applying those resources toward "Better Rural Living."

An ample and tasty lunch was served at noon by the members of the Home Economics and Agriculture classes. It was provided by the facilities of the hot lunch program of the school. The expense was met by the Dr. G. L. Rose Memorial Fund.

Better than a half hour's very pleasing entertainment was furnished by the high school. Under the able direction of Mrs. Vliek, the Boys' Glee Club, the Girls' Glee Club and Sextette and Double Sextette responded to the spirited encores of the audience.

During the group discussion period, your reporter visited each group and found one common characteristic, full participation. This period passed quickly and was followed by reports to the assembly and summarization by Dr. Ulrey.

Dr. Wm. McKinley Robinson of Western Michigan college, in thirty minutes of rapid-fire comment, supplied everything that might possibly have been lacking up to this point. He was pleased to see town and open country considered together as a rural community and reflected on the significance and possibilities of such an approach to community problems. He contrasted this attitude with that of metropolitan areas in which such common interest is not recognized and the term "rural," in their thinking, means the open country.

As the meeting adjourned, the air buzzed with such comments as, "I wish Dr. Robinson had talked longer," "We ought to have more such meetings," "That was a fine program."

Your reporter wants to have it understood, that whatever degree of success this meeting attained is due to the cooperation in planning and in execution of a lot of people.

On behalf of the Dr. G. L. Rose Memorial Fund Committee, we extend sincere thanks to all those appearing on the program and to Dennis Caul, county agricultural agent, Kermit Washburn, assistant county agricultural agent, and the staff of the Van Buren County Soil Conservation District.

We are much indebted to Mr. Bates, Mr. Houseman and Mr. Davis for assistance other than their part in the program.

In spite of the satisfaction experienced at the favorable reception given the Farm and Community Forum, there are some regrets. There were several unoccupied seats, seats where farmers, business men, ministers, and other citizens should have been.

You, who were not there, are in the majority. What kind of a community do you want? Are you farmers so good that you need no inspiration to do better? Does not Main St. have an interest in the training and environment of our youth? Does not Main St. have an interest in the productivity of our soils? Do not you, Mr. Average Citizen, care what your community does about public health, or education? Mr. Sky Pilot, the majority, who were not there, if you were operating by remote control, it was not recognized.

Max and Dalton Rose, sons of Dr. G. L. Rose, are doing a fine thing in memory of their father. They were born and raised in this community, graduated from Decatur high school. Dr. G. L. Rose gave his life to this community and his sons are sufficiently interested in its youth and development to create a fund, in memory of their father, such fund to be used for the benefit of this area.

Interest in the programs made possible through the Dr. G. L. Rose Memorial Fund has been growing steadily. A large number of applications for Soil Conservation Service help have gone in from this area. Community consciousness has been aroused. Farm press and farm radio programs are making inquiry. If some noteworthy achievement gains acclaim, Decatur might acquire re-

Dr. Dalton K. Rose

Dr. Dalton Rose, a former Decatur boy, has for many years resided in Clayton, Missouri, a St. Louis surburb, where he is engaged in private practice and was also professor of Urology at Washington University Medical School in St. Louis.

Five years ago when the doctor reached 65, he became 'Emeritus' professor "and, with this partial release from responsibilities," he writes, "together with approaching retirement from medical practice, he and his wife (the former Cora Lee King of Olivet, Michigan) began taking longer and longer vacations.

Last year they purchased a house on Belleair Beach which is situated on a key in the Gulf of Mexico, directly west of Clearwater and their postoffice address is Indian Rocks Beach.

Dr. and Mrs. Rose plan to spend six or eight months a year in Florida and the remaining months in Clayton, Missouri.

For their retirement project they have chosen an "improved" black walnut orchard. Previous to this, they raised cattle for many years. However, they sold the herd seven years ago and became interested in the unique orchard.

The walnut trees are planted 50 feet apart on the square plan and cover 80 or 90 acres of the old pasture. The doctor explains the orchard as follows.

"Improved black walnuts refer to varieties accidentally discovered somewhat like the original "Delicious" apple was found. They have quite a thin shell, large kernel, and crack out a very high percent of halves and quarters. This inproved variety must be budded or grafted upon seedlings grown from 'wild' or forest black walnuts. We trim the trees to at least a 16 foot bole-log. This means continued interest. It is well known that older people enjoy planting trees. Mrs. Rose is the chief 'budder' and 'grafter,' and warmly advocates this as interesting work "for the ladies."

Dr. and Mrs. Rose have a duaghter, Anne Lee Stewart and two grandchildren, Mike, age seven, and Molly, four. Molly was named after the doctor's mother Mary Kelly, called Molly as a child. They live in New Canaan, Connecticut, 45 minutes from New York City. Mr. Stewart is connected with McKinsey and Company, Capital Management Consultants in New York City.

Dr. Rose and his wife drive east to visit their daughter and family and also his brother Max, who lives in New York City. We also have a brief account of his life in this special issue.

Dr. Rose visits his boyhood home every year and adds that he is antiscipating a visit to Decatur in the near future.

Similar are the lines from The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam,—

"Ah, Love! could you and I with Him conspire
To grasp this sorry Scheme of Things entire,
Would not we shatter it to bits—and then Remould it nearer to the heart's desire!"

Dr. G. L. Rose, in the last year or two of his life, read much from this little book that was then having a popular run. He seemed to be fascinated by its philosophy and quoted many lines of it from memory.

Omar Khayyam was a Persian of the eleventh century. He was a man of profound learning who lived to the ripe age of 103. Not much was known about his writings in this period until Edward FitzGerald created his remarkable English version in 1859. Of this a contemporary said, "The Rubaiyat will come in time to be recognized as the highest expression of agnosticism."

Its philosophy as presented by FitzGerald is in effect as follows: "We know the loveliness of this world, we know nothing of the hereafter; but God, who created us as we are, will not punish us for being as He made us. Let us then enjoy the only life of which we are sure, before we inevitively pass into darkness."

Dr. Rose surely knew and enjoyed the loveliness of this world. He found beauty in the landscape everywhere. We have ridden with him behind his fast stepping Hambletonians and listened enraptutred as he talked about the wonders of the sky, the trees, the fields and the birds we saw as we drove along the way. His mind was in tune with the universe, and it was heaven to him. He so lived that when he had finished each day and year he did not worry about what would follow. In our talks he never stated his religious views and we do not intend to state that he was an agnostic.

To simplify the record will add that the word "rubaiyat" means "quatrains," being the plural of "rubaiy," and the dictionary describes "agnostic" as one who asserts the impossibility of any knowledge of God or ultimate things.

Fine Promotion of Former Decatur Young Man.

This letter from our good friend, Clyde Haefner, concerns Carl Squier, notice of whose promotion occurs in another column of this paper. Carl is making a prominent place for himself in the business world and his Decatur friends are all proud of him.

It is not out of place in this connection to say a few words about the writer of this letter, another Decatur young man who has gone out and by his own efforts gained a position of prominence with one of Detroit's big corporations. Clyde Haefner is now the general manager of the Detroit Harvester Company. Mrs. Haefner is a daughter of Mrs. Katherine Carney.

September 7, 1929.

Mr. Arba Moulton,
Care of Decatur Republican,
Decatur, Michigan.

Dear Arba:—Every once in a while something occurs to make life worth while living. This morning I read with a great deal of interest of Carl's promotion to general manager of the Lockheed Airplane Company of Burbank, California, and I felt that you would be interested in receiving the copy of the announcement which appeared in the Detroit Free Press today.

Should you not be familiar with the Lockheed organization, it is recognized as one of the outstanding aviation companies and their principal products are Lockheed aviation brakes and shock absorbers, both of which are used universally throughout the industry. Incidentally Carl is recognized throughout aviation circles as an expert pilot, and has steadily climbed the ladder to a point where he has gained the personal favor of Mr. E. S. Evans, the well known financeer who has brought together quite a number of mergers in the aviation industry, the latest one being the Detroit Aircrafts Corporation, which is a combine of the Aircrafts Development Company, Grosse Isle, The Eastman Aircraft Company, the Lockheed Company of Burbank and one or two others which I cannot recall at the moment.

In talking with Mrs. Squier a few moments ago, she advised me that she was leaving for the west on next Tuesday and upon her arrival on the coast, they will locate their residence in Hollywood. I regret that I did not talk with Carl before he left a week ago, while Aileen and myself were enjoying a ten days motor trip throughout the East. I personally feel that Carl is destined to be one of the outstanding executives in the aviation world. I base my opinion on the fact that he has made aviation his life work and while other opportunities presented themselves he could not break away from the aviation work.

I believe that our subscription for the Decatur Republican will soon expire and as this paper is received by us with a great deal of enthusiasm every week and we do not care to have the subscription in arrears, so I am enclosing my check for $3.00 to cover the subscription for a couple of years hence.

With kind regards to you and yours and trusting that Aileen and I may have the pleasure of seeing you down this way soon I am,

Sincerely yours,
Clyde Haefner.

M. DONAHOE, AUCTIONEER

By Arba N. Moulton.

(Note: Much of the following article has been written from the writer's personal memory of his acquaintance with Mr. Donahoe, an ecquaintance that extended over a period of nearly forty years; some has come from the older men of the community who knew our subject well; and the more personal information has been furnished by members of Mr. Donahoe's family.)

No series of articles touching on the farms and farmers of Southern Van Buren, Northern Berrien, and Northern and Western Cass counties would be complete without some reference to one of the most widely known men of his generation in those areas, a man who for nearly fifty years was engaged in selling farm sales throughout the territory just described. We refer to M. Donahoe (better known as "Mike" Donahoe), the famed auctioneer from Dowagiac, who in his lifeti sold thousands of sales within a radius of from forty to fifty miles of Dowagiac. His name will mean but little to the younger generation, but the older people of this community will all remember "Mike".

Born in a little settlement known as "Potato Creek" west of South Bend, on Dec. 8, 1850, Mr. Donahoe spent his younger years in Indiana. He was the son of James and Bridget Byrne Donahoe, early immigrants from Ireland. He never saw his father, as Mr. Donahoe, Sr., died a short time before the birth of his son, and is buried in the little cemetery at Bertrand. Mr. Donahoe was raised by his mother and his uncle, "Tommy" Byrne.

While yet a small boy, the family moved to a farm just north of the entrance to St. Mary's College, Notre Dame, Ind., and later to a farm near Bertrand, Mich. Bertrand, in those days, was larger than either South Bend or Niles. But the coming of the railroads—the Michigan Central to Niles, and the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern to South Bend—changed that, and Bertrand gradually waned until it became but little more than a memory, although in the past few years it has been greatly built up again.

In later years Mr. Donahoe often told that the first money he ever earned was picking thorns along the little stream that runs just on the north edge of Roseland, Mich. These thorns were used by the carding mills in South Bend and Mishawaka.

He also used to tell of hearing the deer hunters of South Bend talk of going "up north" for their annual hunt—"up north" in those days, meaning in the vicinity of the present city of Buchanan.

Coming to Michigan

In 1867, Mrs. Donahoe, with her brother "Tommy" and her son left Indiana and started north, intending to settle somewhere in the central part of the state. They drove up through Niles, along present M-40 to Dowagiac, and then out through the township of Silver Creek. They were invited to stop at the John Bunbury home (now the Jas. W. Curran farm) northwest of Dowagiac. The Bunbury family had moved to Silver Creek some time before from the vicinity of Barron Lake in Howard township. The Donahoes spent the night at the Bunbury home, and the next day were prevailed upon to buy the 50 acre farm across the road from the Bunbury place. This farm is still in the Donahoe family, now being owned by Mr. Donahoe's youngest son, Vincent.

Several years later Mr. Donahoe married Miss Mary Bunbury. The young couple set up housekeeping on what was then known as part of the "Gregory" farm, just north of the Silver Creek Catholic church. Later they returned to the original homestead, which remained their home until their deaths. Ten children were born to their union, of whom seven remain alive, three of them still living on the old homestead, two in Dowagiac, a son in Mt. Clemens, Mich., and a son in Milford, Iowa.

His First Sale

It was quite by accident that 'Mike" took up the profession of auctioneering. In the middle 1880's a sale was advertised to be held on the Moore farm, just west of Dewey lake, and next to the Cullinane or Dewey lake school. Mr. Donahoe had no intention of even attending the sale, but Erastus Osborn, who owned the Osborn place at the Seven Mile corner north of Dowagiac, drove by his farm and prevailed upon Mr. Donahoe to accompany him to the sale. An auctioneer from South Bend had been engaged for the occasion, but due to some unforseen circumstances was unable to attend. Mr. Moore was anxious for the sale to be held, so called upon different ones to try their skill at selling. Shortly Mr. Donahoe was called upon, and he did so well from the very start that he was persuaded to finish the sale, which he did to every one's satisfaction.

Some time after this Mr. Osborn was administrator of an estate in Hamilton township, and, finding it necessary to have a sale to dispose of the personal property, he called upon "Mike" to do the selling. Always afterward Mr. Osborn made the claim that he was he first man to engage Mike Donahoe to sell a sale—that Mike wasn't engaged to sell the Moore sale. This, as stated, was sometime round the mid 1880's, and more nd more after that "Mike" was alled upon to sell sales.

The best known, auctioneers of hose days were "Bill" Baldwin of 'okagon and "Dan" Sammons of Hartford. But as they gradually etired, Mr. Baldwin from ald age nd Mr. Sammons from the effects f a broken hip, Mr. Donahoe radually took their places, until efore the turn of the century his erritory had so expanded and the ales were so numerous, that almost his entire time from the first f August until the middle of the ext May was given to the selling of sales. His territory included the southern and western parts of Cass, the northern half of Berrien, and the western half and the southeastern part of Van Buren counties.

The Selling Season

The sale season usually started the first day of August. Then there would be a few sales during the balance of that month. September, October, November and the first half of December would find him selling from four to six sales every week. Then there would be a short "vacation" until after New Year's Day, when his heaviest schedule would start. January having five and six sales every week. February and March found him engaged six days a week. His heaviest week found him selling seven sales, two of them in Decatur on one day, one in the forenoon and one in the afternoon. April would see a falling off in sales, as the farmers started their spring work. There would be only a few sales in May, and practically none in June and July, except in cases of estates that were being settled.

"Mike" kept no record of the number of sales he sold during his life-time, but the number ran into the thousands. Neither did he keep any record of the total amount that he sold, but it must have run literally into the millions. In the early days of his selling sales would run from $400 to $800. Later they would run from $4,000 to $7,000.

An excellent judge of values, either live stock or farm equipment, he disliked having any item sell for less than its fair value, and he would never 'dwell" on any article when he felt that the bids had reached a reasonable figure. This fact was recognized by both bidders and sellers, and both had unquestioned faith in his judgment and honesty. And speaking of honesty, one of Mr. Donahoe's prized possessions was a letter written by a gentleman near Benton Harbor who wished to engage him to sell a sale. The envelope bore only this address:

"An Honest Auctioneer, Dowagiac, Mich."

and it was delivered promptly to Mr. Donahoe.

All Kinds of Weather

Of a strapping build—he stood over six feet in height, and weighed over 200 pounds—and having an iron constitution, Mr. Donahoe never missed an engagement on account of illness. He missed one sale following an injury to one of his legs, and the sale was sold by one of his sons. Storms would sometimes cause a postponement, but even zero weather would not deter the holding of a sale provided a sufficient number of bidders were present to warrant holding it. Sometimes sales were held if the farm barn was large enough to hold the crowd.

One of Mr. Donahoe's proudest moments as an auctioneer came around the turn of the century when he sold a sale for Wm. Swisher in Silver Creek. One of Mr. Swisher's teams sold for the then unheard of sum of $300. This news quickly spread and the prices of horses took an immediate upswing. Years later a team sold at the James Gould sale in Volinia for a little more than $600, but "Mike" didn't get the thrill out of that sale that he did out of the earlier one.

In the early days Mr. Donahoe's traveling was done with horse and road-cart, his little gray "Billie" being almost as well known as the owner. Later he had a team of ponies with a buggy in summer and a cutter in winter. It was not until 1914 that he owned his first automobile. It was nothing for Mr. Donahoe to arise at three o'clock in the morning, drive over near South Haven, sell the sale return home to some other far point of his territory.

We have spoken of the first place bought by Mr. Donahoe's mother in Silver Creek. Later on he purchased 100 acres across the road from his original holdings, and that, too, is still in the Donahoe family.

Livestock Buyer and Shipper

With all his activities as an auctioneer, Mr. Donahoe was also engaged in the livestock buying and shipping, being one of the heaviest buyers and shippers in Dowagiac. Incidentally, some 40 or 50 years ago Dowagiac was the largest stock shipping point on the Michigan Central Railroad from Buffalo, N. Y., to Chicago, Ill. His largest shipment was nine carloads of stock sent from Dowagiac in the latter part of December, 1914. This followed the lifting of the quarantine which was imposed upon Berrien, Cass and Van Buren counties, in October, after the out-break of the foot and mouth disease near Buchanan. Hundreds of thousands of dollars were paid to the farmers in the Dowagiac shipping area for stock delivered to Mr. Donahoe in the years he was engaged in that business.

Large and Small Sales

As an auctioneer, Mr. Donahoe's native Irish wit stood him in good stead, as many a would-be heckler learned to his discomfiture. "Mike" could always turn the laugh on the other fellow, and few had the temerity to cross verbal swords with him the second time.

It is thought that Mr. Donahoe's largest sale was the James Gould sale, mentioned before. It amounted to something over $7,000, and was sold in a little over six hours. His smallest sale amounted to only $67, and "Mike" had to stand a great deal of good natured "ribbing" on account of it. His fees were on a percentage basis, with a minimum charge of $5. The proprietor of this little sale had so described his property when he engaged the auctioneer, that "Mike" said his charge would be 2%, without mentioning his minimum fee. It happened that the farmer's tools and equipment were old and worn, and the total of the sale was such that "Mike's" fee amounted to only $1.34 for his trip and day's work. At the other extreme was the farmer who carefully estimated that his sale would amount to a certain sum. However, the proceeds of the sale exceeded his expectations by several hundrd dollars, and he thought that "Mike" should cut his charges, because the sale had amounted to so much more than anticipated. The fact that the sale brought so much more than expected didn't seem to count with that farmer.

Twice In Politics

While deeply interested in civic affairs, Mr. Donahoe entered the political arena only twice in his long life. In the early 1890's, although not at the caucus, his party named him as its candidate for supervisor of Silver Creek. At the election he was elected by a large majority. The next year his party again wanted to name him and the opposing party offered to endorse him, so that he would have no opposition, but he declined. In 1912 he swung behind "Teddy" Roosevelt into the "Bull Moose" party, and was that party's nominee for State Representative from Cass county. He made no active campaign, but he received a substantial complimentary vote. For a number of years he also served on the school board of his district.

As stated in the beginning, Mike Donahoe's name doesn't mean a great deal to the younger generation, but to us older folks he will always remain as one of the outstanding characters of our acquaintance. We knew him well. He called at the Republican office frequently and no one was more welcome than he. We printed thousands of bills advertising sales that he would sell, and we could close our eyes and see the type that printed:

"M. DONAHOE, AUCTIONEER"

Mr. Donahoe died Dec. 10, 1933 two days after his 83rd birthday. He was buried in the Silver Creek Catholic cemetery, beside his wife who had preceded him in death 19 years, and beside his mother who had brought him to Michigan more than 66 years before.

His death marked the close of a remarkable career, and the passing of one of this editor's most esteemed acquaintances.

We shall not soon see his like again.

CANOE VOYAGE OF GENERAL CASS

Written by David Woodman and Reprinted From The Decatur Republican of Some 30 Years Ago.

Miss Catherine Howland, in her search through THE REPUBLICAN files for early history of this community, discovered this short story by the grandfather of John Woodman and the great grandfather of Jonathan S. Woodman of Paw Paw. She thought it ought to go in with these history stories and we agreed.

A clipping from the Geneva Gazette, an old newspaper of 1821, gives an account of Gen. Cass's canoe voyage in that year.

As a curious coincidence I might mention that several columns are devoted to the Constitutional Convention then in session in Albany, New York. The leading man was Martin Van Buren.

The most remarkable thing, however, in this ancient sheet, is the way in which Gen. Cass went to Chicago to hold a treaty with the Indians, and this I believe to be the most wonderful canoe voyage in American history. Let the reader trace on the map the following route from Toledo to Chicago, which is thus given in the Geneva Gazette.

Gen. Cass on his route to Chicago, ascended the Maumee River to Fort Wayne. From there his canoe was carried over a portage of about nine miles to the head of the Wabash river. This river he descended to the Ohio and then descended the Ohio to the Mississippi. The latter he ascended to the mouth of the Illinois, one of whose tributaries approaches within ten miles of Chicago. The reader will see that in order to avoid a land journey of 300 miles through a wilderness, a circuitous course of five times that distance was endured. In this manner the government agent reached Chicago where he had a council with the Indians.

The direct journey can be made now in as many hours as it then took weeks, and during the extraordinary canoeing the party probably lived on fish and game. The route took them past St. Louis and yet this was then the easiest and safest way of reaching their destination.

If Gen. Cass had kept a diary of that journey it would be one of the most interesting things of the kind in our history.

East Decatur Pioneer Days

Written for the Republican by Mrs. Sarah Graham Norton of Alamo, assisted by Mrs. Orris A. Roberts of Decatur, and published in the Republican in July, 1928. The clipping was sent to the Republican by Mrs. Marietta McDole Taylor who had written over it, "very interesting." We also find it very interesting and think this a good time to reproduce it. Mrs. Norton was one of the very early residents of Decatur. She was born in 1853 on Christmas Day and died in 1943.

When Wm. Ray's wife died he sold his farm to a Mr. Cross, who had one boy; they went out with the young people a great deal, and invited young and old to their home. They spent the evenings dancing, with "Bobby" Dunnington playing his violin. The girls took refreshments and all had a very pleasant time.

The school teachers would have spelling schools and exhibitions, and all enjoyed themselves much the same as at present. In the fall of the year when there were apples and peaches, the neighbors would go in, or make a bee, and pare and string the fruit until all was finished, when the lady of the house would serve refreshments; then they would play games or dance.

Two families, who came to East Decatur were always ready for a good time. They were Mr. Lathrope and Net Thurston. If the M. E. ladies wanted Mrs. Thurston to give a social she always complied and after supper when the older people had gone home, some one would ask if they could dance a few sets. "No quicker said than done." That caused quite a commotion, turning a social into a dance.

One night young and old went to Frank Carpenter's to a husking bee. The girls and women sewed carpet rags for Mrs. Carpenter, while the men were husking corn. After supper all had a good time playing "The Needle's Eye," "Drop the Handkerchief," or "Button, Who Has the Button," etc.

Mr. Doolittle lived on the Smith farm and sold it to William Powers. The family consisted of Mr. and Mrs. Powers and two adopted daughters. Frank Carpenter worked for Mr. Powers, and married one of the girls and John McAdams married the other one.

Mr. Moon sold his farm across the road from the Powers place to Myron Newkirk. Will Newkirk lived north of his brother's home on what was in later years known as the Burt Andrew's place. The Newkirks invited the young people of the neighborhood to come in for evenings and they danced and had fine times. We did not see any drinking or fighting.

A very sad accident happened about this time. Mr. Durkee had bought a small farm north of the McAdams place and built him a small house. He was clearing a few acres and in some manner a tree he was felling struck him and injured him so badly that he died in a few days. It was in a terribly stormy time and but few people were able to attend the funeral. My mother and aunt went to the home and did all they could to help them and keep them comfortable. There were four children—Libbie, Allie, Jim and Carrie. The neighbors were very good to them and made bees to help put in their crops and get wood and do anything needed for their comfort. The children were all very good to help their mother as soon as they were large enough.

if I would promise not to go on the lake. I promised and kept my word but I felt bad when all the rest went and I could only sit on the bank and watch the others have a good time.

Dennis Murphy bought the Sam Sweet place west of our place. There were several children—Thomas, Mary, Maggie, Lizzie, Nellie and Mat. Their place was not far from the Howlands, who were related to the Murphys; there was quite a family of them also—Will, Mary, Maggie, Anna, James, Mike, George, Nellie and Richie. The older Howland and Murphy children, my cousins, Alonzo and Ed. Ray.

The two Waters' children, Quinglas and Nettie and my brother and I had some good times going and coming from school. We had a lot of different teachers as so many of them only taught one term, which might be of two, three or four months. A teacher seldom stayed a full school term.

The worst teaher or master we ever had, was Jim Maddison. No matter what the weather was if we were not on the grounds when the last bell rang, we were not allowed to enter until recess or at noon. He bacame so cruel that the pupils all left school. The school board tried to discharge him but he had his contract and claimed they could not discharge him, and he refused to go.

It was in the contract that he was to board around. Each family was to board him so many days or weeks, according to the number of children they had of school age. He went to the school house each morning and built a fire and remained there all day alone, not a pupil came. He studied law until the end of the term and drew his salary the same as though the full quota of children were there every day.

I worked in Decatur for Mr. and Mrs. Jack Tuttle. They were very nice people. Then I went to Lawyer Cole's. He was very sick with the old-fashioned T. B. and died in the spring. Then his daughter and husband came to live with Mrs. Cole and her children. The daughter's husband was E. A. Blackman, editor of the Decatur Republican.

I stayed there until I became sick with the ague. I would have a chill and fever every other day and worked as long as I could, but finally had to quit and go home until I was well. Then I went back to work again, as Mrs. Blackman and I got along so well that they were glad to have me back, so I stayed with them until all three of their children were born.

We do not hear anything much about ague any more since the timber has been cut down and the swamps drained. There are not so many mosquitoes to carry malaria as formerly. While I was working for Mrs. Blackman the East Decatur people planned to have a Christmas tree. It was their first attempt and was certainly a grand success. You can imagine how we felt as the names were being called, each wondering whose would be the next name called. I think that was in December, the 24th, 1870.

In 1872, Oscar Caldwell went north to Howard City to work at lumbering. He hired Mr. and Mrs. Henry Kirtland to stay at the camp until he could get other help. He hired my mother, brother and myself giving us three dollars a week. He also hired Mr. and Mrs. Milo Hatch and my uncle, William McNeal, Johnny Richmond and the two Stone boys. My mother cooked for eighteen to twenty men all winter.

It was there I met Mr. Rollin Norton, who was Mrs. Oscar Caldwell's brother, and we were married on the tenth of the next September, 1873, and left in December for Alamo, where we have resided ever since, excepting about six months when we were in Ohio.

Fifty-five years later there only remain a very few of the old settlers and all but two have moved onto other farms.

Our Winter In Florida

By Fred W. Green

Since our return from the South Arba has repeatedly asked me to write about the trip. I have refrained from doing so because the ground has been so thoroughly covered by others from Decatur. But so long as he felt I should add my impressions and experiences, and to keep the peace within the Republican office and at 110 West St. Mary's street, I here proceed:

Starting from scratch, I began to prepare for the trip South in September, first by placing an ad in the St. Petersburg Times for a room to stay in when I arrived there. The ad. brought many 'answers,' so many that they raised Edna's curiosity, and she asked what all the mail from St. Petersburg was about. I told her I had advertised for a room. Her next question was when I expected to go. My reply was October 10th or 11th, or about that time.

A few days later she said, "You know I have been thinking I will go with you this year and try it again." Fine, I replied, so sent another ad for an apartment which brought 42 answers, all of which were turned over to her for inspection. She asked questions as to where the various places were located, all of which I was able to tell her.

The places were sifted down to two that I thought would satisfy her. Both were out of the down town radius, so I sent the two addresses to a friend who lives in St. Petersburg the year around and asked him to visit them and send his impressions, which he did. Then I asked my friend Gus for a confirmation and we took the place he selected. It was satisfactory and we lived in it all the time we were there.

Planning the Trip

Next we talked about the trip and made plans as to when we would start. My question was how much time she wanted in which to get ready. She didn't know, so to bring the matter to a head I asked her if 30 days would be enough, and she said, "Plenty."

I said, very well then, we will start October 11. I tol her the car woul be standing in front of the house all packed and ready to start at 10 a. m. It was there at the minute and I was seated in it waiting for the lady to arrive. She was there a little late, but take it all in all she did a good job of getting ready. It was raining good and plenty and she kicked on starting in the rain, but I brushed that aside with the remark that starting out on a 1,300 mile trip one could not regulate the weather. So off we started, getting a nice send-off from Miss Carney and Mrs. Bope.

It rained continuously all the way to South Bend, in spite of the old adage of "rain before seven, shine before eleven." The sign failed, so on we went in the rain until I became discouraged and asked her if she did not think we should find a place to stay for the night. After traveling another 40 miles, that is what we did. We found a nice place, not very attractive from the outside, but the food was good and that was all that mattered.

After a good night's rest we found another good restaurant and after a good breakfast continued on our way. The rain had stopped. We went through Indianapolis to a small town named Memphis where we found excellent accommodations, including our first chicken dinner.

We stopped at Elizabethtown, called "E" town for short. From there we went to a town called Springfield, then to Huntsville, a lively town where we stopped at the Erskin Hotel where, to our surprise, we found one of the best hotels on our entire trip. Edna was not feeling any too good there, so I had to eat alone, and I did eat a regular dinner with all the trimmings.

We stayed at Huntsville but one night and drove on to Guntersville where the government has a wonderful dam. We stopped to examine it, but there was nothing to see but water. We next reached WeDOwe where I have a post office friend, and then Opiteka. It was very hot and I was ready to get out of the car when we arrived there Friday. We stayed there until Monday morning and had a good rest.

The country was football crazy. Georgia Tech was playing a conference game about four miles from there and I never saw such crazy driving as we saw Saturday and Sunday, so it did not take much persuading to hold me there till Monday. That was the biggest drive I made on the way to St. Petersburg,—210 miles, not far for an expert, but enough for me in one day. The landlord turned his radio over to us for the Northwestern game while he went into another room and turned on one for the Georgia game. They got trounced but Northwestern won.

Monday morning we went on to Columbus, Ga., 20 miles, for breakfast, then on to Thomasville where we found a super motor court hotel. It is wonderful how they get those places up with everything to make one feel like being at home. We stopped there one night. We then were within hailing distance of our destination.

I always stop at Brooksville before going in to St. Pete. It has a nice hotel and good food. One can get an extra dolling up there and after sitting in a car a week he needs it. Besides it is better to arrive at your destination early in the day.

We Arrived at St. Pete

So we arrived at our new home in good season and were able to get our things unpacked and find a good place to eat before night. We had three rooms, all electric household utensils in good working order and plenty of hot water, so what more could we ask. We had to furnish our own sheets and other linens, but we had them and I think you will agree that we were well housed.

Now that we were there, just what did we do with ourselves? That is a hard one to answer as there were so many things to do to take up the time. Let's take up Edna's activities first. She fussed around the house and now and then went down town with me, but very seldom.

Silver Springs

We took two trips out of town and chose one of the two days it rained while we were there. We went to a noted place called Silver Springs. Had to leave home at seven and be down town at eight in order to get a seat in the bus. It is a four hour ride from St. Pete. On the way the bus stopped at an orange grove and all were allowed to pick one orange just as a novelty. All got out and picked it in the rain and the bus went on to Silver Springs.

The driver announced that we were about to pass a novelty, to take a good look at it and a picture if we desired. The bus stopped a minute for all to read the sign over a large juice factory. It read "California Juice Factory." I wonder how many juice factories in the heart of the California fruit belt have Florida signs on them. I would say, not many or any. This factory is run by the famous Del Monte Canning Company. All their products are labeled California. I thought it queer for a California company to be processing fruit in Florida, but there it is, an enormous plant.

This Silver Springs is a water picnic place as the name would indicate. We were taken out in a boat with seats all around it, and in the middle one can see the springs through the glass bottom. We could see fish in profusion and all kinds of aquatic growth. It was spectacular. We floated around in this boat for perhaps 30 minutes, then entered another boat with portholes all around it so we could see what is going on under the water which is crystal clear. That took up another 30 minutes.

Then there were the diving ladies who do water stunts, but the day we were there they were afraid of getting their bathing suits wet, so we did not see them perform. We were told they were wonderful high divers, but they can't prove it by us. We purchased cards and looked for a place to eat, but found none inviting and so postponed that part of our picnic until later on. The driver announced that the bus was ready to start back so we clambered aboard and returned home via Tampa tired but satisfied we had seen a lot, even if it had rained all day.

Lucy Howland

Another trip we made was to see Lucy Howland. Lucy wasn't at home but we improved the loss of her company by having supper at the famous Columbia restaurant known all over the world. There are five distinct restaurants,—Spanish, American, Italian, German and Cuban. You can get anything you want in the way of food, and if you eat all you are served you are a wonder. I do not like the place for that reason. They pile the plates so full of what is ordered that it takes one's appetite away. It is a shameful waste of food, but they do it every time. The wines they serve are from all over the world and of rare vintage. Then of course they serve Balantine ale and other brews on the market.

After being the guest of a lovely lady who worked with me in the post office for many years we returned home. This lady visits St. Petersburg a few weeks every year. So we failed to see Lucy but had a good trip and a wonderful dinner anyway.

Lucy took a day off later and visited us in our York street home. Her and Edna's tongues wagged for several hours while I spent the time listening, writing letters and sleeping. They roasted anyone and everyone they could think about, including some newspaper people we will not mention by name, but you should be able to guess.

Lucy is going to visit here later on but thinks she is pretty well tied up this year. However, she added, one can never tell. She looked good to me, and I am sure she enjoyed the day off from her arduous duties.

Spending the Time

I put in much of my time reading the daily newspaper. Took Edna to look at the waves, but she refused to go in, in spite of the fact that I offered to buy her a one piece bathing suit. Nothing doing, although it did look nice and the women wearing them seemed to be enjoying themselves.

I put in a lot of time at the Bowling club playing cards and bowling, every now and again taking a stroll down town. I sat on the Green benches when I was tired, which was frequently, but was not snatched up as you can see.

When Monday, April 11, arrived the car was already loaded by Gus and myself ready to sail at the break of dawn, but the sailing simmered down to almost noon. Edna was glad when the sails billowed out and the ship started North to dear old Michigan.

Time never hangs heavily on one's hands down South. There is something to do every hour of the day. Sunday was one day Gus and I always spent together. He would pull up at York street in the morning. Edna would have a good dinner of strawberry shortcake, which was in season from January to the latter part of March. Then we would attend community singing conducted by a fascinating lady who will get more singing out of a crowd than any other mortal I ever saw. She conducts the Sunrise Easter service attended by 5,000 people.

After the Sunday singing Gus would go home with me and we would spend the balance of the day talking about Chicago, and Milwaukee avenue in particular. We never get tired talking about Chicago. That takes care of the way we spent the days in St. Petersburg.

Going Home

Now we are on our way home, receiving the best wishes of our neighbors as we leave. We returned home a different way, going through Argo, Clearwater, Tarpon Springs and Port Richey, New Port Richey and Brooksville. After we were out a couple of hours it began to rain and we drove through rain all day and the next day.

The hills are steep this way, but are not to be considered mountains. The drivers going South this way don't get behind those big trucks, for some of them are loaded so heavy that they get stuck on the hills. On the last day of the trip, when we were 125 miles from South Bend it snowed, and this was the first snow I had seen in six years. After breakfast we started out in a rain and it rained all the way till we arrived at 110 West St. Mary's street, Decatur.

Anyone who has the patience to read this letter I hope will enjoy it. It took me a long time to get started to writing it, but when I did get started I enjoyed the writing. It has given me an opportunity to answer a lot of question about the trip both North and South.

I must mention a pleasant incident which occurred on our way home. We were given the high sign by a continual tooting of the horn, so returned the salute and stopped. A gentleman walked up and said he knew we were from Van Buren county. I greeted him by saying, I know you but do not recall your name. He replied by saying, "Your name is Green." Then I asked him his name and it turned out that I bought some spray dope from him many years ago when he was clerk at the Lawrence Coop. Later he went into business for himself and he and his sons are still in it. He was Mr. Simmons of Lawrence. He asked where we were stopping. We were about 20 miles from Opelika and I told him we would stop there over night. It turned out that his daughter had driven 237 miles that morning and was still going strong, so after a pleasant visit we parted company.

We visited Mr. and Mrs. Fred Buys twice at their Lantern Lane apartment in St. Petersburg, and also Mr. and Mrs. Peter Gaertig at their winter home. We also saw Mrs. Chas. H. Wolbert, sister of our townsman, Raymond Gale, who is a permanent resident of St. Pete. We also saw Mr. and Mrs. Cyrus Tremper. They are former residents of Decatur although they have not lived here for many years. They went from here to Cleveland, Ohio, where they taught school until their retirement, and they now have a pleasant home in this Floria city. Mrs. Tremper is a daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Alden Knights.

This is the finish.

The reward of one duty is the power to fulfill another.

DEATH OF CHARLES E. WARNER

Charles E. Warner, 86, 312 Broadway, Niles, a former justice of the peace and a prominent Mason, died shortly after noon Tuesday at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Helen Miller in Chicago.

Mr. Warner, who was known among his many friends as Judge Warner, had been in failing health since the first of this year when he and his wife, Kittie Lee Warner, joined their daughter in Chicago for the winter.

He was born in Volinia, Cass County, February 1, 1863, and was reared in that area.

Early in life he entered into the furniture industry and was employed by several large furniture companies in Chicago, Ill., and Denver, Colo., before returning to this area 18 years ago.

He served for a time as Cass county sheriff and from 1934 to 1936 he was a justice of the peace in Niles.

Besides being prominently known in the furniture field, Judge Warner gave much of his time to Masonry.

He was among Michigan's most prominent members of the Masonic body and held many high offices during his years of activity in the lodge.

He was raised to the third degree in Volinia lodge 227 and later became master. On May 24, 1884 he served in offices in Chicago and Denver lodges while residing in those cities.

He was elected to honorary membership in the St. Joseph Valley lodge of Niles on May 2, 1939, and served as chaplain of the Niles lodge for several years. He was a representative to the grand lodge from Niles on many occasions.

Surviving besides his widow is one daughter, Mrs. Helen Miller of Chicago; three grand daughters, Miss Helen Warner, Santa Barbara, Calif., Miss Phyllis Miller, Chicago, and Mrs. Patricia Earl, Washington, D. C.; and three sisters, Mrs. Ralph Goodenough and Mrs. Edna Sherman of Cassopolis, and Mrs. Jessie Green, Dowagiac.

Funeral services were held last Friday at 3:30 p. m., at the First Presbyterian church with the Rev. T. M. Greenhoe officiating. Burial was at Crane cemetery in Volinia.

Roscoe Burch, past grand master of the Masonic lodge of Michigan, officiated in the Masonic rites at the church and the St. Joseph Valley chapter of Niles conducted the graveside services with Harry Blake, chaplain of the Niles lodge in charge.

Masons of the Niles lodge and the Volinia lodge attended the services.

Charlie Warner remembered his friends with original greeting cards each Christmas holiday. He had a natural gift of composing rhymes and poems and it was his way of remembering those near to him. We have received one of these clever Christmas greetings from him every holiday for the past twenty years or more, have looked for it and expected it, and should have been greatly disappointed if it had failed to appear in the mail. Mrs. Warner joined him in the sending and the last one, received four short months ago, was as follows:

A SURE CHRISTMAS GREETING

What kind of a Christmas card is this?
Somebody's thinking has gone amiss.
Whoever wrote the crazy thing
Has bells in his belfry that do not ring—

Sez you.

FESTIVAL ECHOES

By Elwood Scott.

Decatur's Centennial and Celery Festival is past, but many things of that occasion will live in the memory for a long, long time. Many of the boys had grown whiskers for this event and they did a swell job of it in presenting different types of beards, mustaches, and chin ornaments. We hear a lot about the "Gay Nineties," but the hairy facial adornment so strongly in view the last day of the celebration belonged more to the "Elegant Eighties." Then, too, Mrs. Alta Taylor, Mrs. Doc Marks, Mrs. Bert Kidman, Mrs. Tom Mahoney, Mrs. Lohroff, and Mrs. Lou Graham, with several others, were garbed in the costumes of a long time back.

The display of relics in the store windows was a revelation to the thoughtful of this generation, while it gladdened the eyes of the old timers, for in their younger days they had used implements like these in their daily tasks.

Grace Weeks had a lot of pictures taken in the village when the camera was a mysterious rarity. Other windows had photographs and tin types of some of the pioneers whose names are now only a tradition. Two fine oil paintings stirred the memory deeply, for they were the likenesses of Dolphin Morris and his wife, the father and mother of Henry Morris, who with his wife, were the victims of an unsolved and spectacular murder mystery in 1879. These paintings were loaned by Mr. and Mrs. Elmer Morris.

Charlie Hughey had a German song book of 1726, fully two inches thick, only slightly wider and seven inches long. This was leather bound, but of surprisingly light weight. Other books of his collection were bibles dated 1781 and 1769. He had also a "Non Sectarian" bible dated 1836, and on the fly leaf was a notation that his great-grandfather had been killed by lightning, and had a Masonic funeral in 1838. In one binding was the Old and New Testaments, 1845. Almost like new was the famous McGuffy Fourth Reader of 1879, and by the same author a "Juvenile Speaker" dated 1860. But Mrs. Guy Collins probably had the oldest book exhibited, a bible printed in 1609.

In the Reick jewelry store window was a truly remarkable machine, in its day. This was a combination lathe and jewel setting tool, with many other uses. It was a beautiful precision instrument made of brass, or bronze, and had spiral gears. It was used in the actual making of watch parts over two hundred years ago. If the foot power treadle wheel had been invented, it was not used here. The fine mechanic of those old days turned the crank with one hand while he used the cutting tools with the other. Right beside this there were two chain drive watches, considerably more than a century old. The chains which drove them were made much like a bicycle chain, though they did not run over cogs. This chain, no larger than an ordinary thread, had carefully finished tiny links riveted together with almost microscopic sized rivets. It was fastened to the mainspring barrel, and by the cleverly designed principle of an ever-widening spiral applied the same power to the watch mechanism when fully wound up, or when nearly run down. These watches were made by M. I. Tobiac, of Liverpool, and were considered the finest in the world. Earl Copley had one complete in the case, and in fine preservation.

The highlights of the festival were furnished by Edgar Bergen, who besides giving his own services, brought some topnotch entertainers, so the people had a rarely good show. No doubt the best part of the fun began after the scheduled show Friday night, and the players had returned to the band stand. There, Edgar Bergen and his brother Clarence, Ircel Twing, the comedian (Pat Patrick), and Jim Sherman went into high gear and convulsed those fortunate enough to be there.

The Kangaroo Court was convened, and many were tried and fined for not growing beards. One of those "arrested" and tried was Edgar Bergen, himself. During his testimony, "Judge" Hughey asked him how many times he had lied to the court, and he answered, "Twice." So he was given a stiff fine for lying the third time. When he refused to pay they put him in the stocks, and if any photographer had snapped the scene it would have been a rare picture of the great comedian with his hands and feet fastened thus. Then the crowd found the "Judge" guilty of a misdemeanor and put him in the stocks also. With this the whole company went down the street playing the games of chance, pranks upon each other, and acting like a bunch of happy kids. Bergen was no longer famous, nor any kind of a celebrity. His friends took him in, and again he was just one of the old gang. It was noticeable that while here he stopped to chat with all his old acquaintances who made themselves known, regardless of how they were dressed. And if he did not enjoy himself in this homecoming, then he is a superb actor, far better than anyone could believe. It was probably summed up best in the inelegant remark of a bystander, who said, "He is a regular guy." And for sincerity, no higher compliment could be paid.

An Indian Mystery

By Lisette Stevens, Paw Paw, Michigan.

In the early years of 1800, my great-grandfather, Nathaniel Leverich, with his three brothers and their families, started west from "York State" by wagon train. In Indiana, my grandfather and several other old time families, decided they would go north into Michigan, while his three brothers and the rest of the train decided to go on to the Oregon trail.

They reached the trading post of Chicago, in time to join an outfit leaving soon. When they arrived at the Mississippi River, it was in flood, so they went south a day's drive, crossed at another ford, made their circle, built fires, to dry their bedding and clothes, and rest, to get an early start in the morning, as they were in hostile Indian territory.

The next morning, a fourteen year old boy, the son of one of my uncles, was missing. They searched for four days. He had been "sick with the fever" when they got there. Then a scout rode up to tell them he had sighted hostile Indian scouts, so the wagon boss said they should leave at once for the safety of the others. They headed north to the Oregon trail, never knowing whether the boy in his delirium had wandered away to be killed by wild animals, captured by Indians, or drowned in the Mississippi.

Honorary Degree Doctor of Laws Conferred upon Charles H. Mahoney

The Republican editor has recently received a copy of the commencement issue of The Olivet Optic, on the first page of which is a picture of Charles H. Mahoney and the announcement that Olivet College had conferred upon him the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws.

Dr. Thomas of the faculty read the citation for the honorary degree as follows:

By direction of the faculty and the board of trustees, I have the honor, Mr. President, to ask your official commendation of Charles Henry Mahoney, of Detroit, Michigan. Born in Decatur, Michigan, he attended Olivet college for three years where he was a member and officer of Adelphic society and where in 1907 he won the college's most esteemed junior award, the Drury prize in oratory. Offered a teaching post in the preparatory school of Fisk, he taught there during his senior year and graduated from that university with the class of 1903. After three years at the University of Michigan where he obtained his degree in law, he was admitted to the bar in 1911 and immediately began the practice of his profession in the city of Detroit.

He has since had a distinguished career serving city, state and nation with characteristic devotion for well nigh forty years. Mr. Mahoney has served his city as a member of its planning commission, his county of Wayne as supervisor over a period of ten years. He has served his state under three governors as commissioner for the department of labor. He has served his nation during the recent war as chairman of the inter-racial war bond committee. Eminent in civil affairs, he is eminent also in the field of education. He has been Detroit chairman of the United Negro College fund for several years. He has been active as a member of the Southern Education Foundation having in its disposition, the Jeanes, Slater, Peabody and Virginia Randolph funds, and maintaining some five hundred teachers in the south and giving needed aid to southern schools.

Lawyer, loyal alumnus, distinguished citizen, Olivet is proud to claim him for her own. His career most happily combines activitiy and accomplishment. We honor him for that ability which has enabled him together with some associates to organize a great insurance company and to preside as chief executive officer of that organization for twenty-one years; we honor him for those years of sacrifice which led him to serve his community and country with so selfless a devotion. To honor him and also to honor ourselves, I would ask, Sir, in the name of the faculty and the board of trustees of Olivet college that you now admit Charles Henry Mahoney to the degree of Doctor of Laws, Honoris Causa.

Dr. Mahoney's childhood and youth were lived in Decatur. His parents were Mr. and Mrs. Barney Mahoney and their home was just around the corner on West St. Mary's street. Charles graduated from the Decatur high school in the class of 1904, and his splendid record from that time on to the present is told in the statement printed above.

"The feature of the Olivet College alumni banquet," states the Olivet newspaper report, "was an address by Charles Henry Mahoney of Detroit, a former student and classmate of President A. L. Ashby who left the campus 42 years ago.

"Dr. Mahoney was introduced by President Ashby who told how he had followed the career of the speaker as a public servant and a member of the legal profession.

"There are some things that money cannot buy," continued Dr. Ashby, "and friendship is such a thing. Friendship becomes sweeter through absence."

The college head related how he and Mr. Mahoney were classmates and that he recognized the stamp of a real man in the latter—a man of whom Olivet could now well be proud.

"When it was first suggested that I come to Olivet as a speaker I thought it was a fine idea," said Mr. Mahoney in opening his talk. "But as the time grew nearer I began to think that it was not such a good idea after all. I began to turn over in my mind what I should say. I wrote two speeches. One I threw away and a part of the other I brought with me.

"When I came back today, I attended lunch and then I walked around the campus. I noticed that Parsons hall was gone. The chapel was gone. The old gym was gone. And then I began to wonder what there was left of Olivet life to remember after 42 years. I tried to recall who my professors were and what subjects they taught. I could not remember the names of some of the professors and what they taught."

The speaker then went on to tell how he remembered Dr. Thomas W. Nadal, Professor George Knapp, Dr. Herbert A. Miller and Professor Daniels. He then realized, he said, that Olivet meant personalities and what they stood for.

"I would have chosen this commencement of all the commencements in the 42 years to come back," declared Mr. Mahoney, "because Olivet has reached a place where a new start is to be made."

A GOOD WORD FROM DR. MAHONEY

(Dr. Mahoney does not forget his old home town and his reminiscent letters are looked forward to with pleasure. We are particularly pleased to receive this one which indicates that his health is improving. Before the summer is over he may be able to visit Decatur again.)

Room F270, Hines Hospital,
Hines, Illinois, May 2, 1949.

Dear Sir:

Nothing marks the flight of time more accurately than your little reminder on the wrapper of my copy of the Decatur Republican which said May 4, 1949. So as not to be on the delinquent list, yesterday being Sunday, I am forwarding post office order for $2.50 not being a resident of Van Buren or Cass counties.

We have a large and busy post office in this hospital. It occupies a large area of floor space and has many employees. It certainly does a large volume of business. I have been here now nearly three years which is a long time to live in a wheel chair, but I hope to be able to walk some very soon, and I will then leave here and go and live with my son who lives in Wilmette. He has a nice home, a large lot and many shade trees. But certainly Uncle Sam takes good care of the veterans here. No fault to find.

Sincerely,
Geo. W. Mahoney.

THE FIRST RESIDENT OF ARLINGTON

An interesting history of the township of Arlington, written by C.B. Charles, was published in the Bangor Advance last week from which we quote the following:

The first settler in the township was William N. Taylor, who, as a young man of twenty one came with a party from Monroe to New York to settle in the township of Columbia. Mr Taylor purchased one hundred twenty acres and built a log cabin on the corner of Section 8 where Earl Bigelow now resides. Mr Taylor's three brothers settled in Bangor Township.

"It is related that the men, women and children of the party, with whom Mr. Taylor came, walked from Detroit along the trail, single file, like the Indians who had made the path. Their sole possessions were hauled by a single pair of steers which they had purchased in Detroit."

William N. Taylor was the father of Mrs. Ella M. Moulton of Decatur and grand father of the publisher of the Republican. He was born in 1812 and moved in an early day from Arlington to Lawrence. The Taylor farm on the north bank of the Paw Paw River was for many years a land mark of the town.

William N. Taylor died there in 1899 at the age of eighty-seven. He was a tireless worker all of his life. The fall that he was eighty-six, the writer drove over to his home and found him high up in an old apple tree picking apples.

Albert Breed, who is mentioned in the story as the first white child born in Columbia Township, was a few weeks old when his mother died. He was adopted by Mr and Mrs. Taylor and remained in the family until he married. He was a veteran of the Civil War.

Daniel S. Powers, Prominent Detroit Engineer

Graduate of Decatur High School in 1917.

By Bessie Fuhrman

"Daniel S. Powers, e'19-'22, prominent Detroit engineer, and former resident of Traverse City, was guest of honor at a dinner given by the R. H. McManus Company at the Park Place hotel in Traverse City early this fall. He has been associated with many large engineering projects such as Willow Run Bomber Plant, manufacturing plants for General Motors, Ford, Chrysler, Kaiser-Frazer and other large industries, as well as numerous highway projects. He is a member of the Engineering Society of Detroit and a Registered Civil Engineer and land surveyor. For the past two years he has commuted weekly between Acme and Detroit, and he is now retired from active participation in his firm, but is continuing as consultant. He is spending most of his time in Traverse City now."

—The Michigan Alumnus.

Several years ago I wrote a story for the Republican about one of our pioneer widows, Mrs. Daniel Alexander of Porter township, who was left with six children to bring up by herself. It was one of a series of pioneer stories of Van Buren county, and the title was, "Great Aunt Margaret." The baby Dannie in my story has become the Daniel Spencer Powers in the article that I have taken from my Michigan Alumnus magazine of Nov. 5, 1949.

Having known Dan since he was a baby, it is only natural for me to be glad to pass on further information about him as a man. The "Alumnus" hits a few of the "high spots" of his career, but has given little else concerning him as a man of character in which perseverence, painstaking care, kindness and modesty are some of the dominant traits.

So, I am taking it upon myself to present a further account of some of the facts which never could have been probed out of Dan by a merely curious questioner, much less by a reporter for publication.

Having given the setting of Dan's babyhood in "Great Aunt Margaret," I shall start here with his work as a boy on the farm of his mother's pioneer parents. He worked there as any other boy probably would have done, and after completing his district school education at the Bell school, decided to go to high school in Decatur. He was here four years, graduating in June, 1917. Before he was through the first World War began and he was claimed for training at the Great Lakes training station near Waukegon, Ill. However he was released long enough to return and receive his diploma with his class.

One of Dan's experiences he had in trying to finance his education he should tell himself, but since he isn't likely to do so, I'll tell it.

One summer he and several other high school boys were hired to sell a stock book with other helpful ideas besides those about stock. Dan went to Lafayette, Indiana, and tried selling the book around Purdue University. He could not find prospects or if he did he must have been too scared to push the sale or his training was inadequate. Anyway, Dan had to give it up and get another job. The only one then available was that of driving mules. As he was not familiar with mules and their ways Dan soon got sick of this job and had to write for money to pay his way back home. Hitch-hiking then was too slow for a hungry boy.

Whether he shook the mule's dust off his feet as a testimony against the fellow who got him into that "raw deal" I don't know, but I am certain that Dan has not forgotten that experience in trying to be a salesman.

Farm work was after all his best chance for earning his way through college, so having chosen U. of M. for his college course he went there in 1919. There he secured jobs that helped to finance his expenses. One of them proved to be a blessing in disguise other than that of financial help.

He had made the acquaintance of one of the regents of the University through tending the furnace in the regent's home. While working there Dan's marks were not what he thought he should have. In desperation he confided in the regent. The result was that after that his marks were better.

It is my opinion that had it not been for that helping hand and the regent's confidence in him, Dan might have lost his chance to pursue his education at the U. of M. It is certain that the influence of the regent who interceded for him with his professors did help him. Dan held on until he had accrued enough knowledge to obtain a position which released him from the University in 1922, one year before he had completed his four year course and before he could receive his diploma.

So without the help of the credential—a U. of M. diploma—Dan was on his own.

One of the first of his noteworthy achievements was that of re-routing the Penn R. R. through South Bend. The tracks in 1918 ran across S. Main street, and the flagman sat where the new Super Market now stands. Having known that location before the change was made, the improvement is easily appreciated.

This summer when he and his brother Fred, from Cadillac, called on me I asked Dan how long ago it was since he did that work for the Penn R. R. and he said it was about 25 years ago.

Several years ago when his mother (cousin to my mother) called on my mother and me. I mentioned the visit of our neighbors, Cora Caldwell and Jean, to the Edison Memorial. Dan said, "I was there." I asked how it happened that he was there and he replied as casually as if he had been just another sight-seer, "I was the construction engineer." Modest? Well, that's Dan as a man.

As to Dan's private life, I regret to say that he has lived through much sorrow—enough to break the spirit of many. Not only the death of his parents, for whom he provided a lovely home in their old age, but the death of three of his uncles who still lived in the home where Dan grew up, the early death of his brother Gary who died with cancer and the sorrow of his sister-in-law's death, and that of his first wife, the latter having died of mental illness in a private sanitarium more than twelve years ago.

Dan has since remarried and after the long siege of sorrows and troubles of life it would seem that now happily married the long road of unhappiness had turned at last and that everything would be right from there on. And for a time the normal happy life seems to have prevailed.

Little Daniel the third came and is now a beautiful child of four years of age. Dan's spacious home on which he has lavished both time and money is in Traverse City to which he has commuted from Detroit some time by train and sometimes by auto for two years, and that's Dan as a family man.

Then after a comparatively brief time of happiness Dan had to undergo a major operation. He has recovered but the condition of his health has necessitated his retirement as an engineer, although the company for which he has labored many years still retains him as consultant.

Thus the blood of Michigan pioneers has made itself evident in telling records in the world's work by another "boy from Decatur."

(It is interesting to note that following the comment about Dan Powers in the Michigan Alumnus is the picture and a brief sketch of Ormond E. Hunt, also interested at one time and well known in Decatur.

Mr. Hunt was the husband of Hazel Hill, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Dana Hill, one of our best known Decatur families. She passed away some 20 or more years ago.

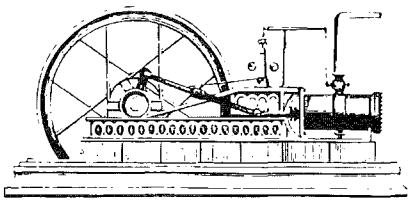
Mr. Hunt entered General Motors organization in 1921 as chief engineer for Chevrolet and played an important part in the development of Chevrolet's six cylinder engine. In 1929 he was appointed vice-president in charge of engineering at General Motors, and five years later was named a director of the company. Mr. Hunt has recently retired as executive vice-president of the great corporation.)



Noted Potowatomi Chiefs

While the Potawatomi did not produce chiefs as famous as some Indian tribes, there are a number who deserve special attention and should be familiar names to the student of Indian history.

TO-PE-NE-BEE

For more than forty years Topenebee was chief of the Potawatomi Indians. We do not know much about his life except in connection with his work as chief of his people. He was born at his father's village on the St. Joseph about the middle of the 18th century. His father, Ansquiba, was a noted chief in his day. Besides Topenebee, there was another son, Sawawk, whose daughter became the wife of the Indian chief, Pokagon. Anaquiba also had a daughter, Kaukeama, who became the wife of Wm. Burnett.

METEA

Near the present town of Cedarville, on the St. Joseph river of the Maumee, seven miles northeast of Fort Wayne, Metea, one of the best known of the Potawatomi chiefs, had his village. From this place he went forth to many a battle and later to many treaty assemblies. He is said to have had an active part in the massacre of Fort Dearborn. He led the Indians in the attacks on Fort Wayne shortly afterwards. Here he was wounded severely. He was in advance of his men when suddenly he came upon a part of Harrison's army. He jumped behind a small tree but his elbow was exposed. Major Mann of Harrison's army fired and broke his arm. Metea rushed back through the forest towards his men, carrying his broken arm and hotly pursued by Major Mann and others. His arm never healed, and after the wars he often told of his encounter with the white man.

He was a full-blooded Potawatomi with marked Indian characteristics. He was 6 feet tall and dignified in bearing. He appeared sullen and obstinate. His many experiences in bloody battles had left their impression. He usually had one eye painted red, significant of his savage nature. He often visited Detroit and Ft. Malden to receive presents from the British, whom he admired. He was interested in his people and later in life advocated and aided their education. But like too many of his people he fell a victim to drink. He attended a council with the Americans at Fort Wayne in 1827. Here he showed all his former dignity and ability. After the council he drank heavily, during which he drank some poison, as well as whiskey. Whether he did this by mistake or whether an opponent gave it to him has not been decided. He died the same day and was buried near the St. Mary's river in the western part of the present city of Fort Wayne.

SHABBONA

Shabbona was of Ottawa blood, a grand-nephew of the great chief, Pontiac. He was born on the Maumee river, Ohio, but at an early age migrated to Illinois where he later married a Potawatomi woman, the daughter of a Potawatomi chief, Spatke. Later he was elected chief of the Potawatomi and became one of their most admirable men. He established his village in what is now DeKalb county. When the Shawnee, Tecumseh, came west, he had a long conference with Shabbona. He later became an admirer of the great chief and followed him to war against the Americans. When Tecumseh fell at the battle of the Thames in 1814, Shabbona was at his side. After this battle he became disgusted with the way the British were using the Indians. He joined the American cause and was ever their trusted friend.

In 1827, during the Winnebago, rebellion, Shabbona visited the Winnebago chief, Big Foot, on L. Geneva, Wisconsin and tried to persuade him from attacking the Americans. Big Foot took him prisoner and for a time threatened his life. He was released, but the Indians reproached him by calling him the White Man's friend. During the Black Hawk war, Shabbona constantly warned the Americans about the intentions of the Indians. He saved many lives but gained the hatred of his race, for which he paid dearly in later years. One group of white people on Indian Creek, La Salle county, Illinois, did not heed his warning and all were killed by the Indians. There today, 14 miles north of Morris, is Shabbona Park, in honor of the Indian who was indeed the white man's friend.

WINAMAC

There has been much misunderstanding about Chief Winamac, because there were two Potawatomi chiefs by the same name. One was friendly to the U. S., the other was bitterly opposed to the Americans. The latter was killed in 1812 in a fight with the friendly Shawnee chief, Captain James Logan. The subject of this sketch died in 1821. His village was on the Wabash river, 11 miles downstream from the mouth of Eel river, where Logansport now stands.

While Gen. Harrison was governor of Indian territory, Winamac was his friendly aid in getting the Indians to make adjustments of their lands. Harrison wrote that Winamac was "an open and avowed friend of the U. S." He was strongly opposed to Tecumseh. For this reason he was marked for death by the Shawnees. At one time in council, Tecumseh poured out a torrent of abuse upon Winamac and threatened his life. Winamac cooly got his pistol ready and was undisturbed by the threats of the great Shawnee chief. Tecumseh accused Winamac of trying to persuade the Indians to sell their lands to the U. S. Winamac reported all the plans of Tecumseh to Gen. Harrison. At one time he attended a great council held at Parc Aux Vaches, now known as Bertrand, Mich. There the council under Tecumseh's suggestions planned to kill all the old chiefs and enlist the younger ones against Harrison. Winamac continued to attend the Indian councils and at one time boldly told The Prophet that he lied. He must have had great influence to be so daring without being killed.

SAUGANASH, OR BILLY CALDWELL

Sauganash, more familiarly known as Billy Caldwell, was the son of an Irish officer, Colonel Caldwell, in British service. His mother was a Potawatomi, remarkable for her beauty and wisdom. He was born in Canada about 1780, and was well educated in the Jesuit schools of Detroit. He was given the name of Sauganash, meaning "The Englishman." He fought with the British against the Americans and is said to have been with Tecumseh when he fell fighting the Americans in the Battle of the Thames.

He was in the neighborhood of Fort Dearborn when the massacre occurred there Aug. 15, 1812. After so many had been killed, some of the friendly Indians, were trying to protect their old friends, members of the Kinzie family. Among these were the Potawatomi chiefs, Waubunsee and Black Partridge. At one time it looked as though their efforts would be entirely unsuccessful, and that all white prisoners would be massacred. Just then another Indian chief arrived. The unfriendly Indians asked him his name. "I am the Sau-ga-nash," came the reply. It was the Indian chief Billy Caldwell, who aimed to say that he was the white man's friend. He entered the house, put his rifle behind the door as suspecting nothing, and then addressed the Potawatomi who had recently come with unfriendly attitudes:

"I was told there were enemies here, but I am glad to find only friends. Why have you blackened your faces? Is it because you are mourning for friends you have lost in the battle? Or is it that you are fasting? If so, ask your friend here and he will give you food. He is the Indians' friend and never yet refused them what they wanted."

The Indians were taken by surprise and were ashamed to state their real purpose. After receiving some presents they went away. The Kinzie family remained in hiding for some time and then were taken to the St. Joseph (Mich.) Potawatomi by Tope-ne-bee.

ALEXANDER ROBINSON

Alexander Robinson, whose Indian name was Che-che-bing-way, meaning blinking eyes, was the son of a Scotch trader and an Ottawa woman. He was born at Mackinaw, Mich., in 1789. In 1794, though only 5 years old, he was present at the Battle of Fallen Timbers when Gen. Anthony Wayne defeated the combined forces of many Indian tribes. Later he came west and identified himself with the Potwatomi. He came to be an influential chief among them. He was present at the massacre of Fort Dearborn and tried to keep the Indians from committing so much cruelty. He helped to rescue Capt. Heald and wife by taking them in a canoe the entire length of Lake Michigan to Mackinaw. In later years he helped Chief Shabbona to keep the Potawatomi from joining Black Hawk in his rebellion.

ZACHARIAH CICOTT

One of the Many traders along the Wabash river was a French Canadian by the name of Cicott. He married a Potawatomi squaw at what is now Independence, near Attica, Indiana. He and his Indian wife had five children. The oldest was named Zachariah who became skilful in all the ways and arts of the Indians.

When Tecumseh came west seeking allies among the Potawatomi, Zachariah opposed him, saying he was nothing more than an agent for the British. He was a scout for Gen. Harrison at Tippecanoe, and during the war of 1812.

Zachariah Cicott was a fine looking man, more than 6 feet tall. He was swarthy, with keen, black eyes. He was a shrewd trader and became quite wealthy for his time. He died in 1850 and is buried beside his wife in the old cemetery just north of Independence on the old Potawatomi Trail and near the great Potawatomi Springs. His important and faithful services for the Americans have been overlooked by many Indian history writers.

MICHIGAN MISSIONARIES

Max Hill has been sent to the British West Indies as a missionary. He is a son of Harvey Hill, once a resident of Decatur, now of Kalamazoo. The family lived here on East St. Mary's street. Zoe, the wife and mother, died here and is buried in Lakeside cemetery. Neva, Max's wife, is also a missionary and their little son Roger is with them.

Mrs. Bert Goens brought the Republican a copy of the Michigan Bulletin, published by the Christian service board of the Church of God. It contained pictures of the three standing beside their automobile, and a separate picture of Max.

A letter from the two contained this information: The Hills left Michigan on Sunday, August 21, and arrived in Grand Cayman Sunday, August 28. They went by boat as the plane was grounded for repairs. The trip was a stormy one with plenty of wind and rain. Max's letter in the bulletin contained this information:

"School began the 12th of September. Sister Hill has the primary grades, Sister Emily the elementary grades. We are looking forward to working with these people and are asking that God use us to the salvation of many souls."

When Max was a young boy and lived in Decatur one of the Hill family's closest neighbors was Mrs. Eva Kinney. She was always nice to Max and he has never forgotten her kindness.

A few weeks ago she received from him the following letter:

Max V. Hill,
Georgetown,
Grand Cayman, B. W. I.

Dear Eva,—

I suppose someone has told you we are here in the Islands for a year teaching and preaching. The weather here is very lovely. It is especially nice right now. We live right on the banks of the sea.

We go swimming often. Roger swims just like a native, and he is so brown he looks like one.

Tell Madeline hello for us when you see her. Foods here are high except the native foods.

It seems funny to think it is almost Christmas when it is so warm.

The last boat for the states before Christmas leaves around December 1. So we have to mail our cards early. Airmail costs too much for so many.

Worry

One of Henry Ward Beecher's favorite stories was about a young man who was applying for a job in a New England factory. Asking for the owner, he found himself in the presence of a nervous, fidgety man who looked hopelessly dyspeptic. "The only vacancy here," he told the applicant, "is a vice-presidency. The man that takes the job must shoulder all my cares."

"That's a tough job," said the applicant. "What's the salary?"

"I'll pay you ten thousand a year if you will really take over all my worries."

"Where is the ten thousand coming from?" asked the applicant, suspiciously.

"That, my friend," replied the owner, "is your first worry."

300 Passengers Lost In Sinking of Ship 'Lady of Elgin' 82 Years Ago

South Haven.—What was considered the greatest loss of life in the history of shipping on the Great Lakes occurred 82 years ago September 8, when the "Lady Elgin," a sidewheel schooner, went down in Lake Michigan, with a loss of 300 of its 400 passengers.

The ship sank off Winnetka, Ill., after colliding with the schooner, Augusta, conveying a cargo of lumber from a Michigan port to Chicago. The Augusta, which did not sink, was repaired and used for many years as a lake carrier. The ship, however, bore another name after the accident.

The sinking of the Lady Elgin was the subject of poems—long ago forgotten—and popular ballads. One of them, written by a Chicago printer, and entitled, "Lost on the Lady Elgin," was heard in theatres and music halls over a long period of years.

Adelbert Doebert, last survivor of the disaster, died in Milwaukee in 1921, aged 89.

The LADY ELGIN

Out from the poor man's cottage,
Forth from the mansion door,
Scattered along the waters,
And echoing 'round the shore,
Caught by the morning breezes,
Borne on the evening gale,
Cometh the voice of mourning,
A sad and solemn wail.

CHORUS

Lost on the Lady Elgin,
Sleeping to wake no more,
Numbered with those 300,
Who failed to reach the shore.

O 'tis the cry of children,
Weeping for parents gone,
Children who slept at evening,
But orphans awoke at dawn.
Brothers for sisters weeping,
Husbands for missing wives,
Such were the chords dissevered,
By those 300 lives.

PICTURES OF THE EASTLAND DISASTER

Ed [illegible] of Decatur, south of the village [illegible]ht to Weaver's last week two [illegible] of the Eastland tragedy in the Chicago river which occurred during the summer of 1915. The pictures were taken by an amateur photographer, the only photographer on the scene. He was about to board the boat as it began to turn over and stayed on the pier. The pictures were published and copyrighted by the Chicago Tribune. Several hundred excursionists were drowned by the overturning of the boat.

Our former townsman, Bert Hazleton, was on the staff of Mayor Thompson at the time, and in the Mayor's absence he took charge of the rescue work and the recovering of the bodies of the dead. It was one of the three worst tragedies ever to occur in Chicago. The others were the Chicago fire in 1871 and the Iroquois fire in 1903.

The pictures are in Weaver's window.

THIS WEEK

By ARBA N. MOULTON, Editor

Mrs. Margaret Parker passed away in Bangor last Saturday, July 16. She was 85 years old last Christmas Day, and has been a resident of this community from the time she was 17. She was born in the North of Ireland, in a section of that rugged island which has furnished Decatur some of its most substantial citizens, notably the Pollocks, the McWilliams, the Orrs and others.

Mrs. Parker was Margaret Pollock. She was but 17 when she left her native country alone for America and particularly Decatur, Michigan. Her brother had come here before her, was working for one of the McWilliams' and she had come to keep house for him. In a little while he got the Western fever and set out for the territory of Dakota. He expected his sister to go with him, but she had a definite mind of her own. She had come to Decatur to live, had made friends here and liked living here, and here she preferred to stay. The brother went on alone, located in the part of Dakota territory which later became the state of South Dakota, became a prosperous farmer, and the name of Pollock is well established there.

Mrs. Parker (Margaret Pollock) as a girl was honest, trustworthy, loyal, and a tireless worker, — qualities which remained with her throughout her active life. She could always find work. She did not look for it, the work looked for her. We were a small boy when she went to work in the home of Professor Upton on School street across from the school house. Being a chum of Conde Upton we were much in their home and our acquaintance with Mrs. Parker dates from that time. The Upton family also gave up to the Horace Greeley advice to "Go west, young man, and grow up with the country." They too wished their unusually agreeable and competent young helper to accompany them, but again she refused to leave Decatur, and it may be at that time young Edgar Parker had something to do with the refusal.

The Upton family never returned to Decatur and it is quite probable that Mrs. Parker never saw any of them again, but they never ceased to keep in touch with her, and she prized their friendship. After Mrs. Upton's death the children sent Mrs. Parker a copy of their mother's poems entitled "October Roses," and it became one of her prized possessions. Several times at her request we have published poems from it, and were glad to publish them.

Of this fine Upton family of father and mother and six children only Lucy and Belle are living, and their home is in Long Beach, California. It is an interesting coincidence that in this issue of the Republican which announces the death of Mrs. Parker, also is published the interesting letter from the Upton sisters on their trip east.

Mrs. Parker is the last of her generation to go, but there are younger generations who possess the same splendid qualities that her generation possessed, and this community is stronger and better for the influence of their lives upon it.

A few weeks ago we received the June bulletin of Solle's Bookshop located in the hamlet of Omena in the north of Leelanau county on Grand Traverse Bay. It brought the sad news of the sudden death on March 20 of Will Solle, who some ten years ago went into the north country, "far from the maddening crowds," and established a book shop now known by book lovers all over the United States.

Will Solle was vice-president and manager of the Kroch Company of Chicago when his health gave out and he sought rest in the quiet country of Northern Michigan. His many customers and friends, writing him for information about books, gave him the idea of selling books from his country home by mail. The plan was successful from the beginning and the business has grown each year. Mr. Solle had a record of 97% in finding books that were out of print and hard to obtain. He located several for this writer. He took such pains to please his customers, and was so friendly in his correspondence, that purchasers of books would go out of their way to buy of him. He gave complete service to the smallest detail, all in his desire to please, and without adding to the cost of the purchases. His son who will continue the business seems to possess the same desirable traits of the father and the Republican wishes him abundant success.

The National Geographic Magazine:- If you like to know more of the world in which we live, if you like beautiful pictures and stories of travel, entertainingly and accurately told, add the National Geographic to your regular reading, or read it in the Decatur Library. The article on shells by Rutherford Platt and the colored pictures of several hundred different shells in the July number is worth a year's subscription. Shells like the ornaments in our home from earliest memory are shown among the illustrations. They had their places on the old whatnot in the parlor and were seldom touched, but they represented something far away in the family history and were held in great respect.

One of the best pictures shown is that of the Chambered Nautilus. The writer says this shell is in a class by itself, "Not only for the beauty of its dynamic symmetry, but also biologically. It belong to the most highly organized group of Mollusks—the nautiluses, cuttlefishes, squids and octopuses. These animals, in contrast with other mollusks, have large bodies, well developed eyes, and a circle of arms (tentacles), often with sucker discs, arising from their heads.

"The Nautilus family occupies only the largest outer chamber of its shell. It protrudes from this to swim about and to catch crabs and other animals with its tentacles. For protection it withdraws completely within its shell.

"As the baby Nautilus grows, it builds its spiral with mathematical precision and, as it moves outward, leaves vacant chambers sealed with water tight partitions. The age of this shell is unknown. The chambers do not bear any relationship to years. One of the largest perfect specimens of the Chambered Nautilus ever found measures eleven inches across."

Oliver Wendell Holmes describes this shell in his beautiful poem printed here:

THE CHAMBERED NAUTILUS

This is the ship of pearl, which, poets feign,
Sails the unshadowed main,—
The venturous bark that flings
On the sweet summer wind its purpled wings
In gulfs enchanted, where the Siren sings,
And coral reefs lie bare,
Where the cold sea-maids rise to sun their streaming hair.

Its webs of living gauze no more unfurl;
Wrecked is the ship of pearl!
And every chambered cell,
Where its dim dreaming life was wont to dwell,
As the frail tenant shaped his growing shell,
Before thee lies revealed,—
Its irised ceiling rent, its sunless crypt unsealed!

Year after year beheld the silent toil

That spread his lustrous coil;
Still, as the spiral grew,
He left the past year's dwelling for the new,
Stole with soft step its shining archway through,
Built up its idle door,
Stretched in his last-found home, and knew the old no more.
Thanks for the heavenly message brought by thee,
Child of the wandering sea,
Cast from her lap, forlorn!
From thy dead lips a clearer note is born
Than ever Triton blew from wreathed horn!
While on mine ear it rings,
Through the deep caves of thought I hear a voice that sings:—
Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll!
Leave thy low-vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length are free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea!

The Republican is publishing in this paper a delightful travel story by two old time friends, Lucy Upton and her sister, Belle Upton Van Etten. Their trip took them across the United States and return, and as they reside in Long Beach, California, we have given the story the title, "Long Beach to Long Island and Return."

The ladies are daughters of Henry B. and Susan Conde Osgood Upton, and Mr. Upton was superintendent of the Decatur public schools at the time we began school. Mrs. Minnie Covington Wadsworth, their fellow resident of Long Beach, was also a resident of Decatur in those early days, and it was at her suggestion that we are favored with the story of the trip. It is pleasant to keep in touch with these friends of long ago, and there are still readers of the Republican who will remember them.

We saw a young man drive up to the curb on Main street, park and go into a store. He had straddled a streak of yellow about as nearly perfect as one could guess. His home is in the country approximately equidistant from two other towns. There was only one other car in the block, but the young man was clearly a violator. Down the street was an officer engaged in serious conversation with a prominent citizen of the village.

We stopped to watch the outcome, hoping the young man would get away without being ticketed. The officer continued to visit while the young man made his purchase, stepped into his car and was gone, all unconscious of the fact that he had perhaps narrowly escaped a ticket and a fine.

Some of our country friends have stated that they will not park on Main street because of the strictness of our parking laws. We believe they do not need to take such a stand. Our parking laws are no more exacting than those of other towns, and our officers are men of judgment. As a village we surely want the good will of our neighbors of the country, and a complete understanding with them is greatly to be desired.

The Republican has added to its staff another feature writer whom we believe its readers will follow with interest. He is Mr. Earl Wright who has, within the past year become a permanent resident of Decatur. He will write under the heading, "Country Folks," and the second of his contributions will be found in this paper.

Mr. Wright served 48 years with the United States Steel Corporation, 37 years of which he was superintendent. He became one of the most valued employes of the giant corporation and he holds three patents for making and rolling steel.

Twenty-eight years ago he bought a home on East St. Mary's street in Decatur and with his family spent the week-ends and vacations here. He retired the first of June, 1948, when he and Mrs. Wright gave up their handsome apartment in Chicago and came out to their Decatur home to stay.

"He either fears his fate too much,
Or his deserts are small,
That dares not put it to the touch
To gain or lose it all."

It is not easy to record the death of a lifelong friend. Charles Haefner called at the Republican office last Friday afternoon. He was making plans for a big trip, but his actual destination was very different from what he was planning.

He came to tell us that he intended to start for McEwen, Texas, Wednesday, the fifth of January, and to hold his Republican until he could send his address there. He would stop at Berrien Springs for Fred Hinkley who was to accompany him.

Next he asked if the new license plates were on sale yet, and we thought they were. He stopped for a few minutes visit and left the office to drive to Paw Paw, and that was our last meeting. He obtained the license and his number was "1 2 3 4."

In the evening he drove over to the Ella Graham farm for a farefell call on this former neighbor. She went to the kitchen to prepare refreshments and he lay down on the couch. When she returned he was gone. His leave-taking was as swift and unheralded as that,—a shock to his relatives and friends, but as the Psalmist said of the upright man, "The end of that man is peace."

Charles Haefner was a substantial member of a substantial family of this community. Their residence here dates back to the time of the Civil War when the generation of Haefners before him fought for the Union and helped to keep our country one country under the Stars and Stripes.

Throughout his younger years in farming Decatur was his trading town and in later years he followed a natural inclination to establish a home here. He was planning to spend his third winter in the Rio Grande Valley where he had made new friends, as he would wherever he located.

Charles Haefner is gone and he will not return in the spring as he had expected, but the influence of his life, well lived, will continue with us.

We think that fitting and appropriate for him is the following:

Not how did he die?
But how did he live?
Not what did he gain?
But what did he give?
These are the units
To measure the worth
Of a man as a man,
Regardless of birth.

Not what was his station?
But had he a heart?
And how did he play
His God-given part?
Was he ever ready
With a word of good cheer
To bring back a smile,
To banish a tear?

Not what was his church?
Nor what was his creed?
But had he befriended
Those really in need?
Not what did the sketch
In the newspaper say—
But how many were sorry
When he passed away?

People who buy books will hereafter notice another increase in the cost of them. The much criticized 80th Congress raised the fee for mailing from four to eight cents for the first pound, and from three to four cents for subsequent pounds. The increased rate began the first of January. The National Postal committee for books, headquarters New York, will petition the new congress for redress on the ground that the new rate is highly discriminatory.

Like the skyrocket and the stick 1949 is likely to see prices going up and down. Farm writers are predicting that farmers have seen the best prices for their produce that men now middle aged will ever see. Public servants are about to enjoy salaries larger than have ever before been paid in this country. Our local express agent receives orders that his company will not deliver express received at this station, even for the merchants on Main street.

A Detroit citizen says wages of carpenters in that city are three dollars an hour and he is holding up improvements on his house. The telephone company is not finding it easy to obtain an increase in rates. The president of the Great A & P store state in this paper that food prices are coming down.

The holiday trade everywhere was light and stocks look uninviting on the shelves. The beginning of a readjustment is upon us, and "caution" is the word to keep in mind. The recklessness of the war period will give way to the more healthy and satisfactory years of peace, and if our statesmen are sufficiently wise to guide our nation into years of permanent peace, the year ahead will be one in which we ultimately can rejoice.

Magician Lake

By Capitola Fassett

Some time ago our Editor requested an attempt made to write something of a history of Magician Lake, and efforts were made to learn more of the early days of the country surrounding it when the Indians composed quite a portion of the inhabitants. Their women appeared quite often at the homes of the white folks with baskets to sell or exchange for something to eat, and the baskets were worth all they received for them.

Had the writer been older when the time was at hand to take notice of that talked of by her elders, more of interest might have been remembered of that which was said.

One thing learned about the habits of young Indians was, when becoming "of age" (as we would say), in order to establish their standing in their race, a number of them would gather at the shore near the deepest water known to be in the lake, and all swim to the island opposite, and back. Any who failed and drowned were supposed to have been taken by "The Magician" because not fitted to live up to the requirements of a real and ideal Indian.

It seems by this that "The Magician" was considered as the "Great Spirit" or a Being appointed by Him to make the decision. Just at this point in the writing of this article a story was told to the writer which must have had a connection with the idea of magic concerning the lake.

Perhaps that which was said to have happened, or appeared to happen, was when few but Indians were dwellers in the vicinity.

The story is that there was a time when one of the islands sank into the lake and after a time (length of time not given) rose to the surface, seeming the same as before.

The earliest remembrance was when there was but one house on the shore, which was at the east end on a quite high elevation and between this bank and the lake was room for the roadway, which had, at the turn in front of the house a gravelly hill so short and steep as to make an almost impossible climb for a horse with buggy.

The residence here was the home of Ira Gould, the forefather of all the Goulds in the community of lakes, Sister, Dewey and Indian, besides Magician, which seemed, magically, to have no inlet, but really was fed by springs. The outlet was beautiful Silver Creek from which the township was named and which made possible, in the old days, to have mill ponds and flour mills where the country people could procure supplies of that kind.

Speaking of the oldest home of the Goulds, which was the only one on Magician 80 years ago, reminds one that a son and family lived about one half mile farther east.

The reason for the writer being strongly reminded of the place was an occurrence which might be of interest to younger people, it showing so plainly how much everything can change through the years. At the time when this younger Gould family lived at the place mentioned, the writer (then a child) went with others to this place to attend the funeral of an infant twin.

In that time of little convenience, and crude ways of an almost new part of the country, to a little girl who loved flowers, seeing a fan shaped bouquet clasped in a tiny hand of the beautiful babe, was something never to be forgotten. In those days there was no special help to bear the last duties to our loved ones other than that which came through the kindness of neighbors and friends.

Few flowers, if any; no funeral car, no undertaker with minute attention to needs of the occasion.

Also within the memory of the writer is seeing the earthly form of a saintly old man of her childhood days conveyed from his home to the church and cemetery in a light wagon drawn by that which, to him, was a beloved companion and faithful friend,—his old white horse. Services were held in a country church which he always attended and naturally had helped in building.

The church was surrounded by giant oaks, all with a background of farming fields, creating an unforgettable picture, as seen from the roadway, on the other side of which, a little farther toward the village, is the cemetery. Pondering on all the different phases in this sphere of existence, is it possible for us to say—that it was not an ideal funeral?

In nature is our first teaching, and, with all our trials, we still have our lakes and woods, and expressed in the Indian way, "thanks to the Great Spirit."

The Pathfinder and The Pony Express

By C. C. Evans.

I told last week about the Mormons in Utah and if it had not been for John C. Fremont the Mormons would not have known there was such a place as Utah. He traveled all through that great salt valley and spread the news of it to the world.

In 1842, 107 years ago, the government asked him to explore the west and to bring back as much of a description of it as he could. So with a party of engineers and Kit Carson as a guide he explored the region of the Rocky Mountains for a route to Oregon.

While on this mission he heard that the Mexican commander in California was about to expel all Americans from the province. At the same time he received orders from this government to protect our interests.

Fremont defeated the Mexicans in the Sacramento Valley and Commodore Stockton, with an American fleet cruising off the Pacific coast, gained control of the country, and California declared her independence of Mexico. That was the fifth of July, 1846. He led five different exploration parties to the west and became known as "The Pathfinder."

His wife paid him a fitting tribute when she said that from the ashes of his campfires have sprung cities. In 1850 he was elected California's first senator and in 1856 he was the Republican party's first candidate for president.

I visited his camping station at Santa Cruz Big Basin where his army camped in the Red Wood forest.

John Butterfield is another prominent western character. He was head of the Southern overland mail that ran from St. Louis to San Francisco. On October 9, 1858, he sent word to President Buchanan that the overland mail had pulled in safe at St. Louis, making the run from San Francisco in 23 days and four hours. The President replied, "I cordially congratulate you upon the result. It is a glorious triumph for civilization and the Union. Settlements will soon follow the course of the road and the East and West will be bound together by a chain of living Americans which can never be broken."

Johnny Frey, Buterfield's friend, rode the first pony out of St. Joe, Mo. when his pony express started back in 1860. When he started out everybody for miles around was on hand to see him streak for the plains with mail that would be in San Francisco some ten days later. Few people nowadays appreciate how big a job the Pony Express had and how well they did it. It took 500 ponies and 80 riders to take the mail through, and there were 190 stations along the route.

Some of the boys averaged 75 miles a day and occasionally they rode 150 miles without stopping to rest. They changed horses every 10 or 15 miles and in this way covered as much as 250 miles a day. They lost only one small batch of mail in 650,000 miles of riding. It cost $5.50 an ounce to send a letter across the country by Pony Express.

My next subject will be William F. Cody, nicknamed Buffalo Bill.

Salutatory of Class of 1949

May Miyoshi

Parents, Teachers, Classmates, Friends:

My high school career has been very satisfying in many aspects, one of which is the numerous friendships and the associations I have formed with my schoolmates. Friendship is something we can cherish throughout our lives, and is surely one of the most valuable things to be acquired from public education. But just as an education brings many satisfying rewards, so too, it has many functions to perform. In general, we might say that the school has two larger purposes, the one to transmit knowledge and the other to teach us the importance of mutual understanding amohg individuals and among people of different races and nationalities.

This nation is made up of many people of varied ancestral backgrounds. Therefore, each individual has his contributions to make and his responsibilities to accept. There are numerous segments of America's population who are misunderstood by their fellow citizens. The hopes, ambitions, and the backgrounds of these minority groups are not understood by the larger groups, and because of this, the majority are often unsympathetic and intolerant. Such was the case with the Pilgrim fathers who settled in New England, the Huguenots who settled in Georgia, and the Quakers who settled in Pennsylvania. And such is the case of the Nisei, the Japanese Americans of this country. Thus history records that life is not only a struggle for existence, but also an effort to be understood.

On that fateful Pearl Harbor day, our family resided some seven miles from Sacramento, the capital city of California. I can still vividly remember the day after the Japanese attack. We went to school that day as usual, but there was a feeling of tension, hostility, and fear, that existed between us and the Caucasian students. Until that day, we had laughed and played together, but from then on we were only "Japs" and "enemies" in their eyes. Then, late in April, rumors began to float around town that all people of Japanese ancestry living on the Pacific coast were to be evacuated into war relocation camps. These rumors changed into reality when a few weeks later, MP's in jeeps came into town, tacking up notices giving us government orders to prepare for evacuation.

In May of 1942, approximately 5,000 of us entered Fresno Assembly Center, one of fourteen camps consisting of hastily built barracks and scattered throughout the West coast. Culminating a six months' stay in Fresno, we were sent to Jerome, Arkansas, a relocation camp. Our family moved here from Arkansas in 1945 to start life anew.

When we entered those camps, we were forced to leave our homes, our businesses, our friends, all that had been dear to us in the years gone by. Those were big sacrifices for anyone to make. The right or wrong of mass evacuation was not for us to decide, but we sincerely hope that no other group or race will ever have to know those sacrifices. Though we took this matter of evacuation in our stride, knowing it was something of necessity, in a sense, wrong had come our way. Therefore we strove the harder to right the error, and from vivid experience lead the way upward, so that never again would America stoop to lose sight of the precious ideal, so dearly won for our heritage. We tried to make that experience a tremendous force towards building an enduring generation of finer Americans. Camp life taught us the importance of co-operation and mutual understanding.

In a sense the evacuation was a "blessing in disguise," as someone once put it, for as a result of it, thousands of Japanese Americans, who before the war, never dreamed of leaving the West coast, really "discovered" America. They have found greater job opportunities here in the middle west and in the east. We Nisei, in particular have been gratified by the matter-of-fact acceptance of our fellow Americans here in this section of our country, based on our face value rather than on our face appearance. For basically, despite the differences in the color of our skin, and in facial contours, we are no different from you. We laugh at the same things, enjoy the same things, and the same things make us sad. It makes me very happy to say that I think my fellow citizens are beginning to realize this.

During the war, we experienced many hardships. I know from bitter experience what it means to be a victim of racial prejudice. That is why I am going to strive all the harder to help bring about the destruction of this vicious thing called racial barrier. I want to become a living part of the community of Decatur to help make brotherhood a reality.

I am glad I had this opportunity of attending Decatur high school because I feel that I have accomplished something, not only from the standpoint of having gained much valuable knowledge, but also in learning to live and work harmoniously with my fellow citizens. Education, in my opinion, should be one of the primary agencies instrumental in producing future generations of children, free from any racial intolerances.

Here in Decatur high school, we have planted the seed bed of racial tolerance. Let's let it grow out and engulf this community, the county, the state, the nation, and the whole world. Then we shall have taken a tremendous step toward world peace. Then, too, we shall have served the purpose of education, which is not only to enrich our minds in the field of academic learning, but to make us more cultured and understanding of other peoples.

Thank you.

May Miyoshi

May Miyoshi attended school at Decatur public schools during her entire high school days. She was a quiet, self-contained young lady, but always had a ready smile on her face. She was liked very much by her teachers and by the student body.

The Salutatory given by her is idicative of her thinking. She very much wants to be known as an American and with the start already made in high school, this goal will be attained. She has done much to let us know more about some very little known citizens of our community.

JIM CHAMBERLAIN'S PECULIAR ACT

Jim Chamberlain has sent the Republican some of his personal papers which show that he was a man of financial and educational standing in Texas in his active years. A calendar of the Westlaco high school for the year 1922 records him as president of the board of trustees. The calendar contains 25 pages and indicates that the high school is as large or larger than the Decatur high school.

Last September he transferred $5,000 to the Fort Worth National Bank and his son Milo as joint trustees to be held by them and paid out for his use and benefit. The provisions of the trust are set forth in three typewritten pages.

On the back Jim has written, "These papers are of value to no one only as mementoes. The trust fund is still intact and has not been of value to me, as my expenses have been paid out of the income of my apartment house."

Can't see any reason why Jim should have put his property out of his hands in such a way during his lifetime, and believe a good lawyer might get it back for him, less fees. Shall not destroy the paper and if at any time he wants it returned to him he can write for it.

The Shaw School Teachers and Pupils

Reminiscences of The Famous Litle School House Where Edgar Bergen Went to School.

Decatur, Mich.,
Oct. 22, 1949.

Dear Mr. Moulton:

At your request I shall try to write an account of my two years of teaching in the Shaw school.

I was interested in the letter from Emerson Calahan and pleased to note that some of my former pupils enjoyed the days we spent there.

I started teaching there in September, 1914. Had Edgar Bergen remained another year in Shaw school I would have been his teacher.

I have a picture of my school and pupils taken in the fall of 1915, my second year of teaching. There were only eleven pupils present that day but I think some were absent. We never had a very large attendance, not more than twenty-four at any time.

Some of the pupils that attended school both years I taught were Karl and Lowell Kern, Harold and John Sherburn, Harry and Russell Bellis, Pearl and Velma Reits. I think Emerson Calahan came to school there in spring of 1915 and remained for the next school year.

Eva Latham Morse and Dewey Zerbe were my eighth grade pupils the first year. Eva passed the county examinations ready for high school, Dewey just missed it by a small margin. I felt badly because Dewey had worked hard and attended school faithfully that year and was a good student.

Emerson Calahan and Frank Ickes were the eighth graders the second year and both passed. There were many other pupils who attended school part of the school years and then moved away.

I remember well one family that lived in the valley. Their name was Kiser, one girl Daisy and an older brother came to school. They furnished a team and sleigh in the winter for sleigh ride parties. We would ride around and pick up the children, then go to a home and play games and have a supper.

I lived in the old Shaw house most of the time, with Mr. and Mrs. George Thompson. Mrs. Thompson was formerly Nellie Earl and attended Shaw school when a girl. I also boarded with the Owen Latham family and Judson Southworths one winter.

While I was teaching Claud Kern was Director; Jud. Southworth was Moderator, and George Thompson was Treasurer.

Mr. V. R. Hungerford was county commissioner of schools during my first year of teaching, then Mr. E. V. Root was elected to that office the next year and Mr. Hungerford left Paw Paw soón afterward and took up work elsewhere.

I think I have given you most of the facts about my teaching experience.

Of course the boys had to play their pranks and pick on teacher's boy friend. I think some really felt the sting of Leo's whiplash.

On September 6, 1916, Leo and I were married and two years later moved onto his mother's farm there and Leo became Director of the school board and served in that office until we moved into the village of Decatur in 1923.

Of course Leo and his brother Maynard attended Shaw school when boys as they lived on the farm there all their lives until both married and left their parents' home.

Shall be looking for more letters from other teachers and pupils of Shaw school

Sincerely,
Mrs. Leo Southworht.

The Shaw District School

Third Letter

In the spring of 1882 I moved with my parents, Mr. and Mrs. I. S. Dewey and two little sisters, Vedah and Elizabeth from Cambridge Junction, Lenawee county, to Decatur and onto the Parker farm, southeast of the village.

The farm was located in the Shaw school district. At that time the old school house was standing. Some two years later the present school was built, the old one moved up to the Shaw farm and turned into a tool shed, and the present substantial building was built.

The school house is located on high ground, and in the edge of a beach forest. At the rear of the school, it was level, where we boys would play ball. Just a little way to the east was a hill where we would slide down hill in the winter time and what fun we did have. Then, about forty rods on east was a large pond, which made fine skating in the winter time, once in a while we would fail to hear the noon bell, then would have to stay after school and make up our lessons, and that was not so nice.

One winter day three of us larger boys got interested in hunting rabbits and failed to come back at one-thirty. The boys were Charley Wickett, Oliver Calbetzor and the writer; what fun we did have, but as I remember, we didn't get a rabbit. When we got back it was nearly time for school to be out. The teacher, Miss Abbie Barker, thought we did it to heckle her, and it made her sick for two or three weeks. We never went hunting again on school time. It was some years later that Edgar Bergen was a pupil there, and he has made the school known all over the country.

Fred H. Dewey,

Lansing, Oct. 23, 1949.

Dear Arba:

I hope that you are all well and happy. I am very well and have a very nice place to stay here in Lansing.

I notice by the Republican that you would like a few comments about the old Shaw school. I have enjoyed reading the comments already made and I might add a few more.

I have said many times that it was, perhaps, the best located school in the state. At the time I went there to school, we not only had the hill, but we had the big pond on beyond. I understand that the pond is now drained.

Yours truly,
F. H. Dewey.

Our former fellow townsman intimates that his mind is filled with more reminiscences of his happy school days in the old Shaw district school, and we shall expect him to send them along.

Teachers and pupils, both young and old, are invited and urged to send the Republican remembrances of their Shaw school days and those who preserve them in a scrapbook will have a treasure they will value in the future.

If you were ever a teacher or pupil in the Shaw district school of Decatur, Michigan, the Republican will be happy to hear from you.

KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS 85TH ANNIVERSARY

The 85th Anniversary of the Knights of Pythias was observed last month in Michigan where the organization was founded.

Justus H. Rathbone, a graduate of Madison University, New York, moved to Eagle Harbor, Keweenaw county, Michigan in 1858 to improve his health and to teach school. To while away the long winter evenings, he and his friends formed a dramatic society. One of the plays which they produced was the lesson of friendship, the story of Damon and Pythias, written by the Irish playwright John Banim.

Impressed with the play, Mr. Rathbone conceived the ritual of the Knights of Pythias order, based on the lives of those two famed Disciples of Pythagoras.

Called into government service at the start of the war between the states, Mr. Rathbone established the first lodge of the order among his government associates in Washington, D. C. on February 19, 1864. Learning of the new fraternity, President Abraham Lincoln praised it highly. At his suggestion an application was made to Congress for a charter and thus the fraternity became the first American order ever chartered by an Act of Congress of the United States.

The order now embraces more than three thousand subordinate lodges in the United States, Canada and Hawaii. The distinguishing principles being friendship, charity and benevolence.

There are three recognized auxiliaries; The Pythian Sisters and their juniors the Sunshine Girls; the Dramatic Order Knights of Khorassan and their ladies order the Nomads of Avrudaka; and the junior order for boys, The Princes of Syracuse.

The little white schoolhouse in Eagle Harbor, Michigan, owned by the Supreme Lodge, is preserved as a shrine and tourist attraction.

Easy To Remember

An irate lady, seeking a divorce in court, told the judge, "My husband is an out-and-out loafer who thinks of nothing day and night but horse racing. He doesn't even remember our wedding day."

"That's a lie," shouted the outraged husband, "we were married the day Twenty Grand won the Wood Memorial."

THE STARS AND STRIPES FLAG OF OUR UNION

By Mrs. Ray A. Graham,
106 Pine Street, Decatur,
Michigan.

(June is the month when special attention should be given to the flag of the United States. Tuesday, June 14, was flag day. Mrs. Graham has given much thought to the study of the flag and describes how it is a symbol of the Christian religion as well as of our country. Her article will appear in two chapters, the second to follow next week.)

Our flag is a wonderful flag. How could it be improved upon? I truly believe that the men who planned our flag were inspired by God.

When our flag was made and presented to us as a nation, we were a Christian nation, and it is the will of the Father we remain a Christian nation, that we always hold high the standard of Christianity. Psalm 33:12 says, "Blessed is the nation whose God is the everlasting life."

Christ the Son who died for our sins, "Romans 4:25 "Who was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification." God the Holy Spirit Eph. 4:30 "Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption."

The flag has two parts — The blue which speaks of heaven, and the other part with the stripes, speaks of the earth. We will let these two parts represent the two phrases of a person's life. The Blue, the Christian life, which is only for those born of the spirit. And the other part with the stripes represents our earthly life with its troubles and tribulations.

There are two kinds of stripes in our flag, the red and the white—13 in all. Let us look at the white stripes first, there are six white stripes. White stands for purity, man tries to be good enough to get into heaven under his own strength. But six is what God calls "man's number," which means he comes short of being as good as God wants him to be, short of perfection.

Although a life may be pure and fine, it is not good enough for God, unless it has become a member of the body of Jesus Christ. And can say with Paul. Gal. 2:20 "I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet, not I but Christ liveth in me; but the life I now live in the flesh; I live by faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave Himself for me." The write stripes remind us of something else, when people want to surrender they raise a white flag; so it suggests, we raise our white flag and say to God, "I surrender, I cannot be good enough of myself and will let you save me in Thine own way."

The red stripes speak of the blood of Jesus for our redemption. Math. 26:28. Jesus says, "For this is my blood of the new Testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins." And Heb. 9:22 says, "Without the shedding of blood, there is no remission of sins."

There are seven red stripes in our flag — Seven in scripture is God's perfect number — God has provided a way; whosoever will may become good enough for heaven, first accepting, Christ who died for our sins, then the holy spirit coming to dwell in our hearts. You'll notice there is a red stripe at the top of our flag and another at the bottom, which tells us God watches over us as well as keeps us. We are under the blood. Ex. Chap. 12—tells of the redemption by blood of the first born of Egypt (Egypt in scripture symbolizes the earth). The Lord says in v. 13 "When I see the blood I will pass over you, and the plague shall not be upon you to destroy you, when I smite the land of Egypt." Then Scripture tells us of the memorial by blood.

We are under His blood and His everlasting arms are underneath us. Deut. 33:27 "The eternal God is Thy refuge and underneath are His everlasting arms."

The fact that there are more red stripes than white ones reminds us that Jesus said His grace is greater than our sins. Rom. 5:20. "Where sin did abound, grace did much more abound."

THE ACTON SISTERS DECORATE HARLEY'S GRAVE

The Acton sisters, daughters of Joseph Acton and wife of early Decatur days going back to the period just following the Civil War, made their sixty-first annual pilgrimage to the grave of their brother Harley last week Wednesday.

This year the family party consisted of Minnie Acton Koons, 76, of Jackson, Mrs. Mary Acton Champion, 70, of Gillett's Lake, six miles out of Jackson, her daughter, Mrs. Fred Hanselman of Cement City, 20 miles out of Jackson, and her friend, Mrs. Charles Shelmandine of Cobleskill, N. Y.

They drove here, arriving after dinner and going straight to the cemetery where they decorated little Harley's grave and then came direct to the Republican office to call on one of their few Decatur acquaintances of the time when they were children. Harley was only 18 months old when he was parted from this life, but he is still held in reverent memory as their little brother.

Ora Acton is the oldest of the children of Joseph Acton. He was 82 last Saturday, May 28, and lives in Dayton, Ohio. He is making plans to visit Decatur this summer. He will come with his son and grandson and it will be a great trip for him. He will hunt for some of his boyhood friends of 60 to 70 years ago, will find a very few of them, and it may give him a touch of sadness to learn how many have long since gone to other places or their names are carved on monuments in Lakeside cemetery.

In our early boyhood Ora was a hero. He was manager of the Featherweight baseball club and Captain of the watermelon gang. We will go over again with him the raid on Ben Clark's melon patch and how the Featherweights beat the Silk Stockings and won the title of Decatur fourth nine.

JIM EXPLAINS MISTAKE

Dear Arba:

In response to your request for an explanation of my crediting Miss Browning as the author of "Out In the Fields With God," I am enclosing my copy of the poem which I cut out of a newspaper several years ago and which I have been using since. When I saw your naming of Louise Imogen Guiney as the author I took the question to the encyclopedia and found that you are right. It has been so long ago that I cut out the clipping I cannot recall from what paper I got it, but you see that I had reason to believe Mrs. Browning to be the author.

Some of my early troubles would not be of interest to many readers, but I will recount a few that might be of interest to you.

I recall that you named Miss Annie Breece as your first teacher, and she was also my first teacher in the Decatur school. You may ask why I didn't keep in the same class with you. The first reason dates back to the time when I was about two years old. When father and mother were out of the house brother John took father's whiskey bottle off the shelf and poured considerable whiskey down my throat which nearly strangled me, of course. I got this information from my parents several years later, with the information that it broke father's habit of leaving liquor within reach of his family.

Hardly had I recovered from John's giving me the drink when I was seized by a strange malady which Dr. Ross diagnosed as an affection of the pancreas. Father in later years declared that everyone who saw me but Dr Ross declared my case to be hopeless. He said there was only one medicine that could possibly save me. Father immersed me in warm water [illegible] few minutes and [illegible] a [illegible] powder prescribed [illegible] to [illegible] me ill.

The [illegible] perfect [illegible]

[illegible] that in my first year in school I was out so much that I was not promoted with the class, so you gained a year on me.

My only recollection of Miss Breece was when she called at our home to ascertain when I would be able to return to school. As a result of one or both of these troubles I consider my lack of co-ordination of certain muscles caused me to perform certain acts in a clumsy manner. You who saw me batting many times in ball games know what I mean. I had to do everything the hard way. I never could make graceful movements.

I hope in the near future to have something pleasant to write about, as I feel I am torturing the readers of my letters as much as I have experienced from ingratitude.

Your friend, Jim.

Jim sent the newspaper clipping of the poem, "Out In the Fields With God," ascribed to Elizabeth Barrett Browning, which is ample excuse for the mistake he made. How it came to be made originally we may never know. There seems to be no doubt about the authorship.

A card received from Jim Wednesday reads, "Send my paper to 755 Ninth avenue, Fort Worth, Texas. Letter will follow."

Van Buren County's Doctor of the Year

A few weeks ago Dr. John Charles Maxwell of Paw Paw, brother of the late Dr. James E. Maxwell of Decatur, was named by the County Medical Association the "Van Buren County Doctor of the Year." This meant something to Decatur as well as to the town in which for 54 years he has been one of the leading practitioners. Dr. Maxwell is a native of Hamilton township and Decatur was the home town of his youth. His first familiarity with the medical profession was behind the counters of the Carney drug store. He went from here to the University of Michigan and in the limited opportunity he had for recreation he played ball in Decatur's well remembered Barton Park.

A good sketch of Dr. Maxwell's professional life in Paw Paw, written by Dan Ryan, was published in a recent issue of the Kalamazoo Gazette, and from it are taken the paragraphs following:

A Rugged Life

"Being a country doctor was a tough profession in the old days." Dr. Maxwell recalls. "My first equipment was crude, the medicines and drugs limited and working conditions unbelievable.

"If we were called out in the country we never knew what to expect. Usually one of the kids would run into the office or pound on our front door at night. He'd holler 'Hurry out to our house, Pa's sick!' and then he'd be gone. I guess I got calls nearly every night in those days. Sometimes I wonder how so many folks survived so many ailments."

Things got a bit better for the doctor in 1908 when he bought his first automobile. But for years the country roads were so poor that he had to go back to the horse and buggy frequently.

"Nobody ever thought of clearing out a road in those days," he says. "More often than not we ended up walking the last few miles on bad winter calls. Even the horse bogged down."

Dr. Maxwell's most trying times came during the late days of World War I. In 1917-18 he was the only doctor examining military candidates in the entire county.

"Besides my regular practice I had about 15 soldier-boys a day and around 100 each weekend to examine," he says with a sigh.

But what he likes to remember is that not one man he ever sent to Fort Custer for army service was ever returned for medical reasons. During World War II when he handled hundreds of ear and throat examinations of Van Buren County young men, his amazing record held up.

In Nov. 1918, the deadly flu epidemic which swept the U. S. hit Van Buren County full force.

Remarkable Record

It found Dr. Maxwell the only physician in Paw Paw. For the next three months he worked an average of 22 hours a day battling some 600 cases of flu along with his regular practice.

One of the doctors' oldest friends, Dr. W. F. Hoyt, now 86, returned from a vacation to help out. But soon he too was stricken and became just one more patient for his friend.

"It was awful," recalls Dr. Maxwell. "I would go out to farms and find the whole family down with flu. I had to bring in the wood for the fire, heat the water myself, take care of each person separately and then move on to the next farm. About the only help I had was from Merle Young, (now a retired judge) and the late Jake Reidl. They were always ready to go.

"And of course my wife was always there to help. Until her death this year she was production director for the Red Cross in this area and, if anything, she worked harder than I did."

And again the invisible but unforgettable record pops up. Of the 600 odd cases of flu which struck the Paw Paw area, Dr. Maxwell lost only five. And these were mostly beyond aid. Elsewhere in the country the epidemic took thousands of lives.

In the years which followed, Dr. Maxwell has continued his quiet service to his people. He has taken perhaps five vacations in the half century and then for only a few days. Until five years ago he never had a hospital nearby. Instead he had to ship his patients by baggage car on the old Fruitbelt Railroad to Kalamazoo hospitals.

Son Top Specialist

For years his fee was $1 a call and 50 cents at the office. He sent out bills once a year.

"I guess I've crossed $100,000 off my books for folks who just forgot to pay," he says.

Dr. Maxwell has also given medicine one of its top men—his son —Dr. James Maxwell, professor of Otology and Laryngology at the University of Michigan, a recognized authority in the field of ear and throat medicine.

A daughter, Katherine Maxwell has also devoted her life to medicine. She is records analyst at the Rapid Treatment center in Ann Arbor.

The white-haired physician has a simple creed. "The practice of medicine isn't a trade or a commercial thing," he says. "It is a way of life."

Three generations of Van Buren County residents can testify that Dr. James Maxwell, their Doctor for many years, has lived it well.

Recollections of the Singer of Michigan

By E. R. Washburn.

(Two years ago the Republican published a story about the 'Sweet Singer of Michigan." Rev. Leroy Cabbage asked for information about her which led to a book and library acquaintance with this unusual character. The story especially interested E. R. Washburn who was a student in the Ferris Industrial School at the time the Sweet Singer was acquiring her reputation, and at our request he wrote the following account of the interest created by her peculiar type of ignorance.)

The expression, "The Sweet Singer of Michigan," has been getting headlines in newspapers and various periodicals now and then for more than half a century and one wonders why. Is it because of the characteristics of the one who bore the name or is it simply the euphony of the expression?

Your writer first heard it a little more than fifty years ago and there is evidence it had been in circulation for some time before that. Your writer was a student at the Ferris Institute and there were heard discussions as to what constitutes worthwhile literature, there were stories used in morning chapel exercises, and others in class work. The little so-called poem at the close of this article was written at that time and because of discussions heard there. It was printed in the November, 1897 issue of Literary Voice, a paper put out by the Literary Society of the Ferris Industrial School.

So elated was the writer at having gained the northwest corner of the front page that he sent a copy of the magazine to his girl friend, Miss Myrtie Rogers of near Hastings, Michigan. A short time ago while rummaging through the "treasures" of the past what was his surprise at finding his "poem" in a box of clippings made more than a year before our marriage which occurred December 29, 1898. Evidently Myrtie, too, was elated at my making the front page of the College paper.

Who was the Sweet Singer of Michigan? She was a woman whose maiden name was Julia A. Davis. She was born near Plainfield, probably near or in Wexford county in 1847. After her marriage to a farmer named Moore they lived on a farm near Edgerton and she passed away in 1920 near Manton in Wexford county, Michigan.

Why did she need any defense, if she did? She wrote poetry so-called, which was not always in good poetical form, often times it showed poor choice of words, or was not appropriate to the ideas she was trying to express. Not only all this, but she thrust it upon the public many times where it were better left untold, so she aroused a great deal of unfavorable criticism.

She liked to write in rhymes which were sometimes good but more often not. She liked metrical expressions in season and out. She called herself "the Sweet Singer of Michigan" till many people used the name in derision and in poor taste on their part.

People of seeming ability used their time, energy and seeming ability in making fun of one, probably not their equal, who was fond of expressing herself and (who knows) in helping or pleasing or in other ways making life brighter for others of lesser abilities.

She at least set an example of accomplishment where persistence and determination are applied. She wrote for fifty years or more. She wanted people to read what she wrote. They did. She wanted her name on a book where people could see it. It is on a book and a bookshelf in the State Library at the capitol of our State. She wanted the attention of others. She got it whether or no. Witness one school where she gained some attention.

During most of the school year of 1897, I was a student at Ferris Institute, Big Rapids, Michigan, and undoubtedly received my share of the attention of my teachers. C. E. Manigold, lightning calculator, and teacher extraordinary for many years at Vicksburg, sat beside me in geometry of which class Mrs. Ferris was the teacher. I was a classmate of the Sellers brothers, W. H. and Roy, one of whom is still a professor of philosophy at the University of Michigan. Another classmate was Isaiah Bowman now and for several years of the past, the president of Johns-Hopkins University, and if I mistake not, one of the men chosen by th U. S. Government to help estab sh the boundaries of the countries of continental Europe at the close of the First World War.

These were good students as were many more not only of this school but of hundreds of other schools in our state and nation. When lessons were assigned they prepared them to the best of their ability.

"So nigh is grandeur to our dust,
So near is God to man,
When duty whispers low 'thou must',
The youth replies, 'I can'."

And here is a reason why the schools and students, teachers and leaders of American educational institutions are in the forefront of similar elements of the entire world.

Whom shall we blame? The one who produced a poor product which was her best or the ones who made to much use of the poor products when they were capable of doing much better? Just one person produced the poor poetry. But hundreds if not thousands felt themselves called upon to make fun of it till actually time to explain why one bit of verse was worth while and other bits of verse were only worthless rubbish was taking taxpayers money and this levy was the result of derision and foolish fun-making.

If you are desirous of seeing some of those poems you may find them in a copy of the Decatur Republican of the date June 19, of the year 1947 where they were placed so that you might see and judge for yourself the kind of material which caused the intermittent fever of derision during more than half a century of valuable time.

The Ferris Institute

The Kalamazoo Gazette of the date May 10, 1949 bears a headline statement to the effect that the state of Michigan will take over the Ferris Institute ninety days after the present legislature adjourns. Thus will end the career of a school organized sixty-three years ago this fall, which has been a wonderful power for good, educationally, morally and politically for thousands of young men and women in a state strong in the affairs of one of the mightiest nations of the world today.

This school was organized in a section of the state where The Sweet Singer of Michigan was born, where she worked and lived, and where she passed on to her reward. The school was organized by W. N. Ferris with the aid of his estimable wife (the former Helen Frances Gillespie) who also aided him in his later gubernatorial campaign.

They were aided by some of the best teaching talent of their time, for instance, W. D. Henderson, later of the University of Michigan faculty; H. H. Barrows, afterward of Northwestern University; Rose Anderson, Bert Travis and the little Thomas Carlyle, affectionately known to the student body as Tommy, in part because of his diminuitive size, and many more well known teachers of bygone days.

The quasi-poem which follows was written by E. R. Washburn during one of those times when feeling was running high in class room discussion and students were permitted to make a choice and then defend it.

A DEFENSE OF THE SWEET SINGER OF MICHIGAN.

Can it be a very sinful thing
For one to write quasi-poetry, and bring
To the world simple thoughts in rhymed measure?
Or must the every word bear a treasure
To the world; a lesson teach of things obscure
Or occult; or tell of things worthy eternity to endure?
Has time then come when even verse
Must be shaped in the mould of language terse?
Must rhyme bear within it a lesson so far from plain.
That one must rack his weary brain
For half the hours of a gloomy night,
To catch the erudite poet's flight
Of thought? Must one, with a blind faith, still trace
The uncertain, stumbling pace
Of poets, who with brains o'ercharged with intellectual fire,
See naught but stars, yet wade through earthly mire?
There are some poor mortals at even this late day,
Whose feet have never touched education's paved way;
Yet whose souls have in some small degree,
The inward visions with which great poets see,
And if they tell in uncouth rhyme
Of things existing in their intellectual clime,
Perhaps there are those whose lives will be brighter
For these same foolish things, and some whose hearts will be lighter
Because of them; when learned men's thought-laden rhymes would blight
The soul-growth of cimmerrian minds by too effulgent light

THE POTAWATOMI OF THE ST. JOSEPH

Taken from "The Potawatomi Indians," by Otho Winger. From the books of Harvey Franz.

So far as our American history goes, northern Indiana and southern Michigan have been Potawatomi lands. However, when LaSalle and his companions, the first white men to enter the state, came by canoe up the St. Joseph River from L. Mich. to the present site of South Bend, the Miami Indians lived there. LaSalle named the river the Miami and the first fort at the mouth of the river was called Fort Miami. The conflict that came between the Miamis and the Potawatomi in eastern and northern Illinois, about 1765 soon spread eastward and the Potawatomi entered this Miami country. In the course of time the Potawatomi drove the Miamis southward to the Eel river, tributary of the Wabash. So when the Americans first arrived the Potawatomi were in possession of this country and their names had already been given to many places.

The St. Joseph river is largely a Michigan river. The Waukakee was connected with the St. Joseph by a portage of only a few miles. Both the Miamis and the French had used this connection between Lake Michigan and the Illinois river. Then came the Potawatomi who used the Kankakee not only for hunting but for trade and travel as well. The name probably comes from the Potawatomi word Ki-a-ki-ki, which means swampy country. While too swampy for villages on its banks, yet nearby were villages, so that the Indians would not be far away from good fishing and hunting.

The great prairie stretching for a hundred miles south from the Kankakee in western Indiana, really belonged to the land of the prairie Potawatomi of Illinois, but is mentioned here with the Indiana lands. Here and there throughout this large territory were camping places for the Indians, not only the Potawatomi, but also their friendly neighbors, the Kickapoo.

One of the most noted of their villages was near the present city of Morroco, Newton Co., Indiana. Here a minor Potawatomi chief, Turkey Foot, had his den and went forth to plunder and murder. Many a theft and murder was later traced to him. He even went across the Mississippi to secure plunder. His end came in a very fitting way. Another Potawatomi chief, Bull Foot, came to visit him. Both became drunk and in their spree Bull Foot was killed by Turkey Foot, who, in turn, was killed by the son of Bull Foot. They disposed of the two chiefs by placing their bodies in sitting position against near-by trees. About them they placed their war trinkets and many other things which the Indian thought necessary for them in the happy hunting grounds. Around it all they built a pen of brush and logs to keep out the wolves and dogs. Years later the white settlers found the bones of these old Indians.

The Elkhart River is the chief tributary to the St. Joseph. Near the mouth of this river at the present city of Goshen was the village Elk Heart, or Me-sheh-wah-ou-deh-ik in the Potawatomi language. This is not the name of a chief, but was suggested by the shape of an island near the mouth of the river.

The southern part of Michigan was Potawatomi land. One of the most thickly settled portions of their domain was in the triangle included within the St. Joseph River and Lake Michigan. Near the mouth of the St. Joseph was the Burnett trading post where once stood Fort Miami of LaSalle. Near the Indiana line, at Parc aux Vaches, was the trading post of Joseph Bertrand and not far to the north was the village of the great chief, To-pe-ne-bee, father-in-law of Bertrand and brother-in-law of Burnett. Southwest of Bertrand two miles was the Pokagon village. Further down the river on the east side was the site of Fort St. Joseph. Opposite the present city of Niles was the Carey Mission where Isaac McCoy tried to help these people. North of him were the villages of Weasau and Macousin. Through this triangle ran the Great Sauk Trail from Chicago to Detroit. With the advantages of trail, river and lake, this section was of great value to both Indians and early white men. Much could be written about the history of this land.

There was a close relationship between the Potawatomi and the Ottawa. The dividing line between them, both as to blood and territory, was not clearly defined. The Ottawa claimed most of the southern peninsula of Michigan south to the Kalamazoo. In the territory south of this river, the Potawatomi lived and hunted. Near the present city of Kalamazoo once stood the village of Match-e-be-nash-she-wish. This and another small reserve not far away, called Prairie Ronde, were ceded to the U. S. in 1827.

North of the present city of Sturgis, Michigan, was the reservation known as the Nottawa Sepa. Some say that the two words mean "a prairie along the river." J. B. Dalby, a Delaware Indian who speaks the Potawatomi language, says it means "the river of the Ottawa." It was definitely set apart in 1821 and reaffirmed in 1832. But on [illegible] 27, 1833, this [illegible] and receded to the U. S. [illegible] and that a French trader, Mor[illegible], came into this section in an early day, married a Potawatomi squaw and by her had seven children. The oldest was Sauaquet, who succeded his father about 1830. He was chief of the tribe when the final transfer was made. These Indians were very angry about the loss of their lands and Sauaquet was murdered by one of his own tribe. The towns of Nottawa and Waseppi, and Nottawa road through Sturgis remind us of these Indians. At the site of Coldwater was the Miskesawbe reserve which was ceded to the U. S. in 1827. Along the old Sauk Trail were smaller settlements of Potawatomi but none of importance in eastern Michigan. There was at one time a Potawatomi village near Detroit, but it was of little importance and did not last long.

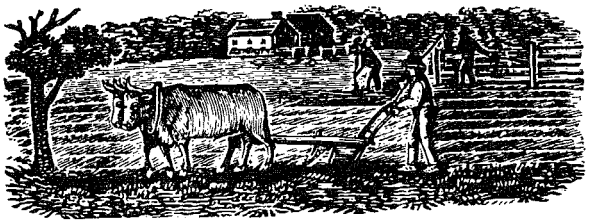
One of the stories that has come down to us from pioneer days is that of Wabememe, or White Pigeon. He was friendly to the whites. He attended an Indian council near Detroit where the Indians planned to massacre the early white settlers along the old Sauk Trail. He started out to warn his friends who had begun the settlement at White Pigeon, Michigan, one of the oldest towns in the state. He ran most of the way, fording streams and swamps. He warned his white friends of their danger, but the strain was too great even for his strong heart. He fell dead and is buried west of White Pigeon. Today there is a large stone marker at the junction of U. S. 112 and U. S. 131. On this marker is this inscription: "In memory of Wabememe, Chief White Pigeon, who about 1830, gave his life to save the settlement at this place." The town of White Pigeon and the Pigeon River are also memorials to this Potawatomi Indian.

Two small groups of Potawatomi Indians remain in Southern Michigan. One is the remnant of the Pokagon band. They do not have a reservation of their own, but live in scattered groups near the present cities of Dowagiac, Hartford and Cassopolis.

Near Athens, Michigan, is a small reservation of 120 acres. Here a remnant of the Potawatomi live in comparative peace and comfort. They raise much of what they need for food. They supplement their small farm income by work where they can secure it. They have a church of their own and seem to take much interest in religious work. Their children attend the public schools of Athens, where they are making good records. While this reservation is generally known as the Athens Indian Reserve, Albert Mackety, one of the leaders, says the official name is "Nottawa Seppe Pottawattomie Indian Reserve."



The Prairie Potawatomi

Taken from "The Potawatomi Indians" by Otto Winger. (From the books of Harvey Franz.) Continuation of the 14th story in the Norman E. Webster local history contesst.

There has been considerable discussion about the relationship of the names "Potawatomi" and "Mascoutens." The usual explanation of the term "Potawatomi" is "People of the Place of Fire." The most common explanation of the term "Mascoutens" is "People of the Little Prairie." With due regard to other explanations this one seems best: That the name "Mascoutens" was first applied to a small group of the Potawatomi who left the main tribe of the Potawatomi in Wisconsin and moved south to the prairie country of southern Wisconsin and northern Illinois. As others moved southward this term became applied to them also. In time the larger group of the Potawatomi were those in the prairie country and were also called "Mascoutens." So the name is often applied to the whole tribe of the Potawatomi. But since the Potawatomi of the prairie are so different from the Potawatomi of the northern forests, they came to distinguish them as the Prairie Potawatomi and the Forest Potawatomi. It is with the former that our history mainly deals. The Forest Potawatomi did not come in touch with the Americans as much as the Prairie band.

Just when the Mascoutens came into the prairies is not certain. No doubt their coming was gradual, but they grew rapidly. By 1765 they had become so powerful that by the aid of the Kickapoo and the Miami they were able to challenge the powerful Illinois and practically destroy them. Then in turn they drove the Miamis to the east out of the prairie country. They were more closely related to the Kickapoo and were on friendly terms with them. They lived in great numbers along the north side of the Illinois opposite Starved Rock, between the present cities of LaSalle and Morris. The present city of Utica was the center of their camps and villages.

The upper Illinois and its tributaries, the Fox, the Des Plaines and the Kankakee, were Potawatomi streams. On the prairies north of Morris was the village of Chief Shabbona. He was one of the most admirable of all Potawatomi chiefs. His own village at Shabbona Grove and at the nearby village of Assiminehon at Paw Paw Grove were on the western fringe of the Potawatomi settlements. Along the Fox River were a number of small villages, chief of which were the village of Shaytee near the present city of Geneva and that of Waubunsee at Aurora.

Another chief of this section was Black Partridge. We know him best for having saved the life of Mrs. Helm in the Massacre of Fort Dearborn. His village was on the Illinois River. He went west and some of his dessendents are living in the Kansas Potawatomi reserve today.

The Vincennes Trace passed through the entire length of the Potawatomi lands from Chicago southward. That and the Iroquois River, tributary to the Kankakee, were courses for trade and travel. Along this route Gurdon Hubbard established trading posts, so that the northern part of the route became known as Hubbard's Trace. Watseka perpetuates the name of Hubbard's Potawatomi wife. The western part of Indiana belonged to the Mascoutens or Prairie Potawatomi, but has already been described with the lands of the Potawatomi living in the present site of Indiana.

Milwaukee, 100 miles north of Chicago, was on the border between the Forest Potawatomi to the north and the Mascoutens, or Prairie Potawatomi to the south. Early travelers and missionaries noted its favorable position for trade. The name is of Potawatomi origin, meaning "rich and beautiful land." Both English and French traders bartered with the Indians at an early age.

Chicago was first known to early travelers, traders and missionaries as a Miami village. After the Miamis were driven to the east, the Potawatomi were all powerful in that neighborhood. It was with them that the early traders of Chicago, such as the French negro, Jean B. La Lime, Pierre Le Mai, and John Kinzie dealt. Though the Indians were in and about Chicago in great numbers frequently, they did not have any permanent or important village there.

It has been but little more than 100 years since the Potawatomi left Chicago for the West. The last great Indian dance was held in 1935. That was a great affair, a last expression of all the Indian felt about what he had suffered. He then went west and was soon forgotten by those who built their homes and carried on trade where once the Potawatomi hunted, camped and traded. Where only a few hundred Indians then roamed, millions of people now live in permanent homes. Instead of the war whoop there is now the shriek of hundreds of trains entering the city. Instead of the hunting and trapping of game there is now the greatest meat-packing business in the world. Instead of the wigwam or tepee there are the skyscrapers, and fine homes. What was then a wilderness of trees and swamps with very few human beings is now a great wilderness of buildings of all kinds with a population numbering millions. All of this change has come about in a hundred years.

SOME FAMOUS INDIAN TRADERS

Continuation of the 14th Story in the Norman E. Webster contest.

During the Indian and pioneer days here were many white men who were Indian traders. Most of them were here and there and for a short time only. They were traders only for what they could get out of it. Many of them married Indian squaws with no intention of living with them very long. Others who took Indian wives built up good homes, and their wives made good mothers and housekeepers. Some of these men became real pioneers and contributed much to the permanent welfare of the country. The following are a few of these men who had many dealings with the Potawatomi.

WILLIAM BURNETT

The first permanent settler on the St. Joseph river in southwestern Michigan was William Burnett, who came from New Jersey about 1776. He spent one year in fur trading and then went to Mackinaw to sell his furs. Here he got in trouble with British agents who had him arrested and sent to Montreal. Later he returned to the St. Joseph to find all his property destroyed. He improved his position as an Indian trader by marrying Kaukeama, daughter of Anquiba, and sister to the coming chief, Topenebee. The marriage of Burnett and Kaukeama occurred about 1782 with the Catholic priest officiating and with much pomp and ceremony.

Burnett had connection with the trading post on the site of Chicago and marketed his furs at Mackinaw. His wife too seems to have been a real princess of much financial ability. Since her husband was away most of the time she had to raise the children. Burnett himself was always friendly to the American cause. This caused him to get into trouble with the British and their sympathisers. He died about 1812 under circumstances not well known. Some think he might have been murdered by some of his opponents.

JOSEPH BERTRAND

Joseph Bertrand was one of the early pioneers and one of the most noted citizens of southwestern Michigan. Little is known of his early life. One report is that he was born in Canada and another that Mackinaw was his birthplace. It is said that he was a close relative of Henri Bertrand, friend and confidant of Napoleon Bonaparte.

Young Bertrand, like many a young Frenchman, came into the western wilderness seeking his fortune. It is likely that he was at first in the employ of Wm. Burnett, whose nephew he became by marriage to Madeline, daughter of Chief Topenebee. He established a trading post on the west side of the St. Joseph river about 1808. This was on the Great Sauk Trail and commanded much trade with the Indians. The site of this trading post is now covered by the St. Joseph river. Later he located on the bluff just opposite on the east side of the river.

GURDON S. HUBBARD

The life of Gurdon S. Hubbard forms a connecting link in the history of Chicago extending over a period of almost 70 years. He was born in Windsor, Vermont, August 22, 1802. His father was a lawyer. He moved to Montreal, went into business and lost what money he had. The son, Gurdon, much against the wishes of his parents, engaged with the American Fur Trading Company for five years service. First at Mackinaw, then down to the Illinois country, back and forth on fur-trading expeditions, young Hubbard gained a great knowledge of the pioneer West. He learned to know and like the Indians. He was brave and without fear in the moment of danger. He frequently had dangerous encounters with drunken and enraged Indians.

In connection with Mr. Hubbard there was a romance that has become historic. The old chief of the Kankakee Potawatomi Tamin, took such a liking to Hubbard that he wanted the young trader to marry his daughter. Hubbard knew that the favor of this old chief was necessary to his success, but because the proposed bride was older than he and not very desirable, Hubbard proposed marriage with the niece of the old chief. Her name was Watseka. She was a favorite of her tribe and had been chosen to perpetuate the memory of a former woman by that name who had helped the Potawatomi defeat their ancient enemies, the Iroquois. The old chief consented, but Watseka was only 10 years old. Hubbard said he would wait till she was older, hoping that something would turn up that would make the marriage unnecessary. But when Watseka was about 15 her mother brought her to Hubbard and insisted that the marriage contract be fulfilled. Hubbard and Watseka lived together for about two years. She bore him two daughters, both of whom died in infancy. Then Hubbard began to think of accepting the more civilized way of life. Watseka understood and so the couple separated. But in later years Hubbard always spoke of his Indian wife as attractive and agreeable.

Gurdon Hubbard has been characterized as the last and the greatest of the pioneers. He had active associations with the Potawatomi of the early days of Fort Dearborn and lived to see Chicago one of the greatest cities of the nation.

ISAAC McCOY

"The Indian school of Isaac McCoy has often been mentioned by Indian writers, but the significance of his work has been overlooked. McCoy was a most remarkable character. Many of the pioneer preachers underwent great hardships, but no other equalled McCoy in this respect.

Isaac McCoy was born in Fayette county, Penna., June 13, 1784. His father was a Baptist preacher. When Isaac was six years old, the family moved to Kentucky. Here he grew to manhood, greatly influenced by a strong religious home life and by pioneer experiences. In 1802 he married Christiana Polke, daughter of Chas. Polke, also a Baptist preacher. Mr. Polke later became a member of the Indiana State Constitutional Convention.

After the War of 1812, McCoy became very much interested in Missions to the Indians. He was also a pioneer in education. One of his greatest schools was called the "Carey Mission," named after the great missionary, William Carey. They had thirty Indian students. But their difficulties and handicaps were many. The winter was very cold. The hastily constructed school had no floor, door, or chimney. A big fire was built on the ground in the center of the room. The smoke was annoying. They had to feed and house these Indian students. They had great difficulty in getting provisions. They sent back to Fort Wayne, a hundred miles away, for more provisions. In the meantime they had little to eat. An old Potawatomi squaw brought them a mess of sweet corn. Mr. Bertrand, the French trader, divided with them his supplies. By the middle of February, supplies had arrived. McCoy was happy, though he had much sickness and often was near death.

On McCoy's monument in the old western cemetery at Louisville are inscribed these words: "For nearly 30 years his entire time and energies were devoted to the civil and religious improvement of the aboriginal tribes of this country. He projected and founded the plan for their own colonization, their only hope, and the imperishable monument of his wisdom and benevolence."

TABLET HONORING CASS AND HOW HE BLUFFED INDIANS

The Republican is indebted to Mrs. Helen Hathaway for this story of Michigan history. It is taken from the Ann Arbor News.

A bronze tablet at Sault Ste. Marie honors Lewis Cass but omits how he outbluffed an Indian chief nicknamed "the Count" in a verbal battle that bordered on war.

The tablet is at the foot of Bingham Ave. in Brady Park. It impersonally states in part that "Lewis Cass, governor of the Michigan territory, here established the authority of the United States." It fails to indicate, however, just how the famed Cass outmaneuvered the chieftain to "establish the authority."

The episode took place in 1820 when Cass persuaded John C. Calhoun, United States secretary of war, to permit him to head an exploring expedition around the Great Lakes to examine the mineral and other resources of the region.

Cass also secured permission to purchase land at the foot of Lake Superior so that a fort might be established there to correct the hostile attitude of the Indians.

The Indians on American soil were still under British influence, according to information in the Michigan Historical Collections at the University of Michigan. This was due to distribution of presents at the British post on Drummond Island.

Indians Grew Hostile

Cass' party went from Detroit to the Sault by water, arriving June 18. The next day Cass called the Indian chiefs to a parley to talk over purchase of the land. When the Indians came, they were dressed in British clothes decorated with medals and epaulets obtained at Drummond Island.

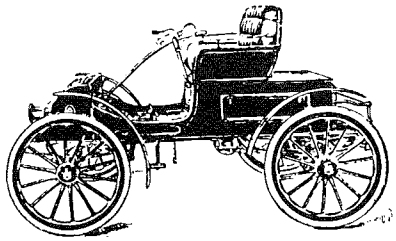
Evasive from the start, the Indians grew more hostile as the discussion continued. A chief named Sessabe and nicknamed "the Count" made a fiery speech, thrust his war lance into the ground, kicked away the presents Cass had brought, and stalked out of the tent, followed by the other Indians.

Word soon came that the Indians had raised the British flag, the Michigan Historical Collections information indicates.

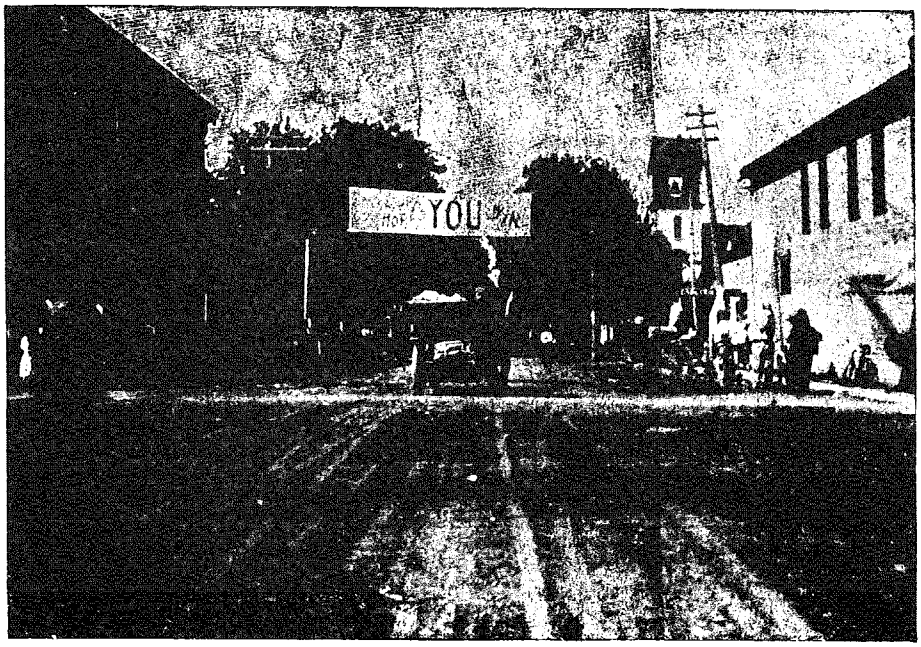
Learning of this, Cass strode to "the Count's" lodge, with only an interpreter for a companion, and lowered the flag. He warned the chief that if he attempted to repeat his hostile demonstration, the U. S. government would destroy him. Then the governor calmly returned to his own camp with the confiscated flag.

A period of extreme tension followed. The Indians sent away their women and children apparently prepared for an attack and Cass held his men ready for battle. But the audacity of Cass had had its effect. Older Indian chiefs got control of the situation and asked for another meeting, at which they sold a 16-sq.-mile piece of land on the St. Mary's River just below Lake Superior.

Two years later a permanent military force arrived at the Sault under the command of Gen. Hugh Brady, after whom the fort constructed there was named, data in the Michigan Historical Collections indicates.



Decatur Once Cheered The Glidden Tour Drivers



"Decatur Hopes YOU Win" was the banner that hung across Delaware St. to greet the Glidden Tour drivers when they passed through Decatur about 1909. The picture here was taken at Delaware and Phelps St., looking West at the cars as they passed. The wooden building on the right is the old I. Brooks Dry Goods and Grocery, and farther down on the right is the Church of Christ, since burned. On the left is the brick building that housed the B. K. Durkee Dry Goods store. This year's Glidden Tour begins Sept. 19.

"Notice! During the day of July 14, 1909, exercise care to keep unattended children, pets and livestock off the highway. Automobiles will pass through your town in the Annual Glidden Tour. Participants will not exceed the legal speed limit on any road."

So read a typical sign posted along the route of an early Glidden Tour. It was a warning that something special was in store for the town that day. It also was a plea for cooperation.

But no such signs will be needed for the Glidden Tour of about 250 antique automobiles which will make its first visit in history to central and western Michigan from Sept. 19 to 22. A half century makes a lot of difference.

The original Glidden Tours, sponsored by the American Automobile Association, were conducted between 1905-13 to prove to the public that automobiles were not merely rich men's toys but were a practical and reliable means of transportation.

The tours were abandoned after 1913 because they had served their purpose. Thirty-three years went by and then they were revived, by the Antique Automobile Club of America, as a sentimental gesture and for fun.

But the revived tours have proved bigger in every way than the original. Sponsored in alternate years by the AACA and the Veteran Motor Car Club of America, the participants tour various sections of the country in a festive mood, using restored vintage cars from the turn of the century through 1929. This is the first time that the revived Glidden Tour has visited outstate Michigan.

The Automobile Club of Michigan has planned a route over state highways with the least traffic for the Gliddenites so that the slower vehicles will not hamper modern-day cars.

Confetti was thrown from a lead car on the original Glidden Tours to mark the route for the participants. Auto Club will use special red and white printed signs to point the way for the 1967 tourers.

Many of the Glidden entries will take part in the 17th annual Old Car Festival at Greenfield Village, in Dearborn, Saturday and Sunday, Sept. 16 and 17, the nation's largest meet for antique cars. The 1967 Festival is expected to attract some 350 cars from the midwest, east and south.

Leslie R. Henry, curator of transportation at Henry Ford Museum and Greenfield Village, is general chairman of the 1967 Glidden Tour. Henry, one of the country's leading authorities on antique automobiles, is a vice president of the Antique Automobile Club of America, largest antique car organization in the world with more than 21,000 members.

After a "crank-up" dinner Sunday night in Detroit, the Glidden tourists will visit Windsor, Ont., in their cars on Monday.

On Tuesday the tour begins. The 540-mile route starts at Greenfield Village, goes through Belleville, Mason, Charlotte, Nashville, Hastings and on to Grand Rapids for the first overnight stop. This is the longest leg of the tour, covering around 188 miles. Tour headquarters in Grand Rapids will be the Pantlind Hotel.

The next day the Gliddenites will make a circle tour, through Wayland to Douglas and Saugatuck on Lake Michigan and back through Holland to Grand Rapids for a second night.

An early start the third day will put the tourists in Flint that night. En route they will go through Ada, Lowell, Ionia, St. Johns and Owosso, covering about 111 miles. They will stay that night at the Durant Hotel.

Friday the tour will head back to Detroit by way of Lapeer, Imlay City, Romeo, Utica and a stop for lunch at the General Motors Technical Center in Warren. The tour will end with the awards banquet that night at the Statler-Hilton Hotel in Detroit.

The Glidden Tour participants will not travel in a caravan when they leave Detroit but will spread out at intervals over the route. Departures are based on the driving time of the cars. The slowest, with a top speed of 28 miles an hour, will require eight to 10 hours for the trip to Grand Rapids.

Although cars as late as 1929 are permitted to participate, only cars of the Glidden car, 1905-13, are eligible for the top award, a miniature of the original AAA-Glidden trophy, and other prizes. The original Glidden trophy is on display at AAA headquarters in Washington.

As on the original Glidden Tours, today's participants will be checked in at points along the route. Today's judges aren't as tough, however, and the awards will be based on reliability and general performance instead of a race against the clock.

While car trouble along the route probably will be minimal, Auto Club will cover the entire route with its Emergency Road Service just to assure a safe trip for all.

The modern Glidden Tours started in 1946, the year of the auto industry's Golden Jubilee. Since then, the tours have covered parts of Pennsylvania, Indiana, Colorado, West Virginia, Virginia, New York, Ohio, Florida, Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Ontario.

The Glidden Tours of 1905-13 are regarded today as one of the classics of early motoring.

In 1904, the American Automobile Association sponsored a run from New York to St. Louis for the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, a distance of 1,218 miles. Fifty-nine cars reached St. Louis.

During the tour, Charles J. Glidden, a participant and member of the committee, offered a $2,000 trophy to the AAA to sponsor a competition for automobiles. Glidden, a wealthy industrialist, made motoring his hobby.

Glidden's name was first used on the 1905 tour. The trip covered 870 miles, from New York to Bretton Woods, N. H., and return. Twenty-five cars finished of the 33 that started.

The 1909 tour started from Detroit amid much fanfare and went 2,636 miles to Kansas City by way of Denver. Going to Chicago, the route went near some of the roads which will be covered by the 1967 Gliddenites. As on some of the earlier runs, Pierce-Arrow cars dominated the 1909 tour and posted the only perfect scores.

The tour was canceled in 1912 due to lack of interest.

My Trip to Colorado

By E. R. Washburn

Our headquarters were at Estes Park Village, one of the main entrances to Rocky Mountain National Park. The village has a population of several hundred or thousand depending on when you count them. Its water supply comes from the Black Canyon Creek drainage basin. A roadside sign reads: Help protect its purity by keeping out. The stream is really a rushing, sometimes roaring stream of clear cold water, clean enough to tempt any thirsty mortal, human or otherwise.

In plain view of Estes Park is Long's Peak, the highest peak in Rocky Mountain National Park. Its elevation is 14,255 feet above sea level. This peak is only fifteen miles from Estes Park but on a clear day it does not appear so far away.

At a convenient driving distance from Estes Park is the city of Boulder, the home of the University of Colorado with an enrollment of 9000 students. Boulder supplies most of the state with electric power.

Boulder claims the distinction of being the only city in the United States getting its water supply from a natural glacier, the Arapahoe several miles distant.

At a turn out parking place is a trail side sign calling attention to Arapahoe and helping the traveler to locate it. With binoculars the stream of ice is plainly seen but you better not wait to see it move.

One of the most important roads in Colorado is the Trail Ridge road, more than four miles of which are above 12,00 feet above sea level while eleven miles of it are above the tree line which of itself is about 11,000 feet above sea level.

Trees in the higher altitudes give a wonderful opportunity for studying forest fire effects because it takes a long time to regrow forests on burned over land due probably in part to the intense cold during much of the year. Many different burned over forest areas of adjacent regions are easily detected while simply riding along the highways.

Many signs have been placed along the highways warning of starting fires and telling when destructive fires raged on areas pointed out. These signs give travelers data on judging time that elapses after one fire before there is a sufficient amount of fuel to feed another fire on the same area.

Noting the height of new trees and the size of standing stubs in adjacent areas together with the information posted helps in estimating how often destructive fires occur on similar or same areas.

Fire is a good servant under favorable conditions but, oh! what a master it becomes when control is lost and devastation sweeps home lands and naught but ash lands remain.

Time flies and we must start for home which we do, saying good bye to Colorado by staying over night at Burlington.

Next morning we worked up an appetite by driving into another state—Kansas—where we got our breakfast at Goodland, having passed through Kanarado, the first village after crossing the state line between Colorado and Kansas, as the name more than suggests.

Then making north and east we were soon in grasshopper land and the insects would rise into the air then plop down into the road ahead of the car, but not in such numbers as the stories of pioneer days tell of, when their crushed bodies would grease the road and interfere with traffic.

Soon passing that road hazard we again crossed a state line and found ourselves in Nebraska, the home state of most of the group, and by nightfall we were in Lincoln, the home town of most of the group.

Went to visit my sister Florence in East Omaha Friday, August 12, arriving at 4 p. m.

On Saturday, August 13, got my airplane ticket from E. Omaha to South Bend, Ind. $31.25 plus $4.69 tax, in case you care to know.

East Omaha, Monday, Aug. 15. I got off the ground at 6:35 a. m. and headed home. At 6:45 a. m. it is foggy but not so thick but I can see the ground. At 7 a. m. clouds very heavy, can't see the ground.

Intermittently till near 9 o'clock it was cloudy, partly cloudy, and clear, changing quickly and, of course, without warning.

At about 8:45 came the high light of the whole trip. The cloudy sky above and below was composed of large fleecy white clouds partially broken in places when suddenly as I was peering from my window (I sat on the right hand side, well before the middle of the ship) to see if I could see Mother Earth, the wished-for happened. We crossed a large rift in the sky and looking nearly straight down, there lay the green earth with farm buildings and a large farm house and trees about it, all framed by those fleecy white clouds. It was a picture of a life time so soon gone that but one word is needed to describe it—evanescent—yet so firmly established in memory as to last to the end of time.

Yes, sojourners of the land, it may be worth one's time to take a flight just to get one fleeting glance that may serve to provide a model for all futurity.

Flight Log

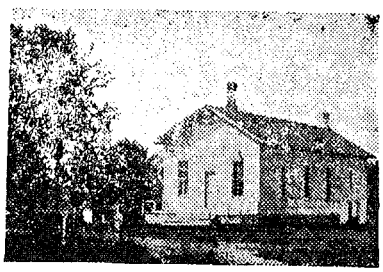
United Air Lines, Main line Airway; recorded by the captain on trip 136, date 8-15-1949. Position at 0901 a. m., over Moline, Ill., altitude 9,000 feet above sea, 8,400 feet above ground. Our air speed is 183 m.p.h. We have a head wind of 20 m.p.h., giving us a ground speed of 163 m. p. h. Temperature 57° F. at flight level; 79° F. at Chicago. Descending at 9:25 a. m.

Arriving Chicago, Ill. at 9:58 a. m. Remarks: all times Central Standard. Will arrive Chicago 20 minutes early account no Moline stop. The Moline Airport is under construction. Signed: Captain L. E. Duescher.

Started for South Bend at 11:10 a. m. on plane No. 124. Passed over end of Lake Michigan. Could see water as far as sight could reach. Over the land again two minutes later.

At South Bend for dinner then a long wait for bus to Decatur where the long trip ended with your servant all safe and sound before dark of the same day that I left E. Omaho, Nebr.

And that's that, and it fills the promise I made Sept. 8. E. R. W.



Recalling Hamilton Fair

Mrs. Blanche Youells, who now resides at Santa Barbara, Calif., sends this writer a clipping from the Decatur Republican which she found among some of her old keepsakes. It is an account of the Hamilton fair. There is no date on it, but an item on the reverse side indicates that it was during the administration of President Taft, which was from 1909 to 1913.

Under a picture of the Grange hall is the following:

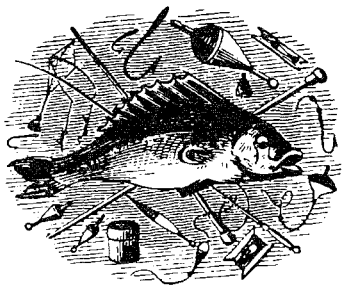
All roads will lead to the Hamilton fair Friday. The fair management have worked hard to get everything in first class shape for a big day.

The usual number of exhibits is assured and in addition the Breedsville band, one of the best in this corner of the state, will be on the grounds to play all day.

Hamilton Fair day is a home coming day for former residents of the township and a number are already here visiting relatives and friends and awaiting the big event.

Hamilton Fair was a great event. There was nothing like it in Michigan. It was a free fair and every year, when the weather was pleasant, there gathered around the Grange hall and the old race track, and most every year the weather was pleasant, from 3,000 to 5,000 people. What great times they had.

Hamilton Fair could be revived. The spirit of the old timers like Arthur Haydon, Al. Bidlack, Luke Tinney, Sam Strong, the Osborns, the Conways, the Creagans and others who made the fair the unique event it was could do it again. You say we have Hartford fair to take away its glory, but then we had Dowagiac fair, as great as is Hartford fair today.



FISHING-TACKLE.

IN A WONDERFUL EARTHQUAKE LAKE (REAL REELFOOT REELING)

BY: F.L. KERN

My good friend, Helen Hatheway, wrote a good story about the interesting Michigan YMCA camp, named for the Indian hero of her father's great story, "The League of the Iroquois," and then another old-time friend, Jessie Thomas Edwards, gave to your readers a beautiful and graphic description of the famous Bok Campanile and Bird Sanctuary in Florida, which she saw dedicated last winter.

While I cannot hope to compete with those fluent writers, I should like to give my friends and relatives among your readers, a little description of the historical Reelfoot Lake, about one hundred miles north of Memphis, down in Dixie, where son, Don, took a party of us for a day's fishing a few weeks ago.

One hundred twenty years back, there was a quiet, old primeval forest, largely of cypress, stretched along the mighty Father of Waters in western Tennessee, where many tribes of Indians camped, hunted, fished, loved, hated, and fought.

Then, as the legendary story goes, as neatly told us by Master Richard Leonard, a school boy, who was one of our party, a high chief of the Chicasaw nation known as Kolpin,

While I cannot hope to compete with those fluent writers, I should like to give my friends and relatives among your readers, a little description of the historical Reelfoot Lake, about one hundred miles north of Memphis, down in Dixie, where son, Don, took a party of us for a day's fishing a few weeks ago.

One hundred twenty years back, there was a quiet, old primeval forest, largely of cypress, stretched along the mighty Father of Waters in western Tennessee, where many tribes of Indians camped, hunted, fished, loved, hated, and fought.

Then, as the legendary story goes, as neatly told us by Master Richard Leonard, a school boy, who was one of our party, a high chief of the Chicasaw nation known as Kolpin, which meant "Reelfoot," so named because he had a flat foot, causing him to reel as he walked, went out on a journey to find him a wife.

Among the Choctaws he found the beautiful princess Laughing Eyes and fell desperately in love with her. But her father, a haughty chieftain, scorned the liberal offer of high rank, supplemented with a goodly showing of fine furs, ponies, blankets and other inducements.

But Reelfoot was so deeply smitten by the charms of Laughing Eyes that he resolved to return and kidnap the haughty maiden. The old medicine man strongly advised his chief against doing such violence, warning him that the great Manitou would be displeased and might blot out the entire tribe by some dire catastrophe.

But the flat-footed chieftain was desperate and stole the charming Laughing Eyes and took her to his teepee under guard of his many warriors. But no sooner had he done this cave-man act than at 2:00 A.M. of Dec. 16, 1811, the wrath of the Great Spirit came in the form of a terrible earth quake, causing the forest to reel, rise and fall with great chasms reaching to unknown depths below and these dreadful shocks came one after another, lasting until in the following February, forming a great valley fourteen miles long and four miles wide, destroying Reelfoot, his captured bride and his entire tribe.

Drawing from the Mississippi, through subteranean channels, the valley filled with water to a depth in places of nearly one-hundred feet and with shallow flats covering thousands of acres, liberally stocking this wonderful lake with all kinds of fish.

All over this remarkable lake today may be seen untold trees, mostly cypress, some with only their tops showing above the surface while those near the shore are still green and growing, and among these green trees, instead of our water lillies, the fragrant nymphes orodata, we see a wonderful lotus lily known as Yoncopins. Its leaves, lying prone on the surface, are about two feet in diameter, resembling those of the giant victoria regia of South America. The blossoms of these Yoncopins are white and from ten to twelves inches in diameter. In the South Seas, a species of this lotus lily may be seen, which is a bright red, closely resembling the Egyptian lotus in form.

In western Arkansas and northern Louisiana a number of smaller lakes were formed by the same seismic disturbances.

Andrew Jackson and Davy Crockett visited Reelfoot shortly after it came into existence. This is mentioned that you may know other noted men besides myself have seen Reelfoot.

We fished along the south bank near the spillway, our catch consisting of gar pike, black and striped bass, croppies and bream. There are plenty of cat-fish, some weighing fifty pounds. The fish are of excellent quality, as the bottom of the lake is covered by quick sand.

Reelfoot in the fall, is a refuge for countless thousands of game birds, or would be if the hunters from far and near did not raise havoc among them. All kinds of ducks, geese, brant, cormorants, herons, cranes, coots, gallinules, rail, bittern, teal etc. Many of these birds nest among the water lilies, smart weed, saw grass and wild rice along the shore, which has a length of about fifty miles. Big fat swans used to be killed here and shipped away by carloads to be sold at twenty-five cents each. Trappers still find mink, weasel, otter, opossum, raccoon, deer and bear.

My space is filled or I should like to tell you still more of this most primitive place.

There is an intersting story of a noted outlaw and desperate killer who lived at Reelfoot contemporaneously with his friend, Jesse James. The state finally made up a posse of ten noted sheriffs and detectives who deployed out, each bent on winning the big reward offered, but the desperado got every one of them and then escaped, never to be heard from afterwards.

LETTERS

EARLY DECATUR DAYS

Dear Arba:

I am sending a money order for the Republican for another year. I do enjoy it so much, even though there are many that I don't know any more.

You have so many letters from the old timers that I used to know back in the eighties and nineties when I lived there. I don't suppose Jim Chamberlain, Charlie Frye, Charlie Dine, Frank Stapleton and others would remember me, but I remember them. So much has "gone under the bridge" since my time in Decatur, but I still work in our print shop every day, and am feeling just fine all of the time.

We moved into a new building in October, '48, and it is very nice. The entire space is light and we have much more room than we had previously.

With kindest regards,

Your old friend,

W. E. Secord.

It is like going back to another age to receive a letter from Will Secord. He must have begun work for Andy Johnson in the Republican office in the early eighties, and we first worked with him there in the summer of 1887. Will was an all around printer then and ran the Washington hand press, while we kicked off the Frank Tucker hand bills all day at a time. When school began in September that year we left the printing business and went to work out of school hours in the Browning drug store.

It was ten years later that we returned to newspaper work again. Will and Fred Dewey had established the Decatur Independent which through friends we were able to obtain from them the first of January, 1897. Both of these men are still living, in fact all three of us are. It is good to know that Will Secord is still following the trade and that Fred Dewey is comfortably retired.

THE LOST IS FOUND

It took a terrible accident to bring this editor in touch again with one of the best of his youthful friends. The early life of Stanley Dare Knight was lived in Decatur. He was one of the famous Potts grocery team of whom the late Thomas Mahoney was the other. Before Tom's death which occurred about a year ago, we often talked about Dare and wondered how he was faring. It is a great pleasure to hear from him again and wish we might be able to go right down to the Gem Cafe and show Tom this letter. We would talk of the escapades of youth all over again. Dare was in Cleveland when last we heard from him, and will not venture a guess as to how many years ago that was.

His letter follows:

May 13, 1949.

Dear Arba:

You will no doubt be surprised to hear from me after all these years, but I often think of my home town (Decatur) and the ones I used to know so well. While going through my morning paper I ran across the enclosed account of a terrible happening to a couple from Three Rivers and immediately thought you and the other folks at home would be interested in hearing more about it from our local paper. Needless to say it was a terrible happening.

Am cutting this short so as to get it on its way.

Sincerely,

Dare Knight.

A GIFT AND AN ANSWER

1240 Ferdon Road,
Ann Arbor, May 12, 1949.

Dear Arba:

I am writing you rather hurriedly this morning to tell you I am mailing you a book, "To the Swift" by Anne Hawkins, which we have read, which came out recently. We think well of it and enjoyed the reading of it. It is an historical novel, telling the story of the "Pony Express," and is a thrilling narrative of the pioneer western days, bringing in the beauties of the Sierras, covered by the portion of the route where the story centers, covering adventures with the Piute Indians, the dangerous real gunman, contrasted with the restrained character of the real man, Sierra Dave Wagenet, the so-called gunman who had never killed any one, and his adorable young sister, who won the hearts of two of the more or less roughened pony men.

I thought you might like this book for the Decatur library. It is one of the Christian Herald's "Book of the Month" club books, which we are sponsoring because it attempts to give the public clean literature,—a drive that is much needed these days.

I have recently received a short letter from Lelia Brinkley, which I regret I have not yet been able to answer, as I have not too much strength and energy for typing these days. I intend to answer it as soon as I can and try to tell her a little about my life and family, which she seems to feel she would like to know about. I appreciate her recognition of myself as one of our family of Decaturites.

I am among those who regret any criticism such as was made about Nellie Truesdell's writings, which I greatly appreciate,—and can see no reason for such criticism. I especially appreciated her original poem to the tune of "Nellie Gray," I think it was, giving us a word picture of the Black River region from which she came. All her little homey details descriptive of the home there in its rural setting like our good old days, did sound good to me.

By the way, can you, if you do have a free moment, give me a few details about Alonzo Newton Benn's recognition and his writing for some of the big newspapers? I think I am going to put his poem on the "Old Town Pump" in the "Almont Squealer" or whatever we may decide to call it, this summer. Would like to mention his noteworthy work when I do it. Have seen something about him in our good Republican, but cannot recall what issue, or quite recall what papers in large cities he has his publications in.

With affectionate regards to yourself, Mollie and Eleanor, I am,

Ever sincerely,

Helen Hathaway.

Helen Hathaway is another newspaper and personal friend who is always doing something nice for others.

The book she sent is a fascinating story. We sat up late Sunday night reading it, but had to go to bed before the finish. In another week will turn it over to Librarian Gertrude Van't Zelfde with the compliments of the sender, and think it will become at once a popular book in the library.

"To the Swift" is a story of the gallant men and one woman who made the Pony Express a fabulous chapter in American history. We first learned about it when a boy collecting postage stamps. The boy who could boast of having in his collection a Pony Express stamp was the envy of the other young collectors.

The pony express was the mail service inaugurated in 1860 between St. Joseph, Missouri, and California. Eight days were allowed for the schedule; 190 stations were established; there were 80 riders and about 400 horses, and over 300 station keepers and their assistants. The service was discontinued in October 1861. Reading this book will give one a thrilling chapter in pioneer American history, and an entertaining romance as well. It has just been published by Harper and Brother.

When Cecil Rhodes was suffering from a serious affection of the lungs he was told by his physician and friend that he had but six months to live. His reply was, "So short a time and so much to do." He did not, however, give up his planning for the future. His life was prolonged for ten years and in that time he became the great financier and statesman of South Africa.

All we are trying to bring out by this incident is that there is not the time to do all we would like to do. So are asking our friend, Alonzo Newton Benn, if he will kindly send Miss Hathaway direct the information she seeks and send us a copy. And would be pleased also if Helen would send us a copy of the letter she writes to Lelia Brinkley.

Young writers interest us. It takes hard work to win recognition as a writer, and we admire their efforts. We know young people, and those who are not so young, right here in Decatur who have ability in that direction and we encourage them all we can to write. One will never lack for interesting employment when writing, even though it may not often bring rich financial returns.

The author of this story, Anne Hawkins, is the daughter of a Texas ranger. She studied in the University of California and the London School of Economics and has worked as a stenographer, court reporter and publicity writer. While reading a history of the Pony Express she decided to write her story. To learn the true facts about it she rode over every mile of the route. She is married to a jazz musician and lives in a suburb of Los Angeles.

JIM CHAMBERLAIN COMING OUT

New address: 1113½ Commerce, Fort Worth, Texas.

May 12, 1949.

Dear friend,

It seems good to be able to tell you that I feel much beter, that I am counting the hatched chickens and planning on a visit to Decatur sometime this summer. You remember how I was disappointed on coming last summer. I had planned a big trip, going on to New York to see my cousins, then into Indiana and Ohio, then swinging west to see my nephew, Paul Chamberlain and his folks in So. Dakota, and continuing westward to ride in Wanda's airplane and possibly to visit with her mother, Nellie Nelson, and then on to Eugene, Oregon. I also planned to take advantage of Louie Cracraft's hospitality before returning to Ft. Worth. But all I visited was the hospital and that was a very prolonged visit.

My son finally sold my home and I deposited the proceeds along with my other trust funds on which the bank deposits $150 per month to my checking account, or more if I require it.

I am enclosing a leaflet of the bank's resources, and also an illustration of the Star-Telegram's new press, also a photograph of the mother of the year. Ft. Worth was also honored in receiving the appreciation car filled with gifts from the French people for donating more than any other city in Texas. In fact Fort Worth donated more friend bundles of supplies to the French people than any other city in the U. S.

I am still taking the doctor's medicine and shots, but for reasons I will state have discontinued the services of the nurse. As $100 per month is too much for me to pay for room and board I am preparing to change my location. I hope to locate near the library where I expect to do much reading. The hospitals are over-crowded and these rest rooms have sprung up like mushrooms. They are making good money.

The hospital prices are outrageous, but the funeral expenses are also prodigious, and you have to pay the freight whether you stay or go. I have much to write but realize that my faculties have failed miserably. As a number of my friends have written that they enjoy my articles will write about the matters I promised to write about some time ago. If you have anything special for which you would like to employ my poor efforts say it, but remember I am like the old horse that was being led through the street. The bystanders laughed at him, at which the man said, "Don't laugh, boys, that horse trotted a mile in 2:06 in his prime." One of the boys replied, "It isn't what he has done, but what can he do now."

Hope to see you in July.

Your friend, Jim.

GETTING HIS BEARINGS AGAIN

The old saying is still true, "You can't keep a good man down, and Jim is rising above his "sea of troubles." For an old man of 19 birthdays he has made a good come-back and we expect now to record his 20th birthday. Owing to the fact that Jim was born on the 29th of February this will necessitate a wait of three years.

755 9th Avenue,
Fort Worth, Texas.
April 14, 1949.

Dear Arba,

Your kind favor received for which I return sincere thanks, for return of the paper, for the kind wishes and the sage advice, all of which, if God so wills will promote my health and welfare.

When I signed that paper I was in a helpless condition and did not realize its import. Also I did it upon the advice of my banker, doctor, lawyer and other people I thought had my interest at heart.

If I get better so that I can transact business I will see what I can do about it, and I believe I will sell my apartment house and if strong enough visit Decatur this summer. I am going to keep going until God calls me home; and I remember Mrs. Truesdell's "Admonition."

Now, as to your two unsettled questions: You know that Miss Guiney lived the last 30 years of her life in England. I do not find the poem, "Out in the Fields with God," in "Happy Ending," her complete poetical works, and authorities differ so much about the authorship of the poem in question that I have quit trying to find out whether she or Mrs. Browning wrote "Out in the Fields with God."

As to capital punishment: As a boy I was opposed to it, but back in the nineties if a man in Windsor, Canada, had serious trouble with another man it was commonly reported that he would often state, "I will meet him sometime in Michigan and settle with him there.

Three brutal crimes caused me to change my attitude toward capital punishment. I cannot always depend upon my memory, but you surely recall the druggist, Latimer of Jackson, Michigan. He boarded a freight and went to Detroit, hired a room, mussed up the bed so as to make it appear that he had been sleeping in it, killed his mother for her life insurance and returned home. You may also recall how at his trial he received sympathy and flowers from lady spectators; and after being convicted and sentenced for life he was made a trusty and escaped. He killed good men who would probably have lived long and useful lives had capital punishment been in force in Michigan.

No. 2. Millionaire lumberman Wright had difficulty with one of his employes about wages. He sued Wright and got a judgment against him, and when Wright did not satisfy the judgment the constable employed to serve the writ to enforce payment was shot and killed by Wright. He was arrested, convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment, and afterward pardoned by Governor Pingree.

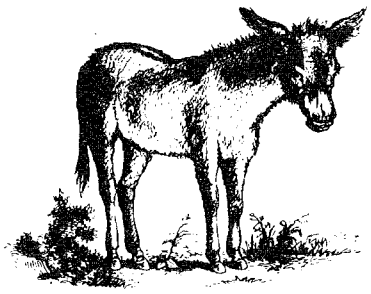
No. 3. I do not remember the name of the man who dynamited the school house near Lansing and killed so many of the pupils. I do not recall his being pardoned, but if a Michigan Pingree or a Texas Ferguson had been governor he might have been out to destroy many more useful young lives.

Jesse Pomoroy is another example of trading the lives of good people for the life of a born criminal, and as Gertrude Lyle states there is abundant Scriptural authority for capital punishemnt when it means saving innocent lives.

I am feeling some better now. I have a room by myself. The people who own and manage this rest room have a television set and I get to see lots of ball games without leaving the house, and I see plays much better than if I were able to go to the games. Among the games I have seen was the one in which the Fort Worth Cats beat the Chicago Cubs 3 to 2, with Mort Cooper pitching.

But Porterfield of the New York Yankees shut out the Fort Worth Cats without giving up a hit. You ball fans watch that boy Porterfield. He looks to me like another Bob Feller.

Your friend, Jim.



HISTORIC PALM SPRINGS

By C. C. Evans

Location 125 miles southeast of Los Angeles on Southern Pacific, where the desert meets the mountains. It is in Riverside county and just about the nicest place you will ever want to step your foot on.

I was informed that for centuries before any Spanish people ever saw the desert a peaceful group of Indians belonging to the Shoshaman family lived in the canyons and on the mountain slopes where water and game were plentiful. They were separated into two bands, the Palm Springs Indians and those living further west, the present Cahuillo, which now number about 65 individuals.

At one time the reservation comprised a little over 49 sections of land or approximately 32,000 acres. The first reservation was set aside for the Palm Springs Indians during the administration of President Grant and at the present time the most valuable of these sections is just east of the main business part of the city. Most of these Indians live there.

From this point San Jacinto mountain towers straight up from 100 feet above sea level to 10,805 feet into the clouds. It is the steepest and most perpendicular of any mountain in the United States. Only a few mountaineers have attempted to climb it, but soon the summit may be reached via the highest lift in the world.

A little to the South is Palm Canyon which has been pictured in newspapers and magazines and is a famous beauty spot. An easy foot trail leads down into the canyon where moving picture people frequently set up locations. This canyon is located seven miles south of the city, and its 13 mile length of canyon wilderness is breath taking.

Further up the canyon are water falls and palm trees said to have attained the age of 2,500 years. A fire swept this area in 1939, but the palms have come out again as beautiful as ever.

I was about to forget one of the most picturesque and interesting phases of Indian life in Palm Springs. It is the mineral baths. For centuries the Red Men have gathered around these hot bubbling springs and drew health from their curative waters which contained traces of 11 health giving minerals. This is the original Palm Springs. It is fascinating and friendly, providing every facility for a healthy holiday vacation in a community. It is not just another resort, but a totally different way of life. When you are in it you will realize the change.

Nellie Truesdell's Column

916 Hays Park, Kalamazoo, Mich.

1949

May 20, 1949.

I don't believe in bad luck on Friday the 13th, but I do believe in four leaf clovers. I find them almost every day. I found one this morning when I was looking for a favorite trowel I have lost. No I didn't find the trowel but I will. Last Wednesday a 'phone call from Grace Hinkley. Now I think 'phones are wonderful, but to hear that pleasant voice and not see the person . . Anyway we've made a date to meet before the summer is over.

I received a letter that day from George Roberts, 2856 Vermont Ave., Grandville, Mich. He had read the song I sent—Johnstown flood—in May 12th paper. He said he thought it was about 1889 and he was a little boy going to school. He has been trying for years to get the book which he thinks was called "The Johnstown Flood." I was sorry I couldn't help him. I never even saw the song in print. but I told him I would send his request to the paper and if any of the readers know how he could get the book he says he will pay them well for their trouble. Thank you Helen Hathaway for speaking so nicely about my little song of home, and all the nice things you say.

"They are not dead who live in hearts they leave behind."

Like the poem about the apple tree you spoke of in your column. Now it is among my favorites.

Yesterday the Garden Club met at my house. Our topic was wild flowers. I had two specimens from my garden. One is Herb Robert and the other golden meadow parsnip. Others brought flowers but the one I was happy to see again was the Mandrake blossom. The foliage is like umbrellas. In fact that's what we used to call them. I think the first bit of verse I ever composed was about them. We picked them and held them over our heads and said:

"Just see us strut,
With our umbrellas up."

Anna Rose gave a book review of Pioneering with wild flowers, by Geo. Aiken. Grace Hinkley knows Anna.

And now for the song Mr. Moulton asked for:

THE QUILTING PARTY

In the sky the bright stars glittered,
On the bank the pale moon shone,
And 'twas from Aunt Dinah's quilting party
I was seeing Nellie home.

Chorus:
I was seeing Nellie home,
I was seeing Nellie home,
It was from Aunt Dinah's quilting party,
I was seeing Nellie home.

On my arm a soft hand rested,
Rested light as ocean foam,
And 'twas from Aunt Dinah's quilting party
I was seeing Nellie home.

On my lips a whisper trembled,
Trembled till it dared to come,
And 'twas from Aunt Dinah's quilting party
I was seeing Nellie home.

On my life new hopes were dawning,
And those hopes have lived and grown,
And 'twas from Aunt Dinah's quilting party
I was seeing Nellie home.

I wonder what has become of all the buffalo robes. In my girlhood so many folks had them. We did not, but we did have a soapstone and warm blankets. My husband's father gave us a robe made from a cowhide. It went with us on our trip across the country and slept in tourist camps, not any cabins in 1921 and '22. I found a verse I had saved which reminded me of the robes. It is written by Mary Louise Tredinnick.

THE BUFFALO ROBE

Whenever stars crackle above creaking snow,
I smile and remember the days long ago,
When grandfather, smiling, would harness the bay
And tuck me beside him deep down in the sleigh.
Hot bricks for our tiptoes and over us both
The buffalo robe from some wild behemoth
Whose hide challenged onslaught of sun or of snow,
So promised snug riding at twenty below.
Rough, shaggy and coarse, and heavy as lead,
With the reek of the wild, in my lap it would spread;
The great tale of the West and the lush rolling plains,
While grandfather, slapping old Joe with the reins
Would fill me with wonder with phrases like these—
"Such herds on the prairies that no man, Louise,
Could count them. In waves like the sea
They grazed there as far as a man's eye could see!
They say there's no meat like a buffalo steak,
But takes a fast horse and a dead shot to take These critters. There isn't a hill
In all those savannahs, and no man could kill
In a lifetime enough to miss in the herd!"
Yet gone is the sleigh, those swift hooves and his word,
Then I held the West in my lap, now I ride
In dull, heated comfort—the frost all outside,
But I know that never in all of the globe
Will there be quite the thrill of that old buffalo robe!

SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR
By Arba N. Moulton

Many people believe the fracus between Spain and Uncle Sam over a half century ago was a toy war, but there is some evidence to the contrary.

Here is a list of the members of Company A. 35th Michigan Infantry, who left Decatur for the front on that memorable Fourth of July, 1898. They were Richard Abrams, Will Labadie, Will Fox, Henry Mahoney, Robert Oaks, Will McIntire, Will Pike, and James Hall.

The captain of the Company was Nathan F. Simpson of Hartford, who later served as representative in the state legislature and as warden of the state prison at Jackson. The first lieutenant was Bret H. Cocket of Decatur. Lt. Cocket was a natural born soldier and popular with the men under him.

Information concerning Michigan's part in the Spanish-American War is hard to find, but there is much to read about the participation of the United States in the war.

The war had been brewing for almost a century. Cuba was held by Spain and her rule was somewhat despotic. The United States, controlled as it was in the first half century by the slave states of the South, desired to annex the island. After the Civil War the South had no interest in the slaves of Cuba. But by 1895 the government was ready to do something for the island through sympathy.

When President Cleveland stepped out of office on the fourth of March, 1897, he said to his successor, William McKinley, "Mr. President, I am about to turn over to you a war which has long been in the making." It came in the following year. The "Maine" was sunk and the sinking was laid to the Spaniards, although it was determined later that the sinking was due to natural causes. The war followed, and it was mainly naval.

The Americans under Admiral Dewey opened fire on the Spanish squadron. His order to his captain was, "Fire when you are ready." Girdley was ready at once and the result of that first firing foretold the loss of the war to Spain. It was a victory that went round the world and made Dewey one of the greatest naval heroes of all times.

This reporter's lines were published in the Topeka Capital Daily on May 3rd, 1898.

"O Dewey was the morning
Upon the first of May,
And Dewey was the Admiral
Down in Manilla Bay
And Dewey was the Regent's eyes,
"Them" orbs of royal blue!
And Dewey feel discouraged?
I Dew feel we Dew."

1898

FOR VICTOR MEAD

(This letter was overlooked in the rush of the Christmas season, but it is not too late to print it now. $132 was raised on the street for Victor Mead and we understand as much more was given him by others. If others care to contribute through the Republican we shall gladly accept the money and turn it over to him.)

Harvey, N. Dakota, Dec. 11, 1948.

For the Editor,—

The accident of Victor Mead hurts me terribly. How I wish something could be done for him to show how much we care.

Would it be out of place to ask every reader of the Republican, if they felt able to send $1.00 (or as much as they wanted to) to you, and you present it to him?

When our house burned, a young neighbor near us started a collection, and his father headed the list with $50.00. Twenty-five miles away, another collection was started, and we knew nothing about either one, until the money was brought to us. They didn't do this because we couldn't replace the house. They did it from love, and as long as our memory remains, we will feel grateful. One small boy gave 77 cents—all he had. My eyes fill yet, over that offering.

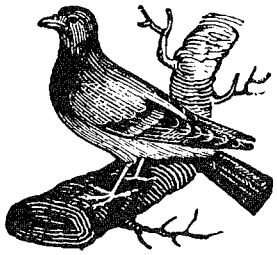
I believe God tests us, when some one is hurt, and we escape, to see what we are going to do about it. He had no more right to get hurt than we do. It just happens, and we can prove we care.

Years ago, and maybe some folks do yet, use the word charity, and think of it as such an ugly word. If they do, they shouldn't, and it's because they don't know the true meaning of charity. There is no nicer chapter in the Bible than 1st Corinthians 13. That gives a perfect definition of charity, which is love.

—Nellie Nelson.



Personalities

THE QUEEN OF THE AIR, Jacqueline Cochran, who set a jet record of 652.337 miles per hour, with her husband, Floyd B. Odlum.

AVIATION'S ODLUM

He Finds Profits in Pools of Red Ink.

(Floyd Odlum was once a Decatur school boy.)

Floyd Bostwick Odlum is an amiable, mild-mannered wizard of 57, with thinning sandy hair, shell-rimmed specs, and a prodigious talent for making money. His philosophy: buy when everyone wants to sell, and vice versa. This formula has boosted his Atlas Corp. into a $100,000,000 investment empire and is now leading him deep into the deficit-trimmed operations of the aircraft industry. Late in 1947 Atlas bought control of Consolidated Vultee Aircraft Corp., then in the midst of a post-war financial tailspin. Odlum became board chairman. Today another unorthodox maneuver finds him petitioning the RFC for a $43,000,000 loan to set up an equipment finance company to rent planes to capital-shy airlines.

When Atlas bought control Convair was losing its shirt. Selling prices for its first few score Convair-liners were agreed upon with the airlines in 1945, but production costs about doubled before they could be delivered. Result: a heart-chilling $36,000,000 loss before taxes in 1947, and $9,000,000 more tossed overboard last year. Odlum hopes to sell the rest of his planes at a profit, but at their present price ($500,000) few airlines can afford to buy them. The Convair Equipment Co. is his answer to this problem.

If plans work out the company will buy 100 Convair-liners and lease them to airlines. If a line decides to buy the planes it can do so at cost less depreciation. Several smaller airlines are said to be interested in obtaining planes in this way, but some of the larger lines give the plan the horse laugh, say rental fees are so high that the only one to make money on the scheme would be Odlum. And says one executive: "Traffic would have to pick up an awful lot before any line would have to hire extra planes to take care of peak loads."

Nevertheless, it would take courage to predict failure for Odlum in his aircraft projects. He has seldom guessed wrong. In 1920, three years after he came to New York as a clerk in a law office, he was named vice-president of Electric Bond and Share Corp. By 1926 he was vice-chairman of the company's foreign subsidiary and was responsible for foreign investments of over half a billion dollars. In 1931 he resigned to take care of the growing needs of a sideline he had started in 1923: a $40,000 pool with the ambitious name of United States Corp. By 1928 the pool had become Atlas Corp. ,with assets of $6,000,000. Sensing evil times ahead, Odlum turned half the company's investments into cash, then sold $9,000,000 in new securities, keeping the proceeds of this sale in a strongbox too. The depression year 1930 found the business world on its ear and Atlas Corp. with $14,000,000 cash, ready to prop it up.

Odlum started to buy up at bargain prices the shares of other, less fortunate investment companies, and by 1935 had upped his company's total assets to $100,000,000. This achievement got him tagged as the country's "Grade A" depression phenomenon. A few years later Atlas was worth $140,000,000. Odlum, however, reduced it to the century figure because he felt the larger sum was getting too hard to handle.

Since 1933 Atlas activities have been mostly concerned with "special situations," like Convair. TWA, Greyhound Bus, and RKO are among the larger companies which have received Atlas transfusions in the past. Banking, mining, manufacturing, utilities, retailing, hotels, and real estate are other fields which have benefitted from Atlas plasma, usually to the profit of both Atlas and the company concerned.

With Atlas dollars and Uncle Sam's bomber orders, Convair should recover as well. As for the equipment finance company, Odlum thinks it will do O. K. too. — Forbes.

FLOYD ODLUM MAY ENTER NATIONAL POLITICS

Floyd Odlum, once a Decatur youth, may take a leading part in governmental affairs. If he does he will be the second person from Decatur to become nationally known politically. Charles B. Warren, son of a former editor of the Decatur Republican, became Ambassador to Japan and Mexico and was President Coolidge's choice for Attorney General but the Senate, led by Senator Couzens, charged that he was a corporation lawyer and refused to approve the appointment. The following news story is taken from the Chicago Daily News:

Washington.—On the day that Louis Johnson was sworn in as Secretary of National Defense in an unprecedented and highly publicized mass ceremony, a dinner was given in his honor. On the dais were President Truman, Chief Justice Vinson and other notables.

At an appropriate moment from the rear of the room came cries of "Lou in '52." Thus was heralded the driving ambition of the new Secretary. As one of Johnson's close friends put it:

"Lou has been running for President for a long time. But he really began in earnest when this job put him in the public eye."

He is causing a great clatter in the Pentagon building as offices are switched about in accord with Johnson's concept of unity on that battlefront. But the suspicion is growing that one of his goals is to build up his own personal machine.

Johnson is reported to be privately pushing his friend, Floyd Odlum, the utilities operator and promoter, for chairman of the National Securities Resources Board. This is the post to which President Truman named his old friend, Mon Wallgren, but the Senate armed services committee refused to report the nomination to the Senate.

If Odlum's name goes to the Senate, there very likely will be an inquiry into the closeness of his connections with the aviation industry, and it seems to me properly so.

Odlum is president of the Atlas Corp., a holding company. Atlas according to a report to the Securities and Exchange Commission last December owned 418,200 shares of Consolidated Vultee Aircraft Corp. This is slightly less than 20 percent of the total, and considered equivalent to control.

Johnson recently approved a shift of approximately $157,000,000 in Air Force funds from other types of aircraft in experimental production to the B-36, which is made exclusively by Consolidated. This decision was said to have been approved by James Forrestal before he retired as Defense Secretary.

This may well have been a wise and inevitable move. Those with expert knowledge believe that in the past funds have been spread too thin over too many types of planes. Despite much criticism the B-36 seems to have established its reputation.

But when all this has been said there would seem to be a question of the propriety of the decision being taken by one whose self-interest must be, directly or indirectly, so involved. It raises, too some pertinent questions about the relationship between government and so-called free enterprise.

MORE DETAILS OF THE SQUIER-KNIGHT WEDDING

Another account of the Squier-Knight wedding comes from Glendale, California. It is taken from the Los Angeles Times, and the sender adds: "Have not made a contact yet. Guess I am at the end of the trail." This is the story of Carl and June:

Actress June Knight, former Follies girl, was married yesterday in Las Vegas to Carl B. Squier, 55, vice-president of Lockheed Aircraft Corp.

The wedding was solemnized in the Little Church of the West chapel in the Hotel Last Frontier by the Rev. A. C. Melton. Best man and matron of honor were Mr. and Mrs. Roscoe Behan.

Miss Knight, 36, was married under her maiden name, Margaret Rose Vallikett. This is her third marriage. She divorced Paul Ames, broker, and Arthur A. Cameron, Texas oil millionaire. Squier is a widower.

Wish the papers out there could agree on whether June is 35 or 36. Carl is a part of the history of Decatur and we want it straight for the record.

Nature Notes . . .

Those who want the birds to visit their yards all summer should think about providing them with water. Now is the time to start coaxing them to stay. It does not take much coaxing; just a little kindness. Put out some kind of a bird-bath or drinking-fountain. The birds do not ask for an expensive stone one, although such a one will be an ornament in any garden. They are easily satisfied and will splash around in any kind of dish that will hold water.

Once you start, please keep the containers filled daily because the birds will depend upon you to furnish them with a drink and a bathing place.

Whether the day is cold, warm or hot the birds seem to be happy at their bath. Our bird-bath has had ice on it these last few mornings when the temperature got down to 22°. I thawed the ice by pouring a little warm water over it, and soon a couple of robins were bathing. Sparrows sat on the edge of the bath to catch the spray as the robins shook themselves. I call the sparrows lazy bathers because they so often do this. This is not always true because they often soak themselves as much as other birds do. Who hasn't watched the robin get into the water and throw it up over his back and leave to a nearby post or bush to shake off the water, then come back to try it again and again before he decides to shake himself, preen and dry his feathers? Once we watched an oriole and a flicker soak themselves in nearby baths. I thought the oriole would never finish. He really kept at it until the water was about gone. The robin will dry himself on a nearby fence or bush but the oriole will fly to the top of a tree and sing as he dries himself.

Have you ever set out your sprinkler and watched the swallows and humming-birds fly in and out? Some day count the number of different birds which come to your bath. Notice whether they dip in and out or soak themselves.

Of the birds we mentioned last week as new arrivals for this week we saw the chipping-sparrow and kingfisher. We also added the northern shrike to our list.

ARTESIAN WELL AT VOUGHT FARM

Struck at 160 Feet One Year Ago In April. First Real Excitement Created by Drilling for Oil.

A year ago Tuesday, April 12, Jack Baker, drilling for R. H. Kersey on well No. 1, on the Vought farm struck an artesian well of water at a depth of 160 feet.

The water came with such force that the drillers were unable to control it. Water overflowed ditches and spread over an area of several acres before the bulk of it could be turned into Red Run.

After some hard wet labor a 20 foot pipe was placed over the well, the wa-

[illegible] shooting through it and into the [illegible]

[illegible] pressure back of the water to be [illegible] to be gone and the [illegible] to be pumped dry. [illegible] This was the estimate of the [illegible] it would take if it were [illegible] exaggerated.

To the [illegible] with all of his [illegible] experience in the business had he never saw anything like it. It was the most terrific force he ever encountered in his experience as a driller.

Men who know the conditions under which oil is found predicted that oil would be found below the water.

The well created intense excitement throughout the village and surrounding country and thousands of people drove there to see it.

Looking Backward

Mrs. Ethel Van Duzer Trayner of Rolette, North Dakota, sent the following Decoration Day program to F. C. Stapleton. Decoration Day 70 years ago was in the hands of the veterans of the Civil War. They made much of the day and the village was crowded with visitors. Mrs. Trayner was the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. P. W. Van Duzer who were among the early residents of Decatur and Hamilton. She has taught school in North Dakota for many years and says she hopes on her retirement to again become a resident of this village:

VISITS SCENES OF EARLY YEARS

O. O. Bishop of Rochester, New York, was a pleasant caller at the Republican office Tuesday. In his younger years Mr. Bishop was a resident of this community. His mother was Martha Richmond Bishop and his aunts were Amanda Richmond Thorpe and Kittie Richmond Hathaway, early residents of Marcellus and Volinia townships.

Mr. Bishop taught the Shaw school in 1895-6, and the East Valley school from 1896-8. He then attended the Ypsilanti Normal College and followed with three years as principal and four years as superintendent at Vicksburg. He next had charge of the department of Chemistry at the Ferris Industrial Institute 13 years and then went to Western New York as manager of a salt refinery.

Snow Races in Decatur Today.

Matched races for purse of $150 between Lady Hastings owned by Alex Griffin of Niles and Joe Murphy, owned by Mat Murphy of Lawton. Isaac Wilkes, owned by W. E. Meyri, against Silver Tail 2:10 and Billie S. of Niles.

Horses entered from Niles, Kalamazoo, Paw Paw, Lawton, Hartford, Lawrence and Decatur. Races begin at 2:30.

What a wonderful amount of rich Decatur history is hidden within the files of the Republican. What residents of today knew Mat Murphy, or any of the Murphys? That bright Irish family grew up in Decatur and were identified with this village from as far back ac the 1860's. In the Gazetteer of 1869 Dennis Murphy is recorded as a land owner in section four, Decatur. We enjoyed the friendship of all of them, and remember the children were Mary, Maggie and Tom, Lizzie, Mat, Kate and Nellie. Nellie was the youngest and the last to go, and she had lived away from Decatur for many years. Now they are all gone and there is no one left here to carry on the name.

Matthew Murphy was one of our spectacular young citizens. The world was always round and rosy and full of glowing adventure to him. Mat would take his listeners into his confidence and paint for them such nice word pictures that they would become his backers in his ventures.

Mat took naturally to drugs. He learned to be a druggist by sweeping out the Trowbridge and then the Carney drug store and studying the Pharmacopeia, and perhaps he took a year or two in college. He bought a drug store in Lawton and from then on he was only a visitor to Decatur, but we thought he always considered Decatur his home town.

Decatur was a horse town in those early years. Sylvester Hamilton owned Monty Patch and took him to Detroit that spring to work him for a record on the track of the Detroit Driving Club. Monty had a three year old record of 2:24¼ and Sylvester expected to put him below 2:10 as a five year old.

Battenburg Club Takes Sleighride

The ladies of the Battenburg Club and their husbands were entertained at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Burrell Van Curen in Volinia Thursday evening. Twenty-four of the party went in one sleigh load driven by T. F. Spellman.

The guests were Mr. and Mrs. Spellman, Mr. and Mrs. B. K. Durkee, Mr. and Mrs. F. C. Stapleton, Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Wood, Mr. and Mrs. Earl Copley, Mr. and Mrs. Earl Van Antwerp, Mr. and Mrs. M. E. Chadwick, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Pomeroy, Mr. and Mrs. O. A. Isham, Mr. and Mrs. St. Germaine, Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Warner, Dr. and Mrs. W. P. Bope, Dr. R. J. Huyck and Miss Lottie Welch.

The Lewis Graham family have lived on the S. J. Sherrod farm in Hamilton nine years and are planning to move. Thursday evening about 40 of their friends gave them a farewell surprise party. It was the 12th of February and the temperature was below zero, but the visitors did not mind that.

On the third of March, 1862, Andrew Corwin and Eli Hincher left their boyhood home of Andover, New York on horseback, and 18 days later drove into Keeler township.

26 Years Ago

Taken from the Kalamazoo Gazette of October 14, 1923, and furnished the Republican by Will C. Labadie, son of the late Charles Labadie and nephew of the Labadie sisters.)

Mattawan, Oct. 13. — On the southern shore of Three Mile Lake reside the Misses Ellen and Mary Labadie, daughters of Anthony Labadie, who in 1835 erected the first white man's home in Van Buren county. Of the 13 children born to the settler, four are still living, including two brothers of the sisters. Charles Labadie, 87, resides in Decatur, and Frank Labadie, 68, lives near the old homestead. After Anthony Labadie died in 1861, the daughters, Ellen and Mary, remained at the old home to care for their mother, who passed away in 1888. Until two years ago, when they rented their acres, the sisters successfully managed the farm.

In their home, equipped with modern improvements, the sisters recall many interesting experiences in pioneer days. Their father did the first plowing for Indians of Van Buren county, of whom they always had the highest regard. Before the family could afford to buy glass for the windows, the faces of their red friends would appear in the openings day, or night, and no one was afraid for the Indians had always proved themselves trustworthy. Their father made the long trip to St. Joseph with other settlers to obtain timbers for the first mill erected at Paw Paw.

One of the many prized relics in the old homestead is a framed letter, yellowed with age, written from Canada in 1825 by their great-grandmother.

The One Hundredth Anniversary of the Settlement of Lyle School District

1850 — 1950

Written by Theone Hughes and Read at the Centennial Celebration in the Lyle School House Friday Evening, May 5, 1950.

Chapter I.

IDEALLY located within a cluster of sparkling lakes are the broad and slightly undulating farm lands of the Lyle community. Its homes are neat and comfortable. And there is an air of thrift and success about them. Its barns, too, are well equipped, and its tool sheds house some of the latest in labor-saving machinery. Two of its farms have irrigating equipment. Like a white shaft through the community's center M-40 is a main artery down which flows the constant whine of auto or truck tires carrying passengers or freight towards Niles and points South.

But around 1850 there was no M-40. Even a generation removed from us Marshall Lyle, Jay's father, played as a boy in the sands of Eagle Lake where now M-40 curls about under the overhanging banks which were once the lake's boundaries. You probably have noticed the big old Maple across from the Maguires which shades the road somewhat in the summer. Jay recalls that his father told about playing under this tree as a youngster, with his feet in the water. One wonders how far from the lake the road will be in another hundred years.

It is difficult to picture our broad acres, now greening up from the Spring rains as timberland of white oak, whitewood, beech, maple and basswood. But just 100 years ago this community was a small part of the great unknown region called—"the West." Paw Paw was then a stopping place of about a dozen cabins, a cobbler's shop, and a lodging house known as Dodge's tavern. Sometimes the stagecoach traveling from Detroit West to Chicago over the old territorial road would bring new settlers. These would usually stay at Dodge's tavern until they could build their homes.

Sometimes there were as many as 100 to feed at Dodge's tavern and Mrs. Dodge did all the cooking. There were no mixmasters, electric stoves or refrigerators to ease her work then. It is interesting to note that Mrs. Dodge's death is the first listed in Paw Paw. We think we know why.

Let's hear what the old John Lyle cabin has to say about those early days.

CHAPTER II

THE JOHN LYLE CABIN SPEAKER

You little children there on the front row. You ain't afeered of a ghose, are you? You needn't be, 'cause I only come back every one hundred years. That's why I'm here tonight.

Jus' think of it, I'd be one-hundred-eight years old on my next birthday if I had lived. I guess I'm what you' call "an old fogey." But I was mighty strong and proud in my day and I could do more work than any stuck up youngsters can today with all their modern plumbing. Let me tell you about it.

I jes' forget now where I was growing when old John Lyle first saw me — only he wasn't old then. Maybe I was right here in this spot. "There's some dandy beech and maple." I heard him say.

"This ought to be good dirt around here." Next thing I knew he had me felled and was hewing me into logs.

They made my frame with whole logs — and only the best at that. No stingy, sawed-out thin boards went into me like you use now. No, sir. I was put together so I could stand up under any kind of storm. I wouldn't have any of those new fangled nails in my sides to rust out and come loose — not even if they had them then. Thank goodness they didn't. Maybe I didn't look as stylish as this fancy part on the school house where I'm a-sittin' tonight. But I was rugged — and mighty useful.

I had a great big room down stairs — just like these big combination living and dining rooms you think are so modern today. Only mine was a sittin' room, parlor, bedroom, kitchen and bath too. So maybe I was jes' ahead of my time. I 'spect at the next centennial I'll find that I'm put together jus' the way you folks are abuilding your houses. Oh, yes, I had a great big fireplace — bigger than anything around here. Mrs. Lyle did all the cooking here. And could she cook! And almost as good as Mrs. J. Lyle does now. I can still recollect the fragrance of them corn cakes, hominy grits and bacon. It took a lot of 'em too, to go around. Let's see, there was Levi, Marshall, Oliver and Olive of the children. They cleaned their plates too, no dawdling at meal times. There were lots of others at the table too. Let's see, Levi Schultz was staying in my cabin back in 1846. He was Harry Lurkin's uncle, you know. But he didn't like all this dense forest around me — looked like too much work, I guess. So he sold the tract he had gotten from the government to George Lurkins — that's Harry's grandfather, you know.

Well, let's see, what was I saying? My memory ain't as good as it used to be. Oh, yes — about food. Sometimes I can remember there was 15-20 a sittin' at my table right along, and there was bunks all over my big room at night. There was so many at breakfast they had to roll up the beds to make room. But nobody seemed to mind. They didn't get all het up about a-housin problem. I 'spect most likely they didn't know they had one.

Since I was the first cabin around here just about everybody stayed here until they could build. Some of those later cabins weren't as good as I was. My floor was all wood. John Lyle split the logs for my floor, putting the flat side up and laying the round side in the dirt. But the best part of me was that my sides were all plastered with lime to make me fire proof. I can remember John telling how he had to dig that lime from the bottom of lime lake in Almena and then had to burn it 'fore it was fit to use on me. Must have been an awful job to get to Almena in 1842 with no roads. They just blazed a trail by notching the trees. But when they got me all done they said I was worth it.

Seems like most everybody that stayed in me in the 1840s were either from New York or Pennsylvania. Some came by ox team, like the Lees: some by covered wagon, like the Orrs. John and his father who had come in the '30's came by boat from Detroit and then walked over the old Territorial Road from Detroit to Paw Paw — only it wasn't Paw Paw yet. Asa Hinckley came in 1846, but I can't seem to recollect just how he got here. He built a big house where Jean Hinckley lived and Jay and Jesse lived until it burned down. I recollect that Jay and Jesse had gone somewhere — Kalamazoo, mos' likely, when the lightnin' struck it and it went to the ground. Too bad. Burned all their wedding gifts too. But I was always jealous of that house. It was really built — as strong as a barn — with great white timbers and 4 × 4 studding, tenoned and mortised into the plate.

It was pretty, too. Well, after that burned they moved the old tenant house up from the back of the farm. That's where the Hugheses lived now. Arlene and Keith were born in that house. Keith is Louise Hood's father, you know. But now that's gettin out of my time.

What I started to say was — there was a lot of livin' in a house in the old days. I'm sure glad there wasn't just three or four people rattlin' around inside of me. 'Course, livin' wasn't expensive then either. Why, it seems to me that John Lyle's first taxes was around $6.00. Not more than $6.00 I'm sure. Of course, he wasn't old then.

I don't know what in tarnation this world is acomin' to. Sure glad I can just stay out of it.

Well, 'pears like you ain't listen' to me very well. Guess I'm not new fangled enough for you. But just you wait until the next Centennial. Then you'll all be a-flocking around waitin' to copy my style and my lines. Then I'll be too modern for you, mos' likely.

Chapter III

FARMING AND CLEARING

Between the 1850's and 1900 the only thing that was plentiful was work. The trees were chopped down by hand. Swinging an axe from dawn until dark, some of the early settlers became masters of the art of hewing. There is the colorful figure of Hi. Sherrod, Mamie Warner's stepfather, who built the Warner home. Hi. could stand on a rolling log and hew to a line. The resulting log looked like it had been sawed. Mamie's mother, Lettie, was a bit of old Ireland, herself, and perhaps her influence is shown in Mamie's high spirits and good humor. Lettie could sew a fine seam and kept her young daughter as prettily dressed as any child around. Letissia and Hiram were well liked for their good neighborliness, just as the Warners are today.

Hi. owned a blacksmith shop in Decatur for many years. Being an excellent horseman, he made the trip daily to Decatur and back to the brick house on horseback. Harry Lurkins can remember him well as he rode by the Lurkins home, his short sturdy figure leaning into the wind, his black, forked beard flying as he urged his horse towards greater speed by hitting him with his cap, first on the shoulder and then on the rump. This pendulum motion kept the animal going "rippety-brindle" as was Hi's expression—the faster the better.

There were other pioneers beside Hi who could hew to the line with an axe — Harry Lurkins' grandfather Sanders who built the Plopper school was one of these men. Also Quint Hamilton (Cliff Hamilton's uncle) and Enos Winborn were excellent scorers.

When the trees were chopped down the logs—believe it or not—were burned. It was not the timber—which was everywhere—but the hand labor, which was scarce. The tough virgin land was then ready for the breaking team of six to eight oxen on a huge breaking plow.

Even after the land was cleared farming wasn't easy in those days. Working from dawn to dark, walking behind the plow—not riding—a man could plow 3 acres with a good fast team. Jay recalls his father's seeding wheat at what is now the Ewert or Kuchmek place, but was then his grandfather's. Marshall Lyle used a 7' roller drill and seeded 18 acres of wheat per day. This meant walking from dawn until dark guiding the horses and the plow. It is small wonder with work so strenuous that so many men died early. Jay's father lived to be only 44, and Harry Lurkins' father died at 38, leaving young Harry at the helm. There was no time for play from then on in Harry Lurkins' life, but he has retained a wicked twinkle in his eye that lets us know he knows plenty about the art of living.

A large number of men on each farm were required to keep the work done. Asa Hinckley paid his threshing help by giving every eighth bushel. At that time wheat was worth 40 to 50 cents a bushel and it was harvested by hand. The crop was then hauled by ox team to St. Joseph where it was shipped by boat to Buffalo. It took a team of oxen and two men from two to three days to go to St. Joe and back.

Even when the grain was fed to livestock the work was still in it. Jay recalls how his grandfather fattened large numbers of hogs, steers, and around 1100 head of sheep each winter. Jay was small, then, and full of mischief. He was an excellent shot at a sparrow with a pebble, and equally skilled in hunting mice in his grandfather's barn. But, although Jay loved fun he was as observing then as he is now—and you know that is one of Jay's long suits. As a boy, Jay watched with admiration the efficiency with which his grandfather ran his 800-acre farm.

In the fall, Jay says, a couple of the men would drive the buckboard, or "cracky" wagon, as it was called, to Ace Fish's place near the county farm at Hartford. Here each Saturday Grandfather Lyle bought his sheep which were herded back to the Lyle farm on foot. Today a hired man who was asked to walk from Hartford to Paw Paw, chasing after a herd of sheep over rough countryside would hand in his resignation—plus some hot vocabulary, that same day. After the hogs and sheep were fattened they were driven into Decatur on foot and loaded into box cars, where they were shipped by train to Buffalo. Short-legged and very fat, the hogs would wheeze and puff like fat men at the finish of their 3 or 4 mile trek into Decatur. Consequently, the loss from bloating was considerable. Shrinkage was a big item, too.

Next week, the Orr house speaks.

CHAPTER IV

THE ORR HOUSE SPEAKS

I'm eighty-seven years old and my arthritis bothers me in this damp weather we've been having. But except for my joints creaking sometimes, by cracky, you'd be s'prised how fit I am. They ain't any of these youngsters in these here parts put together like I am with heavy white-wood timbers. I can still remember that spring day in 1863 when old Madison Eastman drove the last nail into my window trim and had me all finished up. He called Robert Orr and Anna Cumming Orr over to look me over. "It's the finest house in this section of the country," old Madison told the Orrs. "And you can well be proud of her."

News was just coming in from the South that same spring of 1863 of General Robert E. Lee's smashing victories against the Yankees. He had pushed the northern troops back all through the Shenandoah Valley, had driven Milroy from Winchester and had captured six thousand of our men and a large amount of valuable muskets, cannon and food supplies. But the Orr family was too happy over me to worry about the war news.

Sabie was eighteen that spring. She'd lived practically all her life in the one-room log cabin just behind me. She was pretty, too, and she was so excited over me that her face was all flushed and all the prettier. She'd been teaching school and had saved enough money to buy six cane-seated chairs to put in my parlor. Oh, yes, I forgot to tell you that I had a setting room too, and a bedroom on each side of it. I had a parlor bedroom too. The two boys, Sammie and Sabina, won't have to sleep in a loft now, no siree. I had a pantry too; a dining-room and winter kitchen, two porches and a summer kitchen with a meal room. I was really built. Yes siree! There wasn't anything to match my style for miles around.

The family was very happy — that is, for about a year. Then Sabie died and nobody seemed to care much about me anymore. Samie was sixteen then. With his sister gone Samie turned to his pets — the fawn he had raised with a bottle when the mother deer was shot near the log house, the squirrel he kept up in my shed room in a revolving cage. He liked to go up the "glory hole." Sabie used to play with him up here — it was their secret hide-out. You reached it by climbing up the old, red cupboard and over the top of the meal room. And there you were. Butternuts, walnuts and hickory nuts were always stored here. Seed corn hung from my rafters. And there was always a fragrance of an herb used to cure snake bites. Mrs. Pe-Pe-Aw, the Indian's white wife had told the Orrs' about it.

But after a few years Samie had grown too old to care about my secret room under the rafters. He began to be interested in the Lee house half a mile down the road. At first I was jealous. Then I knew it wasn't the house but Eva Lee that Samie liked. When Samie and Eva were married the family was sure happy. It was great to have a girl in the house again. And if anyone could have taken Sabie's place it was Eva Lee Orr. They brought the organ from the Lees' for Eva. And she could make the music pour out of it.

I can remember when the Add-A-Link Club met here for the first time. Eva didn't have time to play the organ much that week. She was busy scrubbing and polishing my woodowrk and my floors. She took the rugs out and cleaned them off with a stiff broom. She opened up my parlor and aired it out. She cleaned out all my cupboards and even the tops of the cupboards. I wouldn't think the Add-A-Link women would look on top of the cupboards — but she always thought every speck of me needed cleaning whenever they came. Of course, I kinda liked all of this attention and it felt sort of good to be so spotless, except that it made me feel stiff — like you do when your mother scrubs you up for Sunday school and doesn't get all the soap rinsed off. But what bothered me most was that Eva was too busy all that week to play the organ. But when Thursday came and all the women came in and admired me, Eva played for them. I was so happy to hear her play again my rafters shook a little, but I don't think a soul noticed. They were too interested in the music.

Samie and Eva had five children and what a hub bub there was inside me sometimes. But I liked it. And Eva always had time to play the organ or the piano. Let's see, there was Daisy, Dayton, Grove, Grace and Ivy.

Once in a while Eva used to tell the children about the old Lee house. This made me preen my joist and smooth out my shingles and feel pretty superior. "It ain't half as nice as I am," I thought. "Humph! — made with pegs instead of nails and with jes an old stick chimney like a log house." Eva said her dad, Uriel Lee, had plastered it on the inside with lime to make it fire proof. He had to dig the lime from the bottom of Lime lake in Almena, and then he had to burn it 'fore it was ready to use. The floor wasn't all sawed out like mine, but was made of straight poles hewed in half and laid in the dirt, the flat side up. Humph! No style! No summer kitchen and winter kitchen and parlor bedroom. No wonder Eva likes me so much better.

Grove and Daisy and Grace and Ivy and Dayton like to go down to Grandma Lee's house. It was because they liked Grandma Lee. Of course the house didn't compare with me. Grandma Lee was pretty fine. She could tell good stories. You know, she was Margaret Sherrod before she married Uriel Lee. Those Sherrods could all spin a good yarn. And there was about one or more Sherrods somewhere in the family tree of jes' about every family in the neighborhood. Grandma Lee knew a lot about medicine too, and what's that new-fangled word — psych-psychi-psychology — that's it. Whenever any of the kids at the Lee School had the stomach ache or somethin' the teacher would say, "You run down to Grandma Lee's and she'll know just what to do." After she doctored them up she laid them on the couch, took up her knittin' and told them about what Phipie and Wellie did when they were boys. Or she told them how her husband came all the way from Pennsylvanie with an ox team and arrived in Paw Paw with only $1.75. It's funny — wasn't no time 'fore the kid had forgotten all about the stomach ache.

All the children grew up and left home except Grove. I began to worry about him. He was pretty bashful as a boy. I remember he got up nerve enough to ask Katy Burten for a date once, and then lost his nerve and left her sittin' at home waitin' for him. He did better at the school picnic and took Clara Woodman for a boat ride. It took them an awful long time to get some water lilies.

When Grove was turning forty and still a bachelor I was getting discouraged. But I shouldn't have been, because that was when he met the dark-haired girl from Chicago — you know — Allene Cody. They liked each other and it was no time before wedding bells was a-ringin'. Then I could settle back with my memories and know I'd get taken care of like Eva always did. And what memories I've had.

There was the argument over Grove's first pair of long pants. There was the day the oxen ran away with Ivy, but she hung on. I remember the excitement when Dayton took Grove to Lawton with the horse and buggy, and put him on the Maccabee Excursion Train to Ann Arbor to the hospital for an operation. I never liked the oil lamp 'cause they sooted up my nice wood work. But I liked the cozy feeling of the big pile of wood behind the kitchen stove on a cold night, and the egg basket under Eva's bed. I liked to hear Nell Dunnington's orchestra when it practised here, too.

But, gosh, I'm plumb worn out with all this talkin' more'n I've done for seventy-five years.

Ouch, there's that durn arthritis again. Ho, Hum! Guess I'll go back to sleep. Hope I'll be seein' you at the next Lyle Centennial.

Chapter V

After most of the original tracts of land were taken over from the government, later newcomers to this neighborhood worked for the earlier landholders before buying their farms. Money came hard but there were not too many ways to spend it. Radio, television and fast motor cars were not tempting those hardearned dollars at every turn in the 1880's and 90's. Some of the top hands, such as Charles Hood and Thomas Hutchins would make 40c to 50c per day (about $10 to $15 per month) and saved money on it. Jay tells of his Uncle Robert's saving up $700 working for Evans (who owned the Paul Maguire home before Paul's father bought it.) Robert Lyle was plowing at Evan's and plowed under his wallet with the $700 in it. As soon as his loss was realized he plowed the furrows back and luckily, recovered his money.

It is easy to see that the recipe for success in 1900 was very much as it is today: one part shrewdness and two parts thrift, thoroly mixed with hard work and well seasoned with faith. A stranger who wanted work in those days was not asked for a character reference—it took too long to track these down. (Telephones were a rarity in 1900. The Jason Woodmans and the Lurkins were the first to have these conveniences in 1903. And there was no rural free delivery in those days, either. One received his mail when he drove his horse and buggy into town for it—perhaps once a week.) And so a stranger who wanted a job was appraised on the spot with native shrewdness as his only yardstick. Jay recalls his grandfather's technique: "So you are a hard worker," John Lyle would say to the applicant for a job, "Let me see your hands." If those hands were well calloused, the man got the job. If they weren't, he didn't.

These shrewd pioneers did not forget that educating their youngsters for the changing future was as important a task as clearing the land. Very early a school was built on the Henry Hinckley farm (now the Anna Hood place.) It was later moved to its present location.

Although the whole neighborhood exemplified thrift and hard work and integrity of character, somehow, when we think of these qualities we think in particular of Charlie and Anna Hood. Charles Hood and David Lane came over from England in 1881. When they set foot on American soil they found it well covered with a heavy snow, 4 feet deep. If they could have turned back that bleak day they would have. But Charles Hood had saved up not only his passage money but also that of David Lane, and it could not be wasted. So they took the train from New York to Decatur and walked from there to the Edson Woodman farm where they had agreed to work.

As the older members of the community recall, heavy set Uncle Edson owned what is now the Kowkowski farm, where he wintered some 70 head of Percherons. He also owned some land adjoining Lake Cora where the horses were driven for summer pasture. Most of the Percherons were imported from France, where Edson Woodman traveled each year to buy new stock. One of his most famous and lucrative stallions, which was bred on his farm rather than imported, was Duke. There were Shetland ponies, too: "Jumbo," the neighborhood pet, and others. And there were quantities of mint growing on the farm.

The horses, ponies and the mint required plenty of hard labor and Edson Woodman was highly pleased with his new hand from England, Charles Hood. David Lane, however, was not pleased with Edson Woodman. The early settler's spirit was uncompromising and exacting and David Lane wanted to quit. "We are staying until our agreement runs out," Charles Hood told him. They stayed. When the agreement expired, Mr. Hood went to work for Anson Webb, and later for Phil Sherrod and John Lyle.

Charles Hood was eager to get ahead, and so he bought a farm at Berlamont. He was married then. But misfortune overtook him. After his son, Ward, was born his wife died and shortly thereafter his house burned down. His misfortunes turned out to be the community's gain as Charles Hood returned to this neighborhood and worked for John Lyle.

During those years that he worked for Mr. Lyle, it seemed to be necessary for him to make frequent trips down to the Lurkins home several evenings a week. He was always dressed up, too. The reason was apparent to all the neighborhood—Anna Kay, now Mrs. Hood was then working for the Lurkins.

After the marriage of Charles and Anna came the lean years of the early 1900's. Farmers' prices were not too favorable then. Clover hay sold for $6.50 a ton and timothy for $11.00 per ton, baled. The baling was done with a machine run by horsepower. But both Anna and Charles were not only hard workers—they were ingenious, as well. Anna could not trade eggs for yard goods in Paw Paw, so she tried at the stores in Lawton. Here she found she could swap eggs (which then sold for 5c a dozen) and butter (then 7c per pound) for muslin which cost her 5c per yard. The same dozen of eggs today will buy 1½ yards of muslin. Butter today will buy 2¼ yards of muslin.

By hard work, thrift and ingenuity, Charles and Anna bought the Henry Hinckley farm, where Anna still lives. Later, by the same hard work, they added other property. John Woodman recalls that as a young man he went to bed at night with the sound of Charlie Hood's voice reaching him across the fields as he urged his horses on the grain drill. He awoke in the morning to the same sounds. We wonder how Mr. Hood, slight of frame as he was, stood up under the heavy work load he undertook. Anna was always there to help, too. She drove the team on the hay fork or to rake the hay. Just 6 years ago both Charles and Anna Hood husked their field corn by hand, themselves. Anna said, "If Charles can stand it, so can I."

In the early days it wasn't easy to help, either. Ward was little then and quite a cut-up. He liked to run away from home, too. But having a mother and a home again, cured him of this. Ward liked home life and grew up with a deep appreciation for good food. At school he liked to sit by Paul Maguire, whose mother made excellent cakes. Fortunately, Ward is still able to indulge his fondness for good food by marrying Edna Beals, the neighborhood's prize cook. Was it manly intuition which guided him in this choice? Or was he just darn lucky?

Chapter VI

EARLY INDUSTRIES

There was a little commercial industry in the Lyle community some time before the turn of the century. Paul Maguire tells of the apple dryer and hop dryer and press which was on the Evans farm when his father, Dell, bought the present Maguire place.

There are still some hops growing on the Maguire farm. Louise plans to transplant some of these to the yard to prevent their becoming non-existent in future years, as the attractive hop vine is fast becoming a rarety. As you may know, the hops were used in making the yeast and malt for beer. Although beer has become no rarety, cheaper processes for the making of yeast and malt have been developed which have improved its flavor, as hops were bitter in taste. Before apples were stored by refrigeration or by canning, apple drying was the popular method of preservation. As you drive around Bangor and other apple growing sections, notice how many barns are still equipped with evaporation turrets at the peak. There are still several relics of apple dryers in that area.

Right across from Dolly and Henry Meyers' cottage on Eagle Lake on the east side of M-40 you can see the high bank which supported the building and under which was the cellar which held the furnaces. The apples were peeled by machinery, sliced and then dried in trays in evaporators. They were then packed in boxes such as prunes and apricots are today. The hops which were also dried in these same evaporators were then pressed into cakes or blocks and then packaged.

Jay Lyle can remember driving by this building with his grandmother in a horse and buggy, and seeing the cellar glowing with a reddish light. A few minutes later, before he could get help to put out the fire the whole building was ablaze and burned to the ground.

South of where the apple and hop dryer building stood, at an earlier date there was a saw mill. This was a desirable site as the logs could be floated on the lake (which edged the bank in those days) and from there skidded to the mill. The neighborhood children were as adept in riding logs as our present youngsters are in riding bikes.

Hi Sherrod used to haul his logs over to this Cuddeback saw mill by oxen. Harry Lurkins' grandmother used to watch him as he rode by the Lurkins home. Al the neighbors watched, in fact—because Hi stood astraddle the movings logs, hewing them off to a line with his axe as the oxen plodded along. The results were as good as the saw mill could have done.

East of the spot where the saw mill stood there was once a cabin where three little Cuddeback children, left alone for a while, burned to death.

LEADERS IN WORK AND PLAY

Also at the community meetings of a generation ago they had spelling schools, singing schools and debates. Wouldn't it be exciting if we could have had a wire recording of some of those debates? The great debaters of the 19th century were David Woodman, an excellent orator, George Sherrod, who could always produce the facts, and George Lurkins, who was as highly persuasive and as good a narrator as his grandson, Harry, is today. It is interesting to note that on whichever side these men debated that side always won. Or if they were divided—whichever side had any two of them always won, no matter which two.

About this time David Woodman's son, Jason, who was about the age of Tommy Hood now, would debate with the grown-ups and many times out-classed them with his eloquence and brilliance. Later Jason Woodman was sent to the State Capital at Lansing as Senator, where his gift of eloquence was put to advantage for several terms of office. He was also county agent for Kalamazoo county. With his research into soils, potato growing, and the continuance of his father's research into grains, he brought considerable prestige to that office. His son, John Woodman, and his neighbor and young friend, Harry Lurkins, continued that prestige for Van Buren and Berrien counties. The neighborhood has been most fortunate to have such men.

Just in case those of you who only knew John as an adult may be misled into thinking he was always reserved and dignified, let us disabuse your mind of such thoughts. John was the neighborhood mischief and what he couldn't think up wasn't worth thinking about. One of his favorite pranks was on his aunt's father, who lived where Carsons do now. John and his brothers would sneak into the stable where the milking was in progress. There were knot holes in the left side of the stable into which a stick could be inserted. At the end of the stick was bossy cow, and on her right sat Mr. Richmond on a 3-legged stool. The sounds of the cattle and the staccato notes of the squirts of milk hitting the pail drowned out John's snickering. The rest was easy. A jab of the stick and bossy stepped sideways. "What ails ye, ye blasted cow," Mr. Richman would ask. After righting the stool and pail he resumed the milking. But soon came successive jabs of the stick and John's uncle would forget what he had learned at Sunday school.

He never knew that his young nephew was the cause of bossy's queer behavior.

HARD WORK FOR THE WOMEN

Haven't you often wondered how the early pioneer woman held up under the tremendous work load with an average of 5 to 10 children and the same number of hired hands to board. Everything was done at home then, too. There were no Campbell soups and Broadcast redi-meats to make quickie meals. Or if there had been, these pioneer woman could not have afforded them. Everything depended upon their effort. Bread was baked daily, or every other day, a dozen loaves at a time. Clothes were made at home—and what clothes!—with yards and yards of material, elaborate tuckings and delicate lace. And these were ironed by miles of walking back and forth to a wood stove where the sad irons were kept hot. And weren't they correctly named—"sad" irons. A garment could be only partially smoothed before the iron had to be replaced at the stove for a hotter one. And such heavy things to lift.

The pioneer woman was her own milliner, too, and she was often the family doctor and nurse. Her time was valuable and children were not traipsed after and coddled. Maud tells how capable Mina VanFleet, who was cook, bookkeeper and housekeeper at the John Lyles made the children mind. Jay had access to the cooky jar when he was growing up but he had to sit in a chair with an apron to catch the crumbs while eating his cookie.

But although every sort of labor was expected of a woman, don't think that she skimped on meals. Each day the food safe in the basement was lined with freshly baked pies, home churned butter and cottage cheese. Only the sugar, whole solid cheeses and crackers (by the barrel) were bought.

Here is a sample menu taken from McCall's in 1903 for a suggested Christmas dinner: cream of tomato soup, roast turkey, turnips, mashed potatoes, chicken pudding, ham, apple sauce, cranberry sauce, squash, oyster plant, celery salad, plum pudding, mince pie, cafe' parfait, velvet cream, macaroons, and coffee. And all this without benefits of mixmasters, electric stoves or refrigerators. No wonder they were called the "good old days." However, few women would care to go back to them. Washings were not done in automatic washers then, but rubbed on a board by hand and boiled in a huge boiler. There was never any lack of soiled clothing, with large families and many hired hands all doing hard manual work.

Probably the women could not have survived this period were it not for the hired girls who were an essential part of every household. But even so, a woman's work was never done. Maud recalls how her mother who was fired with ambition for self improvement, took a chautauqua course in literature and did her studying after her work was done at 10:30 at night. As one wanders through an old cemetery today he notes the short span of life, particularly of the women during the last century. If we had to choose between the good old days and the good new ones I think we'd stick to our modern plumbing, our tractors, our automatic washers, and a few years hence, our television.

Chapter VII

FUN AS WELL AS WORK

The early settlers in the Lyle community had their fun. Since most of the neighborhood was interrelated, there was much visiting back and forth. One doesn't have to dig back very far into neighborhood history to find that the Cuddebacks are related to the Orrs and the Orrs to the Sherrods and the Sherrods to the Lyles and the Lyles to the Hoods, and so on. Perhaps this is one reason the Lyle community has been such a strong one.

There was plenty of community activitiy then as there still is: picnics with horse racing or foot racing down on the sand of Eagle lake were frequent. And there were community meetings such as we are now having.

RARE ANNA WOODMAN

The Lyle community is what it is today not by the industry or shrewdness of a few families only, but by the tremendous energies, generosity and thrift of a passing parade of names which bring respect and a brightening twinkle to the eye of those who are old enough to remember them well.

Let us first pay tribute to Anna Woodman whose brilliance and ability always elicits some word of praise whenever her name is mentioned. Capable as an actress, she could take the parts of several characters, putting on a one-woman show. Highly original, too, she kept the neighborhood entertained for many years, much as Louise Maguire does now.

Fred Woodman and his sister, Grace, inherited the present Warren Woodman farm from their parents, Jonathan H. and Ellen who settled here in 1862. After his parents died Fred and Grace lived together there for several years. But Grace married and Fred had ideas, too. The vivacious Anna Leddick was working for George Lyle in the big home we now call the Vincent house. She was small of frame with dark snapping eyes and quick speech. Fred Woodman was eager for opportunities to exchange work with George Lyle—anything that would give him an opportunity to see more of Anna. And Anna, too, was impressed with Fred—his steadfastness, his shrewdness, his ability to add columns of figures in his head, and spell down the neighborhood at spelling bees.

After their marriage, Fred's steadfastness and Anna's joy of living added much to community life. In those days Anna was a constant companion of her close neighbor, Anna Hood. The two women, together with Katherine Lurkins liked to go cranberrying or blueberrying in the Woodman patch. Katherine still remembers some of those days as highlights. In her words, "I honestly believe I had more fun with Anna Woodman and Anna Hood on those cranberrying days than I ever had before or after in my life.

Ward and Max were little then and tagged along with their little pails to fill. Sometimes the cranberries were so plentiful that they could sit on the ground and pull them by the fistful into their pails. At other times the ground was too wet or the berries too scarce for a big haul. But there was always the reward of a marvelous day in the open with an abundance of laughter and plenty of singing and, best of all, Anna Woodman's homespun entertainment. These blueberrying trips became so popular with the three women that Fred liked to kid them about it. If he would see Anna Hood somewhere in the neighborhood he would call out, "Say, Anna, I think there are still a few of those blueberries left."

Anna Hood recalls how she and Anna Woodman used to meet at the end of the lane to attend some activity together or to go to Sunday school at the Lee school.

Another of Anna Woodman's chief pleasures was a fishing trip with her neighbor, Inez Maguire. Sometimes they would spend the whole day fishing. On these occasions little Paul had to sit quietly in the boat for hours, and he grew increasingly restless, fidgety and mischievous. But the women fished on. Fred Woodman grew fidgety, too, if Anna had not returned by supper time. Then he would walk across the field to the Maguires to see what was up. He always looked first to see if Anna had a good string of fish to account for the day spent. If she did, he said nothing. If she didn't, he scolded. But Anna only laughed it off and quickly restored his good humor by telling him something funny that had happened. She always retained this ability to minimize trouble, and, in later years, to discount pain—a wonderful woman.

OLAF AND EDITH ANDERSON

Another fine couple who were contemporaries of ours, but should be mentioned nonetheless, were Olaf and Edith Anderson. By their industry and good neighborliness they were real assets to the community. Mrs. Anderson was an active member of the Add-a-links and of extension class. Always a good sport, we can all still remember her comical stories. One she frequently told was of their new innerspring mattress:

As you remember, Olaf was tall, but lean. Edith was tall, too, but with a well rounded figure. She never told just where she tipped the scales, but the arrow must have gone a little beyond the 200 mark.

Olaf was ready for bed first that night. He was anxious to try out the new mattress for the first time. The old one had been about as springy as a soggy biscuit, so this new luxury had found him already relaxed and completely off guard. But Edith had forgotten all about the new purchase. She had been housecleaning and was especially tired. With a heavy sigh she dropped her weight wearily onto the bed. There was a snapping of springs and Olaf flew into the air like he was thrown from a net. Edith rebounded, too. "Papa," she cried, "Var are ve going now?"

Mrs. Anderson loved to tell this joke, and many others on themselves. Their untimely death left an unfilled gap in community life.

THE RELIABLE HAMILTONS

Woven into the tough fabric of the community in many commendable ways was the hard working Hamilton family. Most of the community was dependent upon their brawn and ingenuity for getting the neighborhood work done. There was Quint Hamilton who was handy with an axe. There was John who was an early riser. John worked for the Lurkins and for many years occupied one of the upstairs bedrooms there. Harry Lurkins tells how John always awoke at 4:00 o'clock in the morning as though there were an alarm hidden in some inner spring of his body. Being punctual was a matter of honor with him and he would sometimes caution Harry: "Don't ever call me, young Judge. If I'm able to come forth I'll come forth."

There was also Jean Hamilton, and his brother, Bob. Bob was a comical fellow, who seemed to have an endless reservoir of funny stories.

And then there was Bill Hamilton, Cliff Hamilton's father. Bill drove a spotted horse and he entertained the neighborhood with his singing and dancing. Although Bill weighed only 135 pounds he could take a Flowerfield cradle and could cradle more grain and lay it in a swath than any other man in the country. Many were the times that he bushed men a foot taller and 60 pounds heavier.

Another man whose axe and saw and generous disposition carved a permanent place for him in the Lyle community was Thomas Cotton. Cotton built many houses in this area. But, being a bachelor and having no need for wealth, believe it or not—he gave them away. The Orrin White house and part of Elliott's was built by Cotton.

DOC FIE

One of the most colorful characters, and one which this community can never forget was Elmer Fie, better known as Doc. He won this title by being the neighborhood handyman and veterinarian in the day when veterinarians just "weren't." At one time or another Doc worked for just about everyone in the community. He was a spiritualist, too, holding seances here in this schoolroom. "There he is!" Doc would exclaim when he had supposedly brought back the spirit of a deceased relative or neighbor. His audience was partly credulous and partly skeptical. But Doc knew "all the answers," right, or wrong. On one occasion Harry Lurkins mentioned to him that the Lurkins home was broken into and ransacked, with many articles of clothing missing. Doc deliberated for several moments. His observation became a neighborhood slogan:

"There's just two things about it—you'll either get him, or he'll get away."

A history of Doc Fie was also a history of the brick house, the one northeast of Warren Woodman's and still owned by the Lurkins. Doc worked for the Lurkins for 17 years and most of this time his short, stocky, bent figure was seen in and around that house. Being a restless soul, one year Doc moved 7 times. Five of those times was into the brick house. Whenever Doc was moving he always drove his topless buggy by the brick house. If it was empty, Doc always moved in for a while, if only for a night. There was something about that house that was part and parcel of Doc.

There was one year when Doc was living there that the going was pretty tough. He complained to the Lurkins that he had had some bad luck and he didn't see how he was going to keep his family fed. As there was a chicken coop on the property Harry thought that one solution might be to have this building utilized. And so he offered Doc 10 or 12 Plymouth Rock hens. The proposition was that the hens should be returned to the Lurkins in the fall, but that Doc should hatch some baby chickens from them and also have the eggs. The Lurkins brought grain down for the hens all that summer. One Fall day the men were working in the grapes up near the brick house. Doc was pumping the water by hand for the spray rig, when he stopped, leaned on the pump and addressed Harry:

"I tell you, Lurkins, B'Gawd, one of your hens died."

"That's too bad," said Harry.

John Hamilton was near by hoeing in the grapes and gave Harry a knowing wink and nodded his head towards the house, where Doc's smallest youngster was just emerging from the door with a very large drumstick in his hand.

That Fall during threshing, Mel Johnson (well liked for his nimble wit) was one of those seated at the Lurkins dinner table. Doc was there too. Harry was helping his mother serve the men some chicken. During a hushed moment Mel spoke up, "I tell you, Lurkins, B'Gawd, one of those hens died." Even Doc laughed.

A CHALLENGE TO THE PRESENT GENERATION

e In another hundred years ours will be the names to be reviewed. Will we in the year 2050 leave as deep an imprint on this community as did the colorful, hard-working people who composed our past have done?

We may or may not have the brilliance of a Jason Woodman. But do we have the drive, the thirst for knowledge which made him a pioneer in agricultural methods?

Have we the lightness of heart, the delight in the simple joys of living which forever keeps the world new and wonderful and which was the special gift of Anna Woodman?

Have we daring equal to that of a John Lyle and a David Woodman who blazed a trail through the forest to found a new community?

Have we the courage of a Charles Hood to come to a strange new country from across the ocean? And do we possess the capacity to work, to save and to have faith in God and our neighbors as were the distinguishing qualities of Charles and Anna Hood?

Or have we the driving ambition which compelled Maude Lyle's mother to study after her household tasks were completed at 10:30 at night?

Do we have the sturdy stuff of which these pioneers were made?

The seeds of our past were planted with hands roughened and calloused with care. But they were planted with wisdom. Our pioneers sensed the future in these soils of beech and maple. And the seeds they sowed were miracle seeds of thrift, good neighborliness and faith in God. We have seen how those early beginnings grew into a fine, progressive community with a spirit which sets it apart from the rest.

Tenderly we closed the chapter on the past one-hundred years. And with hope and faith begin the next.

BODY OF FAMOUS WAR-TIME OFFICIAL WAS VIEWED

The Cemetery Board of Hamilton at one time transferred some of the bodies from one part of the cemetery to another.

The body of John Letts, the famous war-time deputy U. S. Marshal was one of the bodies to be moved. Letts was killed about the year 1864 at Dead Man's Hollow by a man named Simpson who mistook him for a highwayman.

Although it was many years after his burial that the casket was opened, his clothes still appeared to be in good condition, and even the scarf pin at his throat was still in place.

The Board now uses a cement burial vault and it is air tight and water proof. Twnety have been made this year and will keep a body life-like until opened. When the body is exposed to the air it soon changes, however. The twenty vaults which have been made are not enough for the demand, and more will be made as soon as the weather permits.

THE HIGHWAYMAN

The wind was a torrent of darkness among the gusty trees;
The moon was a ghostly galleon tossed upon cloudy seas;
The road was a ribbon of moonlight over the purple moor;
And the highwayman came riding — riding — riding —
The highwayman came riding, up to the old inn door.

The Old Hoppin House Near South Haven Still Stands

Written by Allen Chesebro of Evergreen Bluff Resort, South Haven. Thaddeus Hoppin was the great uncle of Mrs. Carrie Hall and Amos Vanderhoof.

One of the most interesting places in Van Buren county is probably the old Hoppin house. Not even some of the old landmarks along the Territorial road between Keeler and Decatur would compare with it.

No one seems to know just exactly when the Hoppin house was built, but it was long before 1860 when Thaddeus Hoppin came back from Jamaica island where he was a missionary for a number of years. The old house still stands on what is known as the Henry Waller farm along the north side of the Deerlick creek on Lake Michigan. It fronts west on what was once known as the old Paulville road, running along the bluff. The road was once known as the "St. Joe stage road." In 1840 and '42, Leonidus Hubbard, Sr., told me, his father drove the stage coach. This Paulville road as it was commonly known by the pioneers followed pretty closely the old Pottawattomie trail. It was the main traveled road south of South Haven until the lake shore was opened to the Packard tram track road, two miles south of here, in 1868. This tram track built of wood 4 x 4 ran from Ludwig pier to Packard upper two saw mills in a southeasterly direction. Those were busy lumbering days, in the 60's and 70's and 80's.

Ludwig pier was built in 1869. It had a platform where four or five lumber schooners could load at a time. Often time Packard saw mill would shut down to load schooners whenever they would drop in. Old VanBeck, a dutchman wearing wooden shoes would hang around the beach waiting for schooners to sail by. He would notify Jim Lee and others to run down to the pier to load schooners.

Deerlick school was built in 1868, a quarter of a mile east of Hoppin house on the Deerlick creek. It was so named when salt was placed in an old crotched tree by pioneers at the mouth for deer, according to legend.

Thaddeus Hoppin set out a large apple orchard. Set two rows of white pine trees west of the house leading to the Paulville road, also a wooden tram track to the beach. A truck with iron railroad wheels brought up stone, gravel and wood off the beach. At the head of this track nearby was the first out post set by South Haven's life saving crew, spring of 1887. This post was afterward moved to the Augensen place, now Ed Stieve, again on Ermina Moore. Then a concrete post was placed on the north side of Evergreen Bluff in 1931.

Thaddeus Hoppin's two oldest children were born on Jamaica island—Thaddeus Jr., and Helen. Jessie and John were born in a log cabin here, probably on the place. The rest of the children were born in the house, as Katherine Lee recalls. She is a cousin of the Hoppins.

Mrs. Hoppin's sister married Jim Lee in 1864 in the Hoppin house. Then they walked from there to the Jim Lee farm, a mile, as their first wedding trip. There was quite a to-do about it at that time. No weekly paper was published in South Haven then. The South Haven Sentinel began in 1870, I am told.

All the children went to Deerlick school. Mrs. Katherine Hoppin wrote that famous poem "The Deerlick School District No. 3." It was published in the South Haven Sentinel in 1872. Then post cards were printed in 1948 through the courtesy of Miss Katherine Lee as the 80th anniversary of the Deerlick school.

Jessie Hoppin went to the South Sea Islands and became one of the most famous missionaries in the world. Jessie was here a few years ago to see her old home. She showed us some of the pictures she had taken during her teaching in the Marshall Islands. She would rig up sailing craft and sail from one island to another. She never got tired of her work. Some of her pupils were highly intelligent and interesting to work with. Jessie never went back. She started to translate the Bible in California. She passed away there and her ashes were brought to South Haven for burial a year ago last winter.

Her work was well done, but the work and her memories in the South Sea Islands will go on forever.

After Thaddeus Hoppin died in 1872 (according to father's diary) Mrs. Hoppin sold the place to my Uncle Clare Chesebro March 24, 1883. That fall, Dec. 12, my folks moved over, it being a warmer house for us kids. The old house which Fred Kleckner built in 1865 was too cold for zero weather. We lived in the Hoppin house several winters. I can faintly recall many of the things that happened.

Straw was placed on the front room floor with a carpet on top and an old fashioned oblong wood burning stove to make the room warm. We kids slept upstairs in low-ceilinged rooms with low windows under overhanging eaves. They were four small bed rooms.

The south wing was the wood shed. An inside cellar stairs led to a Michigan style stone cellar. It had an odor which to this day I can never forget. There were the pork barrel, sauer kraut jars, vegetables, apples, soft soap, canned good, as I can remember, but where liquor was never known. Only two small west windows in the cellar.

The east wing just off the woodshed was the kitchen. An old-fashioned cook stove. Back of the stove was one of those narrow cupboards, directly under the chimney. It had a brick pitch cap with opening at both ends which are commonly seen in old houses.

The wall was covered with Harper's civil war pictures. These pictures today are worth $10 to $30 apiece. In fact they are even worth more than some of Currier and Ives. I would often visit this room years afterward whenever an opportunity presented itself. All this has long disappeared.

The Hartford Life Insurance Co. has put out Currier & Ives calendars a good many years. They are printed in Detroit. Mrs. Matilda Yodish who works for this concern told me that these pictures are more exact and clearer than the original and some of them are valued at $10 to $25 per calendar. If you readers have any of these Currier & Ives calendars or even the "Harper's Weekly" of the Civil war days, you can count yourselves lucky.

I save all the calendars, also a few civil war pictures. Four of them are behind heavy plate glass on our big dynamite magazine door. The Deerlick school gets a Currier & Ives calendar every year. They are educational for youngsters. Every school should have one.

When the place was sold to W. W. Winslow in 1925, Mr. DeVoe bought the Hoppin House which he kept to the old style pretty much when they had it remodeled. I was permitted to go through the house two years ago. It brought back memories.

The house is occupied one or two months of the year. Most of the time it stands alone, like a death sentinel. Most of the folks and families who have lived in this house are gone or passed away. It is surrounded by trees in a beautiful setting. Mr. Henry Waller lives in a nearby house, overlooking the Deerlick Creek. Right below the house half way down was an old spring probably used by some of the early settlers —Hoppins, C. C. Chesebro, and so on down. The cattle lane leading to the spring, moss-covered barrel trough, willows, elders, have long disappeared and forgotten.

Otto Gibson and Mabel Gibson have been on this place since 1912. They are caretakers for both Winslow and now Henry Waller.

The famous peach orchard for 30 years long has ceased. The old apple trees only here and there over the 50 acres.

"Consider Poor Lo"

Consider "Lo, the poor Indian". Untutored and uncivilized "poor Lo" goes his thoughtfu' way and keeps his mouth shut tight.

He soars not on a crazy boom nor sinks into a deep depression. He revels in no revolution, nor is sucked into a World War. He supports no standing army, nor builds million-dollar battleships to go on the junk heap in a few years.

He does not send several hundred Big Indians to the Big Wigwam in Washington to make much big talk, 99 per cent of which counteth not to the value of a hill of beans. The Big Chief administers the law and the gospel, from which there is no appeal and no repeal.

If he raises more stuff in his little garden than he can eat, he does not proceed to destroy it so as to make his brother Indian, whose garden dried up, pay more for what he has to have nor give him some wampum to buy it with.

Consider also Lo's poor squaw. She chases not after the fleeting fashions, nor quarrels over bridge, nor bothers about divorce and alimony. Verily, thrice blessed is Mrs. Lo.

Poor Lo believes in a Great Spirit. Are the white man's doctrines any more sensible or logical?

EVERGREEN BLUFF An Ideal Place for Rest and Recreation

SOUTH HAVEN, MICHIGAN

COPIED FROM THE SOUTH HAVEN SENTINEL
MARCH 18TH, 1872.

Good morning, sir! By your looks I see
That you are a stranger in Number Three.
Just step this way for a quiet talk,
And tell me as onward slowly we walk,
If Nature's garb could more lovely be,
Than here in District Number Three.

O, a lovely district this Number Three;
Birds gaily carol in happy glee;
Flowers blossom, and fruits in plenty grow;
And music's sweetest melodies flow;
And our children, happy as youth can be,
Go to our school in Number Three.

And, with your leave sir, we'll go to-night
To our school house which is just in sight,
And you shall see that the truth I tell
When I say that in learning our youth excel;
For with your own eyes you shall see
That we keep no dunces in Number Three.

Our officers, stately and stern, but true;
(Some of them wore the "Loyal blue";)
Perform their duties as they should,
For they punish the evil, but praise the good;
And so we are well behaved you see —
For why? We live in Number Three.

Then, too, our teacher; some folks say
"He's very quiet in his way";
I'll tell you in confidence; he's got grit,
Which is quite to his pupil's benefit;
And a very orderly school have we
Who live this winter in Number Three.

Our people are modest, and quiet, you know;
For to whisky saloons we do not go;
The consequence is, we are all quite steady,
And ever to do a kind deed are ready;
So I'm sure with me you will quite agree,
That I'm glad I live in Number Three.

Then the grand old Lake in summer time,
Fills our hearts with thoughts of things sublime
Who, seeing each day this lovely view,
Would not seek to be noble, good, and true.
O, yes, the Creator's hand we see
Who live in District Number Three.

So, because we're not rich, we do not fret,
Nor seek by treachery, money to get;
But labor patiently day by day,
To earn our bread as best we may;
Grateful for mercies past are we,
And content to live in Number Three.

Then hail to District Number Three!
And long may we live in harmony;
Long may our people with children be blest,
And long may our teacher teach his best,
And soon may the world our prosperity see,
Who live in happy Number Three.

And do you ask why I spend my time
In writing this useless, silly rhyme?
In putting this jingle of words together
In this beautiful and fair spring weather;
My answer is plain, as plain can be,
I live in District Number Three.

The Wreck of the "City of Green Bay"

1950

(2 miles south of South Haven
October 3, 1887)

By Allen T. Chesebro
Evergreen Bluff Resort
South Haven.

(This story of the wreck of the City of Green Bay was sent by Mr. Chesebro of South Haven to Mrs. Carrie Hall of Decatur. The old Hoppin place referred to in the article was the home of Mrs. Hall's great uncle. Mr. Chesebro, who wrote the article, is near 70 years of age and still active in business.)

Sixty three years ago today, October 3, the City of Green Bay, a three-master, was wrecked in front of the old Hoppin place. It was sighted early in the morning in a terrific storm—a Southwester. It had left Escanaba October 1st for St. Joe, her destination, with a cargo of 700 tons of iron ore. She was within sight of St. Joe when she became disabled, all sails down and flying a white flag, about 10 miles S. W. By 7:00 she had struck the second sand bar, and by 10 was all to pieces. Six men were lost and only one saved. His name was Slater. He came ashore lashed to a hatch cover. They built a fire in the Hoppin house and dry clothes were given him.

I was only 5 years old at the time, and of course was not allowed to go. Nearly 2,000 people were there. I remember well how the waves would strike the ship broadside squarely every now and then, probably a 50 or 75 ton blow. No ship can withstand such beating very long. The City of Green Bay once sailed the Atlantic ocean between Boston and Scotland. It was well built, 154 feet in length, all oak and iron.

The South Haven life saving crew had shot a life line over the rigging time and again, but the line broke every time, and the crowd became indignant. Then one of the men in the crowd shot a smaller charge, and the line went over. But it was too late. The main line got tangled up in the wreckage coming ashore. Then the ship broke into three parts, the bottom and the two sides. Some of the men were crushed. God be ever merciful to the dying sailors.

The next day I can remember the wreckage strewn along the beach, tangled wire cable, rope, sails, hatch covers, even parts of a piano they had on board. Folks were viewing the ghastly sight which the gale had wrought the day before.

Today all there is left of the proud schooner is the bottom, which lies just at the edge of the shore north of the Deerlick Creek, gradually going to pieces. Within another 50 years there will be nothing left. Shipwrecks along the shore are seldom seen any more. Back in the 70's, 80's and 90's sailing vessels and steamers were a common sight on the lake. Even passenger boats are fast disappearing.

I have picked up oak ribs and planks full of iron bolts and spikes off the beach now and then. I have a 10 pound pin from the center board, a 100 pound iron anchor gear, a 10 inch steel sheve and a deadeye.

Father, a year later, hauled some of the spars to a sawmill and sawed them up into lumber and built the shop in 1888. The wreck of the City of Green Bay was broadcast over the air on WLS a few years ago. Some of you folks may have heard it on the 7:15 rural mail box program. This cargo of 700 tons of iron ore was to be loaded on the Chicago and West Michigan for the new foundry at Bangor, which burned in 1889. I have a man who is working for me now, Capt. Lancaster Ludwig, who is 96 years of age. He sailed the Great Lakes for over 80 years, does more work than most teen-agers.

Next week I will write an article about the home of Thaddeus Hoppin, who came here from Jamaica island along in the 60's, as I recall, and what some of the pioneers told. Miss Katherine Lee will assist with some of the dates.

Allen T. Chesebro.

Girard Observes 106th Birthday

School for Boys Has Graduated 15,000.

PHILADELPHIA-(AP)-The largest boarding school for boys in the world observes its 106th birthday today.

On Jan. 1, 1848, Girard College opened its doors to the first 100 students under the will of Stephen Girard, early American financier. Girard's original endowment of $6,000,000 has since grown to $85,000,000, the income of which pays for maintenance and all services rendered the students during their nine years in the college.

Fatherless boys enter between six and 10 years of age and remain until they are 18. The school, which is non-sectarian, assumes all costs of a boy's care and education during his life at the college. It offers academic courses leading to college entrance, in addition to trade and commercial training through elementary school and high school to all orphan boys who meet its eligibility requirements.

The present enrolment is 1,300 students and more than 15,000 young men have been graduated since the college's founding.

The school is supervised by a board of directors of City Trusts, of Philadelphia's leading citizens who are appointed for life and serve without pay. The mayor and president of city council serve as ex-officio members.

President Truman has been invited to participate in the centennial observance by the committee, which includes Gov. James H. Duff of Pennsylvania; Mayor Bernard Samuel, judges of federal, state and local courts and many well-known business and professional men.

Timely Reflections

COMMUNISTS

Folks sing about the busy bee,
They praise the little ant.
But the wee termite daily proves
A growing irritant;
Because its boring work is slight,
It adds to no man's pay,
But bores unseen and silent corrodes
And in due time destroys.

The busy bee pays well its keep.
The ant has proved it's sand.
And folks for ages have admired
The way it does its part.
But Mother Termite regiments
Like Reds of whom we've read,
Which may just suit the termite clan
But fills our thoughts with dread.

The sightless termites work in gangs
Slaves to a central power,
Which rules them with an iron hand—
'Twould make the workers cower
Were they not termites like as peas
Accustomed to such strife,
But freeborn men could ne'er endure
A Communistic life.

The tiny termites bore and bore
In solid timbers till
They're honeycombed and made so weak
They break and sometimes kill;
And Communists well hid in cells
Work like the termites do—
They bore unseen in minds quite weak
And soon there's much to rue.

They e'er disdain faith, truth and love
But they rely on might,
And when they feel that they can win
They quickly start a fight;
So all who love America,
Must aid in putting out
All foreign Reds before they put
All loyal folks to rout!

Chronicle Dims As Time Goes By

Time, Weather, Tourists Taking Their Toll

SISTER LAKES — One grew strong and the other fell apart.

That's the biography in a nutshell for two pioneer churches in the area, fostered more than 100 years ago by Fr. Louis Baroux. The priest lies buried now in Silver Creek cemetery, next to the church that survived. He died in 1[illegible] (1897)

Both churches served Potowatomie Indians in those early times.

Records are hazy as to when the first of the two was founded, on Beach Lake in Silver Creek township in [illegible] County. But Fr. Baroux [illegible] there in 1859 and replaced [illegible] structure with a better building, ministering to the Indians.

TAX ARGUMENT

About a year later, the tribe argued over a tax levied against their lands. When the wife of Chief Leopold Pokagon called for them to give her money to pay the taxes, it put [illegible] them so much that about half of the tribe moved to Hartford. This band built a log church on the banks of Rush Lake, and established their own burial ground there.

Fr. Baroux had charge of this new congregation also. In 1864, through friends in his native France, the priest obtained $1,000 and erected a frame building at Rush Lake. It was this church that failed to live, ending ingloriously as tourists ripped off souvenirs and weather beat down the remains.

Today, only a few rotting timbers can be seen of the Rush Lake church.

AMONG EVERGREENS

The original Silver Creek Catholic church, meanwhile, has become a modern brick edifice, nestled among tall evergreens on a little knoll. It is a place of peace and quiet, dignified guardian of the cemetery where its founder was buried, and where Chief Leopold Pokagon went to his Happy Hunting Ground.

Caretaker John Augusta said the church was built out over Chief Pokagon's grave. For years, he said, the chief's stone marker leaned against a basement wall in the church; one day it was gone.

Requiem

Rest, Church of the Bygone, rest.
Brambles reign upon your breast.
Rabbits 'neath your timbers burrow,
Unaware the secret sorrow,
That for you there's no tomorrow.
Sheltered by a snowsheath, rest.

— Ray Dangel

Augusta has been caring for the cemetery for more than 18 years.

In a shaded spot near the center of the Silver Creek grave plots is a marker of about 11 by 20 inches. Illegible to the naked eye, the letters were revealed by side-lighted photography. The words say "Mary Jane, Daughter of Simon & Angeline Pokagon. Born Feb. 2, 1853 (or 1855). Died April 24, 1858." A sprig of leaves is chiseled at the bottom.

GRAVES OVERGROWN

Simon was a son of Chief Leopold Pokagon, and the last chief of the tribe. There have even been debates among scholars over Simon's claim to that rank. Simon and his wife were buried near Rush Lake, and today even the lone marker that guards Angeline's resting place is broken in two. Both graves are overgrown with high weeds.

Time, weather and tourists who didn't realize the sadness of their deeds have nearly erased this page of southwestern Michigan's history. One by one, pioneers of this area who remember those old days are passing away. The Potowatomie tribe has scattered.

SHOP-PE-NE-GONS

By E. R. Washburn.

How long is 40 years and how many things can happen in it? More than half of my life to date, have I looked upon Decatur as my home and I find it difficult to think of any other part of the world as taking its place.

But that is not what I started out to write about. Rather, I was intending to tell of Shop-pe-ne-gons, an old Indian, to tell an Indian story, but to do that I must tell of something else first. Pardon me if I take time out to get married, for that was undoubtedly the most important thing I—we, my wife Myrtie and I—ever did. In the latter part of the summer of 1898 I received a letter from W. N. Ferris, president of the Ferris industrial school, telling me of a village in northeastern Michigan that needed a teacher, a man teacher, and he thought I could handle the situation. If I wanted to try it, to let him know at once. I did want to try it and soon was on the way to Mio, county seat of Oscoda county, and it was but a short time till I was located.

From September till December is a short time and on December 29, 1898, the wedding was solemnized and on January 4, 1899, Myrtie and I were on our way to the north land, our honeymoon to be spent in the wilds of northeastern Michigan, land of arbutus and pine, wild deer, wildcats and a few timber wolves. The sound of falling timber was sometimes heard, the odor of pine was in the air and the heat from burning pine helped in warming the houses, including the schoolhouse, at least in part, though some hard wood was brought in from farther south.

We soon got acquainted with the pupils and some of the parents, for they were as anxious to see what we were like as we were to see them. Mio was (and is) the county seat of Oscoda county and the county officials were located there and their children attended the school. The wives of the county officials called on Mrs. Washburn and they were soon on visiting terms. There was some farm land and grazing land in the outlying areas and so farm children were brought to school by their parents, and more acquaintances were made.

Mio, being the county seat, boasted a weekly newspaper, the Mail Telegram, which later became the Oscoda County News. Mio was fortunate in having mail delivered, at least part of the time daily from Roscommon through Luzerne and to and from Lewiston. I believe the mail carriers crossed routes at Mio in later years and carried express and light freight also.

Mio also had a water department and water was delivered to the school house, the court house and to Main street most of the time, except that in very severe weather the town pump was more reliable. A deep water well at the livery barn which was maintained by the logging interests helped out, too, in severest weather. If you are desirous of knowing more of Michigan's coldest weather, read the records of the winter of 1898-'99 and imagine the cold which dipped into the low thirties and from there to temperatures which I do not dare to repeat for fear I should get a habit which I might have difficulty in breaking.

Logging on the River

Soon great piles of logs covered the low bluffs along the Au Sable river, brought there not only by broad bunked sleighs, but also by great high wheeled carts tall enough to be driven astride a mammoth log, the butt of which was suspended by chains so as to swing above hummocks or other inequalities in the roadway.

So many ways and things were different that we from down state were kept busy learning the ways of the northland and understanding what was being done and why. The weather began moderating somewhat, for spring was in the air.

Word came that logs were coming down the old Au Sable. It needed investigating. In our younger days we had known waterways—the Coldwater river, the Thornapple and Bullhead Run—all good streams for fishing, swimming, boating and trapping, but none had logs coming down them though in winter time we could slide on or skate on them, or even cut a year's supply of ice, though most people preferred to get that at the lakes.

In Mio half a century ago it was different. Logs, huge logs, were coming down and to a tenderfoot it was worth going to see, a matter of interest long to be remembered. Everything was new and interesting. After a few more days, came word that a jam was forming down river. Now, to an oldtimer a log jam was no novelty. He had seen and known of many, but to the newcomer all was strange and full of interest. New faces began to be seen in town. The older pupils and many grown-ups went to the river to see the rivermen at work. When the jam had built upstream sufficiently near the town many citizens and children took the long walk to see the men and river at work. The sight was well worth seeing and the memory of it would take care of itself and no one would later regret the long walk which would soon be forgotten. A little later Myrtie and I, accompanied by some of the high school pupils, went to see the jam and to walk across the river on it to the opposite shore and then back again without lingering long, for we had visions and advice that there were safer places to take a long walk than on the far side of a log jam which at any moment might be too near the breaking point of the jam to take a long walk with perfect ease of mind.

An Indian Trapper

Among those we saw near the safe part of the jam was an old dark-skinned fellow in rough clothes who proved to be a better listener than talker, though he did not refuse to answer some questions. One of the older residents who had lived in the region for a long time said, as we had suspected, that he was an Indian—that he had hunted and trapped along the river for many years and that he had probably been held up by the jam. He said the Indian's name was Shop-pe-ne-gons and that he was fairly well known up the river where the country was still more like a wilderness.

After a time the down stream end of the jam was cleared of logs and out upon mid-stream appeared the old Indian on a raft which was loaded with his traps and bundles of furs. He was busy guiding his raft and letting the current do the work. As if by magic he had appeared and, paying no attention to anyone, was majestically continuing his journey to the place where he could dispose of his furs.

How long had he been waiting for the river to be cleared? I do not know, but the next issue of the Mail Telegram claimed that the entire length of the jam was seven miles. Not that its length at any moment was seven miles, but its length from where the first log was stranded to where the last log was loosened so it could float away covered a distance of seven miles. What a picture a moving log jam would make, for it is never at rest. The swift water is lifting the logs or lifting one end of them sometimes, even, so the log stands on end and is lifted while in this position, then totters and falls with a splash, or a crash as it hits another moving log. The swift stream is churning in some places and these places are good ones for the newcomer to avoid. Not only does the water splash but there are moans and groans as logs rub or scrape each other. Oh, there are plenty of sounds to stick in the memory, especially of the timid.

There are smooth stretches of river too, and the logs are moving rhythmically and quietly and, needless to say, these are good places to ride or to bird logs. Many men are able to perform fantastic tricks while riding logs—not always in quiet waters. The quiet places, however, afford a challenge—even to a down-stater—and we of Barry county watched our chance and, each with a balancing pole, stepped from log to log and so crossed the river and then back, and stored in our memories some experiences to treasure for near a life time, even though the school boys and girls regarded us as amateurish but were secretly glad that their teacher and his bride were able to turn the trick.

Later in the spring while trout fishing I went back into the woods bordering the river to get earth worms for bait. Seeing a large elm tree that sometime in the past had been uprooted, I went to it, for the digging would be easier there, and there under the fallen trunk was a long smoothed cedar pole tapered to a blunt point at either end. By it was a large hamper made of small bent willow limbs, or should I say osier branches, and in it was an oatmeal box nearly empty. The old fellow had some modern ways even fifty years ago. How I wished I had that pole and basket down in Barry county and as I remember it, it was not entirely respect for the property of others that kept me from taking them there—the pole was probably fifteen feet or more long. I certainly coveted my neighbor's property then. A few years after that while teaching in Dexter, I went to D. E. Hoey's lumber yard to get a board from which to make an ironing board (school teachers and wives were frugal even in those days.) And could Mrs. Ie do a good job of ironing on that home made piece of furniture. But to get back to my story, as I went into the office to pay for what I had bought, my attention was immediately attracted to a calendar hanging on the wall. It was put out as I recall it, by the Hanson Lumber Co., of Grayling, and on it was a picture of a patriarch of the north lands—no, not a giant pine, but our old friend, Shop-pe-ne-gons.

I told Mr. Hoey of our meeting the old Indian on the banks of the Au Sable. As I started to go home with my load Mr. Hoey handed me the calendar saying, "Take it with you—it probably means more to you than to me." We kept it for years, adding a new calendar on it each year. We even brought it to Decatur, keeping it for more years.

J. G. Hirst, our neighbor, and lumber dealer, had an Indian working for him. His name was Mix, Arthur Mix, I believe. Maybe you remember him or his wife. They were our neighbors too, and lived on our street, where Mrs. Rank, the flower gardene, now lives. They had several children in school and especially a little doll of a "squaw poose" who used to play with a puppy they owned. She would pick him up by the cheeks or jowls and say "me bite 'im nose, make 'im squeal," and they both did just that. Mrs. Mix used to pick grapes for us when we owned the former Ullinger place. One day as we were busily working and talking some, Mrs. Mix told of her attending an Indian school at Mt. Pleasant, and even studying Latin and she still retained some of it. In talking of the north, it happened to speak of Shop-pe-ne-gons and she fairly [illegible] ground as she said, "[illegible] new Shop-pe-ne-gons? [illegible]s Sharp Needles in the Indian language." And so we had again come in contact with someone who knew at least the name and could translate it. We had come out of the north and to Decatur to learn the meaning of the name of our quasi acquaintance of the Au Sable country.

IMPROVEMENTS AT LAKE OF THE WOODS

Douglas Lee subdivision has grown into a community of seven families. The deal for the large expanse of land, previously owned by J. G. Hirst, was negotiated in the spring of 1946. The 54 acres were bought by Mr. and Mrs. Dalton R. Kinney and named in memory of their son, Douglas Lee.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Athey bought the first house on lot 2 of Douglas Drive. The second house in the block was sold to Burton and Florence Houtman soon after Burton returned from the army. Mr. and Mrs. Orville Adams and family purchased the third house. Neal and Jane Elgersma came to live in the fourth house but have recently sold to Mr. and Mrs. Warren Garrett. Mr. and Mrs. John Dragan found a plan they liked and last fall Mr. Kinney completed their home. The sixth house was built by Clemet Hanauer for his own but was sold to Mr. and Mrs. Petrucci. Mr. and Mrs. Bruno Dragan bought the seventh house of Paul and Betty Maglaughlin, who formerly owned the Mercury Cleaners.

Four additional homes are now under construction and will be completed by fall. One of the houses is on Douglas Drive, the other three are on Pine Street.

The plat of Douglas Lee Addition, including 7 streets and 51 lots, has been accepted as a part of the village of Decatur. Gas lines have been run by the Consumers Power Company for both heating and cooking purposes. Sidewalks are to be provided next spring.

As one drives further down Pine street beyond the subdivision a brickcrete house on the right is under construction, that of the Hanauers. The summer home of Mr. and Mrs. James Mead is just across on the left. They are the proud owners of the beautiful iris garden. The Meads also have boats for rent and carry a complete line of fishing needs. The town park and bathing beach is found at the end of Pine street.

The road that leads off to the right, comes upon a group of cottages and homes. There are the Malinovskis who live in their comfortable home the year around. Mr. Garrow of Elkhart and the Warners of Chicago are summer residents. Mr. and Mrs. Marshal Lundy, Mr. Chick Grazulis and Mrs. Valaitis are year round residents. The Howard Haefners occupy the white shingle house with the bright red trim. Mr. and Mrs. John Kujwa of South Bend spend much time at their pleasant cottage that is now quite complete with its breezeway and garage.

Mr. and Mrs. Dalton Kinney and son spend about seven months of the 12 at their home which is constructed of logs and painted gray. Mrs. Brown and family of Chicago have been summer residents at Lake of the Woods for 17 years. Mr. and Mrs. Harry Warner's "Moon Lite" cottage however was the first to be built on this side of the lake. Mr. and Mrs. Humphrey of South Bend enjoy the summer months at the lake also. The Bocks are seen at their cottage almost as soon as Chicago schools are recessed for the summer months, and are here until Labor Day. Mr. and Mrs. Grant also of Chicago spend much of the summer at their cottage.

Since one can not drive entirely around the lake, the eleven families mentioned above completes the list of families that live on the Hirst landing.

Driving out St. Mary's street, one passes Gaertig's Dream village, Hill's resort and the Ackley cottages. Other property owners are Mr. and Mrs. Shaw who bought the beautiful home formerly owned by the Whitneys of Kalamazoo, and Mr. and Mrs. Al DeWitt who spend much time at their attractive farm home. These are found, besides numerous other homes and cottages.

On the far side of the lake is Camp Greenwood, a summer retreat for many boys and girls of Chicago. There is another group of cottages to the west on what is known as the Fritz landing.

All in all the summer population of Lake of the Woods is several hundred. Many new cottages and homes have been built on the shores of the Decatur lake. This fact is readily recognized by the many lights that are seen in the stillness of the night as they shine out across the water.

Class of '24 Holds Biggest Reunion in History of D. H. S.

The class of 1924 was known as the class that "got things done." A quarter of a century has not dimmed the enthusiasm nor lessened the aggressiveness of this group of people as evidenced by the 17 class members, together with their wives, husbands and children, aggregating 44, who gathered for a picnic dinner at Maple Isle, Paw Paw, Michigan, at noon last Saturday. Highlighting the occasion was the presence of Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Harper. Mr. Harper is superintendent of schools at Delton, Michigan. He served the Decatur high school seven years, both as principal and superintendent, coming to Decatur in 1922. Mr. and Mrs. Harper are held in high esteem by the people of Decatur and particularly by the class of 1924 as Mr. Harper was our class advisor.

The following class members were present: Bernice Washburn Dahlstrom, Crystal Kidman Rowe, Ilah Winkler Maltby, Alice Haefner Conway, Ruth Calbetzor Leighton, Frances Graham Ragotzy, Lois Howe VandePolder, Monica M. Howland, Harry L. Nutt, Alva W. Rowe, Richard E. Conway, Lyle MacKellar, Carl G. Fosdick, Gilbert S. Mead, Herbert L. Rowe, Hugh Paul and Paul Slack.

After a thoroughly enjoyable afternoon of reminiscing, swimming, etc., the adults attended the Alumni banquet in a body in the evening. The class was justly proud of the excellent toast delivered by one of our classmates, Crystal Kidman Rowe — "Make Mine Democracy."

After the banquet program, the group was delightfully entertained at a buffet supper by Mr. and Mrs. Herbert L. Rowe at the home of Mrs. Rowe's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Bert Kidman, who did much to make the 25th reunion a marked success. Mr. E. R. Washburn, beloved instructor of all time, and Mr. and Mrs. Cleo Myers, the latter the sister of Mrs. Rowe, were guests of the evening. Even though the class had spent hours together, they were still reluctant for curtain call at midnight. Originally it was planned to hold a reunion every 25 years, the next one to be held in 1974, but it seems there were a few who feared the scythe of Father Time so the second reunion of the Class of '24 will be held in 1954.

CLASS OF '24 CLOSES REUNION AT KIDMAN HOME

Following the Alumni banquet the members of the class of 1924, their husbands, wives and others to the number of about 30 were guests of Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Rowe (Crystal Kidman), at the home of the latter's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Bert Kidman.

This event concluded a day's reunion of the class of 25 years ago, which Supt. R. W. Harper of Delton declared to be "the best time of my life," and probably others felt the same about it.

The party at the Kidman home was one round of hilarity and joyful recalling of events of the happy past. "Do you remember when this was done, and when that occurred?" brought out responses that if told here would make this column sparkle, and perhaps some members of the class will yet add their contributions to this brief record.

There were 29 in the class of 1924 and all of them are living. That in itself is an unusual record. But even more unusual is the fact that over half of them, 17 to be exact, attended the class reunion.

E. R. Washburn and Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Harper were honored guests.

Decatur In First Place

Decatur's Red Raiders stepped into first place Friday night when they edged by Watervliet, 28-32. The Hartford Indians got revenge on the Coloma Comets and dropped them down to second place.

This coming Friday night (Friday the 13th) at 7 o'clock, the Raiders will play the Comets. Coloma has a tall fast-passing and fast-breaking team which will be a rugged tussle for the Raiders. Although Decatur has an off and on team and if they should meet them with an on night, Coloma will have a hard time outfighting them.

The Raiders have more team spirit than most any school around. They proved that when they came from behind in the Cass game with a 20-point rally to beat them, 51-49, also in the Paw Paw game, their hair-raising rally in the third quarter almost toppled the so-called mighty Redskins. So whether they're off or on they will still fight to the end.

Graham Named to Public Works

A new department was created at Monday evening's meeting of the village board when Max Graham was appointed as public works supervisor for the village of Decatur.

Mr. Graham was elected as a member of the village board at the recent village election, and resigned this post to accept the position as supervisor. His duties will include the active management of the street, water and sanitation departments. Silas Knoll was appointed as chairman of the street department following Graham's resignation.

To fill the office made vacant on the village board, Roy Cramer was named and approved by the council members. Mr. Cramer has just completed a year on the board having been named a year ago to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Lyle Marks.

Another change in village personnel came about Monday when police officer Frank Hazzard retired from that job, after having served for several years. Previous to his work for the village Mr. Hazzard had been a member of the county sheriff's department.

At Monday's township election, Mr. Hazzard was elected as justice of the peace, and he will establish an office for active work in that capacity. Ralph Antles was appointed recently to take over the police duties of Mr. Hazzard.

President Dr. Bowers' budget for the coming year was read at the meeting. It calls for estimated expenditures of $72,000, including $17,000 for streets, $3,000 for the fire department, $2,000 for administration and $2,000 for recreation. Receipts are expected to be about $75,000 for the fiscal year.

EARLY AMERICAN HISTORY

C. C. Evans.

Nearly 400 years ago, Sir Francis Drake beached his ship only a few miles above the golden gate, which he had missed, raised the flag of England, and took possession in the name of his queen. Since then the banners of many nations have been raised over the Redwood Empire where now only the flag of the United States flies.

At Fort Ross, the Russian flag flew for nearly half a century, ending in 1842, less than a decade before the discovery of gold. Then the Russians left California and in 1846 J. C. Fremont raised a force of volunteers and defeated the Mexicans in the Sacramento valley, and on July the 5th, 1846, California declared her independence from Mexico and by this the power of Mexico was broken.

California, Nevada, Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico were ceded to the United States. Scarcely was this treaty signed when news came that gold had been discovered along the Sacramento river.

This news spread around the world and excited adventurers rushed toward the diggings. Ships were deserted, while officers and men joined in the scramble for sudden wealth. The history of the west is written around gold discovery and the fascinating story of frontier developments. San Francisco, a little village with mud cabins in 1849, grew to a city of 15,000 in the course of a year. The famous mining centers of Nevada City, Grass Valley, Auburn, Placerville, Jackson, and a score of others were mines discovered by the prospectors of '49 and are still actively productive after nearly one hundred years successful operation.

DECATUR HIGHLIGHTS OF THE EIGHTIES

By James Chamberlain

From a vocational viewpoint I consider the introduction of the muck shoe for horses by Brigham and also by Gates, the introduction of the peppermint industry by Brigham, and the beginning of the celery industry by Clark and Houseman, to have been the greatest factors in the industrial growth and general development of Decatur and contiguous domain.

The above were the main factors including the dredging of the outlet of Pickerel lake, changing the vast wooded unproductive muckland lying south of Decatur to the highly cultivated and productive region of the present. It has given employment to countless workmen and been the source of vast revenues. The vocational picture has been aptly illustrated in the Centennial issue of 1948.

Now let us glance briefly at some avocational high lights. To the old timers of today, most of whom were teenagers of the 80's, the most brilliant high light was the famous Decatur baseball club that was without a peer in this section of the state and whose fame was extended near and far.

The boys of that date never did tire of reciting the record that team had made. For the benefit of the late "tuners-in" I will repeat the line-up of the club: Stapleton, catcher; Thomas, pitcher; John Hughes, first base; Claud Haydon, second base; Dan Carney, short stop; Harvey Taylor, third base; Marion Chadwick, left field; Ed. Rawson, center field; John O'Leary, right field; George Kruse, right field.

In those days there were not enough jobs for every one, and of course, there were many days when the weather was unfit for out door work. As most of the fellows were chuck full of energy they had to find means of getting some of it out of their systems.

Many of the older ones would make their head quarters when not working, at N. S. Rathburn's grocery store, which was located adjoining the Charles Brigham building which in the early 80's was occupied by A. S. Hathaway's drygoods and clothing store, later by Lyscum Brigham.

Mr. Rathburn was an extremely genial host and freely extended credit to a goodly number of patrons. Among those who frequented his store and discussed politics, religion, philosophy, labor and related questions, as well as incidents of the Civil War, were E. P. Hill, Dr. Broderick, Orange Hayes, Eli Hincher, Jud and Silas Rawson, James Shockley, Jerry Fate, Charles Labadie, John Beach, Ransom and Lucius Nutting, George Hubbard, James Aldrich, my father and my uncle, and others.

Stories were related and each had his chance to tell the biggest one. Mr. Rathburn would finally relate one that would turn the proceedings into a different channel, a story such as the one that he trained a hog to keep up a fire all winter to keep a pig pen warm during severe weather.

Mr. Rathburn's son Edward N. (Ned) was a very talented young man with an extraordinary command of English, and would have attained a high position in life but for one sad failing. But, alas, there were no A. A. organizations in those days.

Uncle Jake Johnson's shoe shop, which was located where the Cozy theatre now is, was also the meeting place of many who were unemployed and desired companionship. They spent many happy hours in the shop where they were always welcomed.

Former Decatur Teacher Dies

Miss Mabel C. Willison, 87, a former Decatur resident and retired teacher, died in Detroit on Tuesday, January 12.

Funeral services were held in Detroit Thursday, January 14, followed by interment Friday at the Crane cemetery, Decatur.

Miss Willison was born in Volinia township, Cass county, October 25, 1872 and moved to Decatur at an early age. She graduated from Decatur high school in 1888 and having received her teacher's certificate at the age of 16, began on a career of 46 years of public school teaching.

In 1889-90 she taught in Decatur township District No. 7 rural school, and in 1890-91 in the District No. 6 school. From 1891 to 1895 she taught in the Decatur village District No. 4 school.

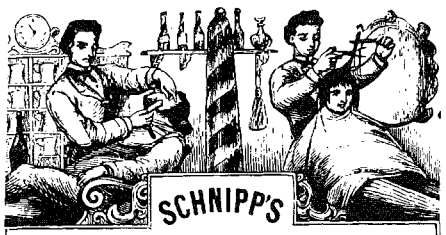
From 1895 to 1898 Miss Willison attended the University of Michigan, then returned home to care for her invalid mother for two years. She completed her college education in 1901, graduating from the University of Michigan with a B.A. degree and a special diploma for teaching.

Following her graduation Miss Willison taught one year at Matoon, Illinois, and in 1902 began a 13-year period of teaching in Decatur high school. From Decatur she went to Houghton, Michigan, where she taught high school from 1915 to 1918.

In 1918 Miss Willison moved to Highland Park, Michigan, where she taught Latin, English, mathematics and United States history in the Highland Park high school for 23 years. After her retirement in 1941 she continued to make her home in Highland Park until her death.

Miss Willison's record as a teacher was outstanding. Among her many friends she counted great numbers of former pupils who so highly respected the influence she had brought into their lives that they continued to keep in touch with her throughout the years.

Miss Willison is survived by her niece, Mrs. Eleanor Moulton Dyer of Marblehead, Massachusetts.



DECATUR'S BARBER EMERITUS REMAINS ACTIVE AT 90

By Howard Wilhelm
in Kalamazoo Gazette

DECATUR, MICH.—There was the morning, Tom Bass chuckled, when a man entered his barber shop and asked Tom to cut his hair with his cap on. That was the only time this particular customer made such a request and the reason still remains an enigma.

Born in Raleigh, N. C., in 1859, he came to Decatur in 1884 at the age of 24. Today he likes to recall that in one family he shaved five generations.

Richmond, Ind., was the town where he began the barber trade. And before settling in Decatur he had a shop for a while in Paw Paw across from the courthouse.

Edgar Bergen, whose home as a boy was in Decatur, was one of this barber's regular customers.

In those days the "college cut" was the rage, Tom said, which amounted to no more than trim. The hair was left full and free, no clippers being used and only the slightest snipping allowed.

As a contrast more substantial and mature clients favored what was known in the trade as a feather edge,

RECALLING DECATUR HISTORY

Harlingen, Texas,
March 15, 1950.

Dear Editor:

We have enjoyed reading news of our Decatur friends through your paper this winter.

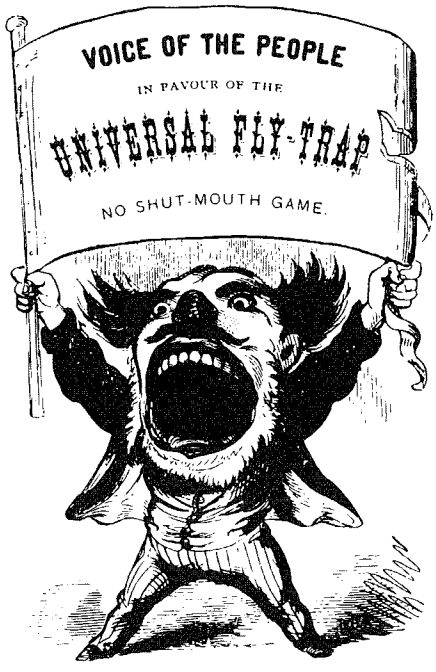
Now will you please send it to our home address in Winona Lake. As we are leaving here next Tuesday. We go to Albuquerque, N. M. for a few weeks so will not see the Republican till we reach home in April.

Am sending last copy to Mrs. Alice Gordon because of the item about those early graduates of D. H. S. She told me once that her father, Mr. Hill, was the first president of your village. She has been ill for months now.

Yours sincerely,
Elsie Hunsche.

Mrs. Hunsche is the former Mrs. Gillesby and a former well known resident of this community. She and her husband have spent the winter in the Rio Grande Valley in Southern Texas and will soon return to their home in Winona Lake, Indiana.

Mrs. Alice Hill Gordon also lives at Winona Lake and it is her father referred to by Mrs. Husche.



Looking Backward

Life in Decatur During the Eighties and Nineties as Recalled by One of the Boys of That Period.

Marshall, Michigan,
July 31, 1950.

Friend Arba,

I enjoyed my short visit with you recently and read very avidly the copy of the Republican you gave me. I have been out of touch with Decatur for many, many years, but I still recall some of the events that took place in the village when I was a lad.

I note the Republican has a column entitled: "Looking Backward." If you don't mind I would like to add a few items that go back into the 1880's and 90's. Some of these events made an impression on me either because of their lighter character or more or less tragic connotations. Of the latter I recall the time about sixty-five years ago when an elderly lady by the name of Teed was struck and killed by a train at the depot.

Then back in the 90's, a man, whose name was John Linderman, committed suicide out in the grubs west of town. He had been dead some days and wasn't discovered until the neighbors sensed his presense in quite a large area around him. The weather was very warm. The undertaker was faced with a problem of removing the body, as few people cared to go near the spot. So, John was moved to the mortuary.

He was unidentified for a time until it was noticed his shirt was open at the neck and then it was announced that he was the only man who was wont to go around with his shirt open, which he did winter and summer.

Back in the 80's we used to have Fourth of July celebrations that were momentous affairs indeed. I recall one that was held soon after the assassination of President Garfield. We had a parade, one part of which was given over to a display of "horribles," people decked out in weird and ridiculous costumes. One fellow was dressed up to resemble Satan, covered from head to toe in black, with horns and a long tail. He, or it, was pulling a two-wheeled gig, on which was fastened a standard with an effigy of Charles S. Guiteau, Garfield's assassin, depicting him as having been hanged with his neck broken and his head hanging over the back. It was a very gruesome sight indeed.

I remember when the old hotel stood on the corner and at noon the clerk came out in front and beat on a large brass gong to announce dinner. Dinner was served at noon in those days. Entertainment was very scarce then with only a medicine show coming to town once in a while. One such show was brought to town by old Dr. Staake, who had several artists with him.

One of his troupe was an actor with an artificial leg, by the name of Frank Tucker, who was a son of a local pettifogger, Bill Tucker. Dr. Staake also had an artist whose name was Professor Skiloni, who put on a very entertaining and mystifying act of legerdemaine. Another actor was Professor Carnell. They presented a pretty good show. The first night was free and consequently drew a full house. They stayed a whole week.

I remember another time when an Uncle Tom's Cabin show came and was located in a large tent south of the railroad. The seats were raised at the back like a circus and everyone was usually in attendance. There was an old Civil War veteran by the name of Ed. Koons in the audience and during the course of the play when Simon LaGree was flogging Uncle Tom, Ed. couldn't take it any longer. He yelled out at the top of his lungs: "By G—, I wish I had my rifle here and I'd shoot that ——." This nearly broke up the act; even old Simon had to laugh.

There was another old character around town who went by the name of Simeon Francis, also a Civil War veteran, who used to interest us boys with tales of the war. He was a sort of pessimistic old fellow and he told me one day he wished the war had lasted until then. I remember he always wore his old blue army overcoat and his index finger was turned at right angles from the first joint.

Another interesting old individual was Doc. Dillon who was lame and wore a plug hat, a Prince Albert coat and carried a cane. Doc liked to imbibe rather freely, as I recall. There were several old fellows around with an insatiable thirst. They used to go into the drug store and call for "boot blacking." I couldn't quite understand why they used so much boot polish, as nearly all men wore felt boots in those days. One of our neighbors would take on such a large cargo that he listed to port on his way home.

Decatur had at one time, years ago, quite a smart ball club. It seems they cleaned up on all comers until a team came down from Kensington, Ill. They were met at the station by our team and the band and both teams paraded up the street to the ball park. I always thought our team had sort of an off-day as they were so badly beaten that the team broke up soon after. Then, after a few years, the old gang got together again for a game which ended rather disastrously. Alv. Moon was hit by a pitched ball and subsequently died from the effects. Dan Carney broke his leg, so that put an end to the team for good.

I used to be interested in watching the blacksmith, Jim Aldrich, shoe horses and one day after he had nailed on a shoe, he straightened up and said: "Young man, would you like to go to hell? If you would, better learn the blacksmith trade." I was also intrigued by watching Van, the harness maker, but never came close and had to be satisfied with a less important vocation.

I remember my first day of school in the village. On the way up I fell into step with a lad in knee Breeches, Fay Beach, who asked me what grade I intended to enter. I did not know what grade I was in, since the country school from which I came wasn't graded, so he took me up into the grammar room, ably presided over by Mabel Willison. There were two very apt pupils in the room, L. A. Hubbard and George Chamberlain, who always stole the show. I was an apt pupil also, only that I was apt to come up with poor lessons. George was very punctual; he would arrive at the north door at 8 o'clock and the doors didn't open until 8:30. He was thinly clad, sans oversoat and mittens. There was a recess of about three inches between the bottom of his trousers and the top of his socks, which left that part of his limbs exposed to the gentle zephyrs of the winter weather.

After struggling through four years of high school, I was allowed to graduate with the rest of the class in 1897. Our graduation was a momentous affair indeed. The girls were all dressed in their finest creations and some even had a little touch of talcum on their pretty faces. Bess Lindsley tried to cover up some of her freckles but didn't have much luck. We boys were dressed up to a great extent also. I remember I wore a high collar that resembled a white board fence around an insane asylum. I also wore a low cut vest and swallowtail coat. We had an orchestra, an address by A. Gaylord Slocum, and generally enjoyed ourselves.

Well, Arba, a lot of water has gone under the bridge since that day in 1897. Somewhere I got the idea that your brother, Will, is in Seattle, Wash. I have made two trips out there in the last three years and expect to spend some time on the coast again next year, and if he is in Seattle I will try to locate him.

I am very glad to receive the Republican and I hope you see a good many happy and prosperous years of living yet.

I beg to remain
Very respectfully,
J. R. Carpenter.

J. R. Carpenter, back in the Golden Days of the eighties was "Jim." He remembers Decatur well. What an impression the daily events of those times had on the youths. Our own mind is filled with memories of boyhood, some of which are as vivid as though they transpired only yesterday. The older we get the more vivid these early events become. We wonder if the youth of today, when their time comes to look back, will recall with as much pleasure the important events in their young lives.

We remember well the death of Mrs. Teed. Neighbors talked about it over the fence and on the street. They said she walked out on the track right in front of the fast train going west in the early evening. It didn't stop in Decatur then. The Gazetteer published in 1869 listed Henry C. Teed and Jeremiah Teed as living on Sherwood street opposite the Michigan Central freight depot.

Good shows came to Decatur in the early years and there was also good local talent here. Is there anyone living who will volunteer to write of Decatur's theatrical talent in the first half of its century of progress?

We were the active Justice of the Peace of Decatur when the body of John Linderman was discovered in the grubs down toward Lake of the Woods. Such cases then required an inquest which called for the services of a constable, an undertaker, a doctor and a justice who acted as coroner. We drove to the place with Dr. Rose. The job was fully as offensive as Jim describes it. We are familiar with all of the events which Jim describes and thank him for writing so entertainingly.

We hope others will catch the enthusiasm which Jim may inspire by his letter and carry the reminiscing along indefinitely.

RECOLLECTIONS OF
EDWIN W. PLOPPER

Lawrence, Nov. 10, 1950.

Dear friend,

Looking backward fifty years on Thursday, the 15th of November, 1900, St. Joe Council Royal Select Masters, invited Lawrence, South Haven and Niles to St. Joe. We drove to Hartford with a cutter. When we reached St. Joe, there was no snow, the ground was bare.

Carl Willison of Decatur bought some timber of Edson Woodman. My brother-in-law, Rufus Smith, cut the trees. Some of the neighbors got their horses shod to haul the logs. They could make from $1.00 to $1.50 per day if they had god luck. They made about two trips a day. The snow went off and there was no more till Christmas. There were a lot of mad boys.

I was working in a blacksmith shop and it didn't hurt me much. The boys who got ready to haul and couldn't were Ed. Mullinex, Will Nower, Sr., Hubert O'Dell, Nelson Beals, and George Walker.

P. S. I have the book which contains the piece, The World of Chance. It is in Sanders' fifth reader. We read in this book when I went to school.

Edwin W. Plopper.

THIRTY-THREE YEARS AGO

From the Decatur Republican of August 26, 1917.

NICHOLSVILLE ONCE CALLED VOLINIA

From a history of the village of Nicholsville is taken the following:

One of the first water powers built in Cass county was on a stream in Volinia township connecting Finch and Bunker lakes. The dam was built there by Alexander Copley, and to utilize the power developed a saw mill and grist mill were built, and with them as a nucleus quite a flourishing little village grew up with post office and stores.

The mills were a great boon to the settlers and people came there from a great distance bringing grain to be ground and logs to be made into lumber.

As the country settled up and other waterpowers were developed, and especially after railroads were built, the importance of Nicholsville diminished, but the mills have been kept running as occasion demanded through all these years, with several changes of ownership, until this spring during the freshet, the washout occurred in the dam, and the waterpower which had turned the wheels there so many years was destroyed.

There seems to be some discrepancy in statements by early settlers of this locality who should know, and some of the printed histories. The latter say that there is nothing on the records to show that there was ever such a village as Nicholsville laid out, but that a village containing 33 lots, called Volinia, was platted, covering the ground now called Nicholsville, and that the postoffice located there was called "Little Prairie Ronde."

County Surveyor, W. W. Reynolds, who in conjunction with surveyor Fred E. Smith of Penn, and surveyor Chas. J. Bradt of Marcellus, has been surveying the land bared by the recession of the water caused by the washout in the dam, says that he has seen the field notes of the survey of "Nicholsville," in the S. E. corner of Sec. 11, and the S. W. corner of Sec. 12, made by John C. Bradt, surveyor in 1851. The latest Atlas of Cass locates Nicholsville as above described, everybody calls it that, so we think it is Nicholsville, maugre the county history.

The first sawmill in Volinia township was built in the summer of 1835 by Alexander Copley, where Nicholsville now stands, and was started up on its first work December 20, the same year. It is supposed that the power was obtained by an overshot wheel. The iron work was obtained at Mishawaka, of the St. Joseph Iron Works, where was located the first furnace for the smelting or reduction of iron are west of the Alleghanies. The ore from which the iron was smelted was what is known as "bog iron ore," and was obtained from a tract of low marsh land, some of which is now a part of the farm attached to the Notre Dame college, where there was a considerable deposit.

This ore and the St. Joseph Iron Works, which reduced it to metallic iron, and got it into shape so it could be used for the manufacture of plows and other tools of iron, was of very great help to the early settlers of this part of the country. To its occurrence may be attributed the location of the Bennett Axe Works, and the plow foundry, in which a young Scotchman, who was a moulder, called in those days "Jimmy" Oliver, discovered a method of suddenly chilling and consequently hardening molten iron when it was poured into the mould, and which resulted in his removal to South Bend where the manufacture of the "Oliver Chilled Plow," made the name famous the world over and the inventor many times a millionaire. Specimens of the ore may be seen in the rooms of the historical society, in the old court house at South Bend, and pieces of it are occasionally plowed up on the farms in the vicinity of that city. Some of the ore is also occasionally found in Cass county. It is usually porous and resembles a piece of rusty sponge, and has a very high content of metallic iron.

A grist mill was built on this dam in 1851 by Harry George, and he soon sold it to Jonathan Nichols and his brother, who were keeping a hotel there, and it is probable that from time to time the place became Nicholsville instead of Volinia, as it was platted, or Little Prairie Ronde, as the postoffice was called.

Nicholsville, as late as 1875, had a population of 100, two stores, blacksmith shop, cooper shop, wagon shop, shoe shop, veneer and basket factory, tannery, grist mill, sawmill, hotel, two physicians, a lawyer and a carpenter.

DECATUR WHEN IT WAS YOUNG

Written for the Republican by W. H. Tuttle and published in the issue of August 26, 1917.

From a few years before until a few years after the breaking out of the Civil War, Decatur was quite a thriving little village, and, apparently, there was much more business going on here then than at the present time.

Outside of the Michigan Central there was no other railroad within forty or fifty miles of us, and all the farmers who had anything to sell, especially things which had to be shipped away, had to draw them to some place on the line of this road.

At that time Decatur had the reputation of being a first class wheat and live stock market, and those commodities were drawn here from as far away as twenty-five and thirty miles. All the loads of wheat had to be drawn up the long bridge to the top of the freight house and unloaded, and as only one load could go up at a time it was rather slow work.

What is now our pleasant little park was during the fall fairly covered with teams waiting their turn to drive up and unload, and many times farmers would have to stay in town over night because they could not get a chance to unload the same day they came in.

There are very few people left who were here fifty-five years ago, or at the beginning of the Civil war in 1861, and as to business men of the town, not one of that time is still in business.

There are very few buildings left that were standing then. Of the stores on Main street I think that there is only one brick building occupied by the Racket Store and three wooden buildings that had been put up before that time, and if one were to try to give the names of the early merchants of that day, the present generation would scarcely recognize one of them.

There are some few residences still standing that were in existence then, but most of those have been altered and built onto so that if the original inhabitants could return they would hardly know their own homes.

I do not think that Decatur could possibly have had more than 600 or 700 inhabitants at that time, for the last census in 1910 found only 1400 people here, and surely the town must be at least twice as large as it was in the sixties.

There were hardly any buildings south of the railroad tracks, except the old tannery, and the ground was mostly covered with oak grubs.

In 1860 the children went to school in the Old Red School House, located on the back part of what is now Walt. Greenman's lot, and so far as I can remember, there was not another building north of there, no street in that direction, and heavy timber covered the ground where the water works and the present high school building are now located.

At the west end of town there was hardly anything west of Williams street. I was too young to remember much about it but I know that we didn't have to go but a very short distance in any direction to get out into the country.

Decatur's Boom

About 1866-67 Decatur had quite a boom and there was quite a lot of building done for this small town.

A good many families moved here from Ohio, Indiana and Illinois and houses had to be built for them to live in. What it was that attracted outsiders here no one seemed to know for there was no swamp land then to furnish people work, but they came here for some reason.

Henry Rogers built three houses at the east end of Delaware street, but they were pretty well out in the country then.

For a few years Decatur grew at a great rate, but the boom didn't last long. New railroads were built all around us, new villages and shipping points were established along their lines, they took away a good share of the wheat and stock shipments from Decatur, and our village settled back into a state of quietude.

We have never had any factories here to furnish employment for large numbers of men, and until the swamp land began to be improved we seemed to be going backward. But now the swamp makes work for a great many men, women and children, and brings a large amount of money into the town, and while it will never grow to any great extent, it is probably as thriving and as well off as many towns that are much larger, and certainly it is a pleasant town to live in.

The Old Michigan Central Freight Bridge

James Cotton, 75, a lifelong resident of Decatur village and community, has been looking up the history of the old freight depot once owned and operated by the Michigan Central.

Jim was especially interested in the old bridge on which loads of wheat were drawn up to the top of the bins for unloading. The first bridge was built in the sixties. It was built from the ground near George street on a long grade to the high platform where the wheat was unloaded and the teams with the empty wagons went down another bridge extending on west.

Along in the eighties the western section was removed, and the platform enlarged so that teams could haul the loads of wheat to the platform where they were dumped in the bins and return the way they came up.

Decatur was then a great wheat town. Wheat was brought here for shipping or storing from as far as twenty miles away. Sometimes at the height of the season loads of wheat extending from the elevator to half way down Main street would be lined up waiting the farmers' turn to unload. A farmer might arrive in the village with his load soon after noon and it would be after nine o'clock at night before he could make the bridge and unload.

Lewis Graham has a clear memory of those early years. John Graham, his father, owned a good farm a short distance beyond the the First Baptist church northwest of Decatur, and raised wheat. He also owned a team of good horses, Normans, which he bought of Edson Woodman. He said they weighed about a ton each.

There was some pleasant rivalry as to whose team could pull the biggest load of wheat up the bridge. Graham's team went up with a load of 100 bushels, but another team soon matched it. Then John piled on 110 bushels and the powerful Normans took it to the top without stopping. Lewis says that record was never beaten.

Ed. Plopper came in while Jim Cotton and the writer were working up the story, and he remembered something about those years when Decatur was the greatest wheat market in Southwestern Michigan. Vet Hess worked in the Michigan Central freight depot in the late seventies. He told Ed. that William Wilson once put a load of 100 bushels onto his wagon and sent it up the bridge with a team of mules.

A necessary accessory which most farmers carried when going up the bridge was a block of wood big enough to hold the load if the team gave out. Hess advised Wilson to take a block for his unusually big load, but Wilson said he did not need it, and drove on without it. About half way up the bridge the mules gave out and Wilson by his own might held a wheel to the plank floor without turning till the mules could take the load again.

William Wilson was known as the strongest man in this part of Michigan. He was a good farmer and his son Ed. was about his equal in strength. Ed. was also a good farmer and rated high as a citizen. He left the farm and went to Benton Harbor to follow the trucking business. He died over there 20 years or more ago but is still remembered by Decatur people of his generation, and all of them will tell you, "There was a good man."

Ed. Plopper remembered that Vet. Hess quit his job at the freight depot in about the year 1882. He went over to Lawrence and began work in the drying house, drying apples. He married Jennie Ridlon, and their son Willie Hess lost his life in the first World War. Guy Eastman, brother of Mrs. Doc Marks, was also killed in that war and the Hess-Eastman American Legion Post of Lawrence was named for these two heroes who gave their lives for their country.

One of the daughters of Vet. Hess is the wife of Glenn Easton. They have a cottage at Lake Cora and visit Decatur every summer.

There is still another paragraph that belongs to this story. Some 20 years ago the New York Central gave up the elevator business, sold the freight depot to C. E. Wickett and Company moved its freight shipping business to the west half of the passenger depot.

We still have the New York Central and it is a valuable asset but the good old days of railroading as it was known in the time of our grandfathers are probably gone forever.

Clif. Hamilton said that when he was a boy he worked for Edson Woodman who had his wheat hauled to the Michigan Central elevator in Decatur. Clif. and young Eddie did the hauling. Clif. hauled as many as 99 bushel to a load and one time Eddie piled on 110 bushels and the team took it to the top of the bridge. He had the one team that could equal John Graham's load, and Graham bought his big Norman horses of Woodman.

Edson Woodman went to France for the sire of his stable of horses and they were powerful animals.

Mr. Woodman was the biggest breeder of fine work horses in this part of the country. He also raised Belgians, French draft horses and shetland ponies.

THE OLD GREENMAN INN

By Leland Sherburn

From D.H.S. Local History Stories

The old Greenman Inn was build on the Valley Road near Decatur in 1834, 121 years ago. It was one of the historical buildings of Southwestern Michigan, and although in 1953 it was entirely destroyed by fire, it is still an interesting subject for comment in the minds of our early settlers, and its location should be marked for the benefit of future generations.

It was a two story building, the first contained the kitchen and bedrooms, the dining and living rooms. On the second floor were the ball room and two more bedrooms.

The outside of the Inn was yellow with white trim around the windows. A balcony ran almost the entire length of the second floor, and below it a porch extended the same length. There were large stone steps leading up to the porch, and there were also two back porches.

The ballroom on the second floor was 35 feet long. It had a spring floor which caused the Inn to literally jump with joy when a merry crowd of young people assembled there for a dance. It was built with double joists so that the floor had "give." Everyone joined in the fun, even though some did not respond to the rhythm of the waltz and quadrille.

Sound boxes 14 inches square were installed in the ceiling, an early attempt to control acoustics.

The Lewis Sherburn family moved in to the Greenman Inn in 1909, and since 1917 had used the ball room as a storage room. Lewis Sherburn well remembered the dances his father held there in his early years.

Some people think that Jacob Charles built the Inn, selecting a place by a flowing spring for it. The spring still bubbles and my Grandpa Graham remembers that when he went from his home near Newton Woods to Paw Paw the horses would start stepping off when they got to within a mile or two of the spring. They knew that they would get a good drink of water out of the old wooden trough there. The Inn was best known when Boston Greenman operated a tavern.

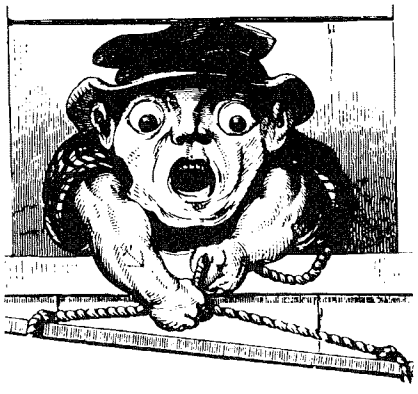
The old trail, which was the old stage coach road from Dowagiac to Paw Paw is still fairly discernable. A traveler down the Valley road could be carried away in imagination at the sight of the old Inn. On that spacious balcony while the dance was in the swing, stole the gay couples of pioneers for a breath of air or a gaze at the moon. Below on the veranda early settlers of the region paused for news and refreshments.

Those were the days when Ezra Stuyvesxant came home from the Civil War and earned his living playing the fiddle for dances. And it was said that he had a genuine Stradivarious violin . It was in the front yard of the Inn that Dan Gant dropped dead of a heart attack. There was much mystery surrounding his death, but no one in the neighborhood is left who can tell the story of it.

Charles Wickett, who is past 82 years of age, remembers the Inn from the time he was a little boy.

The Sherburns had been planning for some time to tear the old Inn down and build in its place a new home. They had decided that an old spring dance floor is no match for a modern kitchen. But before they could tear it down the Inn caught fire and burned to the ground. This was in the fall of 1953. No one knows how the fire started, but the accepted theory is that a little bird carried a lighted cigarette to its nest and started the blaze.

A fine new modern house will occupy the same spot on which the famous Greenman Inn stood for over a century, and the old building will henceforth exist only in the memories of our oldest citizens.



THIS WEEK

By ARBA N. MOULTON, Editor

Robert Ingersol said in one of his eloquent orations, "The past rises before me like a dream." And so it does to the most of us who have arrived at an age where the past reaches off into the distant shadows.

In the fall of 1885 we entered the high school and sat among the seniors who to us were exalted above all other young people. There were five of them and they fully maintained their high place in our estimation throughout the year. They were Nellie Arnold, Maude Nesbitt, Minnie Warner, Ward Copley and Nellie Murphy. The first two are still among the living, and the last named passed to the Great Beyond but a few short weeks ago.

It is in tribute to Nellie Murphy that these few lines are written. She was Nellie Murphy in school,and so she remained to the end of her mortal life. It is a name on which no one could improve. It stood for many things,—and among them were integrity, honesty and frankness. From a young girl she had a way of looking one squarely in the eyes, and inspiring a confidence which made her a lasting friend. This quality never left her. She was always the fine character that was developed in her in girlhood.

But the one thing which made her outstanding among a group of young people was her rare good humor,—her fine Irish wit which did not leave a sting. In high school entertainments or the commencements of earlier years we looked for something extra when Nellie Murphy was on the program. What fun there was in her small crowd when she was young and gay.

She went through life in the bright friendly way in which she begun it, and in later years, whatever the affliction she was called upon to endure, she never lacked for friends to give her help and encouragement. So long as the generations who knew her survive the name of Nellie Murphy will be remembered as one who left a smile and pleasant thoughts wherever she went.

Nellie Murphy was a native of East Decatur where she was born in 1868. She graduated from the Decatur school in 1886 and taught in the village and country schools. She was a faithful member of the Catholic church, and in those earlier years was a member of the Every Tuesday club. She went from Decatur to Kalamazoo where the greater part of her life had been spent. About five years ago she lost her sight, broke up her home and went to Borgess hospital. She suffered a stroke of paralysis last March and her health gradually failed until her death September 15.

Miss Murphy was the last of seven children of Dennis and Catherine Murphy, all well remembered by the older residents of Decatur. They were Mary, Maggie Ray, Lizzie Dillon, Katherine, Thomas and Matthew. She left four nephews and two nieces.

Received a pleasant letter from Mrs. Dana Smith of Paw Paw last week. When Dana died a few years ago she took over his real estate business and has been very successful with it. She sold over $100,000 worth of property last year and in the week before she wrote her sales amounted to $20,000. Her business cards contain this verse:

MICHIGAN

I love Michigan's lakes and streams,
Best state to me it seems.
Two-thirds the autos are made right here,
We have fruits and grains, and wines to cheer.
Have copper, iron, oil and wheat
Shut in from the world we still could eat.
Come be our guest and fish again
When it's "Blossom Tome" in Michigan.

The Republican filed its annual report with the Post Office Department last week, the first Thursday in October. On that day and for the past six months its average circulation has been 1,650. Interest in the Republican is holding strong and we hope to show an increase of at least 100 by this time next year.

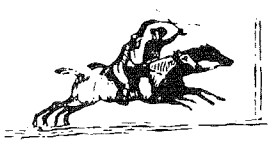
It is said that if the home town newspaper can keep its circulation equal to the town's population it is doing extra well. The population of Decatur is 1,599.

A good reading paper is also a good paper for the advertiser and we endeavor to make each issue of the Republican a good reading paper.

Readers can do the Republican a favor by buying from the Republican advertisements and mentioning the fact to the dealer.

The new Main street pavement came in for its share of praise during the Celery Festival. The contractor, John Yerington, did a good job and Decatur people are proud to show it off to their visitors.

Another thing that is noticeable is the cleanliness of the pavement. The street men are keeping the pavement clean. It looked as clean and pretty as a parlor floor every morning. Tilmar Nash and Cal. Chenoweth are responsible for this effort.



CONTRIBUTED

After reading our editor's request for Republican readers to send in items to complete the file of records of the startling tragedy of September, 1879 on Little Prairie Ronde (The Morris Murder), it has occurred to me to contribute two or three incidents that might lend interest to the story.

At the time of the dreadful occurrence, over 57 years ago, the writer was in Troy, New York and recalls that the episode was printed in the Troy Times of the Monday evening following the occurrence on Sunday evening in Van Buren County, Michigan — indicating the wide publicity given to this event in that early day of our country's history.

A pathetic side connected with the tragedy was the finding of Mr. Moris' little white dog — his loved and faithful companion — the morning after the murder, nestled close to the body of his master on the porch. The dog's hair was stained with the blood that had flowed from the wounds made by the gun shots.

It was Mr. Morris' habit to leave the dog in the barn nights, but when the assassin opened the barn door to steal a horse with which to flee, the dog dashed out in search of his master.

A further incident which adds interest to the story relates that the man whom public sentiment aided by circumstantial evidence, at the time associated with the murder as the possible murderer, was at one time the teacher of the East Decatur school. At the beginning of the term he entered the school house with his arms full of law books and during the term, devoted more time to the latter than he did to the unfortunate children whom he punished so cruelly at the slightest offense. Because of this the children were, one after another, removed from the school by their parents, until there were only four or five remaining. About that time the School Board called upon him and demanded his resignation. He laughed in their faces and told them to read his contract, reminding them that he, himself, had drawn the contract and they had signed it, and he defied them to undertake to force him to resign from the school. He assured them that they would find that they had made a mistake.

He then proceeded to order his four or five remaining pupils to busy themselves with bringing in wood and piling it up around the stove in the school house. He used the wood to heat the room while he studied law for the remainder of the winter.

Another circumstance which might be interesting to add to this article is a story given the writer by Mr. Elias Morris, an uncle of the murdered man, some years after the murder occurred. A young man called at his home one day to inquire if this were Mr. Morris. He stated that he came to ask for the story of that occurrence in detail; that he was ashamed and sorry to say that he was the son of the man supposed to be guilty and declared that his father was the wickedest man he ever knew. He said that his father had contrived to have himself appointed administrator of his father-in-law's estate (the maternal grandfather of the young man). This man was very wealthy. In the end he appropriated the estate's money for his own use, deserted his family, and was never again heard of by them until the murder occurred. (Mr. Morris was glad to state that the young man had told him his father was dead at the time of his call upon Mr. Morris.) The young man had, by the way, just been graduated from the University of Michigan, and stopped off upon returning from college to his home in the West, for the purpose of obtaining the correct version of the Morris Murder.

Another incident, which may be of interest, was related to the writer by Mr. Elias Morris. It was reported that shortly after the murder, a letter was received by the Sheriff of Van Buren County, from the landlord of a hotel in Washington or some far western state. It contained the information that a man answering to the description given in the newspapers of the supposed murderer was there sick in the hotel. Acting at once upon this suggestion, the Sheriff left immediately for that point. He discovered upon his arrival that he had seen this same man about Van Buren County in the days before the murder. So he took a room in the hotel to wait for the man to recover sufficiently in order that he might return him to Van Buren County; however, instead of recovering, the man evidently recognized him, apparently grew worse instead of better. So, after waiting a few days and finding the man still too ill to travel, learned, to his consternation, that his prisoner had eluded him in the night and made good his escape from the hotel.

Nellie Truesdell's Column

916 Hays Park, Kalamazoo, Mich.

March 23, 1950.

"He, who from zone to zone,
Guides through the boundless sky thy certain flight,
In the long way that I must tread alone
Will lead my steps aright."

"To a Waterfowl," by Bryant. And this by John Wirt Dunning:

"An old prophet says, 'The hearing ear, the seeing eye, the Lord hath made even both of them. He made them to help us to see the true, the good, and the beautiful, and to hear sweet sounds of harmony.' It is failure to see and hear the glory of God in nature and in human nature. That is the cause of our wobbly condition today. A waterfowl on the crimson sky is only game to a hunter. To a poet it is a divine creature, guided from zone to zone by a Hand that "will guide my steps aright,' if only I have the upward look."

I received a nice friendly letter from William King who is in the Odd Fellow Home. He visited with my friend Margaret Fairchild, and inquired about my friend from Detroit. I was sorry to learn she is not able to leave her room.

I enjoy the Nature Notes by Ella Stegeman, and I want her to know I save them all and send them to different young folks who are in school. And I was glad to see the poems by J. H. A. and Mrs. Stanley Haas.

How well I remember the old wood box. Of course I had brothers to do that chore, but many a pan of chips have I picked up.

J. H. A. has a "seeing eye" when she goes out in search of Spring. I think she is a friend of the fairies.

I also like Leora Smith's song, "The Winding Paw Paw River" was near my mother's early home as the Black river was near mine.

"How will you find good? It is not a thing of voice; it is a river that flows from the foot of the Invisible Throne and flows by the path of obedience."—George Eliot.

Looking Backward

From the Decatur Republican of August 16, 1917.

PRSBYTERIAN CHURCH DESTROYED BY FIRE

So many readers express themselves as interested in this column that we shall try to run it each week. The destruction of the First Presbyterian church occurred 33 years ago, but it is still a well remembered tragedy of Decatur.

The church membership rose above their loss and a few years later built the stately edifice which stands on the same location. Plans for improving it are now in progress and it is now as it has always been a great benefit to this community. The Republican's account of the fire follows:

August 16, 1917.

The beautiful Presbyterian church is in ashes.

It was built in 1868 and was one of the most imposing structures in the village. Last Friday evening it was destroyed by fire.

Jakie Schneider is but five years old but in his short rise from the cradle he has made his name a household word in the community.

Jakie and Alice Barns were playing in the hay in the Galbreath barn Friday afternoon. Jakie had a box of matches with him and lit one. It blazed up and began to burn his fingers and he dropped it. Then he and Alice had to hurry to get out, which they did. This seems to be the most likely story, although Jakie tells that Alice dropped a lighted match down the hay chute. The little folks did not report the situation and the barn was a mass of flame before the fire was discovered.

The alarm was quickly sounded but the building and contents were destroyed and the firemen had to do active work to save the nearby buildings.

The barn belonged to the home of Mrs. I. B. Galbreath, the property fronting on East St. Mary's street. It was built by the late Mr. Galbreath about five years ago, and was a substantial building. It was filled with hay and grain and some pieces of furniture and a flock of chickens. The Schneider cow was just being led from pasture and was saved in spite of her efforts to enter the burning building.

Mrs. Galbreath is with her daughter Mrs. Dana Sherrod, in Bloomington, Illinois, and Isaac Schneider and family have resided in her home here the past year.

The burning embers of the fire had died down and the firemen and spectators had left the scene. At 9:30 in the evening, M. P. Cady went out and inspected his barn which was close to the fire, but found no indications of further trouble.

Soon after ten o'clock young men going home from the show discovered the Presbyterian sheds adjoining the Cady barn to be in flames. The alarm was sounded and the firemen promptly responded but the sheds and barn were past saving. The fire carried to the church building and it was so hot the firemen could not stop it. The big building was doomed and the flames spread so quickly that not all of the furniture was saved.

The homes of Mesdames Burlingham and Rogers on the west and Mr. Cady on the east were in great danger and the furniture of both houses was removed. Fortunately there was no breeze stirring and both places escaped without much damage.

The church was insured for $4,000 on the building and contents in companies represented by Mrs. Haynes and J. F. Brigham. $1,000 of the insurance on the church covered the pipe organ which was installed a few years ago at an expense of nearly twice that amount.

The loss falls heavily on the Presbyterian church society. The members have kept their handsome edifice in perfect repair and within the past ten years they have spent thousands of dollars in improvements upon it. They feel keenly the loss, but are not a society that will falter or lose courage. Already they are considering the problem of rebuliding, and although it is not likely that definite action will be taken this year, it is practically certain that within the near future a handsome modern church will take the place of the building which served its purpose well for nearly a half century.

For the time being the Presbyterian services will be held in the town hall.

When it became evident that the church would go, it seemed to many impossible that the adjoining houses could be saved. Calls for help were phoned to Paw Paw and Dowagiac and both companies promptly responded. The Dowagiac company drove their fire truck here in forty minutes. Before either company arrived, the home boys had the fire under control. Members of the Home Guard remained on watch duty all night.

History of The First Presbyterian Church

By Danny (D. W.) Brodhead

The First Presbyterian Church was built and dedicated in 1868, Nearpass and Bray were the builders. Its ground area about 45 x 75 feet.

For many years, thirty or more, it was surmounted by a tall, tin-covered spire. Once, so the story goes, a little boy asked his mother if that was God's toothpick.

Some years ago the spire was supplanted by the present belfry.

An immense gathering of people attended the ceremony of laying the corner stone when the building was completed and they were very impressive. Rev. Toof was the pastor.

Deposited in the corner stone were several papers, two or three coins and a new testament.

Two years ago when the basement was excavated the corner stone was removed, the enclosures were examined and then replaced under another stone and were inclosed in a tin can. The coins were black and coated. The papers stained, yellowed and too rotten to be unfolded. The only word made out in them was the signature "Blackman," who was the editor of the Republican.

As I remember there were three papers, a history of the village, a history of the church. The third might have been the contributors to the building fund.

I remember Robt. Nesbitt contributed $100.00. I remember that distinctly as I heard the conversation between Hon. E. P.Hill and Mr. Nesbitt. When asked by Mr. Hill for some aid Mr. Nesbitt asked why he should contribute to the church. "You know it don't represent my religious ideas, I never attend your services, and no doubt I would not be very welcome if I did." Mr. Hill assured him he would be welcomed, and he should help for the general good of the community.

"Mr. Hill, how much do you think I ought to give?"

Mr. Hill replied, "$100.00."

After a moment's reflection Mr. Nesbitt said, "All right, Mr. Hill, make it $100.00."

The church was built larger than was necessary at the time as it was not only the hope and ambition but the expectation that Decatur would soon be the largest town between Niles and Kalamazoo. Some of the leading men were optimistic that Decatur would outstrip even those towns.

Decatur was the best and largest wheat market on the line and was the market for an immense amount of timber products, wool, fruit and livestock. They could not foresee that in a few years we would be sandwiched between two lines of railroad and our trading area more than cut in two.

Many minor changes, refinements and improvements have taken place on the church during its nearly half century of usefulness. The windows were changed, some years ago a grand pipe organ was installed and just recently the basement was excavated and a banquet hall put in with all accessories, as kitchen, dishes, silverware, tables, seats, etc. An ideal heating plant was installed consisting of two large furnaces, their equipment costing over $600. The entire insurance carried on building and contents was $4,000.

And thus another landmark of pioneer days, along with the sturdy pioneers, devoted men and women, who made the church a reality, has gone into history. All that remains is a memory, precious to most of us in association and retrospect. Its history and activities are closely entwined with the thoughts and lives of many of us and it will be good to think that though the church has gone its influence still lives to all eternity. D. W. DAD'S RUNABOUT

When I was young, midway my teens,
Dad owned a horse and runabout,
And when the summer nights were fair,
I'd put the other boys to rout
By driving up to Lucy's gate,
Behind pa's speedy little mare;
And then with Lucy by my side
We'd speed away we cared not where.

At times some other boy would hire
A liv'ry rig quite spick-and-span,
And coax my girl away from me
And then I'd be "an also ran";
But liv'ry rigs then cost a lot,
Not less than fifty cents per hour,
So competition soon would lag
And then I'd cease to sulk and cower.

Quite oft I'd drive through Lovers' Lane
With charming Lucy by my side,
And there beneath the twinkling stars
I'd picture Lucy as my bride;
But still I didn't dare to speak
For I was much too young and shy,
Though none the less I thought a lot
And felt I'd win her by and by.

But by and by dad made a sale
That left me dangling high and dry,
For I had taught the maid to shun
The boys who walked as we rode by;
But since she's grown quite gray and fat
I thank my stars dad sold the rig,
While she, no doubt, is also glad
Now that I'm bald and need a wig.

Minister, Once Circus Clown, Tells How He Dined With Lincoln

(This clipping from the Detroit News, yellow with age, was send to the Republican some time ago with this note on the margin:

"Mr. Moulton, I know you like to read about Lincoln so am sending this to you." The note is not signed but we believe the clipping was sent by Nellie Truesdell. If this is not correct shall look to the one to set us right. It is indeed an interesting story.)

CLARE, MICH.—The life of the Rev. W. M. Younglove, former pastor of the Clare Methodist Church, is packed with adventure. While a boy he ran away from home to join a circus, and toured Michigan and Ohio as a clog dancer. During the Civil War he was captured by the Confederates. But the greatest adventure of all, and the memory he prizes most, was when Abraham Lincoln invited him to dine at the White House.

Not only did Younglove eat his dinner with the President, but he sat in Lincoln's chair, and wrote with the pen that had signed official documents the same day. Then, before he left, he demonstrated a few dance steps at the President's request. The incident occurred in 1864.

Speaking before a class in a Clare School, the Rev. Mr. Younglove revealed his colorful and interesting experiences. He was born in 1846 in a cabin in Lenawee county. At 10 years of age he ran away from home one night to attend a circus in a village a mile away. The circus had packed to move to the next town, but one of the men stowed him in a wagon when he asked if he could go along.

It was a small, one-ring show that led a none too prosperous existence in those days of hardships and penny pinching. The men slept in the wagons, and cooked their own meals. Younglove quickly learned dancing and was elevated to the station of performer. At 13, he joined another circus, but, when the Civil War broke out, he enlisted in Company G, 27th Michigan Infantry, and was mustered in at Hillsdale College.

While on a foraging expedition, his party was surprised and taken prisoners by the Confederates. As they were being marched to camp under a cavalry guard, Younglove and another soldier slipped out of the column and took refuge in a woods. They found shelter in a Negro's cabin, hiding under the floor for three days. Several times they narrowly missed recapture, for the Confederates suspected their whereabouts. At the end of the three-day period, however, the Negro guided them safely into the Union lines.

During the Battle of the Wilderness, June 18, 1864, the flagstaff Younglove carried was shot out of his hands. Though he escaped the bullets of the enemy, he suffered sunstroke a short time later and was sent to an army hospital. When he recovered, he was assigned to special guard duty at Washington, D. C., and then to the mail service.

It was during this period of dispatch-carrying that Younglove had his experience with President Lincoln. One day he was ordered to deliver a packet to the President in person, and wait for a reply. When he was shown into Lincoln's presence, he found the President in conference with a major-general and a civilian whose name he did not learn.

Lincoln asked the young corporal to be seated, and walked toward the door with his visitors. Younglove, who had lost his timidity during circus and Army life, accepted the invitation in an unusual manner. Wondering how it would seem to be in the President's chair, he walked to the opposite side of the room and seated himself at Lincoln's desk.

Taking a diary from his pocket, he picked up a goose quill to write of the unusual experience. Then, as he told his audience in the school room, he heard a rustle behind him. "A long, lean hand reached over my shoulder, selected a pen and handed it to me, and I heard a kindly voice say, 'This is a better pen, my lad'." The voice was that of Lincoln.

It was an embarrassing moment for the young soldier, but Lincoln quickly made him feel at ease. When the President finished reading the packet, he questioned Younglove on his early life and asked him to stay for dinner. During the meal, he had the soldier relate his circus and war time experiences to Mrs. Lincoln.

"We returned to the office after the meal was finished," the pastor told his audience. "At the request of the President, I gave an exhibition of double clog dancing I had learned in the circus. Before I left, he took a well-worn Bible from his pocket, and offered a prayer for the Nation's cause."

Younglove was ordained by Bishop Ninde in 1884, and served actively in the ministry until forced to retire by ill health. Today he is planning to write a book on his life.

DEMOCRACY

Democracy was hard fought for
By forebears brave and true,
And whether it will long survive
Is up to me and you;
For traitors now within our gates
With it will soon make way,
And Communize us, one and all,
Unless we save the day.
For self-determination fight
And keep our country free,
For there are those who would destroy
Our life of liberty;
And regiment us evermore,
And force us to obey
The orders of an autocrat
Who seeks to gain full sway.
'Twould be like whistling down the wind
When waves are dashing high,
For us to sit and idly wish
The storm would soon pass by;
Or steer our ship to meet a great
On-rushing waterspout,
Instead of batt'ning down each hatch
To keep the water out.
Our Ship of State must be well-manned
By staunch men tried and true,
Who have had much experience,
And know just what to do
To hold the ship on its true course
And safety e'er maintain;
And never sail uncharted seas
Dictatorship to gain.

Decatur's Descendants Donate Letters

Letters and memorabilia relating to Commodore Stephen Decatur and American history were presented to the National Trust's Decatur House by two family descendants in September.

Letters from John Quincy Adams, Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson and others came from Storer Decatur of Kittery Point, Me., a descendant of Commodore Decatur's brother. Other items given by Mr. Decatur are a ceremonial sword and a one-pound gold medal presented to the commodore by the state of Virginia. There are also several signed letters from Commodore Decatur in the collection.

Mr. and Mrs. William F. Machold of Wayne, Pa. (she is a collateral descendant of the commodore), have donated to the National Trust a white saucer with scenes on it that had been in a set belonging to the Decatur family and a small black tin instrument box marked, "Stephen Decatur, Junior Midshipman, April 26th, 1798." They also gave two letters that were written to Decatur—one from the Pasha Bay of Tunis dated July 25, 1815, and the other from the Minister of Foreign Affairs in Tripoli, dated August 7, 1815.

Adams on Peace

The letter from John Quincy Adams is dated September 21, 1815, 10 years before he became President. Writing from London, he congratulated Commodore Decatur on the negotiation of a treaty with the Dey of Algiers on the Barbary Coast forbidding the payment of pirates' tributes. Adams wrote, "I pray you to accept my congratulations upon the peace, which we have only to wish may prove as permanent as it is glorious. It is to be hoped that the lesson which you so promptly and so opportunely gave to that Power, will make a durable impression upon its future policy, and I most ardently pray that the example which you have given of rescuing our Country from the disgrace of a Tributary Treaty, may become our irrevocable Law for all future time."

A request from John Henry Sherburne to Thomas Jefferson for information for a book, received the following reply from the 82-year-old Jefferson at Monticello on February 14, 1825. "During my residence in Paris I was much acquainted with Commodore Paul Jones, whose life you propose to write, and had much to do with him. Yet my memory is so decayed that from that source I can furnish you nothing worth a place in his history." But Jefferson did help by sending Sherburne "all the papers relating to him in my possession." In conclusion, Jefferson wrote, "I shall be glad if what I furnish may add anything material to the establishment of that fame which he truly merited."

Jefferson also recalled his acquaintance with the letter-writer's father, whom he had named to a now-unknown position. Jefferson wrote, "The best service I could render the public was to commit their affairs to honest men, and in his appointment I was satisfied I rendered them that service."

Virginia Presents Sword

Commodore Decatur received the sword and gold medal from Virginia after he had won an important naval victory in the War of 1812. The inscription on the sword reads, "In testimony of the splendid talents and valor displayed by Commodore Stephen Decatur, commander of the U.S. frigate United States in the capture of the English frigate Macedonian, 25th October 1812, the State of Virginia bestows this sword."

In a letter in the collection to his brother, Capt. John Decatur, on December 4, 1812, the commodore described his victory over the Macedonian. "I had only five killed and seven wounded, the Macedonian had 104 killed and wounded." Describing the British vessel as his "prize," he called her "a noble ship mounting 49 guns."

Among Our Pioneers

Joyce Ann Dodge.

(Because it would be impossible to mention all of the pioneers of Decatur I am telling the stories of a scattered few. It is to be understood that there were other great men and women in the history of this township but it is not possible to tell the stories of all of them. I am indebted to many local historians for much of my material.)

Our First White Settlers

The dawn of a new year saw the face of white man for the first time in what is now the township of Decatur. In the spring of 1829 Dolphin Morris and his wife Nancy started a home in the wilderness; a wilderness which was later to grow into a village; the village of Decatur.

Dolphin and Nancy Morris started in the autumn of 1828 traveling in a lumber wagon from Virginia to build a home out of the wild and beautiful wilderness of Michigan.

They built a house of logs, chinking them with basswood and daubing them with clay to help keep the cabin warm.

Dolphin laid a floor of split basswood puncheons and built a roof of oak shakes. Nancy did her cooking over an open fireplace. The first church and school in Decatur were held in this cabin.

Another Morris Family

(I shall now relate to you the story of another Morris family. This article was written by Mr. J. A. Shaw, for whom the Shaw school was named.)

Clark and Peter Morris with their mother and two sisters came into the township of Volinia in the early thirties. They lived in a log house which the boys built on the south side of the James Fulton farm. They were not related to the other Morris family.

Clark was a blacksmith. He built a shop in Charleston and became the best blacksmith in the township.

He forged practically all of the nails used by the pioneers in building their homes. He sold his Charleston shop to Dean Lawrence and set up a shop in Decatur soon after the railroad went through.

Peter Morris, Clark's brother, was a cabinet maker, carpenter, millwright, and jack of all trades. He made many pieces of furniture for the homes of the pioneers.

He was among the first helpers in both Volinia and Nicholsville mills. One time when he was tending grist mill in Volinia, Harvey Warner took some buckwheat to the mill. There were certain days when they ground buckwheat and Mr. Warner did not go on the right one. Peter said he was not grinding buckwheat and Mr. Warner replied, "I am awfully sorry because I want some buckwheat of the very worst kind." Peter then said maybe he could accommodate him and take it out of his grist, so he filled a sack and put it in his wagon. When Mrs. Warner went to set the pancakes that evening she opened a sack full of buckwheat, bran and flour scrappings and immediately there was trouble. The next day Mr. Warner took the stuff back to Peter and demanded to know why he sold it to him for buckwheat. Peter replied that he wanted buckwheat of the very worst kind and he sold him the very worst he ever saw.

Peter never married. He was a member of the Masonic lodge and his last few years were spent in the Masonic home at Grand Rapids. He died at the age of ninety-one.

One of the daughters became the wife of James Fulton and the other married a man by the name of Murphy. He died and later she married Jason Strong. The mother lived in the James Fulton home until her death in the early seventies at the age of 88.

Dolphin Morris

(The following article was also written by Mr. J. A. Shaw.)

Samuel Morris was the first settler in the township of Volinia. He came from Ohio and located on the east end of Little Prairie Ronde.

With him were his family, consisting of his wife, Rebeccah, three sons, Dolphin, Samuel, and John, and three daughters, Jane, Elizabeth and Nancy. All of this family except John remained on the Prairie the balance of their lives and their graves are in the Anderson cemetery. John Morris sold his arm to Levi Lawrence in 1861 and moved to Kansas.

Samuel Morris and his family made the trip from the old Ohio home with ox teams bringing with them all of their earthly possessions. Samuel, Jr., and his young wife made the trip on horseback.

Mr. Morris was particularly proud of a fine frame barn which he built in the thirties and which at that time was one of the best barns in southwestern Michigan. The next year after this barn was completed the prairie was visited by the worst cyclone in its history. The entire roof of the barn was lifted into the air, carried three-quarters of a mile and dropped into Swift Lake.

This part of the Prairie has always been subject to extra heavy wind storms and nobody has ever given a practical reason for it. (Mr. Shaw built for Dr. N. D. Thomas a square silo.) The year after it was built a cyclone came along, blew it from the foundation and turned it bottom-side up. During his residence near this section of the Prairie, Dr. Thomas lost two entire wheat crops and most of his other grain by wind storms and his windmill was blown down upon his house.

Dolphin was the oldest son of Samuel, Sr. He located on the north side of Little Prairie Ronde in what is now Decatur township, Van Buren county.

Dolphin was the most ambitious of the Morris sons. He was a tireless worker and a good planner and accumulated a substantial fortune. He was a devout member of the Methodist church and helped to organize the society which held meetings in Charleston. Several attempts were made in these early days to build a church but the society never became strong enough to accomplish the work, although two members at one time pledged one hundred dollars each for a building.

The Dolphin Morris farm was a mile long and a half mile wide, three hundred acres of the finest land on the prairie, wheat, corn, and oats were his principal crops, as they were the principal crops of all the farmers of the Prairie. During the time of the Civil War these farmers could raise from twenty-five to forty bushels of wheat to the acre and market in Decatur to L. T. Rawson, Grove Tarbell or A. N. Chamberlin for from $3.00 to $3.25 per bushel.

Dolphin always prided himself on his water melon patch. Every year he had a big one and raised the biggest, nicest melons of any of his neighbors. The boys of the neighborhood knew this and they were generally as well posted as the owner as to the location in the patch of the best ones. On one particular Sunday night in the sixties three youths on mischief bent staggered out of the patch with three fine specimens and headed toward one of their homes for a melon feast. They had no sooner reached the road than three other boys came along and chased them. One boy hid in the cornfield, the other two dropped their melons and broke them while climbing a fence. The second trio had a grievance against Dolphin and went into the patch and smashed every melon there. Mr. Morris offered a reward of fifty dollars to find out who did the job but nobody told.

Dolphin Morris married Nancy (Beaver) Charles before coming from Ohio and they were parents of eleven children. In this family occurred the greatest tragedy that is recorded in the history of the prairie, the murder of Henry Morris and his wife at the old homestead on Sunday evening, September 28, 1879."

John A. Shaw

Perhaps after publishing articles written by Mr. Shaw I should give you his story. It follows as it appeared in a newspaper article:

JOHN A. SHAW

One of Michigan's Oldest Pioneers

"Mr. Shaw was born in Salt Creek township, Fairfield county, Ohio, July, 1823, in the same year in which President Monroe delivered the famous Monroe Doctrone. In Novembr of his ninth year he came to Michigan with his parents, the children, nine in all, a team and two cows.

They first settled on the Jacob Charles farm in Little Prairie Ronde. Here the father, Samuel Shaw, built a log house in the woods. Clapboards were laid for the roof; no nails were used. Michigan was then a territory and the Black Hawk war was causing considerable excitement.

John Shaw helped to drive to Michigan not only his father's cows but also the cows and sheep of another family.

At the age of eleven he attended a log school for six weeks. It was supported by subscription. The Bible, used as a reading book, and Webster's spelling book were the only textbooks used. Later he attended a winter school in a log cabin near the site of the Anderson graveyard. At a subsequent period he attended Nicholsville school, paying his own tuition. Again at Huycktown he attended school and studied grammar, arithmetic and philosophy. In 1848 he moved to Barry county and there married Miss Rhoda Ann Hollister.

Ten children were born to them. In 1853 Mr. Shaw bought eighty acres in Decatur township. The deed for this farm was written on sheepskin and signed by Martin Van Buren, president of the U. S.

Mr. Shaw was director of the school in his district for many years. In those times the district library was kept at the director's home, and he read by the light of the tallow candle and the blazing fire most of the books in the library. He was also school inspector and Justice of the Peace and many cases were tried before him and many marriages performed by him.

He was an honest, industrious, and well-read citizen, and respected by those who knew him.

During his citizenship in Kalamazoo county he enjoyed reading a great deal and kept well informed of the progressive movements of the day.

While attending a meeting of the Kalamazoo County Farmers' Institute he developed a cough caused by snuff and red pepper, which was thrown on the stove by some boys. The results of that evening's cough stayed by him until his final sickness."

SECOND INSTALLMENT
EARLY PIONEERS OF VAN BUREN COUNTY

By David Woodman

Their early residences were rough and humble, but they answered the purpose. If they had to climb a ladder to reach the loft in their simple dwellings, it was all the same as though they had had winding stairs. If they slept on wild cat bedsteads their sleep was just as sweet as though they reposed on black walnut. If they warmed their cabins by means of huge fireplaces and cooked their frugal meals over a blazing fire, or in a Dutch or tin baker, the food tasted just as good as if it were cooked on a sixty dollar range. If their children were rocked in a home made cradle or toted about in a vehicle costing a couple of hours work, they were fully up to the average of those of the present day in intelligence and vigor. If the kitchen had to answer the purpose of sitting room, parlor and often sleeping room, it was satisfactory, and a necessity.

Our musical instruments were of God's own invention. Our wives and children, and their music was the sweetest and most cheering the early settlers or the late settlers ever listened to. Our wives were their own cooks, chamber maids, dress makers, and milliners and were able to make up all light family clothing. Though they never did bang their hair or a piano, they did bang a broom, mop, and other household utensils around in a lively manner.

Such was the mode of living of our early pioneer fathers.

Van Buren County Attracted Pioneers

Van Buren county in its primitive state was a most inviting place for the sturdy, ambitious, pioneers to settle in. It possessed every variety of soil and all kinds of timber found in any northern state. It had land timbered with beech, maple, walnut, cherry, butternut, white wood and various other kinds. It had the timbered openings, white and burr oak plains without timber, called barrens.

It had its beautiful lakes, its streams of pure water, swimming with fish and its forest and plains with deer and other game. In the spring time it was the most charming. The plains were one vast flower bed and teams could be driven rapidly in any direction for miles.

Let not the reader imagine all was solitude when early settlers came to the country. Oh, no! There was music in the air and it might be the whoop of the Indian, the sharp report of his rifle, his deer or turkey call, the bleat of the deer, the croak of the crane, the squawk of the wild goose or duck, the hoot of the owl, or the sweet notes of the whip-poor-will.

Some of us have heard the howl of the wolf, and let me say it was not very pleasant music to the ear, especially when one was alone in the forest. Some music was likely to accelerate the movements of the hearer as I know from personal experience.

Nicholsville Once Called Volinia

Note—Mr. J. A. Shaw wrote these articles giving the history of Volinia and Nicholsville.

One of the very first water powers built in Cass county was on a stream in Volinia township, connecting Finch and Bunker lakes. The dam was built by A. B. Copley, and to utilize the power developed. A saw mill and grist mill were built, and with them as a nucleus quite a flourishing little village grew up, with postoffice and stores.

The mills were a great boon to the early settlers and people came from a great distance bringing grain to be ground and logs to be made into timber.

As the country settled up and other water powers were developed, and especially after railroads were built, the importance of Nicholsville diminished but the mills were kept running for many years, until one spring a washout occurred in the dam and the water power, which had turned the wheels for so many years was destroyed.

Nicholsville

There seems to have been some argument between early settlers and printed histories on the existence of Nicholsville. The histories say that a village called Volinia was platted into 33 lots and its postoffice was named "Little Prairie Ronde.

The first saw mill in Volinia township was built in the summer of 1835 by A. B. Copley, where Nicholsville now stands, and was started up on its first work December 20 the same year. It is supposed that the power was obtained from a tract of low marsh land, some of which is now a part of the farm attached to the Notre Dame college, where there was a considerable deposit of iron ore.

The St. Joseph Iron Works, which reduced it to metallic iron, and got it into shape so it could be used for the manufacture of plows and other tools of iron, was of great help to the early settlers of this part of the country. To its occurrence may be attributed the location of the Bennett Axe Works and the plow foundry in which a young Scotchman, who was a moulder, called in those days "Jenimy Oliver," discovered a method of suddenly drilling and consequently hardening the molten iron when it was poured into the mould. This resulted in his removal to South Bend where the manufacture of the "Oliver Chilled Plow" made the name famous the world over and the inventor many times a millionaire.

Specimens of the ore may be seen in the rooms of the historical society in the old court house at South Bend, and pieces of it have occasionally been plowed up on the farms in the vicinity of that city. Some of the ore is also occasionally found in Cass county. It is usually porous and resembles a piece of rusty sponge and has a very high content of metallic iron.

A grist mill was built on this dam in 1851 by Harry George and he soon sold it to Jonathan Nichols and his brother who were keeping a hotel there and it is probable that from time to time the place became Nicholsville instead of Volinia as it was platted on Little Prairie Ronde and as the post office was called.

THIRD INSTALLMENT

Volinia

(From the work of Howard S. Rogers, written in 1875.)

"The township of Volinia was originally called Volhynia. It was named after a province in Poland and the honor of having named it goes to Josephus Gard.

Samuel Morris made the first settlement on Mar. 27th, 1829. He settled on section one on which is now the farm of Elias Morris, Samuel's brother, Dolphin Morris and Henry D. Swift journeyel with him and settled in Van Buren Co.

Jonathan Gard, Jacob Morelan, Jacob Charles, Josephus Gard, and Samuel Rich made the first land entries in 1830. Entries a year later were made by Samuel Morris, Elijah and John B. Goble, Jacob Charles, Christanna Gantt, Christanna Charles, John Shaw, John Curry, Alex. Copley, Levi Lawrence, Jonathan Gard, David Crane, Daniel C. Squier and William Griffis. In 1832 and '33 entries were made by Samuel Morris, John S. Barry, William Griffis, Josephus Gard, Alex. Fulton, Alex. Copley, William Tietsort, James Newton, Samuel and John Morris, William Squier, Joel and Elijah Wright, John B. Gard, Amos Huff, Henry Myers, and Assan and Peter Huff.

A school was built in the spring of 1833. Michael V. V. Crane was its first teacaher and so the school holds the name of Crane School.

In the spring of 1832 the first wedding was performed. It was a double wedding, it being that of David Curry, and Alexander Fulton to Sarah and Elizabeth Gard.

John H. Rich, born October 21, 1828, was the first child to be born in Volinia township.

Alexander Copley built the first sawmill in 1835 on the site of the present village of Nicholsville. The irons were cast in Mishawaka, Ind., for the mill and it was started on December 20.

Three days after their arrival, Jonathan Gard, Samuel Rich, and Elijah Goble came. Jonathan Gard settled on what is known as Gard's Prairie. Rich and Goble settled on the west side of Little Prairie Ronde.

The two parties came under the guidance of Squire Thompson of Pokagon Point. Jacob Charles and Jacob Morlan came the same season. Samuel and Alexander Fulton, ohn Curry, William Tietsort, and Josephus Gard arrived in 1830. Abed Bunker, William Griffis, and John Shaw came in 1831. In 1832, James Newton, David Crane, Amos Huff, and Levi Lawrence came.

The township was organized in 1833 and an election held at the home of Josephus Gard, July 8th. Before this it belonged to Penn township. The road district comprised the township and Van Buren county in 1834. Men living on Little Prairie Ronde that season were obliged to work out their tax on the swamp where Lawton now stands.

Charleston

James Herron kept the first store in the township. It stood a little distance north of where Charleston stood. It was opened in 1836. Morris and Clifton opened a store at Charleston in '37 and Daniels and Huyck started selling goods in Volinia.

Charleston was laid out in 1836 on Little Prairie Ronde by Jacob Morlan, Jacob Charles, Alexander and Samuel Fulton. The town was laid out in 32 lots.

In the same year Volinia was laid out by Levi Lawrence, David Hopkins, Obed Bunker and John Shaw. It was composed of 55 lots and a public square.

For a number of years before the competition of the M. C. R. R., Charleston was a thriving village. Daily stages passed through from Kalamazoo to Niles and it looked as if it was the coming town. Because of a lack of foresight Charleston and Volinia remain only in the minds of a few citizens and the places which were once a hustle and bustle are now marked by a few old houses.

A carpenter by the name of Smith who was employed by David Hopins in 1837 was in the habit of getting intoxicated. He was drowned in Bunker Lake while under the influence of liquor. At the time of the accident, he was on the lake in a canoe going to Charleston to obtain liquor of which he was already under the influence. Not succeeding in getting the help of one of the family to go with him he determined to go alone. When he was near the shore opposite from his house the canoe upset and he was seen no more. Men fishing another part of the lake noticed the empty canoe and went to look for him and for several days the entire neighborhood searched for him; but the only trace of him that could be found was a hat in the bottom of the canoe. He left a wife and family in New York.

In 1849 the M. C. R. R. was built through to Niles. Then a wagon road was built over the swamp to the railroad giving an outlet for farm produce. Before this they had to be driven to Paw Paw, Niles, or St. Joe.

Harry George built the first grist mill in the township in 1851. Soon after building the mill, he sold it to the Nichols Brothers and put up a store which burned in the winter of 1854. Since that time Wing, Wilkins, Goff and others have carried on trade there.

In 1876 Nicholsville contained a population of 100, two general stores, one blacksmith shop, one cooper shop, one wagon shop, one shoe shop, one veneer and basket factory, one tannery, one grist mill, one steam saw-mill, one hotel, two physicians, one lawyer and one carpenter and joiner.

Volinia then contained a population of around 50, had one grist mill, one general store, blacksmith shop and other stores.

The Volinia Farmer's Club was started in 1865.

The only meeting house was that of the colored Methodists erected in 1873.

The first cemetery laid out was the Crane, now known as the pioneer, platted about the year 1833."

FOURTH INSTALLMENT

A PIONEER JOURNEY

The story of the journey of the Mumaugh family is told here as it was related by the late Charlie Mumaugh.

In the year 1864 Silas and Mary Jane Mumaugh and their three children, Maggie, Lizzie and Charlie started for Hamilton, Mich., from Mansfield, Ohio.

They began their journey in a covered wagon one windy day in March. While traveling through a thick forest their first misfortune was a broken axel. Silas and Charlie had to walk nine miles through virgin timber to get a wheel before they could travel on.

While they were gone some men appeared, apparently thieves, and tried to steal their horses but the Mumaugh wolf dog drove them off.

After the wheel was repaired they continued on their journey. In a few days they had another unpleasant experience. They were attacked by Indians who wanted their horses and supplies, but some people in a nearby cabin helped to drive them off.

Another hardship which they had to endure was sickness. Their daughter, Lizzie became ill, and, as the services of the doctor could not be secured, her case soon became serious, and her fate was in the hands of her creator. Miraculously she recovered after a long illness, and she lived a great many years.

Thirty-three days after they started their journey, they reached their destination—in what is now Decatur, Michigan.

The Covered Wagon

(By Lena Whittaker Beakeney)

This poem is quoted in memory of those who made the journey in covered wagons across this land of freedom:

"Through a mist of tears I watch the years
Of my youth go by again;
The golden years when the pioneers
First people an unknown plain.
By our camp fire's gleam on a far off stream,
Like a light in a drifting haze;
I journeyed back by the old dim tract
That leads to the vanished days.
As the phantom trails of the windswept plains
In shadowy outline pass,
The cottonwood trees stir with the breeze
That ripples the prairie grass.
The prairies swoon in the radiant noon,
And I catch the faint perfume
Of the cactus, blent with the faint
Sweet scent of the yucca's wagon bloom.
The cattle drink at the river's brink—
At the close of the peaceful day,
They are dim-seen ghosts of the trampling hosts
That, far-flung, once held sway.
I hear the beat of a horse's feet,
And a note from a night-bird's throat,
The deadly purr of a rattler's whir,
And the bark of a lone coyote.
And the muffled thrum of the Indian drum
As it beats a weird tattoo;
For the wild war dance—the old romance
Still stirs me through and through.
The trail grows dim—Ah, now the rim
Of the sunset sky bends low,
And the gray-green sedge at the prairie's edge
Is bathed in a blood-red glow!
The measured beat of my mustang's feet
Still lures me down the years—
And I want to ride back by the strong man's track
That I see tonight through tears."

EARLY PIONEERS OF VAN BUREN COUNTY

This is the story of Benjamin Hathaway, the "Farmer Poet" as related by Mr. J. A. Shaw.

"Benjamin Hathaway was born in 1822. He came with his parents to the prairie and on the death of his father succeeded to the home farm. He made a model farm of it and at one time in competition he was awarded a premium for having the second best farm in the state.

He failed to receive the first premium only because the competition was for a 160 acre farm and the Hathaway farm contained but 120 acres.

Mr. Hathaway set out pine and maple trees among the native oak, raised beautiful hedges and gardens, nearly every kind of fruit that would grow in the country and kept one of the finest nurseries in the state.

Benjamin Hathaway was a poet and writer of fine ability. He became known throughout the country as the Farmer Poet, and his published works. "The Last of the Iroquois," "Art Life" and other poems are known and admired by students of good literature. On his model farm he trimmed the native oak trees to thirty feet and under them planted hard maples in rows. This made not only a pretty scene but a luxurious maple sugar grove.

When Benjamin Hathaway was a young man he set out a row of hard maples one hundred rods long. These trees became a rich sugar grove. One night in sap-running time several of the mischievous boys of that neighborhood emptied all of the sap from 50 or more pails out onto the ground and filled them with water from Samuel Morris' big horse tank.

John Nolan was bossing the sugar camp for Mr. Hathaway and when he came out from his home in Charleston in the morning he was accosted by that gentleman who had been out to the sugar grove before him. "Y-Y John," said Mr. Hathaway, "Chitter along, the pails are all running over, you must hurry and get the sap to boiling. We're going to have a heavy run." John got busy and soon had it boiling. He boiled it all forenoon and into the afternoon till Mr. Hathaway came back and sampled it and found that the water that had not gotten into steam was no sweeter or thicker than when it was poured into the kettle.

Mr. Hathaway always had several of the young men of the neighborhood working for him on the farm and in his nursery and garden. He could get plenty of help for they all liked to work for him.

He liked a good joke, humored the boys in their pranks and didn't complain when they were on him.

Mr. Hathaway also planted on his farm a chestnut grove. From one particularly fine chestnut which he had planted in his youth by the side of the house he had made the coffin in which he was laid to rest. He had the tree cut and sawed into lumber while in his prime and engaged Archie and Linneus Lawrence to make the coffin for him. They did their work well and when all that was earthly of the great man of the Prairie reposed therein and the sorrowing relatives and neighbors beheld his form for the last time the harmony and peace of that repose in the beautifully fashioned timbers from the chestnut he planted and loved, left an impression that will never fade away.

Mr. Hathaway passed from this earth in 1896 at the age of 74 years."

Following is a poem written by Benjamin Hathaway:

JUNE

Month of Flora! month of roses!
Bring again the gifts divine;
Autumn's gold thy heart encloses;
In the garlands thou dost twine
Hides the heaping horn of plenty —brims the vintage glowing vine.

When the dewy dawn is breaking
Unto morn serene and grand,
Hark! exultant anthem waking,
Of the wildwood's warbling band.
Like a wind-swept harp Aeolian, joyful, thrilling all the land.

High the thrush his song's swelling
Where no meaner voice intrudes;
Far the wood-dove's note is tilling
Love's soft matin through the woods
While a home of beauty building, mid the leafy solitude.

Mad with Jay's delirium panting
Nearer sings the Oriole;
Loud the Bobolink is chanting
"Bob-o-link," with fiery soul,

Till through all the woodland arches wide the music billows roll.

Lowly minstrels! long above ye
Gently wave the budding sprays
Never will I cease to love ye,—
Let your choral roundelays
Waken still love's wild aspiring yearning for harmonious days.

Though the seasons swiftly leave us,
Each some precious boon shall bring,
Nor shall ever Hope deceive us
Waiting for the coming Spring-
Waiting for the promised Summer,

JUDSON HATHAWAY

This is the story of Judson Hathaway taken from a newspaper article.

Adoniram Judson Alney Hathaway was born in Cayuga county, New York, August 15, 1824 and was the second of eight children born to Abner and Naomi Alney Hathaway.

As a lad he assisted his father in operating a lumber rafting business, from the forests of Northern New York over the Erie Canal taking turns with his elder brother Ben in driving the horses along the road.

Owing to reverses in their business the family moved in 1837 to Southwestern Michigan hoping to retrieve in a measure their lost fortune in the wilds of a New and growing country. They settled in Cass county on what was later known as the Hathaway farm which they purchased under heavy mortgage.

Their first home was a log cabin. In the course of time, however, they were able to build the large and commodious farm house which was for years the homestead of the Hathaway family.

In 1843, the death of the father occurred and the business management of the farm was left in the hands of the two sons, Benjamin and Judson, who worked like young trojans to pull the farm out of debt. In those days they braved the hardships of many a long winter drive to St. Joe in the open sleigh with their grains or other produce in order to ship to Chicago for market.

He and his brother, by cooperating with each other, developed the resources of the farm to a remarkable degree, beautifying it at the same time until it became known throughout southwestern Michigan as a model farm.

Judson Hathaway was by nature a home loving man and it was failing health that induced him in middle life to make his sojourn in the west where he fell in with a government survey company.

Oddly enough he was requested by "Colonel" Parker, so-called, who led the expedition, to accompany them as chaplain of the party. He camped with them in the open, slept on the ground with only his blanket for covering and "roughed it" generally while his skill as a huntsman was almost invaluable to the company since he was thus able to supply them with wild game which constituted the major portion of their provisions throughout the trip.

The rigors of camp life must have agreed with him for he returned to civilization at the end of six months a well man. It would seem also that he "made good" in his position as chaplain, for though he never offered a formal prayer nor exhorted the men to experience religion, it was said of him that his silent influence worked wonders in restraining the men from profanity and in keeping them in general true to their best selves.

His taste for adventure and sport took only one turn—that of love for hunting. It was this that drew him for forty consecutive years to leave his home and follow the trail of the deer in the wilderness of northern Michigan. On his return from one of these hunting trips in the north, he brought with him a little box and planted with his own hands the seedlings which became in time the stately evergreens growing in his yard and bordering the drive to the house. His adventures in camp and on the trail formed the theme of many an exciting narrative which he delighted to relate to the end of his days. His fondness for the chase was not confined however to his northern trips. For years he was a familiar figure to the whole countryside as, equipped with his cartridge belt and his trusty rifle, and his hounds he roamed the prairie and adjacent forests for game.

Physically he was a giant in strength as compared with ordinary men and there are rumors of his prowess in the early days when the strength of the fist was the measure of the man, though he was never known to injure or intimidate a weaker one.

As a man he stood well in the community and was respected by all who knew him as a kind neighbor and good citizen. He never preached but held ideas of his own and on occasion would settle his religious opinions in a simple direct manner that always struck home.

He passed away June 9, 1910.

PIONEER SKETCHES BY MRS. ERASTUS OSBORN

Written in 1926.

I have been surprised by the suggestion that I write for the Republican some sketches of pioneer life in this part of the state. Upon reflection I find there are people and events connected with those early days that may profitably be brought to the attention of the present generation.

I cannot claim the honor of being a pioneer. I did not know this country until 1860, when there were cultivated farms, fruit trees in bearing, religious services, schools, comfortable houses, and fairly good roads when they happened to be dry.

I am amazed now when I think of the improvement the wonderful development effected in the twenty-five years that had elapsed from the time the real settlement began. In 1836, history tells us, there were only six families in the township of Hamilton. I doubt if any other period of the same length can show the same growth.

I would like especially to remind any who are interested in the history of the town of those two broad-minded, public-spirited, energetic men, Robert Nesbitt, who located in the town in 1835, and Philotus Haydon, who came one year later. As I recall many things that I used to hear said of them in the 60's and 70's and by those who spoke from personal knowledge, I cannot but feel that we of the present day are greatly indebted for the help and counsel they freely gave to the early settlers, and the benefit of a good example was to be highly valued.

Mr. Nesbitt, himself a millwright, built the first sawmill in the town, in time wearing out five or more, also the first gristmill, and only think what that meant—material for daily bread and boards to enclose the homes. The log houses were quite as comfortable. You remember how Mrs. Abram Wise longed for the warmth of her log house on the 'cold New Years,' as told by her daughter last winter in the paper.

Of course the frame houses made room for many conveniences not possible in the others, but the well kept log houses possessed a charm never found in those of later years, and that no architect could copy.

That each of these men accumulated what was called wealth in those days is no cause for reproach. None of it was obtained by any dishonorable business methods. It was a boast of both that they "trusted everybody" and almost never lost a debt.

EIGHTH INSTALLMENT

No. 2

Mr. Haydon, while not coming so close to the lives of the pioneers as Mr. Nesbitt, had more to do with public matters, having been ten years supervisor of the township, as well as member of the state legislature at different times. He was intensely patriotic and once when making a speech in the early days of the Civil War he said, "If I were thirty years younger I would say as I always used to say on my farm, 'Come on boys,' but I am past taking the lead," being then past seventy.

When he was delegate to a state convention for the nomination of governor, seeing there was no chance for the man of his choice to get the nomination or to be elected, he voted for the candidate whom he saw was likely to win. As he dropped his vote, he said, "God forgive me." His judgment proving correct, the man for whom he voted was nominated and elected. Being in Lansing as representative he attended the inaugural reception. During the evening someone told him the governor's lady wished to meet him. Several knew the lady's design and when he went up to be presented there was a hush in the assembly. After the formal presentation she said, "Are you the man who asked God to forgive you when you cast your vote for my husband?" "Yes," Mr. Haydon shot back, "but I knew He wouldn't." So her expectations of confusing the "country member" were not realized. I never saw the story in print though it probably was, but heard it told in the early years of my life here, and think it should be preserved.

I am not trying to write a history of any of these towns, that has been worthily done three or more times in the last fifty years, but only to recall incidents and persons connected with the development of the country, and especially the ones omitted from the printed histories. Indeed so many of these crowd upon me, it is difficult to make a choice, and I will have to ask you, as Henry Ward Beecher once asked his congregation, to give me credit "for what I keep back."

The mowing marshes were considered a desirable part of a farm, and were useful for pastures, for cutting hay, but later were regarded as having been really a damage, because farmers did not begin the use of clover as soon as the land needed it. There were few fences except to enclose growing crops. Stock could go as far as they liked, and "getting the cows" was the work of hours and sometimes days. I have heard Charles Osborn tell of going north from their old home because the cows started north in the morning, and finally finding them near where the North Wayne church now is, nearly four miles from home, almost directly south.

There were wild berries, wild game and Indians for neighbors, and oftentimes these Indians were very good and kind neighbors. There was plenty of wood, and I have heard people say girdled trees were not fit for wood and they would use only green timber, which now certainly seems foolish but the supply then looked endless.

James and Daniel Osborn and his sister Harriet came here in the spring, Daniel locating in Keeler and James coming the next year to Hamilton.

The first year they were together and raised some fine melons. Their father had said he thought the family would come, so these two eldest sons—James was already married—selected some fine melons and packed them in oats for a treat. But they looked and waited in vain, and finally quite late ate the melons, and the next day, lo, there came the covered wagons and the family.

Only think of the difference! Within a slow day's drive, and those here had given them up, had no means of knowing they were so near. Had not even heard they were on the way.

However a mail route was established and a post office opened on the territorial road, with Mr. Coleman as first post master. I remember before I came from New York addressing letters to Hamilton's post office.

No. 3

Perhaps no family impressed themselves so strongly upon the community as the Osborns, for the reason that they were more numerous, and as a rule longer lived. Seven of the sons grew up and raised families, and four daughters, while four of the first wife's children and three of the second mother died single, there being eighteen altogether.

Harriet of the first family lived into her fifty-fourth year, and was widely known and esteemed. Chauncey, youngest son of the second, died in camp hospital in the Civil war. All who are left of that generation are D. H. Briggs of Naper, Nebr., whose wife was Laura Osborn, Mrs. Horace Osborn and myself.

There are now more than 80 living in this section, who are either of Osborn blood, or married one who was, and as many in more or less remote parts of the country, besides, of course, many who have died.

The father, Stephen Osborn, was an honest, temperate, industrious and moral man, but unreasonably severe with his family. No child was spoiled by sparing of the rod, and by what I have heard different ones of them say, he welcomed a pretext for using it. Perhaps he thought he was doing his duty. Daniel Osborn once said to me, "I'd rather my boy would never mind me at all, than be afraid of me as I was of my father."

He was not a good financier, and the family, especially in his later years, were poorly provided for. The mother worked more hours, and slept fewer than any one I ever knew, and even then could barely keep them fed, and never comfortably clothed, with the scanty means at her command.

ERASTUS OSBORN

Many times when driving around the lake near their home my husband, Erastus Osborn, would speak of the times when he had gone over the road shivering with cold, because he was so thinly clad.

I do not allude to these things to bring discredit upon a pioneer citizen, but to emphasize the fact that in spite of all these hardships and privations they all grew up to be reputable members of the community and nearly all were exceptionally kind and liberal parents. I do not know if my husband was 7 or 8 when he started in school, wearing a sunbonnet, and had no book. Good Mrs. Baxter, a blessing wherever she lived, learning this from her children, "dug up" a book and gave it to him the second morning.

His father died when he, the eldest of 7 children, was 15 and I think it was after that, but am not sure, that feeling the need of an arithmetic and having earned some money, he sent by a neighbor to Paw Paw for one. He did not know what to buy, and came home with the Thompson's higher arithmetic, which was utterly useless. He remembered that disappointment as long as he lived. A dollar and a quarter was not easy to spare.

DANIEL OSBORN

D. Osborn was an elder half-brother, one of the finest Osborns I ever knew. With the environment which should be every child's birthright, and an opportunity for an education, he would have been a superior character. Even lacking these, he was a sterling man, and a dignified gentleman.

He removed to Harper Co., Kansas, in 1885, where he resided until his death in 1903. He purchased an extensive farm which is now owned by his son Milo H. Osborn. A recent letter tells of himself, one son and a hired man harvesting, threshing and storing in the elevator 6000 bu. of wheat, besides a few hundred bu. in smaller lots which had to be handled in the old-fashioned way. Mrs. Daniel Osborn, Minerva Babcock, died some years before he did, and their daughter, Mrs. Nora Weidenback, about 5 years ago.

BENJAMIN HUNGERFORD

The maternal grandfather, Benjamin Hungerford, came to Keeler in 1837 and bought 640 acres on the Territorial road with the intention of giving each of his children a farm, but his plan, I think was never carried out. He was of English descent, his ancestors having come to America in the 17th century.

Some of the family have traced their ancestry in a direct line back to Sir Giles and Lord oRbt. Hungerford, and one cousin visited their tombs in Salisburg Cathedral dated 1438, also the sister of these who built the church at Stoke Pages, which was the scene of the elegy written by the poet Gray.

Benjamin Hungerford was a man of much energy and business ability, of strong character in all ways. He owned and operated a carding mill in Genesee Co., N. Y., which he sold when he came to Michigan. His "mantel piece," to quote Mrs. Partington, seems not to have fallen on his sons.

His wife was Jane Weston, daughter of Jonathan Weston, a Revolutionary soldier, but as records show eight by this name in the American army, no one has been able to learn which was the ancestor of the Osborn family, by reason of which some who desired to join the D. A. R. have been unable to do so.

They were parents of 16 children. He died in 1850, and she in 1853, and they are buried in the Keeler cemetery, his monument being the first one erected in that burial ground.

Millard Fillmore, in his youth, was an apprentice in the Hungerford mill. Not long before his death he re-visited the locality and wept as he gazed upon the familiar scene, and recalled incidents of his life there. It is related that great grandmother Weston rode on horseback with a babe (grandmother Hungerford) in her lap to witness the surrender of one division of the British army. It took two days or more, and she was in company with a neighbor whose son was in the same regiment with her husband.

LITTLE THINGS

It has been said and aptly too,
Mosquitos are more trouble, quite,
Than elephants are to me and you,
Likewise 'tis frost the corn does blight;
So one should ever strive quite hard,
From early morn till late at night,
Against the little things to guard,
We'll seldom have big things to fight.

When one does start to make a thing
On which a profit should be made,
Waste heads the list of things to curb
If for your labor you'd be paid;
And waste occurs along the line—
Waste product, labor and supplies,
So stop the waste of every kind
And splendid profits realize.

Pioneer Sketches by Mrs. Erastus Osborn.

Written in 1926.

I think only six of the children of Benjamin Hungerford came here with him, or at least remained here as settlers.

Morgan had a blacksmith shop in Keeler and about 1850 went to California, across the plains. Chas. Osborn was of the same party.

Morgan Hungerford, however, never returned. Stephen, whose wife was an Osborn, lived in Keeler and raised a family.

"Zack," Charles, Lester, Lucius, and Mary, who was the wife of Mr. Bullard, were the others. Lucius lost his life in the Union Army, Charles and Lester died in recent years, the only ones generally known. There were Mrs. Osborn, Mrs. Palmer, Mrs. Parish and Clarissa, who married John McKenna of McKenna's prairie. Later, both Clarissa and Mrs. Palmer lived in western Iowa and died there. Mr. Parish was a carpenter and, I have been told, built the Silver Creek mill and the Silver Creek Catholic church.

Soon after the death of Stephen Osborn, the elder, Mrs. Parish was brought to that home very ill, and lived only a few days. Her mother went there, and on the day of Mrs. Parish's funeral, fell down stairs and died, the same day, I think. The eldest of the Parish family, Cecelia Babcock, past 90 years of age, lives in Galien, Berrien county.

It was Decatur and Hamilton about which I was asked to write, but, having strayed into Keeler, there is one more occurrence in that town which I wish to relate. Though not strictly a pioneer incident, it is of one of the older Keeler residents, Mr. John Rosevelt, many years deceased, and took place after the close of the Civil War.

A young man had bought from Mr. Rosevelt a yoke of steers and gave his note in payment. Before it came due, he enlisted but I do not know how long he was away. When the house in which Chas. Rosevelt now lives was being built, the young man came there to pay the debt. Mr. Rosevelt was much interested, and plied him with questions regarding his Army life. After awhile he said, "Mr. Rosevelt, I would like to pay that note and get home." Mr. Rosevelt said, "Don't go now until after dinner, I want to talk with you more." So the young man stayed and Mr. Rosevelt continued asking questions.

Awhile after dinner he said again, "I want to pay that note and go home. I have work to do."

Mr. Rosevelt said, "All the time you were in the Army I had a good bed to sleep in, and three meals a day. You don't owe me anything."

This was told me by a man who was doing some fine finishing work on the house and who heard the whole conversation. I cannot now recall his name, nor do I know who the young man was, but Chas. Rosevelt, perhaps, may know both.

The Baxters

In the family of Squire Baxter, as he was called, there were five sons, all first-class men, and three daughters, but there is now no descendant left to perpetuate the name. Mr. Baxter understood surveying, which was extremely useful in a new country. His eldest son, James, left one son, Frank, who married Margaret Brooks, but they left no children. Edward, Charles and Orlando had no children, and Lucius left no son.

Edward, when past 75, sold his farm and bought a home in Dowagiac, where he anticipated with enjoyment in association with the church he loved, but they had been in town only a short time when his illness, consumption, took a fatal turn, and ended his life in a few weeks. His widow, Mrs. Lydia Corwin Baxter, is still living, aged 88, very infirm and almost entirely deaf, so life holds for her little enjoyment. Her home is in Dowagiac with her niece, Mrs. Louise Corwin Blauvelt.

Of the daughters, Martha, Mrs. Sanford Whitlock, after Mrs. Sutfin, and Caroline, Mrs. Elliot Wrightman, were my earliest friends in Michigan, and always among my dearest. My acquaintance with Mrs. Jane Lombard was light, but all were worthy daughters of a noble mother.

Another dear lady, Mrs. Margaret Nash, who in those early days was an ornament and a blessing in the home and social life of the neighborhood, is still living in her 92nd year. If a bare existence of the body, without the mind, can be called living. When the mind outlives the body it is very sad, but when the body outlasts the mind I believe it is still more pitiful. The prayer book says, "From sudden death deliver us," and I would say more fervently, "From too long-life Kind Heaven preserve us."

This lady is well known in Decatur. Mr. Nash lost his life in the Civil War, and she is now the widow of Charles Stewart.

I once heard Mr. Stewart speak of a mutual friend as "an honor to any community," and that truly described himself. Both were former residents of Decatur.

(This biography was written by Joyce Dodge from an interview with Mrs. Amy Millard Payne, granddaughter of the Calvin Millard referred to. The other biographies of Hamilton township pioneers were written by Mrs. Erastus Osborn and published in the Republican about thirty years ago.)

STORY OF THE MILLARD ANCESTORS

In the year of Grace, 1837, during the month of April, Calvin Millard and his brother-in-law, Ralph Mason, turned their backs on Lynn, Connecticutt, and headed for unknown territory.

The name of the steamship that they boarded was "Constitution," and their first stop was Albany, New York. They were later detained in Buffalo for two weeks because of ice in the lake. The next ports were Cleveland and Toledo. At Toledo they purchased a team, harness, and wagon. Starting the long trail with horse and wagon toward the St. Joe river, they landed in the southern portion of Michigan. Here, on the St. Joe, Calvin met land sharks who tried to outwit him. He took up the land in North Hamilton which is now the former William King farm. It was a beautiful spot, and there, cupped in among hills was a tiny lake. Here Calvin settled. He wrote back joyously to his wife, Lucy, telling her of the place he had found and promising to build her a home some day overlooking the lake which the hand of the Creator had placed among the hills.

The next spring he returned to Lynn and brought his wife and five children to the wild and beautiful territory of Michigan. It was on this return journey that they experienced the thrill of seeing their first Indian and his canoe. The craft was tied to a tree on the edge of the present Lake Cora.

The hardships of the following winter were very bitter. The cabin had no door until winter had almost withdrawn his icy fingers. A blanket was used as a very poor substitute. Candles and sunshine were the only light available. The former had to be made with painstaking care. A ladder led to the loft and it was here Lucy would take her children when the wolves howled without the cabin.

Little Lucy Millard was the baby of the family, being then only two years of age. One of her earliest experiences in backwoods life was a very unpleasant one. Railroad trains, at that time, did not carry household supplies of every description within easy reach of the homes, nor would a few words spoken over the telephone bring a delivery truck to the door with needed articles. Even that staple article, flour, was to be obtained only after a forty mile trip with ox teams through forest and swamp lands to the nearest gristmill, which was Flowerfield. The roads were mere trails and the traveling was rugged,

On this particular occasion the flour supply of the entire neighborhood was exhausted, and the winter, having been long and severe, the roads, such as they were, were not passable. There did remain, however, a supply of corn meal, but the delicate appetite of little Lucy rebelled against that, so the family had to suffer the pain of hearing her cry for bread and waste away for the lack of it. When she cried herself to sleep at night her mother cried with her. One night aninspiration came to the mother and the next morning the coffee mill was brought into service for grinding the wheat into flour. As fast as one pair of arms grew tired, another pair took up the task. There was soon enough flour for a small quantity of bread and this was undoubtedly the first flour that was ever ground in Van Buren county.

It was not long ago, that a little girl who lived with her parents near the site of the Millard pioneer cabin, picked up a piece of blue china ware near the original site of the cabin. She was on her way to visit Mrs. Fred Payne, the granddaughter of Lucy Millard, and showed her the piece of blue china telling her where she had found it. Mrs. Payne was surprised to find that the piece was identical to a portion of a blue plate of "Staffordshire" china in her possession, which had once belonged to her grandmother, Lucy Millard. Evidently one of Lucy Millard's plates became broken and was thrown out. A hundred years later a piece of this plate was plowed up and found by a little girl.

Soon after, a few neighbors moved into the vicinity. Because those early people were deeply religious, and because they had no church at first, religious services were held in the cabins and Lucy Millard led the meetings.

Unlike so many people of today, those pioneer families knew the bible well, had a deep and reverent faith in the Heavenly Father, and completely resigned their will to His. Because of this deep religious spirit, they were able to bear afflictions and sorrow with perfect resignation.

While Lucy Millard was still in Connecticutt her husband wrote telling her of the beautiful site he had chosen for a home and promising to build one for her as soon as possible. He did not know that he never would fulfill his promise because the site of his future home was to become, instead, his graveyard. He died the following winter, and his was the first funeral to be held in Van Buren county. His remains were later moved to Hamilton cemetery.

Following is a portion of a letter writen by Lucy Millard to her parents. It was writen with a quill pen and the letter folded to form the envelope. No stamp was used and the numerals 25 were merely written in the corner to signify a stamp.

Kendall, Michigan,
Feb. 1, 1838.

Dear Parents,

With what emotion of soul I now attempt to address you is known only to that Being who searches the heart and tries the reins of the children of men, the Lord has sorely afflicted me. He has made me pass through the deep waters of affliction. He has brought me down to the dust far from my native soil in a land of strangers. The Lord God has made me a widow and my children fatherless. He has taken the companion of my life, the partner of all my joys and sorrows has taken his flight to the world of spirits. Oh, may that God, who has afflicted me, pour the balm of consolation into my wounded heart.

Our dear Calvin was sick only eight days and died on the ninth. He was taken ill on Wednesday but kept out all day clearing timber. He died Thursday, Jan. 25, at one o'clock in the afternoon p. m. and Sat. the 27th we followed his remains to the grave. He deceived himself with the idea that he should soon be about his work again and we were deceived in the same way.

God has seen fit in His all wise dispensation to remove him from the land of the living. He has, I doubt not, obtained an incorruptible crown. My earnest prayer is that we may bow with submission to the will of Him who has given and Who has taken away. The children all send love to you.

Yours in affliction,
Lucy Millard.

Tenth Installment

Among the earliest settlers in Hamilton were Marcus Merriman from Conn. and Calvin Fields. If I'm rightly informed it was a wedding trip for Mr. and Mrs. Fields, but the Merrimans had with them four children. They came by boat, probably only to Detroit, and I do not know how the first part of the journey was performed.

Both were among the earliest friends of my husband and he often quoted the opinions of both. When Mr. and Mrs. Fields were here on a trip from Kansas they made us a visit that we greatly enjoyed. Mr. and Mrs. Merriman also were here several times from Paw Paw, staying one night or more and were interesting company with their narratives of old, old time.

After Mrs. Merriman's death Mr. Merriman also came. One time he told of their experience on Lake Erie. That piece of water behaved with characteristic depravity, when all the passengers were greatly alarmed, Mrs. Merriman said to her husband, "Well, we're all here. If we are drowned we'll all be together." But drowning was not to be their fate.

Good Watchers

There were doctors quite early in the history of this section, but nurses, at least trained nurses, were unheard of. When sickness came, neighbors took turns caring for those who were ill, especially at night, though even then there was a choice, and good "watchers" were liable to have many calls. I know by experience what a "good watcher" Mrs. James Osborn was, and no doubt there were others as competent. And in later years there was that angel of goodness, Amanda Phelps.

Of course I cannot say regarding all the different neighborhoods in the towns I have mentioned, but in this one there certainly was an excellent set of citizens. To remember the goodness and helpful kindness shown by one to another is to restore one's faith in human nature. If, when we read of the crimes that even a glance at the papers brings to view, one feels discouraged, but we must remember there are millions whose name are not published, of those who lead respectable, orderly lives. Those who know say the criminals are a very small minority of the population. One loose screw can disturb the running of a machine, while every other part may be working quietly.

Winter of 1842-'43

We are promised the severest winter on record, but let us hope it will not overshadow the one in 1842-'43 when it set in November 13 and lasted 'till the middle of May. Almost from the first there was a crust that could bear a team and loaded sleigh.

A lady told me of going from the home across from the North Wayne church, to the old Comly Place where Floyd Osborn now lives, without regard to the roads, but in a bee line over the fences, on the 15th day of May. There were several persons in the sleigh, but the next day the thaw began, and the immense body of snow rapidly and harmlessly disappeared.

The house on the Comly place and Mr. Baxter's were the only two log houses with which I was familiar, but I can never forget how wonderfully attractive and pleasant they were. During that winter people had to cut browse for their cattle. Many starved, and the ones that lived came through in sorry plight.

Mr. Milton J. Gard of Volinia, told here about 40 years ago of his recollections of that winter. On Nov. 12, his father loaded up a grist of wheat to take to Niles to mill for their winter flour. It was a four days trip with oxen, two days each way. In the morning the snow was so deep and still falling he dared not venture, and the grist was never ground 'till the snow went off in May.

They had 50 pounds of flour on hand, but his mother soon decided that must be saved for possible illness in the family though she now and then made biscuits for a summer treat.

They had a big iron kettle, and part of that 6 month's winter work was to pound corn with an ax or a mallet in that kettle to make meal for their bread. So with their cow, two hogs to kill, and potatoes they lived.

Sometimes I think we can never properly appreciate, we certainly cannot realize the privations of those real pioneers. It was not all hardships, of course. They had their good times too, and made the most of them, and thank heaven for that.

I do not know very much about Decatur. There was Mr. Carlton Wheeler. I guess the railroad never had a better station agent, his efficient helper, Rolla Osborn, and next Emily Barney, his wife.

One whom my husband respected and admired almost to veneration was Mrs. Phelps, past mistress, for her kindness to him when he was an almost unnoticed bashful boy.

Two of my husband's most esteemed friends were Mr. Yeckley, at one time representative at Lansing, and Joseph Bullard, brother of Stephen Bullard, living near the Grange hall. Joseph Bullard removed to Niles, where he died.

These not being intended for personal sketches, I have tried, though not with entire success, to leave myself out. There are many unmentioned who really belong in them, but they are imperfect at the best, and the length has far exceeded my design as well as probably the anticipations of the editor.

Eleventh and Last Installment

(This biography was written by Joyce Dodge from an interview with Mrs. Amy Millard Payne, granddaughter of the Calvin Millard referred to. The other biographies of Hamilton township pioneers were written by Mrs. Erastus Osborn and published in the Republican about thirty years ago.)

STORY OF THE MILLARD ANCESTORS

In the year of Grace, 1837, during the month of April, Calvin Millard and his brother-in-law, Ralph Mason, turned their backs on Lynn, Connecticutt, and headed for unknown territory.

The name of the steamship that they boarded was "Constitution," and their first stop was Albany, New York. They were later detained in Buffalo for two weeks because of ice in the lake. The next ports were Cleveland and Toledo. At Toledo they purchased a team, harness, and wagon. Starting the long trail with horse and wagon toward the St. Joe river, they landed in the southern portion of Michigan. Here, on the St. Joe, Calvin met land sharks who tried to outwit him. He took up the land in North Hamilton which is now the former William King farm. It was a beautiful spot, and there, cupped in among hills was a tiny lake. Here Calvin settled. He wrote back joyously to his wife, Lucy, telling her of the place he had found and promising to build her a home some day overlooking the lake which the hand of the Creator had placed among the hills.

The next spring he returned to Lynn and brought his wife and five children to the wild and beautiful territory of Michigan. It was on this return journey that they experienced the thrill of seeing their first Indian and his canoe. The craft was tied to a tree on the edge of the present Lake Cora.

The hardships of the following winter were very bitter. The cabin had no door until winter had almost withdrawn his icy fingers. A blanket was used as a very poor substitute. Candles and sunshine were the only light available. The former had to be made with painstaking care. A ladder led to the loft and it was here Lucy would take her children when the wolves howled without the cabin.

Little Lucy Millard was the baby of the family, being then only two years of age. One of her earliest experiences in backwoods life was a very unpleasant one. Railroad trains, at that time, did not carry household supplies of every description within easy reach of the homes, nor would a few words spoken over the telephone bring a delivery truck to the door with needed articles. Even that staple article, flour, was to be obtained only after a forty mile trip with ox teams through forest and swamp lands to the nearest gristmill, which was Flowerfield. The roads were mere trails and the traveling was rugged.

On this particular occasion the flour supply of the entire neighborhood was exhausted and the winter, having been long and severe, the roads, such as they were, were not passable. There did remain, however, a supply of corn meal, but the delicate appetite of little Lucy rebelled against that, so the family had to suffer the pain of hearing her cry for bread and waste away for the lack of it. LOOKING BACKWARD 40 YEARS

Another Exhibit of Old "Exhibition Days"
Of the Decatur Graded School

Across the chasm of the years—and forty of them make a wide one between the sunlit peaks of youth and the alkali plains of later life—I, too, become reminiscent and answer "Present" to the clarion roll call of our Richard the Lyon-hearted! Dear classmates of the years gone by—how vividly the magic wand of memory brings you all before me as I knew you in the dear old Alma Mater days of the Decatur Graded School before we were silver grays. And "way down in my heart I've a feelin' for you"—a feeling that has been there, lo, these many years. Perhaps an old bachelor—I plead guilty—is not supposed to have a heart; but I have at least a valular muscle that does duty for one and has many warm corners in it for you all. God bless you Dick! for thus burnishing up the links of that invisible chain of kindly feeling and interest that has ever bound us, one to the other, as the strenuous years went by—a chain that has never weakened or broken, only tarnished by the corroding cares of life. True, there are missing links, but they hold their places and carry the chain over the river to "loved ones who wait on the other side." But let us not make this a time for memory and for tears, but for joy bells.

Do you know as thoughts of that memorable exhibition come to me I seem to see and hear every incident, every detail, and it seems but yesterday. How hard we worked—our motto, no such word as fail. What councils of war and wisdom over ways and means and details; each one a committee of the whole as it were, to make their own part perfect in the finished production. I, too, have the old program carefully preserved all these years—and the cherished Bluebeard group picture. What a time we had getting to Mrs. Tucker's skylight parlor in the garish light of day in all our shining raiment to have it taken! And for each copy made a separate sitting or standing, for those were not the days of rapid-fire photography, and we were typed in—or on—tin. The costuming of Bluebeard alone was accomplished by individual and united effort, much ransacking of treasure chests of old, and the effect was striking and all that could be desired. I would give more to roll back the tide of years and see ourselves as others saw us that night than to see the most magnificent and finished spectacle of the modern stage. Then, the tableau of the Soldier's Dream, "Tenting Tonight on the Old Camp Ground." How we boys who were in it worked for it; how we carried real evergreen trees for the camp; whittled pine shavings for the real fire to give realistic light effects where the boys in blue were carefully grouped. It deeply touched many in our audience, we were told, for the terrible tragedies of the Civil War were close to the hearts and homes of many. And over and through and pervading each and every number the presiding genius of it all, our universally beloved Prof. Bellows, our ideal of all that was noblest and best in a man and instructor, and for whom we would have made any effort to please and assist. Nell thinks he would naturally forget us in the multitudes that came after us in his long and successful career; but I believe that in his inmost heart he remembers us all, individually and collectively.

Closely associated with him in my memory, although no one has spoken of her yet, is Miss Annie Abram, his assistant, that pleasant faced little woman whose quiet, earnest ways and friendly chidings of our frequent waywardness earned our respect and regard, though we were prone to shock her by gay and worldly ways and amusements when she would feign have had us attend prayer meeting six nights in the week and three or four on Sunday!

And do you recall that memorable last rehearsal and the Fall of Richmond? We were all there at the school house—Dick, Buena, Rusha, Nell, Wesley and myself, all the members of the noted school choir—putting the finishing touches before we were in the lime light of publicity. Suddenly every church bell in town began to ring joyously, Hinckley's Stave Factory whistle began to toot frantically and other whistles joined in the discordant chorus, wild hurrahs came to our ears, and the weird flare of numerous bonfires made lurid light on tower and steeple. We rushed to the windows thinking a fire had broken out. Some one passing yelled at us, "Richmond has fallen, the war is ended! Come on!" And we did, all going up in Trowbridge's Hall and singing patriotic songs out of the windows while a wild mob of excited people filled the street in front, yelled themselves hoarse and cheered us to the echo. Many a time and oft the scenes and events of that wonderful night have repainted themselves on the canvas of memory, and "the night has been filled with music," the echo of those ever remembered voices, for I have seemed to hear you singing with me as then. But closely following that time of excitement and joy came the death of the martyred Lincoln, and the gloom of mourning—for those were historic days and times

"Dick" says I was the poet of the school. Shade of Shakespeare! If so I must have been a youth to fortune and to fame unknown, and have expiated any such impractical tendencies of forty years ago by a very prosaic and unpoetical life up to date! Little did I think then I should ever pose before the public in the role of a rhymster: and now Dick has suddenly thrust me out of the dim light of other days into the blaze of the present where Vs and not verses make the mare go. So I shall make my bow and exit hastily before any more bouquets hit me.

I should like to speak of old Hamilton days, friends and associations, too, for several of us were Hamiltonians and events there were stepping stones that placed our names on the initial roster of the Decatur Graded High School, but time and space forbid. All honor to Dick and Nell; always leaders in our happy school days they still lead the van in keeping alive the fires of feeling on the Altar of Friendship forty years young. Let us hope that some day ere the silver cord shall break, we may meet face to face, wreathe with flowers of memory the vacant chairs, and bridge the great gulf between There and Now.

Some Historical Data About Indians of This County

Dana P. Smith

The early history of the Indian tribes is well described in various historical works that are easily available so nothing will be said about it here except as it pertains to the Indians of this vicinity. All this part of Michigan east of the St. Joseph River was ceded by the Indians to the United States by the treaty of Chicago in 1821. By the treaties of 1828 and 1833 the lands west of the St. Joseph river were conveyed to the government, with the stipulation that the Indians were all to be removed west of the Mississippi River after 1838.

The government carried on the work of removal during the years of 1839 and 1840, using soldiers to round up the Indians, who resisted as much as they could, without fighting, the leaving of their old homes and hunting grounds, and graves of their kindred. The story of their removal is a most distressing one and a blot on our boasted civilization.

Chief Pe-pe-yah

Prominently among the Indians of Paw Paw township who escaped the removal edict was Chief Pepeyah and his band who were located about two miles southwest of Paw Paw on land owned by Chief Pepeyah. On account of his being a land owner, the old Chief would have been exempt from removal, but finally becoming fearful that he would be taken beyond the Mississippi, he fled with his squaw and child to Canada, where he died. Soon after his wife No-ninne-qua-pe-pe-yah and her son Na-na-quabe-pe-pe-yah returned to their old home on the Pe-pe-yah farm where they resided until they sold the farm to John R. Baker.

Na-ne-quaba-pe-pe-yah grew up and married a Christianized squaw Nancy by name, but consumption, the prevailing disease of the red man, claimed him while still a young man, his death occurring in 1854. Soon after his death a son was born to his wife Nancy and named Stephen Pe-pe-yah, well known about Paw Paw and who died in 1925.

The first Pe-pe-yah was a man of character and possessed with more than the average amount of intelligence, setting an example of thrift and morality which it would have been better if his people had followed but which but few of them ever did. His wife died at a ripe old age, an object of charity among relatives on the old Notawasepe reservation in Calhoun county.

Two sons of Stephen and Emma Pe-pe-yah, Paul and Silas, served their country in the world war, Silas being now deceased. Stephen Pe-pe-yah was typically Indian while his wife Emma was an educated woman of character, inclined to religion, speaking and writing English fluently, as well as the Pottawatomie, Chippewa and Ottawa languages. She was also a good musician.

Indians in Liquor

Beside the Pe-pe-yah band, there were other small scattered bands and individuals who escaped the government's removal plan, and who made their home in the woods in the vicinity of Paw Paw which was their trading point and when the Indians came to town to sell their berries or furs, or the government commissioner made his annual visit to pay the Indians their little stipend, the merchants did a thriving business while the Indians were in town as they were free spenders and their money soon found its way to the till of the merchants and whiskey sellers. Most Indians have an uncontrollable appetite for "sco-ta-wa-boo" (fire water) and there were always traders ready to sell them what they wanted as the selling of liquor was not looked upon as it is now. An Indian would never molest anyone who furnished him liquor, and while the traders were safe, other people were subjected to all sorts of annoyances, to say nothing of the constant fear of being butchered by them as a pastime. There is an impression that all Indians in liquor are dangerous which is to some extent erroneous as their dispositions vary the same as other people, but lacking the restraint of moral culture and law, those who were inclined to be ugly when drunk were to be feared the same as a wild beast. Although very reticent when sober, all are very talkative, and some absolutely silly when drunk. Such is their propensity to talk when drunk, that a continual jabbering is kept up, whether alone or with others, showing that whiskey completely changes their disposition. Once started on a drunk an Indian would as soon pay a dollar for a drink as five cents, and would persist in his enjoyment as long as he had any thing to pay or trade for whiskey. All Indians, however, did not drink or at least but seldom, and some used their money wisely to provide for their families. The quarrelsome ones were usually disarmed, and if too troublesome, were bound hand and foot by their Indian friends and laid away somewhere to sober up. The old settlers have told how the bucks became too drunk to sit up and drink any more and the squaws would fill their own mouths with whiskey and squirt it into the mouths of the helpless red men, probably on the theory that a dead drunk Indian was safer than one not so drunk.

I. W. Willard

Those were the colorful days in Paw Paw. Everything was new and there is a charm and romance about a new country just emerging from a wilderness to civilization that is very fascinating and our pioneers passed through an experience that will never be repeated in this country. By 1840, I. W. Willard had bought out the interests of his former partners in the mercantile business and at his store centered the bulk of the Indian trade as he had clerks who understood the Indian language. He kept goods especially for the Indian trade and took in their furs, maple sugar, berries, jerked venison and what not. To one of his clerks Enwin S. Smith I am indebted for interesting sketches of local Indian characters.

Indian Characters

Old Kac-kac was a brother of Mrs. Pe-pe-yah and with his family shared her abode until consumption did its worst and he joined his kinsmen in the Pe-pe-yah cemetery. He was known as a very honest Indian and his credit was good any where. He was very friendly with Calvin Hawley, Paw Paw's pioneer foundryman and would enter his house without the formality of knocking and ask for the loan of a dollar, which was always given him without question. On meeting Mr. Hawley on the street he would say "me pay you" and when he got some money he was promptly on hand to pay up.

Wap-seh who was a member of the Sin-e-go-wa band at Rush Lake northwest of Hartford was a frequent visitor in Paw Paw, being a friend of Kac-kac. He was born in the Pokagon village on Pokagon prairie, east of Summerville, Cass county, in July, 1783, and in 1894 was still alive at the age of 110 years. He was known as the greatest bear hunter in this section. Wap-seh and Kac-kac used to get "squib-by" together and were the jolliest of fellows when in liquor. No amount of tantalizing would ruffle them and nothing but the sobering up process would erase the broad grin on their faces. Their uniformly good nature made them not unwelcome in the stores of the new settlement.

White Wolf

"White Wolf," which was the English name given to an old Indian of the original stock, had his village on a tract of ground which centered about where the Lee school house stands. He was the father of Mrs. Pe-pe-yah. He and his squaw never varied from the habits and customs of their ancestors. With a few others he strictly adhered to the tribal style of dress, namely, the blanket, leggings, and moccasins. He also preferred a wigwam to anything more modern. The Indians were there when James, William and Uriel Lee moved to Michigan and settled in what is now called the Lee district. The Indians had cleared between ten and fifteen acres after their fashion, which was to girdle the trees and plant their crops among the dead timber. White Wolf was a very honest Indian and his promise was considered perfectly good anywhere. During his life he retained a strong hold on the affections of both Indians and whites. In his young days he had been intemperate and very ugly and dangerous when drunk. At one time when under the influence of liquor he quarreled with Elder Joseph Woodman, who defended himself with a heavy horse whip, giving White Wolf a sound threshing, after which he was never known to drink. Nothing would tempt him to drink liquor, fearing if he did, that revenge would get the mastery and the killing of Woodman would be the result. When near his death he sent his aged squaw to Paw Paw to pay a debt of 75c at Willard's store for a field hoe bought some six months before. As soon as the government annuity was received in the fall, there was no rest for him until every debt was canceled. At a ripe old age he passed to the happy hunting ground, and was laid to rest with his kindred and friends in the Pe-pe-yah burying ground. On the western hillside toward the setting sun, "the world forgetting and by the world forgot," he sleeps in the land of his fathers.

More Paw Paw Indians

In a log hut at Agards trading post north of town on the river, dwelt an eccentric old Frenchman by the name of Jos De-ro-sha called by the Indians Ke-no-sha. His wife was a Pottowatomie squaw. He spoke both the Indian language and English fluently, making his services indispensable as interpreter on annual pay days. His squaw and half-breed boy drawing their little stipend with the others, were recognized as members of the band. Here at the French trading post he lived faithful to his squaw wife until he died. Personally he leaned to the ways of the whites, yet tolerating his wife's adherence to all the ways of her people. He mingled but little with the Indians outside of his family except on occasion. He was often seen around Willard's store as his language accomplishments made him very useful in dealing with the Indians.

Another old Canada Frenchman called by the Indians Moo-saw, but whose real name was Joseph Lash-ua, having for a wife a deaf mute squaw, with whom with their half-breed pappooses he was always present when anything was going on, was also looked upon by the Indians as one of them; but being more filthy and degraded, in most respects, than his associates he commanded little respect from them and less from the whites.

I have it from the late Thos. Dodge that when the wind was right it was possible to smell old Moo-saw clear across the street. Owing to the fact that he was a purveyor, first hand, in muskrat and skunk pelts, and a faithful member of the ancient order of the unwashed, he carried with him a penetrating and far reaching scent. So terrible was his appearance that he was the "bogey man" for all the small children in town. The sight of old Moo-saw coming in the distance would strike terror to the heart of the stoutest kid. His vocabulary was half Indian and half Canada French, with a sprinkling of English, which was very difficult to understand. His habits were Indian, of the lowest order, on account of which, what he brought to market did not meet a ready sale. His berries were not picked nicely, his maple sugar was dirty and spleened against, and he was shunned largely on that account.

Moo-saw's squaw was the half-breed daughter of a white man by the name of Johnson and a Pottawattomie woman. Being a deaf mute Mee-saw used to say of her, "not much talk, but mighty good squaw." Though she could not talk she was the most persistent beggar among the Indians. She had several pappooses and if she caught sight of a child's dress, there would almost be a fight to prevent her taking it. This socially undesirable couple lived in a cabin on the edge of the high bank, west of and a little south of the former Will Payne residence. Unlovely though he was, the name of Moo-saw will probably live in the history of Paw Paw longer than the many who lived a more civilized life.

On the Gremps farm on the west side of the river lived a Canada Frenchman with his half-breed daughter. The daughter was noted for her great beauty, owing no doubt to her French ancestry, and she was famous locally as Paw Paw's most beautiful squaw. Her name was Ag-nes-shaw-wan-eese, a name probably partly French and partly Indian.

Paw Paw's First Doctor

An old timer of 1842 some years ago related the following incident in regard to the late Dr. Josiah Andrews. The doctor came to Paw Paw in 1838, as yet a single man and began the practice of his profession. He soon became acquainted with the Indians as did almost all the new settlers. As housing accommodations were limited he slept in a room off from his office which was a small one story building. One winter night he was aroused by a tap, tap, tap on the window pane of his room. Getting up to investigate he found an Indian outside who made known by signs and "pidgeon english" that he wanted the doctor to visit, in a professional way, one of their band who was very sick. The doctor dressed and taking his medicine case started to follow his guide. They crossed the river at the foot of main street and took the trail through the snow-covered woods to the Pe-pe-yah village. There in a wigwam he found a young Indian rolling on the floor in great distress. The red man always had a healthy appetite and when enough food could be obtained he would fill himself to the utmost capacity. The doctor soon determined that here was a case of acute indigestion. There are no doubt some persons today who have reason to remember the fearful potency of Dr. Andrews' dependable blue pills usually administered with trimmings. The dose he gave that Indian was enough to move Prospect Hill to the north side of town. Mr. Indian was soon emptied of everything inside of his skin and on the way to recovery. The doctor left the Indians delighted with the magic of the white man's medicine and returned to town. Not long after he was visited by a party of Indians leading a young squaw. They made known to him that they thought highly of him as a medicine man, and that they desired to adopt him as a member of their band, and that as an evidence of their friendship and brotherhood they had brought him a beautiful young Indian bride. The embarrassed doctor tactfully made known to them that marriages between whites and Indians were "wean-net" (bad) and therefore impossible. They went away friendly but a little disappointed.

The Indian Cemetery

It was an unfortunate thing that the Pe-pe-yah Indian cemetery was destroyed. It was located on the southwest ¼ of the southwest ¼ of the southeast ¼ of section 22, Paw Paw township. It occupied a knoll covered with hard wood trees, with a thick tamarack swamp on the west. There in the open spaces between the trees the dead of the tribe had been buried for many years before the white settlers came. The Indians, in the lay out, or rather lack of lay out, in their cemeteries made the graves without any special system, except it was customary among the earlier Indians to arrange the graves with the foot pointing exactly toward the rising sun, in accordance with the tradition that when the Great Spirit should come to visit his Indian children he would come from the sun rising and thus it would be easier to see him coming. It was possible to determine nearly the time of year that the burial was made by observing the pointing of the grave. If it was well toward the northeast, the burial was made in mid-summer. If east it was in the spring or fall. If southeast, it was in the winter. In the Pe-pe-yah burying ground under the majestic green trees, symbolic of renewed life and joys in the spirit hunting ground, and covered with autumn's recurrent, splendidly colored robe of dead leaves, reminder that death is the destiny of every living thing, they expected to be left to rest undisturbed. With the coming of the white settlers with a soul only for the utilitarian and a contempt for things Indian the sheltering trees in the cemetery were destroyed, and finally in 1876 as the crowning act of gross utilitarianism the cemetery was plowed up. Let not history record the names of those responsible.

In the Pe-pe-yah cemetery was buried an Indian by the name of Shavehead who died on the south bank of Four Mile lake and whom David Woodman recollected seeing carried past his cabin in a hollow log to his burial. Later some men, led by a prominent doctor from Paw Paw made a night visit to the grave of Shavehead, cut off his head with a lath hatchet, boiled off the flesh in the back yard of the doctor's home in Paw Paw and put the skull on exhibition as a curiosity.

Indian Habits

Judged by the standards of the white man the Indian was not considered very clean in his domestic arrangements. Of course some were worse than others. In his clothing he was not given to much change of apparel, the same clothing usually doing duty for all occasions. In the home life, whether in wigwam or cabin there was not much privacy, all living together in happy go lucky sort of fashion. Yet the family life was usually a happy one, the parents being very kind and affectionate to their children, it being almost unheard of their whipping their children.

The Indian had an armor plated stomach which would stand for most anything in the way of food, and while he preferred venison, wild turkey, and fresh fish, in an emergency, not having a very delicate taste, "everything was grist that came to his mill" in the way of food. My stomach still revolts at the remembrance of a party of Indians feasting on the entrails of a hog fried in corn meal, unwashed and rare done.

The squaws utilized their blanket in various ways. It was used as a covering for the head and shoulders in bad weather, or to wrap the papoose in, and also as a bed sheet to sleep in. In the sugar making season they would, in the absence of something better, slip off their blanket and strain their maple sugar through it. The squaws would in the interest of economy and efficiency utilize the boiling sap to cook the family dinner of muskrat, which accounts for the hair and other things sometimes found in the sugar. All things are more or less relative and so methods of living that were perfectly satisfactory to the Indians were looked upon with disgust by the white people.

Chief Shavehead Showed Hate For Early Settlers of County

Camping Ground of Famous Indian Still Marked by Discovery of Many Arrow and Spear Heads.

When the Pokagon band of Pottawatomies sold their lands around Chicago and came to Michigan they divided up into three bands. Pokagon, a son of the old chief, settled at Pokagon prairie, Weesaw located in Volinia township, on the present Mrs. Henry Crego farm, and Shavehead located in Porter township.

Pokagon and Weesaw were always friendly to the white settlers, but Shavehead bore a grudge toward them which lasted until his death. He chose the southwest shore of Baldwin's lake for his camping place, clearing of its brush and trees two acres of land overlooking the lake which to this day is an open glade in the woods, the forest still standing on three sides of it with the lake in front.

Trails came to this camp from every direction. This land now belongs to Stiles Carter, supervisor of Porter. When his father, Braddock Carter, came there in the thirties and took up land from the government, and built his log cabin, one corner of the cabin stood over a trail that was nearly a foot deep in the ground, so long had it been used. The Carter farm included the ground where the Indian camp had stood, and every year flint arrow heads are found there, with sometimes one large enough to show that it had been used as a spear by the race who lost it. Porter township was a network of Indian trails when the white man came here, its many lakes and vast wooded tracts making it both a good fishing and hunting ground.

Shavehead guarded his home jealously, and many were the encounters he had with the settlers who encroached upon his domain, especially if the intruder was alone and without arms. He always kept his head shaved except for one lock of hair, hence his name. Some say Shavehead was shot by Job Wright, a hunter and trapper of that time who located upon Diamond lake Island before the settlers came. Tradition has it that Wright buried several thousand dollars in specie near his cabin, which stood on the east side of the island, not far from the present hotel. Tradition also has it that Wright killed Shavehead, while others say the Indian died in a sugar camp one spring near Paw Paw, where he had gone after the settlers had occupied his hunting grounds in Porter township.

Evidences have been found that the Pottawatomies did not enjoy peaceful possession of their lands here, even before the white man came. There were at one time in Porter township and also in Penn township upen glades in the woods of some 40 rods in length by three or four wide, where the trees never grew, and where the early settlers were told by the older Indians that captives had in times of war been made to run the gauntlet. No shrubbery or young trees took root on the land thus cleared, and these reminders of one of the most barbaric customs of the Indian may have been a hundred years old when the first white settler came here.

For years after Porter township began to be settled there was plainly visible a deeply furrowed trail from Penn township down to Shavehead's settlement, and the presence of arrow and spear heads around his camp indicate that he had not only had a large following but that this had been his abiding place for many years, and was probably the camp of some equally warlike predecessor.

(Harry Garrett of Decatur, Ill., writes: Upon going through some of my old papers I found the enclosed article on Shavehead, the Indian whom we used to discuss. The clipping is taken from the Dowagiac News in the early years of the present century. Knowing your interest in early local history I thought you would appreciate it.)

TECUMSEH

Tecumseh was probably the greatest American Indian that race has ever produced. He was the most eloquent orator ever known among the savage tribes. When he spoke, his voice was deep and full, like an organ, his face shone with emotion, and his words were remarkable for their poetic beauty.

His father was a Shawnee warrior, and was killed in battle with white settlers, when Tecumseh was a mere child. This impressed him with a great resolve to keep the white men out of the Indian lands, and to fight them whenever he could.

He possessed a sensitive dignity, as is shown by the following incident. Upon one occasion, when he came with his warriors to hold a conference with General Harrison, he looked around, after he had finished his address, to find a seat. Seeing that none had been reserved for him, he appeared offended.

A white man, seated near General Harrison, arose and offered him his seat, saying, "Your father wishes you to sit by his side."

"The sun is my father, and the earth is my mother. I shall sit in his light and rest on her bosom," said Tecumseh. Whereupon, he sat down on the ground, in the full light of the sun.

Tecumseh was a noble soldier, and never allowed any prisoners to be tortured. He promised General Harrison that, in case of war between the Indians and the whites, he would not permit his warriors to massacre women and children. He faithfully kept his word. At the siege of Fort Meigs, the Indians began murdering their prisoners. Tecumseh ran in, and, brandishing his tomahawk, bade them stop at once. Turning to General Proctor, who stood looking on, he cried out,

"Why do you permit this outrage? Why did you not stop those men, and save those wretched prisoners?"

Proctor replied that the Indians could not be restrained, and that he could not prevent the massacre.

Tecumseh was furious at this, and said, "Begone, you coward. You are not fit to command men. Go and put on a petticoat, and sit with the women, where you belong."

Proctor was not a brave soldier, and, at one time, burned his stores and abandoned his fort, even though he had a thousand men and three thousand Indian allies. Tecumseh was so disgusted with his cowardice, that he compared him to a fat dog, who barked and held his tail high, when there was no danger, but who howled, and dropped his tail between his legs and ran, whenever any one attacked him.

When Tecumseh went to Alabama to stir up the Creek Indians against the whites of that section, he found them unwilling to rise against their neighbors and friends. All his eloquence failed to move them, and, to all his appeals and threats, they merely shook their heads. Finally, in a burst of anger, he cried out,

"Your blood is white, and no longer runs red like the rising sun. You do not fight because you are cowards and are afraid to fight. You do not believe the Great Spirit has sent me, but you shall believe it. I am going back to Detroit. It will take me many days, but when I reach there, I shall tell the Great Spirit, and I shall stamp my foot on the ground, and shake every house in your village."

So saying, he left, and journeyed northward. The Indians counted the days until he should reach home. Strangely enough, about the time he was due there, an earthquake shook the village, The Indians rushed wildly for their dwellings, crying out,

"Tecumseh has arrived in Detroit; he has told the Great Spirit; we feel the stamping of his foot!"

The last battle in which this warrior was engaged was that of the Thames. The Americans had been pursuing the British and their Indian allies for some time, until Tecumseh was tired of the disgraceful state of affairs, and told the British officer, Procter, that he would retreat no longer. "We will stand here and give battle," said he. "I and my warriors were not made for running away from our enemies."

The result was the battle of the Thames. At the opening of the conflict, Tecumseh turned to his friends, and said,

"Brother warriors, I shall never come out of this battle alive. I go there to die, but I go. My body will remain on the field, I know it will be so."

He unbuckled his sword, and handed it to one of his Chiefs, and said, "When my son becomes a great warrior, give him this sword,

Looking Backward

THIRTY YEARS AGO

From the Decatur Republican of April 14, 1921.

Thirty to sixty years ago Fischer's orchestra of Kalamazoo was the greatest musical organization of its kind in this part of Michigan,—we might say in the whole state. It was an official orchestra of the Pan American exposition at Buffalo in 1901 and of the 100th anniversary celebration of the Lewis and Clark expedition in St. Louis in 1904. We remember our first entrance into the dining room of the Inside Inn at the St. Louis exposition. There was the orchestra playing for the entertainment of a thousand or more guests, with Charlie Fischer leading and playing first violin and carrying his inimitable smile "that would not come off." Our eyes met at the same instant, and it was like being in Europe and meeting a friend from home. We had several pleasant meetings during our wonderful week at the fair, and Fischer added to his already great reputation as an orchestra leader.

In the years before the automobile, when travel was slower and more limited than it is today, it was more of an event for small town fellow residents to meet each other in distant places. One time back in 1894 when standing on a crowded street of Los Angeles watching the parade of the city's annual celebration, we met Cora Carney who had come to the celebration from the city of Pomona where she was visiting relatives. Both of us were surprised and delighted and it almost seemed that we were taking Decatur right out west with us.

We are reminded of a remark made by the late Mrs. Metzger on a similar occasion, also many years ago,—"I would be glad to meet a dog from Decatur."

The above remarks were inspired by an ad of the Decatur Dancing Club of a Fisher's party at the town hall April 19, 1921.

Items of April 14, 1921.

"Lockwood's Store At Your Door" was the sign on five large auto vans which passed through the village on the Dixie highway Tuesday morning. The vans were larger than any moving van and were equipped to carry a complete general stock of goods through the country. The plan is being worked extensively through Ohio and Indiana. (We imagine that city and village ordinances will soon put a stop to this business.)

E. R. WASHBURN

Edward Rush Washburn was born March 7, 1872, in Greenwich township, Huron county, Ohio, and died April 18, 1951, at Lakeview hospital, Paw Paw.

He was the second son of William Rush Washburn and Alice Newton Washburn. He came to Barry county when he was only eight years old, traveling by covered wagon. He attended rural school at Rogers Corners, Carlton township, high school at Hastings, then Ferris Institute, Ypsilanti State Normal College, Valparaiso University, and the University of Michigan where he obtained his degree in science.

He was married December 29, 1898, to a neighbor farm girl, Myrtle Rogers, who preceded him in death November 9, 1948.

E. R. Washburn started teaching in a country school in 1892 when he was only twenty years old. He taught in rural schools until the year he was married, when he was principal of the Mio village school, Kossommon county. Later he was at Lowell, Grosse Isle, five years at Dexter, and thirty-two years in Decatur, eleven of which he served as superintendent. Two school houses were built while he held that office. He taught science and mathematics from 1926 to 1938 when he retired after forty-four years of teaching.

He had made his home with his son Kermit and family since January of 1950.

He is survived by his four children, Dr. E. Roger Washburn of Lincoln, Nebraska; Mrs. Bernice Marie Dahlstrom of Ann Arbor; Kermit V. Washburn of Paw Paw and Edythe Myrtle Haefner, also of Paw Paw. Also, his three brothers and one sister, Wiley Irving Washburn of Potterville, Mich.; Fred Elmer Washburn of Newfane, Vermont; Col. Homer C. Washburn of Santa Barbara, Cal.; Mrs. Florence E. Hecht of Omaha, Nebraska.

Funeral services were held at the Nevel and Sons funeral home Sunday afternoon at 1:30. There was a large gathering of his relatives and friends and many beautiful floral offerings.

Rev. Henry Houseman preached the funeral sermon and this was followed by the Masonic service conducted by Rolland Haefner. Among the large number present were his former school associates, P. W. Harper and Mrs. Harper of Delton, Mr. and Mrs. Chapin Allister of Holland, Al. Peets and family of Midland, Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Dutton of Niles, and others of the Decatur faculty.

Burial was in the family lot in Hastings.

Tribute to Mr. E.R. Washburn

Alumni Banquet — Decatur, Mich.
June 2, 1951

When a great man dies,
For years beyond our ken,
The light he leaves behind him lies
Upon the paths of men.

Such was the greatness of Mr. E.R. Washburn, that the light he leaves behind him will manifest itself in the lives of the countless hundreds who were privileged to come within the realm of his teachings.

Some years ago, an alumnus of D.H.S. said, "Mr. Washburn could get more chemistry out of a hairpin and a piece of string than many college professors could with an up-to-the-minute and well-equipped laboratory." Nothing I might say could illustrate more clearly his keen intellect, his ingenuity and his remarkable ability to impart to others his wealth of learning. How little we appreciated that master mind — like the pearls in our own back yard — so often overlooked.

His classes were intensely interesting and never boring because he possessed such a fund of related knowledge. It seemed there was just nothing he did not know. He was a loyal student of nature and often spoke of the great rees to be found in Newtons Woods. He also knew a great deal of local Indian lore which he wove into the subject matter he taught. And intermingled with his teaching was a saving sense of humor — the subtle, intellectual type — he liked to make his pupils the butt of a good-natured joke.

Mr. Washburn's accomplishments were not confined to the class room. He was also a scientific farmer who took just pride in producing, and nurturing and harvesting the things of the soil. And just as all educated men should contribute to the civic welfare of their community, he accepted the responsibilities of public office and ably served our village as president for several terms.

Mr. Washburn did not please everybody — and why should he? — many years ago I heard a definition of failure. The definition is this: "He who tries to please everybody is doomed to failure." No — Mr. Washburn was not a failure. He carried the courage of his convictions and followed through in a most convincing and positive manner. Viewed in the light of present-day standards, his system of teaching would be labeled "old-fashioned." He consistently opposed the wave of "so-called" progressive education which swept the country some fifteen or twenty years ago, oddly enough believing that little Johnny and little Mary should not be allowed to follow the unbridled bent of their own inclinations but rather that they should be taught the fundamentals of education, particularly the 3 R's and to be able to apply them.

We in the business world would plead for more E.R. Washburns with their old-fashioned concept of education — and you may ask why — simply this: These young people, through no fault of their own but because of pussyfoot discipline and too many extra curricular activities — have never learned to concentrate — have never learned the value of perseverance — have never learned respect for superiors — and as for responsibility — THEY WANT NO PART OF IT!

And why shouldn't we have discipline in our schools! Mr. Washburn was a rigid disciplinarian who tolerated no foolishness nor disrespect. His was a sense of values, of balanced and constructive thinking and he had no time for sloppy soldiering. High school law breakers and "show-offs" were quickly brought to justice. The boys respected him and later in life admitted that he was the best teacher they had ever had. This spirit of discipline and orderliness was carried over to the home he loved so well. His home and family could well serve as a shining example to all America — a symbol of permanence and stability that is so all important to the welfare of a community and of a nation.

I guess I could go on and on about this great scholar whose loss we feel so deeply, and who now belongs to the ages. I know I speak for the entire village and for the entire countryside when I say, "We are grateful for having been enriched by his talents." Mr. Washburn was a lover of poetry and often quoted bits of verse and so I shall close with the words of Sadie Louise Miller, "To live in hearts we leave behind is not to die."

Decatur Trapper Marks 70 Years Running Own Lines

Kalamazoo Gazette

Back in 1880 when children hiked to school through heavily wooded country, skirting large swamps or bumpety corduroy roads, there were opportunities aplenty for alert farm boys with a gun handy to make that walk a paying proposition during fall and winter months.

One of these enterprising huntsmen-scholars was 11-year-old Orlando Ball, Decatur, who conceived the idea to buy pelts from the other boys, adding them to his own bale of furs. He gave eight cents for muskrats, selling them to a New York firm at the rate of 13 cents each. This was his first venture in the business world and in order to make this beginning, his mother had forwarded $1.00.

When the letter came from this fur company, Orlando was bitterly disappointed for there was no money—that is, as he had always known it up to that time. However, his mother explained the value of the enclosed check, so the order marked the lad's entry as a fur buyer.

Now hale and hearty at 81, Orlando works his 40 acres with a team, milks four cows and is ready to carry on this winter as he has for the last 57 on this same farm —taking in pelts brought in mostly by country boys.

Furs dealt in are practically all muskrat, raccoon, mink and, until the last few years, fox. For "rats" Orlando has paid from three cents to as high as $6.50 each. Mink brought from 25 cents to $36, while "coon" never exceeded $12.50.

Looking back over the last "four score years and 10," this buyer recalls that his largest purchases occurred during a two and one-half hour period when the transactions covered $1,575. Another time he paid a farm boy $175 for the skins taken from his trap line over one week.

Unless a man is familiar with pelts, it is easy to be mistaken, Orlando said. Weasel and mink have the same color and shape with the exception that the former is white underneath. Then, too, a weasel weighs 4½ pounds while a mink but one-half pound.

'Rover,' A Real Find

Every hunter has a favorite dog story to relate. This sprightly octogenarian had a dog, Rover, he found "running the streets." Three coons and three skunks this hound was known to "bag" in one night with the former selling for $12.50 and skunks bringing $7.50.

Then a boy came one winter day and laid claim to an interest in Rover, which was settled for $13. Later, another boy called at the farm asking to have a price set on the dog. Not wanting to sell and thinking to name a figure so high as to make the boy leave, he said $50.

Too late, Orlando discovered it was a trick, the boy having been sent by men waiting up the road. One year later, he bought the dog back for $150. Altogether, Rover lived nine years on the Ball farm and made more money for his owner than "any cow I ever had."

Of equal interest is the story of the nine-year-old Decatur boy who walked the five miles to Ball's farm on a freezing cold day in December. He brought what he thought was a weasel, laid it on the front carpet and would have been satisfied to receive about 30 cents. Instead, Orlando slowly counted out 20 one-dollar bills in the astonished boy's hands. It was a mink.

The highway through the Ball farm, called the West Valley road, extends from Lawton to Glenwood and has brought many fur-laden farm boys to its hospitable door. Formerly an old Indian trail, the region still provides tell-tale signs of the days when the Red Man was wont to lay his snares in the swamps and roast his meat in stone-filled fire pits.

Now, though the Indians are gone and the school bus transporting rural students has prevented the profitable diversion of taking pot shots on the way to and from the "little red schoolhouse," farm boys are still engaged in their time-honored winter activity. They are setting out trap lines and paying regular visits to reedy marshes where dome-shaped mounds tell of muskrat colonies.

And Orlando Ball, all ready to buy their pelts, finds them much the same as in the days of his youth.

A Tribute to Harry J. Lurkins

Given at His Funeral by Waldo Phillips.

Harry J. Lurkins was born on the farm which he always made his home. He loved that farm and gave it tender care. He loved its soil, he loved its trees, its vines, its grass.

His father died while a young man, leaving two sons, Harry and George, just boys, and their mother.

Responsibility fell seriously and heavily on Harry's young shoulders, but he managed to attend the country school and was graduated from Decatur high school with honor. This completed his formal education but did not end his study. He was a keen student and skilled observer all his life and an outstanding example of continued adult education.

His was a pioneer spirit. In this respect we are not referring to his homesteading in Montana, but rather his participation in the revolution in the science of agriculture which had its beginning about the turn of the century.

No eulogy is needed. His life and work, his deeds are familiar to all of us. However, it is fitting that we pay tribute to his memory. What we say here is our humble attempt to put into words the thoughts that are in our minds today.

We knew Harry as our friend. "The comfort of having a friend has been taken away, but not that of having had one." "Friend is a word of royal tone, Friend is a poem all alone." Yes, he was our friend when most needed and appreciated, a fount of inspiration when we weakened, a well of wisdom when we needed counsel.

"Ah! How good it feels—the hand of a friend."

Harry Lurkins was one of the Lord's great husbandmen.

He practiced his religion, making little profession of it.

He maintained the highest standard of honor and integrity.

He had an extremely keen sense of duty.

He loved his work, gave his heart and mind completely to it.

Possessing such attributes he naturally gave his life to the service of his fellow men. To this fact thousands can testify.

He gave freely of his talents to the whole community, not to agriculture alone. If humanly possible, he responded to calls for every worthy cause. He served business men's clubs, women's clubs, church and civic groups, as well as individuals. In more than twenty years as agricultural extension agent in Berrien county he left an imprint on the agriculture and horticulture of Michigan that remains his monument. As is said of Jesus in one of the sweetest lines in scripture, 'He went about doing good."

We hold in high regard the companion who has so ably assisted him, and our hearts go out to her in sincere sympathy in this hour.

If we but listen, can we not hear a voice quoting Sam Walter Foss,

"Let me live in my house by the side of the road,
Where the race of men goes by.
They are good, they are bad, they are weak, they are strong,
Wise, foolish. So am I
[illegible] by the corner's seat,
Nor hurl the cynics ban.
Let me live in my house by the side of the road,
And be a friend to man."

May the precepts of his teaching, the principles he practiced remain with us.

With this thought and these lines from Kipling we would close.

"The Captains and the Kings depart.
Lord God of Hosts; be with us yet,
Lest we forget, lest we forget."

JAMES MAHONEY, ESTEEMED PIONEER

Came to Decatur in 1856. Passed Away at Home of His Daughter, Mrs. C. M. Rawson, January 26.

James Mahoney was born at Ennis, Clare county, Ireland, March 18, 1845, and died at Decatur, Michigan, January 26, 1931.

He came to America when six years of age with his parents and three brothers, John, Edward, and Michael, and sisters, Mary and Margaret. They first located in Syracuse, New York, and later the family came to Kalamazoo and settled there.

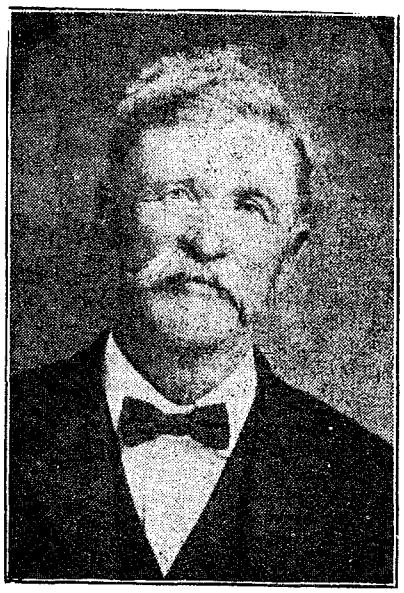
He first came to Decatur in 1856, but stayed only a short time, returning in 1861. On April 3, 1867, he was married to Mary Code at Silver Creek, Michigan. Decatur has since been his home with the exception of one and one-half years which were spent in Mattawan.

In April, 1916, he completed fifty-two years of continuous service with the Michigan Central Railroad Company. He was the first in Decatur to be pensioned by the company. His brother, Michael Mahoney, had completed fifty years in their employ ten years before.

In his fifty-two years of service Mr. Mahoney had not lost to exceed ten weeks time in vacations and illness and had never been off the pay roll. At different times he had been sent to Detroit, Jackson and Gary on special work, but for the most part had been on duty on the sections east and west of Decatur.

At one time the three brothers, Edward, Michael and James, had been foremen of the sections, west of Lawton and east and west of Decatur.

During all these years Mr. Mahoney never shirked his duty. [illegible] were never too cold or stormy for him to go out. He guarded the tracks and protected the lives of those who rode over his section, with never failing loyalty, and in his faithfulness he obtained true greatness. He retired with the thanks of his employers and with the congratulations and best wishes of many friends.



James Mahoney

Mr. Mahoney will be remembered by many for his warm affection for relatives and friends and the genial hospitality which characterized him. He was never so happy as when entertaining those whom he loved in his home, and the wayfarer and the poor and helpless found shelter and welcome there.

Decatur has lost an honest, reliable, upright citizen, and a large number of friends and relatives mourn for one whose heart was kind and true.

Those who attended the funeral from out of town were: Mr. and Mrs. Frank Mahoney, Will Howland and daughter, Mrs. Frances McDermott, George Howland and daughter, Mrs. B. Shean and sister Nellie of Jackson; Drs. Mahoney and Howland and Leo Howland of Chicago; Mr. and Mrs. John Rapp, Mrs. Carrie Kelly, Mrs. Jennie Clote, Mr. and Mrs. Joe Welch and Mr. Fred Rapp, Dowagiac; Misses Mary and Nellie Murphy, Mrs. Anna Kelly, Mrs. Floyd Chappell, Mr. and Mrs. Leo Kelly of Kalamazoo; Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Labadie, Mrs. John Dillon and son Dick, William Dillon and Edward O'Grady of Paw Paw; Miss Monica Howland, South Bend, Indiana.

CARD OF THANKS

To the friends who helped us in any way in our time of grief and trial, we extend our most sincere thanks.

Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Rawson,
Mr. and Mrs. Henry Howland,
Mr. and Mrs. T. F. Mahoney,
Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Mahoney,
Mr. and Mrs. Thos. Deering.

BIRTHDAY CONGRATULATIONS

Frank C. Stapleton, 86, May 13.

His friends are legion and they call him "Stape." He came to Decatur in the early eighties and never left it to establish a home elsewhere.

We remember him when he sold overalls and hats and all men's wearing apparel in the Schuster clothing store now Harley Smith's. We remember him when he barbered and when he was cashier in the bank, and then when he served so faithfully as a member of the county roads commission, when he married the bright young Lena Free of Paw Paw and when they celebrated their 50th, 55th and 60th wedding anniversaries. Mrs. Stapleton was far from well on the 60th anniversary and passed away three months later.

Most of all we remember "Stape" when he was catcher and Frank Thomas was pitcher of Decatur's famous baseball team. That was in the golden era of the eighties and the home team was credited with being the best amateur team in the state of Michigan. Those were great days and the old timers never tire of recalling them.

IDA SWAN

A Tribute by Roy Cramer.

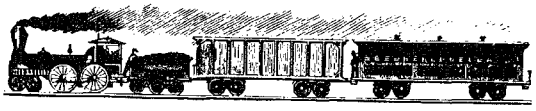
(Mrs. Swan passed away May 25 at the age of 90 years.)

She was a faithful pilgrim, living in a world of sin,
Her eyes were turned to Jesus and she longed to be with Him.
Always an inspiration to others far and near
To keep on looking upward till the Saviour shall appear.

Many a time I've heard her say, "We'll soon be going home."
Far above the starry sky never more to roam,
"Now just be faithful," she would say, for "just a little while
And we will be with Jesus and see his loving smile."

Now she is at her journey's end and will sleep beneath the sod.
I believe when the angel trumpet sounds she will hear the voice of God.
As he calls His saints to be with Him beyond the starry sky,
If faithful, we will meet her there and no tear will dim the eye.

Now to the children I would say, be not sad and do not sigh
And prepare for Mother's Saviour, who is coming bye and bye,
Then the circle will unbroken be in that home so bright and fair,
When all the saints will ever be with Jesus over there.



ANDROCLES AND THE LION

(Another of those once well known stories taken from Webb's Model Fourth Reader.)

When Rome was mistress of the world she had a colony in Africa, over which a governor was appointed. This governor had many slaves, to whom he was so cruel that they sometimes ran away from him.

Among these slaves was one called Androcles, who was so cruelly treated that he ran away and escaped into the desert, where he soon hid himself in a large cave. He was very weary and sore from the scratches of the thorns through which he had passed.

He had been but a short time in the cave when a huge lion approached. Androcles was greatly terrified, and felt that he should surely be torn to pieces by the savage beast.

But, to his surprise, the lion gently came near and held up its right paw, which was wounded and bloody. Almost overcome with fear, the slave took the foot and carefully examined it. He there found a large thorn, which was evidently causing the animal great pain.

With trembling hand Androcles ventured to pull the thorn out, all the time fearing the beast would destroy him, as he caused pain to the foot. But, to his great joy, the lion caressed him in the kindest manner instead of offering any harm.

At night the man and the lion lay down and slept together in the greatest harmony. The next day when the beast went forth for his prey he brought a good supply of food and placed it at the feet of Androcles. For nearly three years they lived together in harmony.

At the end of this period Androcles was captured as a runaway slave and sent to Rome, whither his cruel master had gone. At that time a master had power to put to death a slave who had escaped. This cruel master rejoiced in the opportunity to exercise his power, and resolved that his returned slave should be thrown to a lion for destruction.

The people assembled in great numbers to witness such an awful death as they expected the poor slave would meet with. Androcles was placed in a lot from which he could not escape and where he could be seen by the crowd of people. When all was ready an enormous lion was let loose upon him as his executioner.

In great agony the slave awaited what he supposed would be sure death. But, to his surprise and that of all the spectators, instead of opening his jaws to devour the poor man, the lion commenced fawning upon him and caressing him, as a dog would do on finding his long lost master. Androcles soon discovered, with great joy, that this was the same lion with which he had so long lived in Africa, and which, like himself, had been captured and taken to Rome for exhibition.

The Roman emperor, hearing of this singular friendship between the lion and Androcles, ordered not only that the slave should be set free, but also that the lion should be given to him as a present. From this time the noble lion and the freed slave were constant companions.

Androcles received quite an income by leading the lion about the streets and giving the people an opportunity to witness his gentleness and his friendship for the man who had so long before relieved him from pain and suffering by extracting a thorn from his foot.

Kindness, sooner or later, in some way or other, will bring its reward. T. Day.

Looking Backward

THIRTY-THREE YEARS AGO

From the Decatur Republican of August 26, 1917.

FINDING GOLD

During the summer of 1864 we had quite an excitement for a short time over the finding of gold in the swamp. A man by the name of Tucker lived at that time on what is now the Lewis farm on the New Swamp road. This Tucker spread the report that he was finding gold in the swamp, and, as may be imagined it didn't take long to send a lot of men down there prospecting, for, if there was any gold to be dug out of the swamp there was a whole lot of folks here who would be glad to get hold of some of it.

I remember going with my father and a lot of other men down there to see what could be found; Tucker had dug a big hole in the ground, about ten or twelve feet deep. This hole must have been located nearly where the little grove and buildings are now just south of the Lewis home. It was partly filled with water, but with long-handled scoops they could bring up the black mud from the bottom, and then with a milk pan they would wash away the mud and in the bottom of the pan would be left a residue of a heavy black sand in which there were little specks of something that shone and sparkled, and was claimed to be gold.

But if it was gold—and I believe that point was never settled to a certainty—it was in such very minute quantities that one would have to work a long time to obtain a dollars worth.

There was a merchant here at that time by the name of Wiggins, and he was very much interested in the matter, and he exhibited a small chunk of what he claimed was gold. It was tested and weighed by Fred Smith, the jeweler, and he said that it was gold and weighed about a dollar's worth.

On the strength of this small nugget, Wiggins tried to get up a company and sell stock, to lease land and explore for the precious metal. But the more that the little nugget was examined the more it looked like a gold coin melted and allowed to run into nugget shape on the ground, and the company fell through. They certainly did wash out small specks of something that sparkled like gold, but if it was gold it was so fine that they would have to work hard all day to get enough to come to 25 cents. Gradually people became satisfied that it did not amount to anything and the excitement died away. Now there is scarcely a person in Decatur who remembers anything about it. There are very few left who were here at the time.

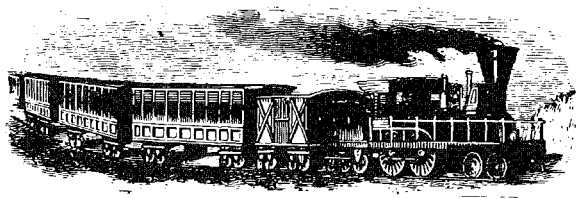
Charles T. Tucker was the first resident of the village of Decatur. In fact he was here before the village came into existence, and before the railroad. He was sent here by the company to get out ties for the road, and he built the first house in the village. He was the father of Lawyer William H. Tucker and grandfather of the actor, Frank Tucker.

A few years later he took up land a half mile to the south and built a house on it. In 1869 he sold this farm to Chas. A. and Sophia S. Moulton and it became known as the Moulton farm. They were my grandparents and I was born in the house that Tucker built. The improved building is now the home of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Griffin.

The big hole which was dug in the search for gold was about half full of rubbish when my brother Will and I were little fellows and lived on the farm. It was called the gold well. The farm then consisted of 160 acres and the well was in a field partly cleared, next to the big swamp. It was about ten feet deep.

Will and I knew all about the gold well and climbed down into it many times. Finally we decided to dig it out and try to find the gold. It was a big undertaking for us and we worked about a month before giving it up as a bad job. After that we lost interest in the well and never went back to it again.—A. N. M.

Pioneer Railroading in Van Buren County



THE WRECK AT LAWTON IN WHICH NINE PEOPLE WERE KILLED AND 28 INJURED.

This is the story which we have been for the past month trying to locate. It was written by Martin F. Ryan, who for years was ticket agent of the Michigan Central at Marshall. It was published in a Marshall paper, issue of October 26 (the year is not given, but think it was 1939.) Ryan was a native of Mattawan and one of the company of notable Irish railroad men to whom the Michigan Central in its early years was greatly indebted. The writer was a special friend of William H. Howland and through him became a friend of the Republican. The files of this paper contain a number of good stories by Mr. Ryan of railroading in the pioneer years of Michigan's most important railroad. Mr. Ryan was a cousin of our townslady, Mrs. Maynard Southworth. He died in 1943.

In his story of the Lawton wreck the writer mentions three persons from Decatur who were in it,—James Mahoney and Mary Case, who were injured, and Percie Nash, a little ten year old girl who later became Percie Nash Seymour and lived to the ripe old age of 94. She was a graduate of the Decatur high school, class of 1869, the second class graduated. We shall endeavor to obtain a more complete list of the dead and injured in the wreck.

The Republican is indebted to Attorney Carl Benton for the story which follows.)

THE TRAGEDY AT LAWTON

By Martin F. Ryan

The early railway history was not written without its tragedies. On an October night in 1863 the village of Lawton was the scene of a horrifying train wreck that took the lives of nine people and seriously injured 28.

In the dark days of 1863, when the Civil War was raging, at a time when the bloody battle of Shiloh had taken the lives of 26,000 men, including some from the flower of Van Buren county manhood, a state fair was being held at Kalamazoo. Looking forward on those dark days, it is remarkable to observe that despite the tragedies that afflict the human race, the horrors of war, plagues and starvation, humanity will take time off to sing, dance and partake of recreation as an antidote to relieve the suffering.

The Kalamazoo state fair held in 1863 was a gala event, drawing visitors from all parts of Southern Michigan. It was on the race track at this fair that "Dexter" the famous horse, covered the mile in 2:40. At this time the only means of transportation was the horse and buggy and the primitive railroad of the Michigan Central. To take visitors to the fair a special train had been provided, picking up passengers at stations and rural crossings all along the line between Niles and Kalamazoo. This special, in charge of Conductor Nick Summers, arrived in Kalamazoo in the forenoon with hundreds of merry visitors for the fair, and to witness the feat of the record breaking horse "Dexter."

In the late evening as dusk was approaching, a large crowd assembled at the station at Kalamazoo to return to their homes along the line of the road. It was soon discovered that there were not sufficient coaches to take care of the crowd. To meet this emergency, two box cars were fitted up with wooden benches for seats. While this was being done the train dispatcher allowed a westbound freight train to proceed with orders to take siding at Lawton and let the special pass at that point. The conductor of the freight train was the well known Charles Billings of Marshall, Michigan, and one of his brakemen was his son, Frank Billings, later to become a well known engineer of the road. It was Frank's son, Hylar Billings, that for many years was connected with the First National bank of Marshall, which position he held until his death.

The freight train arrived in Lawton and pulled into a siding to clear the main track for the special. A large crowd had assembled at the Lawton station to meet the expected special train, and among them were Charles Billings and his son Frank, the latter leaving their train after clearing the main track. At the time that the freight train was clearing at Lawton the two box cars were being attached to the rear of the coaches on the special train in Kalamazoo. These cars were attached by the now obsolete pin and coupling contrivance. The bell cord from the engine cab, running through the upper section of the coaches was extended over the top of the box cars, with the cord fastened at the end of the last box car for signal communication to the engineer.

Finally the passengers clambered aboard, filling the coaches and the two box cars. With a shout of "all aboard" the train pulled away from the station at Kalamazoo. The first stop in the darkness of the night was Mattawan, a distance of 12 miles. Following the discharge of passengers at this point, the train proceeded for the next stop, Lawton, a distance of four miles, and largely a down grade movement. Soon after leaving Mattawan, an investigation held some time after proved that some one, either through ignorance or malice pulled the iron pin from the iron link that fastened the box cars to the coaches soon after leaving Mattawan, and as it was a down grade movement the box cars would travel as fast as the grade would allow and the momentum attained at the time the pin was pulled. The coaches attached to the engine would naturally travel faster than the box cars that were detached. Subsequently the coaches arrived at the Lawton station, and passengers were leaving the coaches, suddenly like a thunderbolt from the sky the two loaded box cars crashed into the rear coach with terrific force, crumbling and splintering the wooden coach like matchwood.

Horrible screams of anguish and terror rent the midnight air as the crowd around the Lawton station rushed to the rear of the special train. Nine passengers were found dead and twenty-eight injured. Occupying one of the coaches were a young man and a young lady, the former, James Mahoney of Decatur, Mich., and the latter Mary Case, also of Decatur, both of whom had attended the fair at Kalamazoo. James Mahoney afterward became a popular rail track foreman, and was an uncle of Wm. H. Howland, a locomotive engineer, known as "Wild Bill" due to the fact that he was assigned to piloting presidential specials over the Michigan Central, also assigned to running the Wolverines. Mr. Howland is now retired and living in Jackson.

In the wreck crash James Mahoney sustained a leg injury that as long as he lived caused him a limp in walking. Mary Case sustained injuries that prompted the company to settle with her by giving her $3,000 in cash, a house and lot and eight vacant lots in the village of Decatur. Also in the coach was Percie Nash, a ten year old girl, who later became a school teacher. It is believed that the only living survivor of that train wreck at the present time is Percie Nash, living at Bangor, Mich. In the village of Lawton at the time there was no hospital and only one doctor, and there was no telephone. But in the darkness of the night, horses and buggies were utilized, also track hand cars, which traveled in various directions to obtain assistance.

THIS WEEK

By ARBA N. MOULTON, Editor

Commencement time will soon be here, followed by the Alumni reunion. The reunion will come on Saturday evening, the second of June.

The graduates of a few years ago are liable not to be as greatly impressed with the reunion as are the graduates having a silver anniversary or more. Dorothy Kinney Jung of Lawrence called a few days ago and is making an effort to get as many members of her class of 1926 together as possible.

The members of this class who graduated 25 years ago are Mrs. Jung, Lena Van't Zelfde Dees, Kermit Washburn, Nicholas Burggraaff, Helen Udell, Emma Behrman Borst, Royal Hirst, Larida Scott Peterson, Esther Szpiech, Lisle Howe, Ivan Ives, Benjamin Neidlinger, Horton Neidlinger, Maude Parish Goodrich, Pauline Woolfe Hanna, Carl Baker, Frederick Winkler, Georgia Welcher Carpenter, Edward Arnold, Waldo High, Ruth Beardsley Sheppard, Pearse Hollenbeck, K. Eugene Borst, Helen Austin Salisbury.

All are living and the addresses of most of them are known.

Some members of the class of 1915 are also hoping to meet as many of their class mates as possible. The members of this class are Doris Brigham Aitkin, Robert Ball, Helen G. Creagan, Fern Hamilton Carrington, Gladys J. Lyle, Theodore J. Rosevelt, Marie Conway Haskins, Leland S. Marks, Ruth Alden Pollock, Archibald Van Ossenbruggen, Marjorie Harris Brigham, Helen Lindsley Rutherford, Carl L. Athey, Dorothy Jones Kelley, Doris Kelly Rippey, Marie A. Parker, G. Sterling Wood, Don J. Morlan, Fern Geer Fuller, Harold Wendell Genung, Harry Snow Pritchard, and according to the records all are living but Marie Parker and Don Morlan.

We go back over the years for this class,—not quite forty years ago, but near it, and it recalls one of the most touching poems of school days that we know. It may bring to the reader a moment of sadness, but it will do no harm and it may increase the desire of some to recall those happy days of old and come back to the reunion.

FORTY YEARS AGO

I've wandered to the village, Tom,
I've sat beneath the tree,
Upon the schoolhouse playground,
that sheltered you and me;
But none were there to greet me,
Tom, and few were left to know,
Who played with us upon that green some forty years ago.

The grass is just as green, Tom;
barefooted boys at play
Were sporting, just as we did then,
with spirits just as gay.
But the "master" sleeps upon the hill, which, coated o'er with snow, Afforded us a sliding place some forty years ago.

The old schoolhouse is altered
some; the benches are replaced
By new ones, very like the same our jackknives once defaced;
But the same old bricks are in the wall, the bell swings to and fro:
Its music's just the same, dear
Tom, 'twas forty years ago.

The boys were playing some old game, beneath that same old tree;
I have forgot the name just now—you've played the same with me,
On that same spot; 'twas played with knives, by throwing so and so;
The loser had a task to do, there,
forty years ago.

The river's running just as still;
the willows on its side
Are larger than they were, Tom;
the stream appears less wide;
But the grape-vine swing is ruined now, where once we played the beau,
And swung our sweethearts—pretty girls—just forty years ago.

The spring that bubbled 'neath
the hill, close by the spreading beech,
Is very low—'twas then so high that we could scarcely reach;
And, kneeling down to get a drink,
dear Tom, I started so,
To see how sadly I am changed since forty years ago.

Near by that spring, upon an elm,
you know I cut your name.
Your sweetheart's just beneath it,
Tom, and you did mine the same;
Some heartless wretch has peeled the bark, 'twas dying sure but slow,
Just as she died, whose name you cut, some forty years ago.

My lids have long been dry, Tom,
but tears came to my eyes;
I thought of her I loved so well,
those early broken ties;
I visited the old churchyard, and took some flowers to strow
Upon the graves of those we loved some forty years ago.

Some are in the churchyard laid,
some sleep beneath the sea,
And none are left of our old class,
excepting you and me;
But when our time shall come,
Tom, and we are called to go,
I hope we'll meet with those we loved some forty years ago.

Mr. and Mrs. John Davidson of Kalamazoo were callers one day last week. They are former residents of Dowagiac and were going to spend a few days there.

Mrs. Davidson is the former Maude Nolin, her family being among the early residents of Wayne township in Cass county.

A year or two ago the Republican received a letter from Clifford Hiram Nolin of Kansas City, Mo., 524 Cypress avenue, who wrote that he was once a resident of North Wayne and mentioned several of the township's early residents whom he remembered. He proved to be a cousin of Mrs. Davidson and they have renewed the family acquaintance.

Mr. Nolin located in Kansas City, Mo., 70 years ago and he is now 88. He is the author of a book of verse which contains some choice poems, and he sent his cousin a copy. The book is entitled "Apples of Gold," and this is one of the poems:

MUSTERED IN

(In memory of a G. A. R. neighbor.)

Close the book, the tale is told,
A record none may flout—
Ninety-eight were in the Post,
The last is mustered out.

Sound the taps, a hero goes
Beyond the world's ado,
Eagerly to join the great
And final rendezvous.

Vision him on the hills of peace
Free of a crippled knee,
Rid of a minie ball he found
In middle Tennessee.

Wrap him tenderly; the flag
Will warm him 'neath the snow;
Colors he had carried high
Where color-sergeants go.

Honor him! He joins the boys
In a uniform above
Our where the sainted Blue and Gray
Have entered into love.

Carve upon the record stone
With reverential knife—
Thomas Kirkwood, Company D
Is mustered into life.

Thomas Kirkwood was one of the early settlers of Wayne township.

Mrs. Mahala Griffin Kay of Paw Paw, in the following note helps to recall some early Decatur history:

"Some time ago in your paper you asked for information concerning two former teachers of Decatur, one of whom was Mae Duffin. She lived most of her life as a teacher in Chicago, spending many of her summer vacations in the home of my parents who were friends of her people. In contests conducted by leading daily newspapers of Chicago she was twice voted the most popular teacher of that city and sent on trips abroad. Both she and her family are buried in Lakeside cemetery, Decatur."

The Duffin family were among Decatur's earliest residents. The Van Buren county directory of 1869 has the following record:

"S. Duffin, boots and shoes, store west side of Phelps street, six doors south of Delaware." That would place it about where Frank Brewer's barber shop now stands. We do not remember the family as residents of this village, but well remember Mae Duffin when she came back here for summer vacations. She was a faithful member of her church, and once on a stormy evening when very few came out to the meeting, she made the trip in from the Griffin farm to be present. When praised for this faithfulness she replied, "Someone has prepared a lesson for tonight and it is my privilege to hear it."

It is my impression that the Duffin family moved from Decatur to Niles, for I was a young boy when his body was brought here for burial. The funeral was held in the Presbyterian church and was attended by a large company of Knights Templars in full uniform, and a band. I stood on the walk in front of the old town hall and watched that long procession of plumed knights, headed by the band playing a dirge, marching to Lakeside cemetery, and the impressive sight has remained in my

WILLIAM FOLEY TRIBUNE EDITOR, DIES

William B. Foley, 78, retired night editor of the Chicago Tribune and a member of the staff 32 years, died in St. Francis hospital, Evanston, last Thursday, April 12. Surviving are the widow, Ella M., two step-daughters, a step-son and three grand children.

Mr. Foley was a native of Indiana where he practiced law for a number of years. He became interested in newspaper work and in 1912 went to Chicago as night editor of the old Inter-Ocean. In 1914 he joined the Tribune staff.

For 20 years Mr. Foley was dog watch editor, carrying full responsibility for local, state, national and world coverage from midnight to eight a. m. He wrote much of the news of the night watches on his own typewriter. He retired in February, 1946.

Some 20 years ago Mr. and Mrs. Foley acquired a home in Nicholsville and spent as much of the summer time there as his work would permit. They enjoyed the lakes and surrounding country and often visited Decatur. Mr. Foley was an entertaining talker and his calls at the Republican office were always welcomed. He seemed to think that the Republican was an ideal country newspaper and once said that he would enjoy editing a paper like it.

A building in Hamilton township, which may be one of the oldest in Van Buren county, is about to be torn down and this local historian has been delegated to make a note of it.

The building is located in North Hamilton and is now but the wreck of an old barn, but it was once famous in local history when it was known as "Brown's Tavern." It was built by Henry D. Coleman in September, 1837, on the line of the Territorial road about four miles to the west and a little north of Decatur village, the location being known as Kidman's corners and also as Fritzburg.

Coleman's only competition was the Keeler tavern located about five miles further west, and before the coming of the Michigan Central railroad both places did a flourishing business.

Coleman used all of his money to build the tavern and then borrowed $700 with which he bought a small stock of merchandise. He also succeeded in obtaining a post office for Hamilton and was himself appointed postmaster. He kept the office at the tavern where it remained until it was abolished shortly after the abandonment of the stage route. He held the office continuously during its lifetime and later moved onto a farm in section four where he died in 1857.

It is presumed that Coleman sold the tavern to a man named Brown from whom it obtained its name. The Selby and Kidman families took over the tavern in the early seventies and in 1895 George Kidman moved the wing of the building across the road to the north and made it into a blacksmith shop. He did a prosperous business there for a number of years. The late Alonzo Phelps bought the upright and moved it to his farm about a mile distant, where it has since done duty as a barn. Fred Hungerford, who inherited the farm, sold it to his son for $50 and the latter plans to use the timber in it to build a barn on his own farm.

Van Buren county was organized in 1837, the year that Michigan became a state. It then contained seven townships. Keeler and Hamilton were one township named Covington. There seemed to be no local reason for calling it Covington and the early settlers did not like the name. In 1839, the legislature separated Covington into two townships. The western half became Keeler and the eastern half Alpena. The name Alpena did not prove satisfactory either, and the next year, 1840, the name was changed to Hamilton in honor of Alexander Hamilton, first secretary of the treasury under George Washington.

The above information was furnished by Mr. and Mrs. Fred Hungerford from memory and from a history of Van Buren and Berrien counties which they loaned to the writer. Mrs. Hungerford is the former Daisy Kidman.

A letter from Helen Hathaway of Ann Arbor contains a list of fifty notable books of 1948 as selected by the American Library Association division of public libraries, and they are available at the Ann Arbor public library. Most of the writers are well known both from a literary as well as a political standpoint. One thing that has become quite noticeable of late years is the number of men in high public office who write books. It is presumed that the most of them do it to clarify and defend their public acts, and they all more or less shed light on the very intensive world history that is in the making.

Included in this list of books recommended by the Ann Arbor library are,—

The Gathering Storm, by Winston Churchill,

Crusade in Europe, by Dwight Eisenhower,

Memoirs of Cordell Hull, by Cordell Hull,

Making of an Insurgent, by Fiorella La Guardia,

Roosevelt and Hopkins, by Robert Sherwood,

On Active Service in Peace and War, by Henry Stimson,

We Need Not Fail, by Sumner Welles.

The list has been turned over to our Decatur librarian who can undoubtedly obtain some of the books for patrons who would like to read them.

It's a long road that doesn't have a turn, and sometimes it's a long road that finally does have a turn.

I have traveled a long road with The Decatur Republican, and have met with many pleasant experiences along the way. No other occupation in life could have come to me that would have given me as much pleasure as has this work of editing Decatur's home town newspaper. The paper came into my possession many years ago as suddenly as it has gone out of it this week. On a day late in December, 1896, I learned that the Decatur Independent was for sale. On the following day I became its owner, and on the following week took possession and restored to the paper its original name, The Decatur Republican. That was the first of January, 1897. On the 13th of August, 1951, 54 years, eight months and 13 days later, the ownership passed to Dalton and Eleanor Kinney. The sale to the new owners was as sudden and unpremeditated as was its purchase from Secord and Dewey in those days of long ago.

In the nearly 55 years that I have been publisher of the Republican the business street has undergone a complete change. Not a person, not an industry, save the First State Bank, not a mercantile establishment, is here today that was operating on the first of January, 1897. The pretty village is here. Many of the homes and places of business are the same, but most of the townspeople of that period are gone, and others have taken their places.

In giving up the Republican the thing that comes first to mind is a feeling of gratitude for the friends the paper has brought me down through the years. It is a priceless heritage. I have been brought many times since the sale to the point of tears over the letters, the newspaper comments, and the personal words of callers. There are more than a few readers who have taken the occasion to tell me that they have been subscribers to the Republican over fifty years, and some from the time I became its owner.

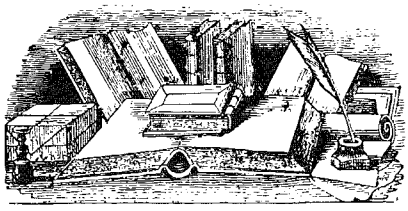
Without the advertising patronage of its home town merchants no newspaper can continue to exist and be a credit to the community. The Republican is not an exception. In the number of its subscribers the Republican has more than kept pace with the growth of the village, and it has been loyally supported by most of the business houses.

I know that the new owners will publish a good newspaper, one that will be a credit to Decatur, and I sincerely hope they will receive the advertising patronage the paper deserves.

Of the new owners, the Kinney family are well known in Decatur. They can be classed as pioneers of this community. Dalton is a son of Ransom D. and Florence Roth Kinney, and the Roth family also are among our early settlers. Dalton graduated from the Decatur high school in the class of 1935. He was married to Eleanor Hoppes of Anderson, Indiana, in 1937 and later took up the work of building contractor. He purchased of J. G. Hirst a plot of land on the easterly side of Lake of the Woods, which he named the Douglas Lee addition. On this land he has built ten houses and has two more under construction.

Mrs. Kinney, who has become well known to Republican readers as Ella Nore, is the daughter of Mrs. Grace Hoppes and the late Dr. G. A. Hoppes of Anderson. She graduated from the Indiana Academy in 1933, and from the Ball State Teachers' College in 1939. She taught five years in the Decatur public schools, most of the time in the Commercial department. She has a fondness for writing and her further ambition has been to own a country newspaper like the Republican. With a liking for the work, an energy almost unlimited, and an ambition to succeed, readers of the Republican may be assured that they will be well pleased with their home town newspaper.

Almost from the beginning the Howe brothers have had a prominent part in the publication of the Republican. They are natural mechanics and in composition and construction have made it a work of art. Otis, the oldest, learned the trade here and worked here until the opportunities in electricity seem to hold a greater interest for him. Clayton followed and took the advances from apprentice to foreman. Then the First World War called him and after his discharge from the Navy he worked in city offices until six years ago when his opportunity came to return.



A greeting to the readers who have missed this column! For a few weeks there was some doubt if it would ever appear again, at least under the name of the present writer who began it some 20 or more years ago. It was a case of the flu, that hard, unrelenting flu, which once it gets hold of an unsuspecting mortal is as difficult to shake off as a bull dog from the trousers of an intruder. The flu is said to be unusually severe on its victims this spring, and so is the spring itself.

We remember the first day the flu ever came to Decatur, in fact it was the year the foul disease was brought over to this country from Europe, and it is about the worst thing we ever got from there, not even excepting the English sparrow. That was away back in 1885. The flu was a novelty then and it had a novel name,—the Spanish Influenza. The sister of Mrs. Carrie Browning, who came from the East on a visit, brought it, and much talk about it was turned loose by the knowing ones when Dr. Rose gave its name and explained its nature. The United States went to war with Spain for sinking the battleship Maine in Havana Harbor, although we had a greater cause to war with that country for sending us the flu.

But, we have met the enemy and it is our's, so let us get on with the work again. There have been many things to write about during the past few weeks, and opportunities have passed that will never come again. Even so opportunities continue to follow each other in endless procession and we do not expect to lack for subjects to write about.

The subject most on our mind as we sit here at the typewriter is that of our long time friend, Edward R. Washburn, whose death was recorded in the Republican last week. It was our good pleasure to be a member of the school board that in 1914 brought Mr. Washburn to Decatur, and we have never had cause to regret that action. He was a good superintendent and a good teacher, thorough in the knowledge of his subjects, and a splendid disciplinarian.

Words of admiration and respect for him have been freely spoken by pupils and teachers who were associated with him in school as well as others, and we can truly say in the beautiful lines of Halleck,—

"None knew thee but to love thee,
None named thee but to praise."

Mr. Washburn's affections were centered on his lovely wife and their happy married life lacked but fifty days of covering a period of fifty years. When she was taken by death much of his ambition in life went with her. He was showered with attention from his children and friends and struggled bravely to overcome the depression that seemed to settle upon him, but the bright light which brought him cheer and comfort was extinguished and could not be renewed.

Knowing well that anything he might write would be treasured by readers of the Republican we sought to interest him in preparing articles for the paper, and its files contain a number of fine articles from his pen. He had other subjects in mind but his strength was not sufficient to prepare them. He left some articles as yet unfinished which his children may complete and permit this paper to print, and we are looking forward to receiving them.

Mr. Washburn had lived in Decatur and vicinity, and been associated with the Decatur public schools longer than any other man and it was in line with his wishes and those of his friends that his body should be taken from this village to its last resting place in Hastings.

Drew Pearson is a writer of no mean ability, but one so rabid, and perhaps conceited at times, that the enemies he has made cannot find the words to say mean enough things against him. On the good side of his several sided character was his eulogy of Michigan's esteemed Senator Vandenberg whose death vied in the news of the day with the homecoming of the deposed Gen. MacArthur.

As an added tribute to our late senator Mr. Pearson's eulogy, given on his radio program, is printed here:

"Now, ladies and gentlemen, last week an old soldier came home. The flags waved, the guns roared; thousands cheered. And last week, without fanfare, another old soldier faded quietly away. The flags of Michigan fly at half mast in tribute to Senator Arthur Vandenberg—a man for whom the tickertape never flew, for whom the bands did not play—but who was the grand old leader of a Grand Old Party and as great a warrior in the battle of good government as any soldier on the battlefield.

"Good politicians seldom receive the accolades that are extended to good generals. But the battles Arthur Vandenberg fought and the victories he won shape the course of history.

In the Days of Long Ago

WHEN OUR PROSPEROUS COMMUNITY WAS A HOWLING WILDERNESS.

Elias Morris Tells of This Region When the Red Men Ranged the Forest.

(From the Decatur Independent of June 13, 1895.)

Mr. President and pioneers of Van Buren county, ladies and gentlemen:

In response to a request by your executive committee, to prepare a paper on pioneer life for this occasion, I am happy to meet you here today. It affords us pleasure to be permitted to go back over a period of more than sixty years and contemplate events pertaining to the early settlement of Van Buren county.

Every county has its first settler, closely followed by the second, third and fourth and so on from year to year, all engaged in establishing homes and laying the foundation for social, religious and educational systems, and in various ways preparing the way for the generations that follow.

It would be arrogant to claim for settlers all the credit for developing this part of our noble state. Each and everyone are entitled to a share of praise.

Preceding the advent of the first settler, Van Buren county was in a state of nature, or nearly so, with dense forests and swamps filled with bears, wolves, lynx and wildcats ready to prey upon domestic animals on first appearance.

There were other large tracts of oak openings comparatively free from underbrush, kept so by the Indians burning them over every year to facilitate the hunting. Numerous swamps and marshes with malaria waited only for a subject to get in their work; also there were numerous lakes well stocked with fish. In certain localities wild fruit, crabapples, plums, blackberries, raspberries, strawberries, cranberries and huckleberries were abundant. Here, too, was the redman reluctant to surrender possession of his favorite hunting ground. Here in this, Decatur township, on the borders of Little Prairie Ronde might have been seen the smoke from the wigwam as it curled upward to mingle with the clouds, or might be heard the tinkling of the bells on the necks of their ponies, indicating the near presence of their owners.

On the west bank of Swift & Anderson lake was an extensive burying ground or cemetery. There were long rows of graves side by side around which was a circle similar to a circus ring, suggestive of the pow wow or war dance, or whatever might have been the customary ceremonies of the race. The grounds were strewn with all sorts of trinkets and relics. I have often picked up a handful of silver broaches, beads, etc. Here, too, were the Indian corn fields, where tracts of several acres had evidently been planted and cultivated to corn, the small hillocks each representing a corn hill. Pits or holes dug in the ground, lined and covered with bark and on top of that covered with earth, were supposed to have been receptacles for their corn and other products.

To cut leave from friends, to sever family ties, to abandon the native home with all its endearments, to say good-bye to all the heart holds dear and start with wife and small children to seek a home in a comparative wilderness, requires a brave heart, a strong arm and determined will.

THE FIRST SETTLER

Dolphin Morris, the first settler of Van Buren county, was born in London county, Va. Here he grew to manhood uneducated and without means, his father being poor and unable to render assistance. March 29, 1823, he married Nancy Beaver. To them were born August 17, 1824, Samuel, July 30, 1826, Zerilda, June 4, 1828, Amos.

In the fall of 1828 he started with his family and all his personal effects in a lumber wagon destined for Summerville, Cass county, Michigan. The route was through dense forests, where they were compelled to ford streams and meet with many obstacles to impede their progress, arriving however safely at their destination.

Here he spent the winter with Joseph Gardner, a cousin. During his stay at the Gardner's he located in the S. ½ section 35 of Decatur township, and early in the spring of 1829 erected the first residence in the county and made the first improvement.

The residence was a typical pioneer log cabin, made of round logs 8 by 10 inches in diameter, about 24 feet long, notched at the corners to hold them in place; the cracks were chinked with split basswood and daubed with clay to make it warm and comfortable. The roof was made of oak shades held in place by weight poles; the floor was of split basswood puncheons 3 or 4 inches thick smoothed slightly with an adz or axe. There were three small windows below and one in the gable. The chimney was made of sticks and mud and thickly plastered inside.

The fire-place was long and spacious, admitting huge logs 4 or 5 feet long, in front of which our mother used to cook the meals for the family. The chamber was reached by a ladder and constituted our large sleeping room with 2 or 3 beds in it. The door was put together with wooden pins and hung on wooden hinges and provided with a wooden latch with the latch string on the outside.

The cooking implements were not numerous. They consisted of a teakettle, one iron pot for boiling meat and vegetables, a bake kettle with iron corners, in which the bread was baked by covering the kettle with coals of fire. The cabin was located near the trail leading from Niles to Grand Rapids and often furnished food and shelter for the weary traveler.

The first sermon preached in Van Buren county, was in this cabin by the Rev. Wm. Sprague, a young Methodist preacher in the year 1829, who afterward became presiding elder; also a member of Congress, defeating the Honorable Charles E. Stewart for that office.

The First White Child

August 4, 1830, was born Lewis C. Morris, the first white child born in the county. He died December 20th of the same year and was the first person buried in the Morris and Anderson cemetery.

May 11, 1832, occurred the most important event of my life. I was born in the old log cabin within a mile of my present home and am now the last representative of my father's family of eleven children. I know something of pioneer life. I know what it was to eat plain food and wear scanty clothes and early in life learned to mend my own clothes and repair my own shoes. I have often listened to the howling wolves that warned us of their near approach and intended raid on the domestic animals, aspecially the sheep. It was one of my duties to bring in the flock and secure them within a high rail pen or corral built so high that a wolf could not get in.

I know something of the ague or chills, fever, the many snakes and the burning fevers we have endured of the sickly season, when nearly the entire family were sick at the same time and some of the neighbors' children were also sick at our house. I also remember the old log school house, with the slab benches, the birch and ruler, too, have left a lasting impression.

The clothing for the family was made from the wool shorn from the backs of sheep, washed and scoured by hand and then hand picked to free it of all foreign substances, carded by hand into rolls, then spun by hand on the old fashioned spinning wheel into yarn, colored and then sent to the loom. It would be amusing now to see the ladies and misses dressed in home made flannel or linsey woolsey dresses and thick calfskin shoes and old fashioned scoop bonnets, or the men and boys with their suits of blue jeans and brass buttons and nondescript hats or caps. The shoes for the family were made from the hides of animals, slaughtered, or that had died and been tanned at the local tannery. The shoemaker would take his kit and go from house to house and remain until the family had all been shod or material exhausted; generally one pair of shoes was all we could have for the year.

Game of all kinds was plentiful and contributed largely towards the family supplies, besides amusement for the hunter or trapper. The lakes were well stocked with fish and contributed liberally towards the family larder.

The nearest mills were at Three Rivers and Niles, 25 miles distant, where all the supplies of flour were obtained.

Crabapples and wild plums were abundant. The latter were excellent quality. Our mothers used to make use of the crabapples for preserves and sometimes the plums. People used to come 8 to 10 miles to my father's farm for wild plums, and on one occasion a man and several boys came on Sunday and found several of us boys enjoying some very fine plums. They asked permission to gather some, so certain trees were designated, one of which contained a hornet's nest. As this trees was well loaded, the boys were soon near the top and began shaking it vigorously. A scream, an oath or several of them and some tll running were in order. They however were permitted to take a supply from other trees to recompense them for the fun they had furnished.

The First School and Church

Owing to the unorganized condition of the territory, schools had not yet been in operation; however as soon as possible a school was organized. The person proposing to teach would visit each family and ask "how many scholars will you subscribe or agree to send to school?" the patrons subscribing one, two, three or four as the case might be, and when a sufficient number were obtained school would begin.

The first school taught in Van Buren county, was taught in my father's old log house by a Mr. Alexander. A few years later a tolerably decent log school house was built, where now the Morris and Anderson cemetery is, and as I remember G. N. Copley, now of this village, was the first teacher. In the winter time spelling schools afforded a large share of amusement for the young people in the vicinity and many a time the old house would resound forth the eloquence of the young orators in trying to determine the important question whether man was an animal or not.

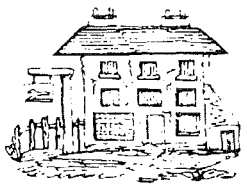
Soon as suitable places could be provided the circuit rider came. Preaching was generally at school houses throughout the vicinity, sometimes on especial occasions at my father's barn. The inhabitants generally would attend services five or six miles on horseback, sometimes two on the same horse. Buggies or carriages were not then in use. The minister would generally speak extempo and sometimes with eloquence and effect. The singing consisted in the congregation making a joyful noise, chords were of little consequence. Whenever there was a lack of hymn books the minister would line the hymns by repeating two lines and waiting until more copy was needed.

The Indians

The Indians were as a rule friendly. Some of the squaws were very kind and would assist my mother with her household duties. Often they would bring jerked venison, maple sugar or berries to exchange for salt pork or flour; the berries were always nice and clean, but the sugar was horrid stuff, having a greasy, sickening taste and offensive smell. One lone old chief, Shavehead, was somewhat a terror to the community and was regarded as a treacherous fellow. The last time I saw him was at my uncle's barn raising; he had his bow and quiver full of arrows and was smoking an old pipe. There is a lake in the southern part of Cass county called Shavehead lake. It is generally believed that some white man shot him a number of years since as he disappeared very suddenly and was never heard from afterwards. On one occasion an Indian called at our cabin and finding no men folks around, commenced some demonstrations with his knife to frighten my mother. She seized the gun hanging overhead and said, "Now, Indian, march." When he found that she would not frighten, he commenced to laugh and departed.

The Indians have disappeared from our midst. Wild animals, once a terror to the settlers, are all gone. Forests have been converted into lumber and the land into beautiful farms. The old log cabin is supplanted by the modern farm house—the fire place by the furnace, the old cooking utensils by the range and gasoline stoves. No longer the farmer cuts his grass with a scythe or grain with sickle or threshes or tramps his grain with horse or ox.

The mower, reaper and steam thresher and stacker have taken their places. No longer people take long journeys on horseback or are compeled to draw provision long distances. All over our state beautiful villages like mushrooms after a warm shower in May have sprung into existance. Railroads have been built for the accommodation of the people. Electric lights, telephones, phonographs, Audiphones, all suggest that a new era has dawned.



The Flight of Lincoln's Murderer

Mrs. Iryl Heap sends a page from the Washington Evening Star containing a story of the historic ride of John Wilkes Booth 86 years ago after he had shot and fatally wounded President Lincoln in the Ford theatre on the evening of the 14th of April, 1865.

From the story as written by George Kennedy is taken the following:

One of the most surprising discoveries that can be made in the Washington area is to come upon a section close to the city that has not been covered with housing projects and which remains much the same along the back roads as it did in Lincoln's day.

Such an area lies directly south of the District in Maryland, the country through which John Wilkes Booth rode after the assassination. The history fan who follows the flight of Booth through Maryland will be delighted to find all the houses mentioned in the account still standing and looking much the same as they did in the spring of 1865.

Of late, following the Booth flight has become a popular pilgrimage on or about the anniversary of the assassination, which occurred on Good Friday, April 14, 1865.

A police lieutenant, Bert Sheldon, annually guides parties approaching 100 in number over the route. He has made himself an expert on the subject. An older student of the Booth flight is Msgr. Edward P. McAdams, pastor of St. Joseph's Church, Second and C streets N. E. He has one of the largest private libraries on Booth in existence.

In order to have an appropriate piece for Lincoln's birthday, the writer asked Msgr. McAdams to guide him over the route. We started about 9:30 Friday morning at the back door of Ford's Theater, now the Lincoln Museum, on the east side of Tenth street N.W., between E and F streets.

"Here's where Peanuts held the livery stable horse for Booth," the monsignor said.

"Booth limped out into the alley, lame from the jump from the President's box when his spur caught on the flag draping it. I don't think it correct to describe his condition as a broken leg. The break was in a small bone near the ankle and his cavalry boot probably kept it in position. He mounted and rode to F street and then turned east. We don't know what street he used to get to Pennsylvania avenue."

We kept on Pennsylvania avenue up the hill and on until Eleventh street S. E. where we turned to the right and continued to the Navy Yard bridge.

We crossed the bridge and went up Nichols avenue and turned to the left on Good Hope road, eventually turning to the right on Naylor road, crossing the Military highway, passing the Quonset Inn and turning to the right again on Route 5 at Silver Hill.

"You see," said Msgr. McAdams, "I knew the Surratt family. A grandson of Mrs. Mary Surratt (who was hanged as one of the conspirators) was a classmate of mine at Loyola College in Baltimore. He became a physician, Dr. Reginald Tonry. Through him I met his uncle, John Surratt, Mary Surratt's son. He was not apprehended at the time but was Bay Line in Baltimore when I knew him. He was one of the handsomest men I have ever seen. I believe he was in the conspiracy to kidnap Lincoln but not to murder him.

"And let me tell you something that I got from the Surratt family that you won't find in any of the books. Louis Weichmann, who lived at the Surratt boarding house and was the chief witness against her in the trial before the military tribunal—"

Here I interrupted.

"Monsignor," I asked, "is the Surratt boarding house still standing?"

"Certainly," he said, "it's on H street near Sixth. Five forty-one was the number. It's a Chinese restaurant now."

He resumed his story:

"One day in the Surratt living room, while young Weichmann was helping Annie Surratt, Mrs. Surratt's daughter and the mother of my friend, Dr. Tonry, Weichmann tried to kiss her.

"Now Weichmann was from Baltimore. His parents were working class Germans. Mrs. Surratt was a Jenkins, an old Maryland family. She had attended Miss Martin's finishing school in Charles County. Her daughter knew she was not a girl to be kissed by a boarder whom she considered beneath her. And she laid him out. He never forgave her. That's why he had it in for the Surratts at the trial. He later drank himself to death, saying he was responsible for the death of an innocent woman."

"In 1901," our guide said, "Osborn H. Oldryod, a collector of Lincolniana who is the real father of the museum on Tenth street, walked the Booth trail. It took him 11 hours to get here. Booth, on horseback, did it in six. The distance is 17 miles. Mrs. Mudd, the doctor's widow, was living here at the time and Oldroyd had a talk with her which he included in his book. "The house is now occupied by Joseph Mudd, a grandson of the doctor. He's a tobacco farmer."

We drove up the lane to the house. Its exterior had changed in only one respect from the pictures in the history books—there was a television antenna on the roof.

'The couch on which the leg was set was over in that corner," Msgr. McAdams said.

"Is the couch still in Baltimore?" he asked Mrs. Mudd.

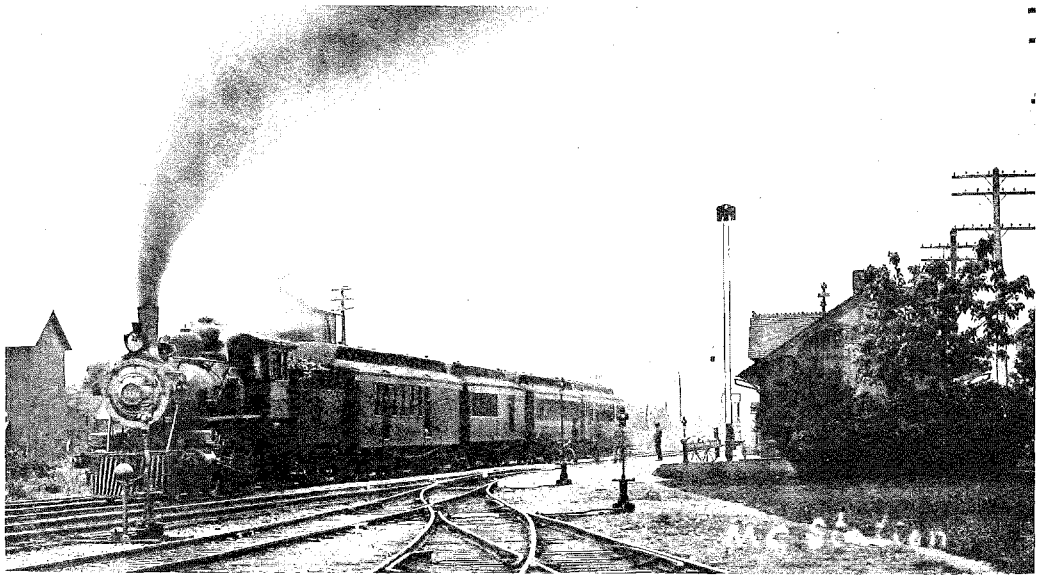
"Well," said Mrs. Mudd, "Mrs. Monroe died. It's probably in storage. It's pretty well worn out by this time."

She was referring to her husband's aunt, Mrs. Nellie Monroe, who went to Hollywood as a consultant for the movie "The Prisoner of Shark Island," then sued the producing firm for $50,000 because she thought Gloria Stewart, the actress who played Dr. Mudd's wife, was not as beautiful as her mother.

Dr. Mudd was sentenced to life imprisonment as a conspirator in the assassination. Booth, who had been at the Mudd place in the preceding November relative to the purchase of a farm or horses, arrived there at 4 a. m. April 15. He was wearing a false beard. He gave his name as "Tyson." Dr. Mudd set the leg. After his conviction Dr. Mudd was sent to a prison at Dry Tortugas (Shark Island) near Key West. He was the hero of a yellow fever outbreak which had carried away the prison doctor. He was pardoned after two years by President Johnson.

As we drove away from the Mudd home I said to Msgr. McAdams:

"I heard a grandson of Dr. Mudd, Dr. Richard Mudd of Saginaw, Mich., give a talk before the Columbia Historical Society last summer. He said that he heard from his father that his grandfather went to Bryantown and heard that Booth had killed Lincoln. When he returned 'Tyson' and his companion were leaving. Mrs. Mudd told him she was suspicious of the men because 'Tyson's' beard kept slipping off. Dr. Mudd was going to go back to Bryantown and report the incident but Mrs. Mudd said she was afraid to be left alone with her four young children. Then Dr. Mudd decided he would report it when he went to mass at Bryantown the next day."



NEW YORK CENTRAL 125 YEARS OLD

The New York Central's 125th anniversary is today. But there will be no speeches, no pageants, no unusual blowing of locomotive whistles. Months ago, the railroad decided this would be "an anniversary without a celebration"—because of the national emergency, and to permit full concentration on preparedness.

As a consequence, the Central is only quietly noting its century-and-a-quarter milestone—125 yrs. of growth inseparable from, and contributing greatly to, the progress of America. Briefly reviewing this eventful period, President Gustav Metzman philosophized in the company's magazine for employes:

"The history of the Central to this point might be called the story of a 125-year plan. The ingredients of the plan are simple: opportunity, incentive, work, reward. The results are accomplishments that serve both the public and the individual.

"Only time will tell whether the first 125 years are the hardest. For each generation, no doubt, its own problems seem the most vexing that ever have been. But this much we know: we have the right plan, and if we keep working with it to the best of our ability, we can make it work even better in the future than it has in the past."

The Central was born April 17, 1826, when the New York State Legislature granted a charter to the Mohawk and Hudson Railroad Co. to build a railroad between Albany and Schenectady. This 16-mile pioneer line was the first built in New York State, and is the oldest of approximately 560 predecessor companies combined into today's 11-state, 11,000-mile New York Central System.

The Mohawk and Hudson was the dream of George W. Featherstonaugh, wealthy landowner and scholar of Duanesburgh (Schenectady County), N. Y. He eloquently expressed his belief that a steam locomotive pulling cars on iron rails would prove the most efficient means of transportation. When he won the support of influential Stephen Van Rensselaer, last of the patroons and first president of the railroad, Featherstonaugh's vision became reality.

Construction of the roadbed and laying of the rails, which consisted of "strap iron" spiked to wooden stringers resting on granite blocks, began in 1830. A locomotive, called the DeWitt Clinton and weighing all of three tons, was being built at the West Point Foundry in New York City. Three stage coaches, carried on iron-flanged wheels and equipped with crude link and pin couplers, were being built in Albany.

At last, on August 9, 1831, an exhibition-excursion trip was made over the new track from Albany to Schenectady and return. The DeWitt Clinton behaved well; the dignitaries who had apprehensively embarked on the ride were outspoken in their enthusiasm. Regular passenger service was begun the next month.

At first, the trains operated only as connections between the steamboats on the Hudson River and the barges on the Erie Canal, completed in 1825. Trains did not run during the winter months. Nor did they run at night—until someone thought of lighting a bonfire on a flat car and pushing the car ahead of the locomotive. The engineman, a truly heroic figure, stood on a narrow uncovered platform behind the boiler. Horses pulled the trains when the locomotive broke down, or when traffic was too heavy for the number of locomotives available.

The success of the Mohawk and Hudson encouraged residents of other cities between Albany and Buffalo to collect money to construct a railroad between their city and the next. The Utica and Schenectady Railroad was thus built in 1837. Then followed eight more small roads, until, in 1842, a chain of them linked Albany to Buffalo.

Passengers changed from train to train of the various roads until agreement was reached in 1843 to operate two through trains daily in each direction. But the fastest service was 24 hours between Buffalo and Albany. Freight revenue was minor, because until 1851, railroads had to pay the state the same per-mile toll for freight carried as the Erie Canal would have earned for the same service.

The New York Central came by its name July 7, 1853, when the ten railroads between Albany and Buffalo were consolidated. Erastus Corning, who had headed the Utica and Schenectady for 20 years, was elected the Central's first president.

LITTLE NOW REMAINS OF WASSMAN MILL NEAR DECATUR WHICH WAS BUILT IN 1858; BURNED TO GROUND IN 1914

By: Della Mullinex

The days of the old country flour mill which flourished in the 19th century and in the early 1900's is a thing of the past. In those days it was a common sight to see the farmers with their summer crop of wheat and corn and even buckwheat on the road with horses and wagons, going to the little country mill to get their winter's supply ground into flour.

One such mill which has long since passed, and in the younger generation is almost unknown, was located about four miles northwest of Decatur in Hamilton Township. Only a few ruins remain of the old mill that was such a favorite of farmers for miles around.

Built in 1858

This mill was built by the late George Nesbitt in 1858. In 1862 the mill was put into operation and Chas. Wassman, a German by birth, and who learned the trade in Germany, was the first miller. He worked the mill for four years and then went to New York, returning in 1885 and worked in the same mill for four years more. About 1890 he bought the mill of Nesbitt.

In 1902 John Wassman bought the mill, which was run by water power. It had turbine wheels and water was shot onto them through a spout. In the summer, as time went on, water power was getting light, as hot, dry summers caused a water shortage.

Cal Parker, a well known Decatur resident and a son-in-law of Wassman, worked for him for many years.

In 1914 the old mill burned to the ground. In 1907 Mr. Wassman had installed a midget Marvel Mill, or, as it is now called, an Anglo American roller process.

After the burning of the mill, Wassman, in the same year, moved to Lawrence, and bought a mill of Benedict and Cook. He increased the flour capacity and installed all new machinery. It is now run by 50% electricity.

During the years when Wassman was running the mill in Hamilton, the grinding was done by 2 — 4 Ft. mill stones. One was used for buckwheat and feed and the other for flour.

Trees have grown up where the old mill stood and only a few pieces of mill remains, a mute testimony of what had been. The dam is gone, and one can hardly recognize the place.

Since the burning of the mill, 14 other small country mills have gone out of business in the country.

Nicholsville Once Showed Great Promise, Now Sinking Into Oblivion

By Fil Racette in Kal. Gazette.

A signboard is nailed carelessly on a tree at the crossroads. The scrawled letters, in faded blue paint, spell out "Nicholsville, Mich."

You've never seen those words on a postmark. In fact, it's practically an impossibility to find the place on a map. And yet this tiny settlement with its two dozen houses and half a hundred inhabitants started out in the middle of the last century with all the prospects of becoming another Grand Rapids or maybe even a Detroit.

But Nicholsville, lying northwest of here in the midst of a chain of resort lakes, never quite made the grade. It stands today like the talented child who stumbled on his first step down the road to greatness and never progressed any farther.

The little community is a castoff of time and progress. It was "a natural" early in the 1800s as the pioneers began settling the area. It was located at the juncture of two lakes, now called Bunker and Finch after two early settlers. Sources of water power were at the top of the shopping list for those land-seekers, and they found what they wanted at Nicholsville.

Although the first survey of the town wasn't made until 1851, an industrious pioneer, Alexander Copley, had constructed a dam on the site and erected a sawmill in 1835. The big over-shot water wheel also supplied power for a grist mill, built in 1851 by Harry George.

Naming of Town

George sold his infant enterprise to Jonathan Nichols, who gave his name to the little boomtown. Nichols, and a brother, whose first name has slipped by the historians, had set up a hotel in the village.

Nicholsville began to proper. J. M. Goodspeed opened a general store, and then came a drug store, blacksmith shop and wagon shop in quick succession.

Settlers came from miles around bringing their grain and logs to the mills. The stores and shops did a bargain-day business, week after week. It lookd like the makings of a metropolis.

Then the forces of progress pressed the stop watch. Other bigger and better sources of water power were developed closer to main trunklines. The railroads began to reach out through the area, and they shunned Nicholsville. The town died in infancy.

There isn't much left today to indicate what might have been. The last vestige of industrial promise was lost in the spring of 1917 when a washout carried away the idle dam. One small general store remains, but a sign in the window reads: "For Sale or Lease."

Nicholsville is a small resort center now—nothing more. Cottages, bearing the nameplates—"Welcome Inn," "Happy Hill" or "Journey's End"—have replaced the pioneer structures of the Copleys, Goodspeeds and Nichols.

Those names can still be found on markers in the small well-kept cemetery which overlooks the community from a hill to the south. The monuments, some new and some worn beyond recognition, hold the story of Nicholsville, what it is, what it was and what it might have been.

Present Messiah This Sunday

The third annual presentation of Handel's "Messiah" will be given by the Decatur Community Chorus on Sunday, December 7th at 3:30 in the Decatur high school auditorium.

Through the music of this massive oratorio is told the story of the Prophecies and the Nativity, the Passion, the Resurrection, and man's hope for his own salvation. Our small community is indeed fortunate to be able to produce an artistic accomplishment of this lofty nature.

Particularly in a well known work such as this are the merits of the director, the instrumentalists, soloists, and chorus apparent to us, for to avoid the hackneyed, the vapid effect and to give a fresh and living performance is the test of the true artist.

The difficult and exacting task of directing the "Messiah" will be performed by Marie Snyder Haefner. From her, we have come to expect a performance which is vigorous and authoritative, yet never lacking in the compassion and spirituality which are the essence of this work. Mrs. Haefner attended Olivet College where she appeared as soloist with the college choir, and studied directing with Pedro Paz, present conductor of the Battle Creek Symphony. She has studied privately with Alva A. Beecher of Chicago and Florence Otis of Kalamazoo, and has had lessons in choral work with Henry Overley of Kalamazoo College. During the past summer, she attended the Fred Waring Choral Workshop at East Lansing. Mrs. Haefner taught in the Decatur public schools and is the director of the choirs at the First Presbyterian Church.

Dr. William M. Govier will, for the fourth time, serve as pianist. A graduate of Kalamazoo College and Vanderbilt Medical School, he has studied music with Ola Krudener of Kalamazoo and Alexander Raab of Chicago. He is at present with the Upjohn company. Dr. Govier's outstanding musicianship has been invaluable in building the chorus.

Leading the artists from Kalamazoo who will appear in the string quartet will be Voldemars Rushevics, concert master of the Kalamazoo Symphony. Mr. Rushevics, who received the highest honors on graduating from the Academy of Music, Riga, Latvia, and studied with Enesco, was concert master of the Riga National Symphony and the Latvian Broadcasting Symphony Orchestra. In addition, he toured Europe as a solo violinist and as the leader of the Latvian String Quartet. On coming to the United States in 1949 he became professor of violin at Kalamazoo College.

Beverly Newell Govier, formerly of Decatur, is an accomplished violinist who has played in the Kalamazoo Symphony.

Karl Richkevics, violist, came to Kalamazoo from Liepaja, Latvia. In Latvia and Germany he was known for his extensive chamber music work.

Muriel Matthews, first 'cellist with the Kalamazoo Symphony, graduated from the Cincinnati College of Music and later studied with Orlando Cole at the New School of Music in Philadelphia, and with Luegi Silva at the Eastman School of Music. She has appeared as guest soloist with the Cincinnati Symphony and the WLW Concert Orchestra, and has given recitals throughout the east.

Dorrie Lou Knoll, soprano, was an original member of the Presbyterian Women's Choir and has done solo work in the church. She is a student of Mrs. Haefner.

Peyton Rannie, soprano, has done brilliant solo work in the last two performances. She has studied with Florence Otis and is a soloist at the First Congregational Church of Kalamazoo.

Marvel Kinney Sundin, soprano soloist, studied voice at Emmanuel Missionary College at Berrien Springs. She has acted as chorus director in Richmond, Virginia, and in Chicago. She has done solo work in both these cities as well as in Detroit. She is studying with Melvin Davis, voice instructor in Berrien Springs.

Gwen Vlick, soprano soloist, is a member of the Presbyterian Women's Choir and has done solo work in the church. She has studied with Florence Otis and is currently studying with Mrs. Haefner.

Martha Howlett, who also appeared as contralto soloist two years ago, has sung at the Grant Memorial M. E. Church and was a member of the Elsie Breeding Glee Club and the Imperial Opera Company of Chicago. She also traveled with the Deep River Jubilee Singers. Mrs. Howlett has studied with Clarence Cameran of the White College of Music, and Thelma Waide Brown of Roosevelt College. She is now studying with Mrs. Haefner.

Paul W. Bakeman, tenor soloist, studied under Harper C. Maybee of Kalamazoo, and was a scholarship student at the American Conservatory of Music in Chicago. He also studied under Karleton Hackett, Theodore Harrison, and Frank La Forge. Mr. Bakeman has done much concert and oratorio work in Florida as well as in the east and middle-west. At present, he owns Merrywell Farm near Dowagiac, and is choir director at the Federated Church.

Harold N. Davidson, whose virile baritone was heard last year, is a consultant engineer. He studied music with Carl Craven and Dorothy Mannering. He has been a prominent member of vocal ensembles in the annual Bach Festivals at Kalamazoo College. Mr. Davidson is soloist at the First Congregational Church of Kalamazoo.

The chorus of over eighty voices is composed of local people who love to sing fine music enough to devote at least one evening a week during the autumn to rehearsing for this performance. Their efforts will come to fruition this Sunday when they are heard in the mighty choruses depicting the sorrows and joys of all humanity.

RALLY DAY AT DECATUR BIBLE CHURCH

The Decatur Bible Church will celebrate Rally Day, Sunday, October 5 at the ten o'clock hour with a program given by the children and young people. There will be a special feature, Gospel Magic, presented by Mr. John Pike, Jr., of Kalamazoo. Mr. Pike is a young man who at one time aspired to be a professional magician. After becoming a Christian he dedicated his talents to the work of the Lord. He is employed by the Gibson company, makers of musical instruments.

Rally Day also marks the opening of an International Sunday School Contest sponsored by Christian Life Magazine of Chicago. The Republican of June 12 gave a brief account of pioneering in the Dakotas and other parts of the north central territory. It brought an interesting reply from Mrs. James A. Stegeman of South George street, in which she wrote as follows:

'My parents were married in 1885 and went to Grand View, South Dakota, on their honeymoon. (It was Dakota territory then. It became the state of South Dakota in 1889.) Mother used to talk about those early days,—the sod house and the lone prairie. Father was the treasurer of Douglas county and proprietor of the country store. Mother waited upon trade and became acquainted with the squaws from the reservation nearby. She learned many Indian words and could talk with them. The Indians were paid in gold dollars of which I have one as a keepsake. When the railroad came through it missed Grand View, and business became so slack that my parents moved away. I'll write you a story sometime if you would like it."

Shall be pleased to receive the story, and also stories from other Republican readers who were among the early pioneers of that rugged country.

Mrs. Stegeman also sent a book entitled, "In All Its Fury." This book is a history of the blizzard of January 12, 1888, with stories and reminiscences collected and compiled by W. H. O'Gara of Nebraska, president of the January 12, 1888, Blizzard Club. The book lists nearly 500 survivors of that fearful event.

The blizzard of 1888 stands out in the history of the north central states like the Johnstown flood in Pennsylvania or the great Chicago fire. In it 109 Dakota pioneers froze to death. Teachers and pupils were forced to remain all night in the frail school houses, and many examples of heroism by the young teachers were reported.

The book gives a graphic recital of experiences of some 300 survivors of the blizzard, and this one is from Mrs. Stegeman's mother, Mrs. Geo. W. Atwood:

"I was living in Grand View, South Dakota. It was a beautiful morning when my husband took the cattle to the well to drink. A neighbor came over to talk with him and he said, "This is a weather breeder." Then a strong wind began to blow and he got the last of the cattle into the barn and had trouble getting the door closed because the wind was so strong.

"Very soon the snow was whirling, and it even came through our keyhole so that we had a drift on the floor. We were lucky to have our hard coal next to the back steps, and we kept warm with a hard coal stove. We could not see out at all, the storm was so severe.

"One of our neighbors froze both of his legs trying to get to the schoolhouse. He had to have both of them amputated."

Mrs. Atwood lived the last years of her life with her daughter and son-in-law, Rev. James A. Stegeman of the First Reformed church, and she passed away last year at the age of 94. She was a bright and energetic woman, and kept up her interest in life to its close. In her later years she made it a practice to read a book a week. She chose good literature and her list would be a good one to follow.

Mrs. Stegeman has given the Republican some interesting accounts of the experiences of her parents in South Dakota and they will be published soon.

Through all the argument and excitement attendant upon the national conventions to be held in Chicago this month, citizens of Michigan should not lose sight of the fact that on the fifth of August we have a primary election at which the parties will nominate candidates for United States senator, members of congress, governor, lieutenant governor, members of the state senate and house of representatives, and county officers.

It is understood that the Democrats will nominate Governor Williams for a third term without opposition, unless in the meantime the national convention should nominate him for vice president. Governor Williams appointed Blair Moody of Detroit United States senator to succeed the late Arthur Vandenberg, and he too will be unopposed in the primary for the elective term.

Dear Arba Moulton,—

You asked me on the only occasion I have met you if I could at any time send any items for the Republican would I do so. I think the enclosed is very good and I hope you may find it useful.

The "Dean," dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, Gt. Br., often called the "Gloomy Dean," is referred to at the bottom. He is now retired but quite frequently I read of him preaching. He is well over 80 years.

With kindest regards,

H. Holman.

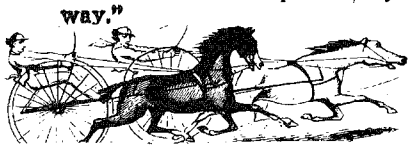
A little more tired at the close of day,
A little less anxious to have our way;
A little less anxious to scold and blame
A little more care for a brother's name.
And so we are nearing the journey's end
Where time and eternity meet and blend.

A little less care for gain or gold,
A little more zest for the days of old;
A broader view and a saner mind,
A little more love for all mankind.
And so we are faring down the way
That leads to the gates of a better day.

A little more love for the friends of youth,
A little more zeal for established truth;
A little more charity in our views,
A little less thirst for the latest news.
And so we are folding our tents away
And passing in silence at close of day.

A litle more leisure to sit and dream
A little more real the things unseen,
A little nearer to those ahead,
With visions of those long loved and dead.
And so we are going where all must go
To the place the living may never know.

A little more laughter, a few more tears
And we shall have told our increasing years,
The book is closed and the prayers are said,
And we are a part of the countless dead.
Thrice happy, then, if some soul can say,
"I live because he has passed my way."



The writer of the poem undoubtedly wrote from experience for the words ring true to life. It seems strange how many more people, strangers as well as friends, are now growing old than there were when we were in the glorious prime. Thanks to the sender, and we hope sooner or later to be able to recall the one visit with him which brought such pleasing return.

Over a period of many years in the time that is past the Republican made friends and contributors all over the United States, and it was one of the ways that we found pleasure in the work of editing the Decatur paper.

When Helen Hathaway of Ann Arbor sees an opportunity to do the Republican a good turn she embraces it. Time and again her fluent pen has been used to compose letters and items for the paper. Her early life was lived on the beautiful Hathaway farm of Little Prairie Ronde and Decatur was her home town. She graduated from the Decatur high school in the class of 1899 and for many years thereafter held responsible secretarial positions.

She was secretary to Charles Lawton, president of the Quincy copper mine in the Northern Peninsula and later was employed in the probate office of Washtenaw county until her retirement. She now has a pleasant home in the University City, attends the Swedenborg church in Detroit and leads a quiet peaceful life. Our mothers were both born on the third day of May, 1850 and died in 1939 at the age of 89. We have that much at least in common.

In one of her last letters Miss Hathaway referred to a comment in this column on books to read. She asked if I had read "Hempfield" by David Grayson, a story of the progress of a newspaper in a little country town. The book is on my list to borrow from the library as soon as it is available.

David Grayson is the nom de plume of Ray Stannard Baker, an American journalist and author born in Lansing, Michigan in 1870. Besides Hempfield he wrote Adventures in Contentment, Adventures in Friendship, Adventures in Understanding, and others. He was a brother of Charles Fuller Baker, born in Lansing in 1872 and equally prominent as an American zoologist. Both were graduates of the Michigan Agricultural College, men of whom Michigan may well be proud.

Also very glad to keep track of Mr. and Mrs. Norman E. Webster of New York City. And there are many other early day citizens of this community who share with me this pleasure.

Mr. Webster was a graduate of the Decatur high school in the class of 1884. There were five in his class and he is the only survivor. He has never lost interest in the Decatur public school and never loses an opportunity to say a good word for it. The favorite superintendent of his time was Professor Henry Upton and he graduated under that unusually bright educator, Miss Abbie Pearce. Mr. Webster also has a friendly interest in the Decatur publ.. library of which we may be able to say more in the future.

He is well over the four score in years, but has lived a good and active life, as did his parents before him, and it is not too much to expect him to be with us another decade, at least.

A letter came from Paw Paw. It contained a four page folder entitled "Dwight Eisenhower—New Deal Stooge." Nothing to identify the sender. It was printed in ten point, would take about a page of the Republican, and contained the information that additional copies could be purchased by addressing, American Digest, Box 62, Englewood, Colorado.

It claims that Eisenhower is not a Republican, that when he registered he declined to state his politics, and it gave the following as an incomplete list of those who originated the Eisenhower for president boom: James Roosevelt, Eleanor Roosevelt, Claude Pepper, Drew Pearson, Americans for Democratic action, The Communist Party.

The article is startling in its tenacity of opposition. If the charges are true they cause one to wonder if there is anyone in public life who can be trusted. This writer is not for Eisenhower for president, but cannot go along with such bitter denunciation of his character.

Taft is putting up a forceful and aggressive campaign for the nomination, he is conducting a clean campaign and making no charges against other candidates. He looks through the charges and vituperations into the clear facts of an issue and knows the facts so well that he does not need to stoop to slander. He comes the nearest to the Lincoln type of campaigner of anyone in public life today. The folks back home who derive no profit from politics and want only what is best for their country, can place confidence in Taft that he knows enough and is honest enough to give them, not a new deal but a square deal.

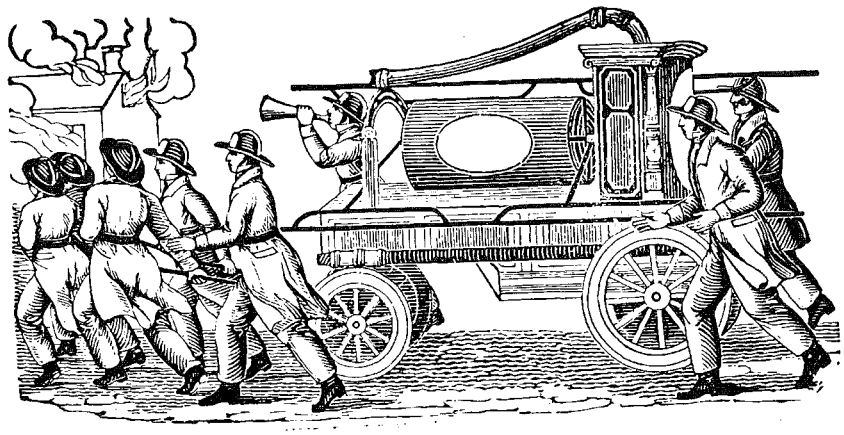
King George VI of England and the great American commoner, Abraham Lincoln, both died at the age of 56.

Saw this comment in Hedda Hopper's column in the Chicago Tribune a few days ago: "Edgar Bergen was met by 100 cars when he landed in Lubbock, Texas, and was given a 40 mile parade to the little town of Post, where he paused to give a benefit to help build a hospital. Every citizen of Post contributed something to Edgar's Santa Claus fight for GI's."



Our Fire Department

"This writer, as a citizen of the community, has observed with some alarm and no small amount of shame the growing dissension in our Village Fire Department.

The Fire Department is an important organizations of the community with serious obligations, responsibilities, and duties to the community, the same as the Board of Education, the Village Council, or the township officials.

Of course, it is true that the Fireman's job is a voluntary one. He is to be praised for the unselfish service, risks involved, and so forth. But, granted all that, he must remember that he was selected from among many candidates, not only because it was thought that he would meet all the qualifications above, but also that he could give to the organization unity, teamwork, efficiency, good fellowship.

The writer also observes that certain rules and regulations govern membership, organization, and activities of the Firemen. Here are a few questions the public might like to have answered by our Firemen.

How many active members do you have—men who attend the majority of fires? How many men show an eager interest in learning about new equipment, in practicing to become more efficient fire-fighters? How many men remain on as as members who have already served their time because of age or physical disability? How many are so-called "social members"—men interested only in a good card game or partaking of fod and refreshment?

Have you selected leaders with personality and leadership who has organized you into an efficient team with pride in proper care of the equipment, with activities to make you better firemen, with social activities in which every member can take part?

Are responsibilities equally assigned and accepted by all members? Do you have some members who "finished their education" a long time ago and refuse to be told anything?

Have you selected a Chief who can be present at all meetings, who will be available at all fires, who knows the equipment?

According to your regulations, how many meetings does a member miss to become dropped from the group?

These are vital questions. Upon the answers the Firemen can give depends the success or failure of their organization.

Now, the Firemen are legally under the control of the Village Council. The Council approves their selection of a Chief, directs a few regulations for the equipment, approves and purchases materials. The Fire Department has been given a great deal of freedom in the past, trusting in their intelligence and ability. The Council probably still wishes to keep it that way.

However, this writer believes there should be closer cooperation between the Council and Firemen. The Council is directly responsible to the community for providing adequate protection. That includes sufficient number of dependable fire-fighters and good equipment. The Council believes they have provided the latter. This writer believes the former is questionable. There are certainly many capable young men in the community who could meet the requirements of an active fireman.

The writer believes that at least half or more of our Firemen group are inactive members, or practically so, as far as actual fire-fighting goes. Yet those same members control elections, policies, and activities of the men who are doing the real duties of the organization.

Sure, most of these fellows gave years of active service. Perhaps they should not be dropped like a hot potato. But the writer sincerely believes those members should retire, perhaps as social or honorary members, with no voice in selection of officers, in formation of policies, in fundamental activities. That in itself will remove much dissension, make for more vigorous activity, and in turn produce a sufficient, dependable force.

The writer would like to suggest a committee of Council-men and a committee of Firemen to work in cooperation for giving our community that which they deserve, that which they have a right to expect of us.

This was not written with any idea of getting personal attention, nor to point fingers at any individual. It is about the only way of bringing one's feeling to the whole group without the distortion that follows telling it to a few in the hope that they will pass it on correctly. It is a situation in which the whole community has a right to be interested.

If the writer has made any false statements or appears in the eyes of the Firemen to be unjust or completely "off his nut," he will be glad to listen to constructive criticism and suggestion.

However, as stated before, the primary purpose of the Firemen is not social. It has a direct responsibility to the community to provide the best fire protection that they can. The Firemen are intelligent people capable of organization to meet that demand.

All of the above is only a personal opinion, and is not intended to reflect the thinking of the Council or anyone else.

Decatur Grocery Clerk Finds Adventure in Lore

For a smiling red-headed grocery clerk, collecting arrowheads and other Indian relics is an exciting adventure.

"Almost every item has a story behind it," declared 20-year-old Jake Waterlander.

Jake, a former Decatur high school basketball player, has been collecting arrowheads for about 10 years.

He also has some Indian hoes, spears, flint spades and pottery.

On breezy Sunday afternoons you might find Jake scouting the shores of nearby lakes to add to his collection.

"Dad got me interested," Jake said. "He's been collecting for 20 years.

Waterlander is proud of his collection. He likes to interest others too.

He has placed some arrow heads in the First State bank of Decatur, Orr & Newell Insurance agency, and Dragon's barbershop.

Jake has read a great deal about Indian lore.

He can tell you the Indians who inhabited this territory were peaceful and friendly. Further south, the Indians were warlike in nature.

Their arrowheads were shaped differently. Unlike the hunting points found locally, the southern tips were designed to break off in a victim.

Jake has some 650 arrowheads and 75 stone pieces.

His dad has 700 Indian pieces, largely arrowheads.

IN APPRECIATION OF OUR FELLOW ALUMNUS ARBA N. MOULTON, '89

Not because he served this community for the greater part of fifty years as Justice of the Peace, not because he has represented the people of the village of Decatur on the school and library boards, not because he was publisher and editor of the Decatur Republican for fifty-four years and continues his column, THIS WEEK, not because he is an alumnus of Decatur high school and has been helpful to our Alumni Association in numberless ways, whether an officer, or not; but, because of the way he did these things, because of his loyalty to this community, his tireless devotion to duty, his uniform kindness to people, the expression of his personality in the columns of the Republican, because of the record he has made as one of the most unforgettable characters in the history of this community, it is entirely fitting that we, his friends of the Decatur high school Alumni Association, give recognition to the life-time of service to his fellow men rendered by Arba N. Moulton of the Class of '89.

Clean living, kindness to all, thoughtfulness of others, encouragement to the faltering, a deaf ear to scandal, civic consciousness, fine literary taste, high sense of duty and honor, abiding faith in God, these are the fibers of which his life-line is woven, these are the elements of his character.

No one who has lived any part of the past fifty years could separate The Decatur Republican from Arba Moulton, nor Arba Moulton from the Decatur Republican. Its pages reflected his personality. Many of the delightful gems of his broad reading were brought to his readers. The local news was featured, especially the good fortunes of people. We were kept in touch with residents of former years, and, though they journeyed far, they continued their subscriptions. No country weekly in the state circulated so far and wide. Arba's product was the envy of editors all over Michigan. The Decatur Republican was the institution for which Decatur was most famed.

We rejoice with Arba in the leisure he has attained. We congratulate him on the success he has achieved.

With sincere appreciation of his work and earnest wishes for several years of useful, happy living, we salute our friend and elder associate with the love and respect and honor that are his due.

Arba, in token of the nobility of purpose you have demonstrated, lo, these eighty years, I place in your hands this note of appreciation, and, figuratively, crown you king and invest you with a robe of royal purple, emblematic of the place you hold in our hearts.

Looking Backward

Decatur and Around It Away Back When

(From the news in the Republican of July 6, 1911. One would need to be close to 50 years old to know much about what was going on in Decatur then.

Let's take a look at the record, as the late Al Smith liked to say.)

Walter Jurgensen of Decatur, and Fannie Williams of Buchanan, were married June 27. They came here on a visit to his parents, but went right on to Dowagiac to establish a home there. Walter has a good job in the Heddon Bait factory.

Charlie Dine does considerable traveling. He now lives in Scranton, Penn., a beautiful city, third in population in the state and situated on both sides of the Lackawanna river. The International Corespondence School of Scranton is the best known school of the kind in the U.S.A. Charlie is visiting his parents on west St. Mary's street for a few days.

Cass Rosewarne, a former resident of Little Prairie Ronde, and Miss Mabel Ellen of Portland, Oregon, were married in Portland on June 28. (The sad news of the death of Mr. Rosewarne was received in Decatur a few weeks ago.)

Barton Park was packed with spectators to see the Fourth of July ball game between Decatur and Penn. The score was 6 to 4 in favor of Decatur, and Red Woolfe's great pitching was given the credit for winning. It was a warm Fourth of July, thermometer 90 in the shade.

Maxine Carney, 6-year-old daughter of Mrs. Maggie Carney, was shot in the head by a bullet from a revolver the evening of the Fourth. Her condition is serious but she seems to have about an even chance for recovery. The sad tragedy is a mystery, but Sheriff Byron Sowle and Prosecuting Attorney Glenn Warner are sparing no efforts to solve it.

A new Michigan law requires horse drivers to turn to the right to let an auto pass when signalled from behind, but some horse drivers do not like the menacing power-driven machines and are not good about obeying this law. One auto driver, who in getting around a horse and w'gon suffered the loss of a mud guard, fender, horn, windshield and lamps, sued the unobliging farmer and was given a judgment of $325.

Carl Downing Mosier (our present circuit judge) and Miss Ruth Hendryx were married at the home of the bride's parents, Attorney and Mrs. Coy W. Hendryx, in Dowagiac last week, Wednesday, June 28.

Frederick Minnis, a well-known former resident of Decatur, died in St. Joseph last week. He was born in Germany 76 years ago and came to the U. S. at the age of 15. He located first in Niles where he married. Then he came to Decatur. He enlisted in the Civil War in '62, and after the war worked a number of years in the Decatur stave factory which furnished employment in those days to nearly 100 men.

Loleta Dewey of Marion, is visiting her Decatur relatives.

Lawrence Fuller is playing trap drums at the Orpheum theatre in Kalamazoo.

Dr. Carl D. Moris of Pontiac, drove to Decatur in his Cadillac last Friday. Acompanying him were his niece, Miss Lottie Huyck, who teaches in the public schools of Saginaw, and Mrs. Hazel Hill Hunt of Detroit, who came to visit her parents.

June 30, Hamilton Grange celebrated the golden weding anniversary of Mr. and Mrs. S. B. Poor. 75 members of the Grange were present and the program included numbers by Grace Osborn, Florence Cockett, Howard Hall and Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Haydon.

Ethel Parker of Goblesville, has been visiting her parents, Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Parker, the past few days.

The slides showing the coronation of King George of England wil be shown at the Vaudette on Friday and Saturday evenings. Admision 10 cents.

Historical Chain-Lake Baptist Church

1838-1952

This historical data submitted by C. C. Evans, an adherent of the Chain Lake Baptist Church since 1891.

During the year of 1890 and 91 my father became the 14th pastor of this organization whose birth dates back to 1838. Prior to that a home to home meeting was held and prospered until namely Turner Byrd, Harrison Ash and Irving James agreed to incorporate on January 4, 1848. Thus on the northwest corner of the present cemetery, a log structure was erected approximately in 1850. This created a community-wide incentive to worship which led to the erection of a frame structure in 1860.

Before 1860, on September the 9th, 1858, Turner Byrd was ordained. This was the first ordination service which 150 persons witnessed and was held out of doors because of the inadequate capacity of the church. So, in 1860 the present frame structure was built to meet their growing needs and changing times, at a cost of $1200.

Since that time, in recent years nearly six decades later Richard Evans constructed a vestibule to the front, topped by a belfry. A short time later cement steps with a hand rail was built by the late James H. Wilson. At that time the yard was leveled and landscaped by John Early, Green Allen and Will Allen, and pine trees in rows running from the front to the full width of the lawn to the highway to the west and south of the church. The yard is flanked by uniform maples, as your vision directs you to scan southwest, the retina of your eye focuses the placid water of Chain Lake, one of the series of 5 lakes that lies to the west location in Calvin Township Cass County, Michigan a very attractive panorama view.

FALL AND WINTER TIME

By C. C. Evans.

Autumn now is growing old,
And sear leaves are flying;
He hath gathered up cold,
And now he is dying,
And people begin sighing.

The year is now in the wane,
There is nothing adorning,
The nights have no cheer,
And the days have no charming,
Cold winter gives warning.

Soon no plumed throng
Charms the woods with song;
Ice-bound trees are glittering
Merry snow-birds twittering;
They fondly strive to cheer
Scenes so cold and drear.

Winter still we see
Many charms in the Lone and chilly greeting,
Snow-storms fiiercely beating
And the dear delights
Of the long, long nights.

DRIED APPLE PIES

I loath, abhor, detest, despise,
Abominate dried apple pies;
I like good bread, I like good meat
Or anything that's fit to eat.
But of all poor grub beneath the skies
Give me the toothache or sore eyes,
But don't give me dried apple pies.
The farmer takes his gnarliest fruit,
'Tis wormy, bitter, and hard to boot;
He leaves the hulls to make us cough,
And don't take half the peelings off.
Then on a dirty cord 'tis strung,
And in a garret window hung,
And there it serves as roost for flies,
Until it's made up into pies.
Tread on my corns, or tell me lies,
But don't pass me dried apple pies.

THIS WEEK

By ARBA N. MOULTON, Editor

In my boyhood years every "feller" loved the circus. It was the greatest event that ever came to town. Back in the seventies and eighties circuses were smaller and there were more of them, and they made the smaller towns. They traveled by horse and wagon over the sandy highways, and one wondered when the men who did the moving ever slept. Nevertheless to belong to a circus was considered by the boys to be a great job and the only reason that more of them did not follow the circus was that at the fanciful age they were too young and later there were not enough jobs to go around.

In the early morning of a day when the circus was coming to town a crowd of boys would tramp out a mile or two to meet it and follow it to the show ground. Some of them would get odd jobs, the pay for which would be a free ticket to the performance. I carried water to the elephants of several shows.

In those early years the circuses were held on the railroad grounds on the south side of the track, and the water to quench the elephants was pumped and carried from the depot pump four or five rods away. The average country circus had two elephants to head its menagerie. Each elephant drank a large tub of water at the feeding time and it was no small job for a boy of ten to keep the tubs filled till the pachyderms were full. Among the circuses that came to Decatur in those pioneer days were Adam Forpaugh and Sells Brothers before they graduated into big town shows, John Robinson's and Burr Robbins'.

The Robbins show was the best known in this part of Michigan. The showman had married Nettie Webster of Lawrence who lived in a big red house on the main east and west road passing through that village. It was but a few doors from where father lived when a boy and he and the young lady were good friends. Once when the circus showed in Decatur father went and took me. Mrs. Robbins, who was selling the tickets, refused his money and said, "Walk right in, Arthur." That was to me such an important remark that I have never forgotten it, although have long since forgotten the features of the circus.

The Webster house in Lawrence is still painted dark red and may ago when going under a bridge in his steam yacht. Have long since forgotten the details of the accident. Can any reader of the Republican add to this story of the Robbins and their circus?

Once upon a time in about the year 1880, when father was justice of the peace, a circus showed in Decatur on Saturday and remained there over Sunday. Two members of the troup engaged him to officiate at their wedding and on Sunday afternoon the whole company came to our house on Prospect street for the ceremony. The event furnished excitement for the whole neighborhood as well as for our family.

Those circus people carried a distinction all their own. The ladies were young and pretty and exquisitely gowned. The men possessed the same pleasing characteristics and also dressed in the height of fashion. Their quiet laughter and happy conversation brought cheerfulness into our little home that kept it brighter for many days after.

The first circus I ever saw was Barnum's in Kalamazoo when I was three years old, and an unforgettable incident connected with it was seeing Tom Thumb play billiards in the Burdick Hotel. He was surrounded by a crowd of spectators as he stood on a chair to shoot. Can also remember the glittering parade of the entire troupe around the hippodrome track at the beginning of the performance.

These notes were inspired by the reading of a book obtained from the Marblehead library named "The Big Top." It is the story of Fred Bradna and his accomplished wife Ella, and their forty years with The Greatest Show on Earth, a story everyone who loves the circus would enjoy reading.

The Dowagiac Daily News takes from one of its issues of 1912 a story of the famous old Buck and Geer orchestra, which for many years set the standard for dance music in this part of Michigan. As this orchestra was well known among the old time dancers of this community, many readers of the Republican will also be interested in the story.

B. F. Buck was nine years old when his family moved to Keeler in 1846. His father, John S. Buck, was Keeler's second postmaster, succeeding Judge Keeler in 1850 when the latter went on the stage route from Detroit to St. Joe.

B. F. Buck began playing the violin when he was ten and at 13 was playing for dances. When he went to high school in Paw Paw he took lessons of J. M. Hubbard who later became assistant postmaster of Chicago. While going to school in Paw Paw he played second violin with the village orchestra. He carried the mail for a few years and served a year in the Civil War.

His partner, Riland Gear of Hamilton township, was also a veteran of the Civil War where he nearly starved to death in Libby Prison.

It was as natural for him to play the violin as it was to eat. "He practically left the cradle and bowl for the fiddle and bow, and he was one of the best prompters that ever followed the calling.

After the war these two young veterans organized the Buck and Geer orchestra which for many years was known to every lover of those delightful old tunes and dances from Indiana's border to the River Grand. After the war Mr. Buck married and located in Dowagiac. He traveled with circuses and minstrel shows and gave music lessons when at home.

The Buck and Geer orchestra was first composed of five pieces: B. F. Buck, first violin; R. Geer, second; Bowse Reams, clarinet; Fred Blackmond, cornet; and Frank Powell, double bass. About the year 1885 the Beckwith Memorial theater orchestra was organized with ten pieces and the Buck and Geer orchestra became a part of it. Arthur Rudolphi, a pupil of Mr. Buck, became leader of the new orchestra and for a long time it was considered the leading orchestra in southwestern Michigan.

Others who played with the Buck and Geer orchestra were Homer Smith, Wally Greenman and Perry Young of Decatur, Dorrence Forsythe and Seth Fassett.

Mr. Fassett was also known far and wide as a musician and orchestra leader, and the Fassett orchestra played for many dances throughout this part of the state. They are a musical family who in the years past have given much pleasure to their friends by their fine entertainment. The writer is still looking for the life story of Seth Fassett which Mrs. Fassett and her daughter, Mrs. Beulah Scott, have been preparing for the Republican.

March 12, 1953

Twenty-seven years ago this coming August Burnside Post No. 27, Grand Army of the Repiblic of Decatur, became reduced in size to two members, Gilbert E. Mead and Daniel Webster Brodhead. They met at the Post hall under Gale's farm store, disbanded and divided the furniture among friends of the organization. The fine portraits of Washington and Lincoln were presented to the writer.

Around the turn of the century Burnside Post had a membership of 100 and was the most active and influential organization in the village. G. A. R. members controlled the Republican politics of the county, state and nation, and Civil War veterans were generally given preference when political plums were to be distributed.

Some fifty to sixty years ago there was a strong rivalry between Alanson Roberts, a Civil War veteran, and Dr. Henry M. Broderick for the appointment of Decatur postmaster. The appointment was to be made by our Congressman at that time, Julius Burrows of Kalamazoo. The rivalry became so bitter that Burrows feared his selection of either would cost him his re-election, so he asked for a special election to decide the winning candidate.

That was the most exciting election ever held in Decatur. Friends of both candidates were out early and kept up their electioneering until the close of the polls. Farmer patrons of the office were as interested in the contest as were the village people and most of them spent the day in town.

Arguments were numerous, feeling ran high and an occasional wager was recorded. I saw one man from the country waving a five dollar bill above his head and offering to bet it that Broderick would be elected. A Grand Army man covered the bill and one of our prominent citizens volunteered to hold the stake.

Officer Henry H. Van Camp was on duty all day endeavoring to keep the peace and to see to it that the veterans, of whom he was one, had a square deal. The most exciting event of the day occurred when Fundy Shoudy, a Broderick man from the suburb of Fritzburg came to town and went to electioneering out in front of the old town hall where the election was held. Officer Van Camp, who was well over six feet tall, went up to Shoudy, who was less than five feet, and commanded him to cease from violating the law by campaigning within 100 feet of the polling place. At this the little man turned his ire on the officer and actually dared him out behind the hall to fight.

The veterans won the election and Alanson Roberts became the next postmaster.

Those were great days for the always lively little village of Decatur, and it had a citizenry of which we were all proud. Those who remember back to the seventies and eighties will recall that it was not uncommon to see the Civil War veterans wearing their uniforms of blue, and in my boyhood days in summer they drilled once a week on the village green where the Church of God and a number of residences have long since been located.

The North sent 2,128,149 men into the Civil War, the total casualties of which were 349,944. Of the total number that survived only one is still living; he is 106 years old and resides in New Jersey. The number of Confederate troops in the Civil War was estimated at 400,000, based on a white population of 5,000,000. Woodrow Wilson in his "History of the American People," placed the number at 900,000, and the loss in killed and wounded at 133,821.

The seceding states in the order of their secession were, South Carolina, December 20, 1860; Mississippi, January 9, 1861; Florida, January 10, 1861; Alabama, January 11, 1861; Georgia, January 19, 1861; Louisiana, January 26, 1861; Texas, February 1, 1861; Virginia, April 17, 1861; Arkansas, May 6, 1861; North Carolina, May 20, 1861; Tennessee, June 8, 1861.

The slave states of Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky and Missouri refused to secede and the western counties of Virginia also repudiated the action of the Confederate Convention and June 20, 1863, were admitted to the Union as the state of West Virginia.

DECATUR HIGH SCHOOL STUDENT PAPER

By Betty Lou Christensen

My father started bee keeping with his father in Decatur when he was ten years old, and has kept bees ever since. He once had over 300 hives, but now has about 200.

When the trees in the orchards begin to bloom he sends the bees out to them. He has to move the bees at night because most of them are out gathering honey in the day time. Once when he was going up a steep hill a hive of bees fell off the back of the truck. The hive broke open and the bees swarmed all over.

There are over 5,000 bees in one swarm. When the season of flowers does not yield enough honey for the bees during the winter the bee keeper has to feed them a mixture of sugar and water to keep them alive until spring.

When my father moves the bees he nails the two stacks of bodies together and nails a screen to the entrance of the hive. The bees sometimes fly as many as five or ten miles away to find flowers. They work very hard all during the spring when the flowers are in bloom.

You must have a smocker, hive tool and a hat with a screen around it to keep the bees out. My father sets the hives on bricks to keep them off the ground so insects cannot get in to them.

A colony of bees have a queen bee. All she has to do is to lay eggs. A few drones are raised to mate with the young queens, and the rest of the colony is made up of the workers. The workers gather nectar and pollen, make honey, care for the young, clean the hive and perform all the other work necessary for the maintenance of the colony.

Honey-bees have been domesticated since earliest times, and bee keeping was practiced by the ancient Egyptians and Greeks.

When the queen bee lays the eggs part of them are to be young queens and they are fed royal jelly. The queen is five and one half days a larva and eight and one half days a pupa. When the young queen hatches out, the old queen and the older workers of the hive leave the colony in a swarm.

The writer of the above article is the daughter of Roy Christensen. Roy and his father, Hans P. Christensen, have kept bees for many years. It is a most interesting work, but rather hazardous from the fact that the bees are generous stingers. That may account for few people being engaged in it.

A few years ago Roy showed for my benefit moving pictures of bees and how they work. They were most interesting, and he still may have the films.

Honey has the flavor of the blossom from which it is extracted. Flavors easily detected are apple, basswood, buckwheat and clover. Buyers of honey are cautioned to keep it in a dry warm place, never in cellar or refrigerator.

Occasionally a swarm of wild bees will lodge high up in a large hollow tree in the woods. They make their honey there and when the tree is discovered it becomes known as a bee tree. Many years ago I took part in the cutting down of a bee tree on the Greenman farm. It was great fun and a boiler full of comb honey was secured. The combs were large, perhaps six by twelve inches in size. Some of them were borken and it was a sticky job to get them out. I wonder if any other readers of the Republican ever had this experience.

When returning to Marblehead we bought of Hans Christensen several packages of strained honey to take to friends we have made here, and they proved to be very acceptable gifts.

The following manuscript was sent to the Republican for the "This Week" column by Mrs. Jane B. Roach of Paw Paw.

I REMEMBER, I REMEMBER

Recently, I came across a passage in Corinthians and as it is pertinant to my story, I quote — "Behold all things are new."

Not so long ago, I dined at a very elegant tearoom whose decor was in antiques, all mueum pieces. Framed on the wall was a bill of sale of merchandise, bought in 1881 — sixty years ago! It was headed in bold type by my father's name. My father at that time had a large department store. I jotted down a few of the articles with prices and here they are —

6 yds. print $1.00; 7 yds. sheeting .70; 10 yds. percale .70; 4 pr. hose .40; 2 yds. damask .75; 4 yds. Stevens crash .40; 1 hat .50; 3 yds. ribbon .30; 1 pr. pillowslips .30.

My father was a perfectionist and all articles were the finest quality.

I marvel at an ad I have saved through the years, dated 1886. It was in the local paper. An ad exploiting a restaurant — The Old Homested — a complete meal for 15c.

And complete it was — choice of three kinds of meat, two vegetables, home made pie and coffee. Often on Sundays, as a special treat, and as father was wont to say, to teach us the amenities of dining out, we went there for dinner — seven of us, including the hired girl.

Through the distance of years, I can see the family parading down the Main street, our destination The Old Homested. Papa, impeccably groomed, wearing striped trousers and cut away coat, on his head a derby. Our pretty young mother very dressy in green taffeta, an emerald paradise with bustle and a quaint little bonnet perched percariously on her head. I the oldest with ankle length dress, long black cotton hose, the underdrawers put on precariously making my legs look corrogated. With me, my oldest brother with long curls — how Mother loved them and how my brother loathed them. He wore a blue velvet Fauntleroy suit with starched ruffle collar. Next, my ladylike and proper sister dressed quite the same as I. The seams of her long black stockings were alwnys straight. She, indignantly dragging by the hand my pugnacious younger brother whose suit was a replica of his older brother's, but his stiff ruffled collar riding one ear.

About this time, a circus made its initial appearance from our town. The local wagon maker was busy building fabulous chariots and a bandwagon.

Father, duly impressed, had him construct a two wheel affair with back to back seat and painted red. He also had him make, a high one seated carriage with piano polish. It was called a Spider.

The smaller vehicle was drawn by a donkey — called a Mexican burro. It looked for all the world like an overgrown rabbit. We called her Bunny. In these days, she might be called Harvey.

The larger carriage was drawn by a Shetland pony. The boys drove the pony, the girls the donkey. Through the countryside we drove, creating much excitement and eye appeal for the farmers along the way. I remember one family rushing to the roadside to see what it was all about and I calling, "Got any gawk seeds to sell?"

Next day the irate farmer — it turned out he was one of father's best customers — barged into my father's store and told my father in no uncertain terms what he thought of us. Among other names he called us "Smart Alecs."

My memory does not fail me and I can still remember Father taking me to the woodshed and giving me a sound paddling and a lecture, the substance of which was that we were dependent on the people who shopped at his store for our affluent living and the luxuries we enjoyed.

The year of the first World's Fair in Chicago, Father took the whole family for a week, patiently showing us the sights and explaining them with meticulous care.

A painting that had created a furor in the Art section was called "The Bathers." Three very nude and undressed women. It had been censured by newspapers and women's clubs. Mother rushed us hurriedly by, but Father looked back over his shoulder. So did I.

In those days, the mere mention of pregnancy was taboo, where small children were concerned. There were three of us in 1881 and Mother had given us a package to be delivered to the home of one of the quilt makers where the committee was meeting. Curiosity triumphed over discretion and we opened the package to find four blocks, the fourth one with the name of Paul. Who was Paul, we wondered and wondered again when all the women laughed.

Very soon, we were no longer puzzled, when returning one Christmas Eve from a neighbor's, we found red and squirming Paul in Mother's bed.

My father was an intellectual who possessed a large library, many first editions, and insisted we at an early age read many of the classics. We were, however, allowed the children's books popular of that era. Among them, Lord Fauntleroy, Tom Sawyer, Huckleberry Finn and Grimm's Fairy Tales. A sentimental liking for the books of one's childhood is hard to overcome, but sometimes the difficulty is that some of the most sugary ones are remembered with the deepest affection. Little Lord Fauntleroy, for example. Even now I am filled with nostalgia for our childhood holidays of so long ago.

The Christmas tree hung with strings of pop corn, peppermint and paper angels. Our stockings hung by the fire place awaiting Santa Claus.

I remember most vividly how in winter of an evening we sat around the big wood stove whose izen glass windows cast an eerie glow. Mother would sing to us the dreary doleful songs of her childhood. One song in particular which seemed to be her favorite entitled "The Mistletoe Bough." Memory has erased most of it but it began — "The mistletoe hung on the castle wall." And at a large gathering a fair maiden calls —"Oh tarry a moment, I'll hide, I'll hide, and hide she did in a trunk in the attic where they found her many years afterwards."

How we disliked it. We would beg mother when she started her evenings of song, saying "Oh, Mama, not the one about the Mistletoe Bough," but she usually sang it and we went up the dark stairway to bed clinging to one another and looking back over our shoulders. Poor little moppets.

Alas, I have not put all these happenings in their chronological order but I have tried to tell the story of my childhood in the year 1887. In closing I quote a verse I have remembered through the years:

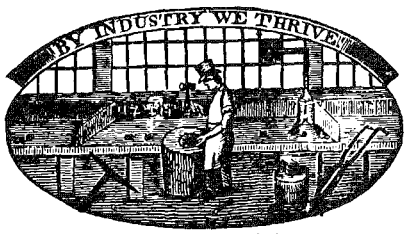
"Time was when Xmas was to me,
Some pop corn strung upon a tree.
A little table bowed with eats
A netting bag of nuts and sweets.
A pair of mittens warm and red,
A picture book, perhaps a sled.
So long ago, so long ago
How could an artless youngster know
That never in the years to be
Could time repeat the ecstasy
Of childish gifts that so beguiled
At Christmas times a little child.

Here is a story about our new town which I ran across in Reader's Digest a few days ago:

Driving along the shore at Marblehead, Mass., one spanking bright day last summer, I noticed a lone artist down on the sand. He was surrounded by all the rich possibilities for painting that an old seaport could offer: sea pounding the rocks, a wharf encrusted with barnacles, a boatyard crisscrossed with lines of riggng, masts and spars. Curious as to what he had selected, I stopped the car and made my way down to the beach.

There was a mirror affixed to the easel—and on the easel a self-portrait. After a few moments' casual talk I summoned the courage to ask, "How did you happen to come down here to paint your own portrait?"

The artist regarded me thoughtfully and then pointed to the painting. "Look at that face. Where else could I achieve that serenity of expression?"



The Bounty of Nature

How a Resourceful Person May Keep the Wolf from the Door When Times Are Hard.

By Lowell [illegible]
Decatur, Michigan

In these times when all man power is utilized in war effort, unemployment is almost unknown, but during depression nature offers revenue to man in many ways.

In the spring time about the first crop available is the water cress. Cold, wet work which however pays well at times. The cress is cut and bunched and packed in baskets to be shipped to commission houses.

Medicinal roots and herbs can be gathered at different times during the year and about the first is sassafras. Dig the root and wash it. Then strip the bark off with a knife. It can be tied in bunches and sold on the market or dried and shipped to firms that specialize in herbs. Tea made of the [illegible] is used as a blood remedy. Boil the whole root to a strong red solution and it can be used as an eye wash for pink eye.

Ginseng and golden seal have become scarce around here, although some people cultivate it. Blood root, dock, mullien, and the bark of the spice bush are all salable. For every ailment that mankind is heir to there is an herb, root, bark or berry as a cure if we but knew it. Mushrooms are sometimes salable. After a warm spring rain go to the woods or orchard. There you will find the morel or sponge mushroom. They are wholesome food although there are other kinds suitable for food, if you know the right variety. However, it is better to be safe than sorry.

Then there are the wild fruits—the huckleberry and blackberry. Most of these can be sold locally. After the first frost of autumn the paw paw can be picked and packed in grape baskets and shipped to commission houses.

I have known men who were professional turtle trappers. Turtle nets were set in creeks and lakes. When [illegible] which were trapped for a shipment they were sent to a dealer who specialized in turtles.

If you are located near a lake, the selling of bait is profitable, the lowly angle worm can be dug and even raised in the back yard. Grubs, frogs, crawfish, crickets, catalpa worms and sometimes clams are used.

There are many things that can be sold as Christmas decorations. The red berry, bittersweet, ground pine and ferns. Do not confuse the fern with the brake which grows in the swamp for which there is no market as far as I know.

Rustic chairs and stands can be made by anyone handy with tools. Sometimes in your rambling in the woods you may chance upon a small black ash tree that is hollow. Cut into sections, rustic bird houses can be made of it.

One who is handy with axe and knife may work up a tidy trade in axe and hammer handles, if you are fortunate enough to have access to a plentiful supply of hickory.

As nearly all the things I have mentioned are subject to game or trespass laws, it might be well to acquaint yourself with the laws pertaining to that trade you may wish to take up.

Decatur

Yes, Decatur will have a new industry. After seven weeks of contacts, phone calls, trips, meetings, working with executives, engineers, making surveys, etc., the American Colortype Company of Chicago has selected Decatur as a location for one of their plants.

Their plant here will be a part of the Paper Specialties Division of this company. Other plants are located in New Jersey, Ohio, and three in Chicago.

R. J. Geimer, vice-president and treasurer; W. R. Rogers, general manager of the Paper Specialties Division, and J. J.Magner, their attorney, were met at Niles Tuesday, where they had arrived on New York Central's Mercury from Chicago and brought to Decatur to meet with the township board.

Final arrangements were made to draft a lease for the renting of the Decatur township hall for their main operations, an additional building for storage purposes may be rented later. Their plant here will assemble and package Christmas seals, tags, etc., and string tags, also they will package Valentines. These products are for the nation's largest 5c and 10c chain stores, plus thousands of independent stores. The 60 feet or longer assembling machines and stringing machines will use under the present plans about 115 or 120 persons covering two shifts. With the exception of about a dozen men, all employees will be women.

Work will start as quickly as possible in getting the hall in shape and remodeled inside, after the lease has been properly executed. Information will be given as soon as possible as to the actual date of accepting employment applications and starting production.

The American Colortype Company was established back in 1903, they operated under a different name prior to that. When you have looked through a Sears, a Montgomery Ward, Alden, etc., catalogue you have been looking at some of their work, especially the color printing. If you have noticed the big Coca Cola calendars, done in many colors, they were made by them, or the beautiful colored boxes that hold Pillsbury's pie crust mix, etc., in the stores, they too came from American Colortype.

I also saw the newest fall copy of "Popular Home," a publication put out by U. S. Gypsum Co., and still coming off the presses, describing the newest in colorful modern home improvements. It is beautiful. Many of Life Magazine's color pages are done by them. This is only mentioning a few. In the near future a window display will be made up of some of their products and color printing. At present there are over 1,200 employees in their Chicago plants alone.

I do not want to forget to mention that a superintendent of one of the departments of the Paper Specialties Division, Earnest Scheetz, has owned a farm up over Fifield Hill for the past few years, and comes home on week-ends to be with his family living there. "Earnie" has been very cooperative, as also have members of the township board and the village council, who have come through with everything requested of them in connection with getting this new industry in Decatur.

Decatur can well be proud of having been selected as a location for this company's newest plant in their expansion program, so — "WELCOME TO DECATUR, American Colortype Company; we hope your plant will be operating in the near future, that you will find all of us willing to cooperate, and that you will be with us for many, many successful years." — FEP.

DEATH OF DR. GEO. MAHONEY

Dr. George W. Mahoney was born in Lawton, Michigan, Dec. 31, 1860, and died June 11, 1953, in a convalescent home in Glenview, Illinois. He was the son of the late Michael and Hanora Mahoney.

His early education had its beginning in a private school in Decatur which was taught by Mrs. Lewis Roberts. He was graduated from Decatur high school in 1878, and, for many years, has been the oldest living alumnus of the school.

He worked as a clerk two years at Robert's and Stewart's Grocery Store prior to his going to the University of Michigan for a two-year period. Because advanced medical courses were not offered in Ann Arbor at that time, he transferred to Bellevue, New York, to complete his course.

He practiced eight years in Decatur with his cherished friend, Dr. G. L. Rose, whose broad philosophy of life and deep unselfish love of fellow men etched the pattern of his future medical career.

He had an office in Dowagiac for eight months before going to Chicago in 1892 where he specialized in eye, ear, nose and throat. Later he devoted all of his time to the eye. He pioneered in cataract removal, and in perfecting the method by which artificial eyes became movable.

Later he went abroad where he studied in Vienna, then rated as having the best surgeons and hospitals in Europe. He also spent some time in London.

He was married Oct. 21, 1908, to Miss Julia A. Garvy of Chicago, who died June 25, 1946.

He was a diplomate of Ophthalmology, a member of the College of Surgeons, and was on the staff of Loyola University, Henrotin and Mercy Hospitals, and St. Vincent's Orphan Asylum. He was a member of the Knights of Columbus and also belonged to the Ancient Order of Hiberniana

During the Spanish American War he was Captain [illegible] in the 7th Illinois Regiment which was the famous [illegible] of Chicago. The last [illegible] his life was spent at a [illegible] Hospital, Illinois.

One of the outstanding characteristics of his long and useful career was the self-sacrificing charitable work which he did in connection with his profession.

Irrespective of the pressing demands made upon his talents, his love of Decatur, where his boyhood days were spent, deepened with the passing years, and no one was more familiar with its early history than he.

His loss is mourned by his two children, Mrs. Miriam McDevitt, III. of Philadelphia and George J. of Wilmette, Illinois; also a sister, Anna G. Mahoney and a brother, Dr. Richard Mahoney, both of Detroit. He also leaves five grandchildren.

The funeral was held June 15, at 10:00 a. m. in St. Francis Xavier Church, [illegible] as in Calvary Cemetery.

CONCERNING THE LIFE AND DEATH OF MRS. EVA SOUTHWORTH

By Bessie Fuhrman

Since there may be friends and acquaintances of Mrs. Eva Southworth who could not attend her funeral, it occurred to me that I might write a few lines for the paper about it, and incidentally add something about her life.

As many or perhaps all of her old friends know she was the granddaughter of the first white settler in Van Buren county—Dolphin Morris, and niece of Henry Morris whose murder occurred when she was a little girl. One of her most treasured possessions was a marble-top bureau that belonged to the murdered Morris couple.

In her long life of over eighty-one years Mrs. Southworth had somewhat more than the usual ups and downs, some of which may be mentioned here. One of her most pleasant memories of her young womanhood was her experience as a student at Valparaiso University when Pres. Brown held office there. Her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Morris were well to do farmers in Volinia township of Cass county, who raised a good "old fashion sized family," all of whom have passed away now but one daughter, Mrs. Clinnie Morton. Thus having been a member of a large family, Mrs. Southworth had many memories of joy as well as of sorrow, particularly the latter as she lived to grieve the passing of all but her sister Clinnie. But besides her joys and sorrows of her parents' family, she had those of her own family. One of her sorest trials was her fear of losing her little boy Maynard when he had an illness that required a long and difficult trial of patience and perseverence in doctoring and nursing—the latter done by herself.

Later when her two sons, Leo and Maynard were established in life with their own families, she lost her husband Judson Southworth by the terrible disease of cancer. Then as if that were not enough she had a stroke which paralyzed her. Then a broken hip and also a hernia, all of which were taken care of and even though her doctor told her she could never walk again, her determination was such that she did learn to walk again first by the aid of a mechanical walker and later quite independently, but sometimes with her cane.

Besides having the love and devotion of her two sons and their families she had the good fortune of having two very kind and helpful daughters-in-law, Alice and Gertrude Southworth. The former, the wife of Maynard Southworth, nursed her through a very bad case of diphtheria and later on cared for her during other illnesses. Gertrude, the wife of Leo Southworth, also cared for her when she was laid up with her broken hip. Thus both of her daughters-in-law did their duties by her as lovingly as if they had been her own daughters.

Her latest sorrows were those of her grandson, Carl Southworth, who died in World War II, and the death of her nephew, Herschell Morris and her brother, Elmer Morris.

Mrs. Southworth was more contented keeping her own home than staying anywhere else, and still kept house until her last illness which attacked her suddenly. After that she was taken to the hospital where she had good nursing for over a month until her death.

Considering her age and the fact that the greatest number of her friends and old neighbors had already passed on, there was a large attendance at her funeral at Newell's funeral home. The beautiful floral tributes were many. Mrs. Cressy Brigham sang softly and sweetly "Face to Face." Rev. Smith of the Bible church which she attended, spoke of her life and preached a sermon that could hardly be surpassed by even ministers of greater experience in the ministry for he stressed the importance of preparing for eternal life. Merely saying that one has no fear of death when the commands of Jesus have not been obeyed is bragging or boasting. To prepare for the higher life beyond the grave one must live the life of faith and understanding of God's word. God sends no one to hell. The individual who refuses to comply with the teachings of Jesus as he taught the word of God is responsible for eternal death. The pall bearers were her grandsons and grandsons-in-law. Mrs. Southworth was buried in Lakeside cemetery Friday, January 18, 1952.

Presbyterians Mark One-Hundredth Anniversary

Services marking the one hundredth anniversary of the organization of the local Presbyterian Church will occupy the attention of the congregation and friends next Sunday, Feb. 3.

The services will commemorate the day, one hundred years ago, Feb. 1, 1852, when the Rev. Marcus Harrison, a missionary of the American Home Missionary Society, met with three laymen to establish a church which would follow the Reformed faith.

The people who joined in the founding of the church were Mrs. Lydia Harrison, Mrs. Eli Rich, and Joseph McClintock. At the same time, Mr. McClintock was elected and ordained a ruling elder.

Later, on Jan. 4, 1853, the church was received as a member of the old Presbytery of Kalamazoo, which later became the Presbytery of Western Michigan because of a merger with another presbytery.

An interesting sidelight to the part played by Mr. Harrison in local history is the fact that the cemetery on the southeast edge of Decatur bears his name, and contains his remains and those of his family. Mr. Harrison served the local congregation and one at Lawrence for three years before ill health caused him to resign.

The First Presbyterian Church has grown from the original three members to its present membership of 180. Many hundreds of people have served the church and been served by it in the past one hundred years.

The celebration of next Sunday will begin at 11 a. m. with a service of Holy Communion led by the present pastor, the Rev. Harold W. Davis. At that time, the pastor will briefly review some of the history of the past hundred years, the heritage which the present congregation has, and the challenge of the future. Then the congregation will join in a service of rededication to the tasks of the future.

In the evening at 7:30 p. m., a "Community Night" celebration will be held to which all friends of the congregation are invited.

Representatives from various civic groups of the community will be present to bring greetings to the church. The village will be represented by Robert J. Fox, president of the village council, the churches by the Rev. William R. Short, Methodist pastor, the public schools by Superintendent Willis C. Bates, the service and commercial interests by Fred E. Pennell, president of the Lions Club, and Van Buren county by Judge Carl Mosier, judge of circuit court.

Following the greetings from community representatives, Dr. Russell H. Seibert, chairman of the department of history of Western Michigan College of Education, will address the group. Dr. Seibert is well-known here for his forceful speeches.

The day of commemoration will close with a reception for all who will attend. The newly decorated basement of the Presbyterian Church will be the scene for this social time at which refreshments will be served.

Those who attend the reception will have opportunity to see an interesting exhibit of items which have played a part in the history of the church. This exhibit, which includes communion ware, records, and other things, has been prepared by Mr. and Mrs. John F. Brigham. Mr. Brigham and his brother Frank have served the church faithfully as elders since Jan. 12, 1908, and are the elders with longest service records who are still members of the church.

The committee in charge of the community night has selected two women of the congregation for the honor of presiding at the refreshment tables. One is Miss Katherine McLeese who has the longest membership in the congregation, dating back to July 1, 1888. The other is Mrs. Louis F Cooper whose husband served the church with the longest pastorate of any minister to date.

Both the senior and junior choirs will appear and sing at both services next Sunday. Because Mrs. A. W. Stepnitz, the organist, has been called away by the death of her sister, Mrs. Ward Knoll will preside at the organ. Mrs. Cressy L. Brigham and Mrs. Robert Calbetzor will direct the choir music, in the absence of Mrs. R. T. Haefner. The congregation is grateful for the willingness of these three members to carry on with the musical aspect of the services.

The central committee is charge of the centennial years services is composed of Frank Brigham, chairman, Rolland Haefner, and Mrs. A. W. Stepnitz. The committee in charge of the community night service is composed of Mrs. Harold Narregan, chairman, Mrs. Robert McLeese, Mrs. Fred McWilliams, and Patrick Redmond.

The committees are inviting all people in the community to join with the church as it seeks to commemorate one hundred years of service to God and the community.

(A history of the First Presbyterian Church will appear in a later edition of the Republican.)

1953

THIS WEEK

By ARBA N. MOULTON, Editor

This is the substance of a letter received from Congressman Hoffman a few months ago. It was found in a collection of notes saved for comment and is offered here as something still worth thinking about.

The United States, up to the present time, has sent over one hundred and nineteen billion dollars to the Eastern nations, but it has not been enough to purchase their friendship. France, which has nearly five billion dollars. will not follow the recommendations of our secretary of state, and Britain declares she will not back our administration policy with military support. We must in some way get along with Russia or fight her alone. It is well to remember that today, as always in the past, self-interest guides the activities of all other nations.

We should discontinue robbing ourselves in this fruitless effort to curry favor with foreign nations and turn to a policy of efficiently and economically building our own national defense, and to make our own country secure.

George Washington was the Father of our country. He was "First in peace, first in war and first in the hearts of his countrymen." He led the colonies through the Revolutionary War, which won for them their independence from England. He served the first two terms as president, 1789 to 1797, and when the young states would have him serve a third term, because he was unselfish as well as [illegible] a great statesman, he refused.

His Fairwell Address stands out in literature as one of the masterpieces of the English language.

A call from Charlie Frye brought our pleasant memories of the years of long ago. He. is a pioneer of the first class, meaning that he has been a resident of the village of Decatur for over fifty years. A pioneer of the second class is one who has been a resident [illegible] er twenty-five years. Our call [illegible] was born in Decatur, but he k[illegible]ers not to reveal how long it was over fifty years ago. As he entered the front door he remarked, "This is the first time I have been in this house for over sixty years".

Charles was quite a boy when his father, the late John Frye, built this house at 108 East St. Mary's street and the Gwilt house next door. John himself rented this one and his son-in-law, Jack Johnson, the other. They were small houses in an imposing neighborhood.

W. F. Harlow, who lived in the large square house across the road, now occupied by George Sikkema and family, did not like the new improvements and called them dog houses. Of late years, however, as the cost of living and keeping up a home have gone up the desire for large houses with big rooms and high ceilings has gone down, and these small homes are in ready demand.

John Frye was a soldier of the Civil War. He fought valiently for his country, was captured and served six months in Andersonville prison. He weighed 145 pounds pounds when taken prisoner and 65 pounds when released. That hardly seems possible but it is according to the records handed down from that terrible time.

Andersonville prison was one of the worst blots on the South in their conduct of the Civil War. It was established at Andersonville, Georgia, in November, 1863, and consisted of an unsheltered enclosure of 27 acres. The superintendent was Henry Wirz, a Swiss. After the war an investigation was made of his conduct of the prison. He was convicted of injuring the health and destroying the lives of prisoners and hanged.

From February, 1804 to April, 1805, there were received at the prison 49,485 prisoners of whom 12,800 died there.

J. J. Sherman, another early citizen of Decatur, was also a prisoner in Andersonville prison and never recovered from the hardships he suffered there.

After the Civil War John Frye lived for awhile in Volinia township, where he married, and later he located in Decatur to follow his trade of carpenter.

His hard experience in the war did not destroy his good humor and he was ready for a joke whenever he found an antagonist capable of matching his sharp tongue.

The grocery store of Roberts and Stewart was a favorite gathering place for congenial old timers to loaf and trade. Nothing pleased John Frye more than to get a joke on a friend, and when the joke was on him he took it gamely and bided his time.

Once he had a verbal tilt with Charles Dennis, another practical joker who declared that during his service in the Civil War he rode up and down Hampton Roads many times on horseback in pursuit of the enemy.

John opened the conversation by telling of a field of cabbage he had raised. The cabbage grew so large that he had to harvest them with a canthook. Charlie Dennis followed by declaring that he was helping Jake Byers, the foundryman, make an iron kettle that covered a half acre of ground. John, incredulous, inquired, "What on earth could you do with a kettle as big as that?" And Dennis replied, "Cook one of your cabbages in it."

To clear up this mystery about Hampton Roads and to disseminate a little practical geographical and historical information this column offers one dollar as a prize for the best description of Hampton Roads.

It seems good and appropriate that present day citizens of Decatur should become acquainted through this column with Decatur citizens of the past who are now located elsewhere. Our home town was once their home town, the streets we travel they once traveled, the school our children attend they once attended, the land marks of the village are familiar also to them, and we all have friends in common.

This letter from a Decatur friend of many years ago will be read with pleasure by others who remember the writer. Her father was superintendent of the Decatur school from 1876 to 1883.

I first heard of John B. Upton when he was a resident of Lawrence. He was one of the early supervisors of that township, probably soon after the Civil War. He is recorded in the Van Buren County Gazetteer of 1869 as residing in Decatur, on the west side of School street opposite the school house. That is the big square house where his brother, Supt. Henry Upton, lived, where Elias Morris lived in later years and where members of the Van't Zelde family now reside.

In the same Gazetteer John B. Upton and William H. Tucker are advertised as attorneys and counselors at law, office corner of Phelps and Delaware streets, over Trowbridge and Hill's grocery store. At that time Decatur had six practicing attorneys and seemed to be on the road to becoming a city.

A number of the leading citizens of Lawrence, thinking they had missed the center of wealth and prosperity, moved to Decatur to continue their activities in the town they deemed marked for a brighter future. They did fare a little better, but not much. Some of them remained here and some moved on again, still seeking a better place. But two nicer country towns than Decatur and Lawrence are not to be found. John B. Upton, if I remember correctly, moved from Decatur to Traverse City in the early seventies, and there enoyed a successful law practice for the remainder of his life.

The following reminiscences were contained in a recent letter from Miss Lucy Upton:

241 Loma Avenue,
Long Beach 3, California,
June 23, 1954.

"This Week" often seems like a personal letter to me, as it undoubtedly does to others.

Dr. Baker was credited with saving the life of our baby brother Emory, and with giving five more years of life to Father. We entertained him and Mrs. Baker one time in Pasadena where Mrs. Baker's sister and family were well known. By now their family ranch is probably subdivided.

Your trip east was very interesting to us, especially the visit to Oberlin College. Father and his brothers did not graduate there, but John B. Upton, who was listed as one of the graduates, was years later awarded an M. A. degree for his proficiency in Greek. He once told me that "if any one started him on a page of the Iliad, he could finish it. He was my father's brother and formerly an attorney in Decatur.

I well remember Mrs. Osborn as Mattie Morehouse. Remember me to her when you see her again. I also have her picture and her sister's picture in the album their class gave to Father at graduation. They were a cute couple as they sang for the school at chapel hour.

The Ruggles home was near ours. I only remember Myrtle's name now.

Alice Hill, now Mrs. Gordon, was my Sunday School teacher about the time she was voted Decatur's most beautiful girl. Seemed natural and fitting that she should be a minister's wife. We have her photo too.

Our lives have been crowded with business and family affairs, and we anticipate two weddings in August, one, Kate's grandson, the other, Belle's granddaughter who lives in El Centro and plays the big pipe organ in the "Church Down Under," where the ceremony will no doubt be held. The other granddaughter's husband, Dr. J. W. Gilbert, has just returned from France where he had charge of a military hospital.

Your contributions to the Republican are bringing pleasure to many readers. I'm glad you can continue.

Your friend, Lucy Upton.

EVERYTHING IS FOR THE BEST

Things happen mostly for the best.
So narrow is our vision here
That we are blinded by a tear
And stunned by every hurt and blow
Which comes today to strike us low.
And yet, someday we turn and find
That what once seemed cruel, was kind.
Most things, I hold, are wisely planned
If we could only understand.

—W. G. Riffmayer, Leadville Colo.

Columns such as this one can bring out a wealth of local history which will increase in value as time goes on. One has but to interest himself in the subject of genealogy, in the settlement of a community, or a larger division of the country, to learn how many others are interested in the same thing. Nothing can be more beneficial to any of us than to keep a busy mind. That is especially true of persons who have reached the age of retirement and find that time can become a drag upon them.

One of my present regrets is that during my active years on the Republican I did not give more time and space to the accomplishments and reminiscences of our progressive and successful citizens.

When I began publishing the Decatur paper it was only 68 years before the coming of the first white settler to Van Buren county. People were living then who could remember that eventful period, and many more could recall the pioneering experiences of parents and grandparents. Today it is impossible to obtain such information first hand, and not easy to obtain it at all. That is why I am doing what I can in this line, and soliciting help from others.

Would suggest that readers make scrapbooks of local history and other items that attract them, and before they realize it they will have something of value to hand down to their posterity. This is being done in many homes.

In a recent letter from Norman E. Webster, C. P. A., of New York City, he puts the proposition this way:

"Why not try to get students, of course with the help of their history teachers, to write biographical stories of early residents, school teachers and trustees, doctors, lawyers, bankers and business people — the Hills, Copleys, Rogers, Trowbridges, Chadwicks, Brownings, Potts, Thomas, etc., to digging into old village council records, early volumes of the Republican, and school records. The State Historical Society will know where such papers are preserved.

"Their stories will be interesting to readers, but the work involved will be of greater value to the students. Of course this is my hobby. My book on accountancy of over 400 pages will come out in a few weeks."

Some readers of the Republican will recall that this is just what was done some six or eight years ago. Miss Catherine Howland was the teacher in charge of the work and it was highly successful, as the files of the paper will show.

The above paragraphs were intended to be a few lines of appreciation to Mrs. Eva Lawrence for her letter following. She not only clears up the identity of members of the Baker family, but brings out other local history which makes her letter of value to be preserved:

To This Week and Arba:

When I read your May 13 column my mind was flooded with memories, because Dr. Baker, whom it mentions, represents a distinctive period of Decatur history. Of course conditions kept changing year by year after the 1820's when people began coming west, but the same primitive customs existed until 1890, — no electricity, phones, plumbing or good roads. To those of us who are 70, 80, 90 years old, half of that time was familiar, and half becomes more or less familiar from the stories of parents, grandparents, uncles and aunts.

So it almost seems we lived years before we were born. I have that feeling very strongly because I was with Helen Nutting Burke so many years. She was a sister of Mrs. Baker and told me in dramatic fashion the things that had happened to the Bakers, the Nuttings and other people of Decatur since she came there in 1857. She told me how they lived and worked and played. Of course I know how simply my own family lived. Dr. Baker's domain of almost half a block looked like a castle and unapproachable during the seventies.

Well, the day came when my husband built a house on the lot east of Dr. Baker's house, where his perfectly kept garden had been for about 45 years. That was in 1903.

In 1908, when our son decided to enter the University of Michigan, the doctor came right over to tell us, so exuberantly, that it was 54 years ago that he graduated with the first U. of M. medical school class. He was retired and feeble, but triumphant with that memory of accomplishment. To us it looked like such a long time. Another added half century does not seem as long, looking back.

In retrospect I can see Charles, the younger, living at Dr. Baker's while going to high school, taking care of the doctor's viscious horses and doing work about the home. The doctor did have high school boys to do just that during his strenuous practice years. I remember Aunt Nell telling some incident about young Charles that I have forgotten, and also about Lou Nutting, an attractive sister of Mrs. Baker who lived with them awhile, probably in the sixties.

The Alumni Association was not organized for several years after the first class graduated. By that time the graduates had attained the titles given them in the Alumni book.

The mental pictures are unlimited and personalities become glorified, or picturesque, or funny, or queer, or sad — anything one is capable of seeing understandingly.

This is just one little story of early Decatur days to be added to those published in the Republican in the past. I hope there will be added every week something form the many who have stories to tell.

Eva Lawrence

This being the week of the meeting of the Decatur Alumni Association would like to add this letter just received from N. E. Webster of New York City, a member of the Decatur high school class of 1884:

Thanks for your letter of May 19 and for your interesting stories in This Week.

I shall not attend the Alumni Dinner, June 5. Though I go to office each day I come home early on the doctors' orders. And my wife is not yet able to leave our house so I should stay here with her. I am sending my dues and hope to be kept on the roll.

I send my greetings to my seniors Mrs. Alice Hill, Gordon '79, Miss Flora Buell '81 and Mrs. Mattie Morehouse Osborn '82 and I accept the salutes of all you juniors.

This Week brings up memories. I think the Concklin Foundry was in the old Tannery building. I used to go there to get sand which I used for the molding of Jackstraws of lead.

Dr. Charles T. Baker was important in my life. He introduced me to it.

My wife and I were interested in the items about Mrs. Eva Olcott Lawrence whom we remember well.

I am sorry to read that Harley Squier is very ill. When he went in the Bank to replace Dana Hill who had gone to Mulvane, Kansas, he left a hole at the Hinkley Stave Company office in which I rattled around until Emory Squier was ready to take the job.

Though I am not sure that I ever saw the old school bell I remember it well and not merely for its sound. The bell rope came through the ceiling of the High School room and boys rang it to call pupils back from recess. Girls sat below it and one afternoon I took the rope as far as I could before I let go and the girls dodged. Prof. Hitchcock said: "Ed Webster stop that rope." I did exactly what he told me to do. When I stopped the rope it did not quiver but the scholars grinned. Professor said, "Leave the room." I did as he told me but as I never heard anything more about the incident, I guessed that wise Miss Pearce told the Principal that it might be better to forget the matter. I could go on indefinitely but must stop.

Cordially,
Norman E. Webster.

Mr. and Mrs. Chadwick of Minneapolis called on the writer one day last week. They had driven here from Lawrence, were seeking information about their relatives, and were told at the Republican office that this is headquarters for local history.

The name Chadwick was prominent in the early life of Decatur and Van Buren county, and the wonder is that not more is known about them today. It may take the patient searching of our genealogist friends, Mrs. Corliss of South Haven and Mrs. Longcore of Lawrence, to bring out the interesting Chadwick story.

Our caller was the son of Will Chadwick, and a nephew of Belle Chadwick, who was indeed one of the belles of Decatur. She had a beautiful soprano voice, and in both her voice and appearance reminded one of Lillian Russell.

Frederick M. Chadwick was the father of Will and Belle and the grandfather of our caller. The Van Buren Gazetteer of 1869 records him as a clerk in the drygoods store of his brothers, Evard E. and John L. Chadwick, and his home was on the south side of Sherwood street, third house west of Williams. He moved his family to Minneapolis in the eighties and his daughter passed away there soon after.

The Chadwick brothers moved their business and their families from Lawrence to Decatur over ninety years ago. They built the three story brick building, now owned and occupied by G. R. Gale, in 1863. Our next door neighbor for many years, the late Charles M. Rawson, once said that he remembered as a small boy seeing the big pile of brick in the road in front of the lot ready for the masons to commence the building.

In this same year, 1863, Decatur's first brick school house was erected. According to a card attached to a picture of the building, presented by Mrs. Marietta Taylor, this building was destroyed by fire the Night of February 12, 1919. This was so published in this column a few weeks ago and brought out statements that the date of the fire is incorrect. We have no other record to go by except the files of the Republican which verify it

A number of pioneer families who first settled in Lawrence moved over to Decatur in its formative years. It was predicted that this village was destined to become a city, perhaps a rival of Kalamazoo. It failed to that extent, but to become a city, perhaps a rthis line isno god and so haps a rival of Kalamazoo. It failed to that extent, but Decatur will always be a good hometown and attract good people for residents.

There are no Chadwicks now residing in Decatur. The last was Marion E. Chadwick who passed away in the early part of the century.

Mrs. Eva Lawrence of Ottumwa, Iowa, writes that some of the items in this column bring back remembrances of her early Decatur days. She has been one of its welcomed contributors, and is receiving a cordial invitation to continue the pleasant work.

Mrs. Lawrence can furnish the date of the flag of 36 stars presented by Miss Ione Haydon. The answer to that question printed several months ago has not yet been received, and she is here informed that the newspaper rule is that news is always news until it is printed. In her hesitancy to write for publication she quotes these lines:

"If your ears would save from jeers,
These things keep mildly hid:
Myself and I, and mine and my,
And how I do and did."

But she is told not to fear such criticism. It is far from her nature to be boastful. Quoting further: "The letters that come to "This Week" are so greatly enjoyed, I always want to tell the writers how much happiness they give me." She mentions especially Miss Lucy Upton of Long Beach, California, and N. E. Webster of New York City.

"Lucy Upton always says things I feel like saying. They lived such a short time in Decatur (six or seven years), I wonder why she remembers it so affectionately. I remember them very well. If they left in 1882 (It might have been in 1883). I was eleven years old. Professor Upton looked as remote as even God to me and I thought he was almost as important. Mrs. Upton was often on the speakers' platform as a W.C.T.U. worker. She may have been one of the saloon haters and gone on raids with Carrie Nutting and others. Aunt Nell has told me vivid tales about them.

"I just haven't the courage to tell about Aunt Nell's Boys' Club, it turned out so funny but tragic. I don't believe there is anybody in Decatur now who was in that club. I have to laugh every time I think of it, Aunt Nell was such a big hearted person.

"We were so glad to read your letter from Frank Thomas about Lake of the Woods, it was so true as I remember it. Myra and Harold drove to Des Moines to see "The King and I" last week. They were delighted with it — beautiful scenery and subject matter."

Aunt Nell was Mrs. Thomas Burke, daughter of Lucius Nutting, sister of Mrs. Dr. Baker and cousin of Mrs. Carrie Nutting Carr. Mrs. Lawrence resided in the home of Mrs. Burke for a number of years after the death of her mother. The house was at the east end of Delaware street, on the north side, some distance back from the road.

Frank Steele of Devil's Lake, North Dakota called on the writer at the Republican office one day last week. He was a son of Solomon and Jennie and sisters were Grace, Fred, Ida, Harry and Beulah, none left in this community. Frank attended the old Red School, which later became known as the Barber School and a few years ago was destroyed by fire: He attended the Decatur school for a year or two and said his particular school friend here was Harry Babcock.

Frank left home when he was 17 and never returned. He was 80 the 10th of last August. He learned the trade of plasterer and brick layer and has worked all over the United States and Canada and never married but was a contented wanderer until he struck Devil's Lake some 30 years ago. This city is located near the shore of the lake of the same name and is noted for its exceptional goose and duck hunting. It has a population of about 7,000. There our caller found his ideal location and settled down.

TO THE LINE: The Oscar Romig company, local (Marcellue, Mich.) furniture and undertaking establishment, advertises:

USE OUR CONVENIENT LAY AWAY PLAN

We would like to know which department is trying to drum up business.

Leon H. Moses in Chicago Tribune.

The curious Mr. Moses should know without asking which is an optional and which a required purchase.

Will Carleton was a Michigan poet, born in Hudson in our neighboring county of Hillsdale in 1845. He graduated from Hillsdale college and devoted his time to writing and lecturing, traveling thru the United States, Great Britain and Canada. He once lectured" in Decatur, the town hall was packed to hear him and his coming stood out for many years as one of the conspicuous events of the village. If we had any word of criticism to offer here of his appearance that night it would be silenced by these lines from one of his poems:

"Boys flying kites haul in their winged birds,
You can't do that way when you're flying words.
"Careful with fire" is good advice we know,
"Careful with words" is ten times doubly so.
Thoughts unexpressed may sometimes fall back dead;
But God Himself can't kill them when they're said."

Of his numerous books "Farm Ballads" is our favorite. To get acquainted with Carleton it might be well to read this one first. Patronize the Decatur library, it is maintained for the benefit of the public and you will find the librarian obliging and helpful.

This is the week of the opening of school. We asked a small boy if he was glad. He said, "No."

A magazine article by a teacher of New York City advocated the doing away with long vacations for the reason that the pupils get out of touch with school work and it takes them several weeks to get keyed up to it agian. Much valuable time is thereby lost, both to the pupils and the teachers.

The Decatur public school has made valuable progress since the organization of the district in 1863. The first class was graduated in 1867. It contained three graduates. This year's class contained 53 graduates.

We have a catalogue of the "Decatur Union School of 1873-4" a gift of the late Dora M. Christie Forbes Anderson, who was in the fifth grade that year. It was published 80 years ago the seventh of July by the board of trustees which consisted of six members, one more than at the present time. They were H. B. Clapp, director; Newton Foster, moderator; John G. Haynes, treasurers; Lyman T. Rawson, Myron Hinkley, Thomas Browning.

The teachers were S. G. Burked, Prin.; Emma Rice, high school; Ellen Lyman, grammar; May Duffin, Viola Childs and Mrs. M. H. M. Combs, different terms of 2nd. Intermediate; Fannie Trowbridge (Stewart), 1st. Intermediate; Jennie Ridlon, 2nd. primary; Fannie Beattie (Collins), 1st primary.

Mrs. Stewart was the mother of Mrs. Ethel Lewis of Decatur and Bay View, and Mrs. Collins was the mother of Mrs. Fannie Rogers of Kalamazoo.

The report of the director paints in glowing words the high standing of the school. Following is a paragraph of his three page statement:

Punctuality and regular attendance deserve particular mention. In banishing the two great evils, tardiness and irregularity, we have been remarkably successful. Our per cent of attendance has been increased from 75 to 95. Truancy, runn' ig away from school, especially from examinations, formerly very common, is now almost, if not quite unknown. Examinations are hailed with delight, and enthusiasm, and excellent deportment of pupils characterizes the school."

Principal S. G. Buked also gives an elaborate report including a financial statement of receipts and expenses for monthly entertainments given by the pupils and faculty. In it he states, "I have also placed in the school my cabinet of specimens, including a choice collection of shells, minerals, birds, mammals, reptiles, insects, etc. And allow me to say here that the collection has afforded our school a great deal of interest and profit."

During our years in school this collection occupied a conspicuous part of the office of the superintendent, then known as the principal. The pupils were attracted to it principally by the many varieties of mounted birds displayed in a large case next to the wall. This fine collection was destroyed by the fire that took the schoolhouse the night of February 12, 1919.

In 1874 there were 570 pupils in the school and their names are all recorded by grades in the catalogue.

Webb's reader was used in the first grade, and Sanders' in the other grades.

Here are two of the four verses of a poem by N. P. Willis in Sanders' Fourth Reader:

Youthful Amusements

I love to look on a scene like this,
Of wild and careless play,
And persuade myself that I am not old,
And my locks are not yet gray;
For it stirs the blood of an old man's heart,
And makes his pulses fly,
To catch the thrill of a happy voice,
And the light of a pleasant eye.
Play on! play on' I am with you there,
In the midst of your merry ring;
I can feel the thrill of the daring jump,
And the rush of the breathless swing.
I hide with you in the fragrant hay,
And I whoop the smothered call,
And my feet slip on the seedy floor,
And I care not for the fall.

Allen Chesebro is a congenial friend gained through occasional correspondence during my many years with the Republican. He was also a faithful subscriber to the paper and wrote for it true stories of Lake Michigan adventures and tragedies. Those old newspaper days were most interesting days. One is liable to forget, when life is going on like a song, that there will ever come a change, but come there will. It was so with my life on the Republican and it will be so with all of us. "We shall all be changed," and it may come "in the twinkling of an eye."

Most of Allen Chesebro's life has been spent on this shore of Lake Michigan a few miles south of South Haven. He went to school nearby with members of the Hoppin family, relatives of Mrs. Carries Hill of Decatur, and they were all friends. He built his Evergreen Lodge there and it has prospered these many years.

The property consists of an acre or more of ground partly grown up to trees, on which is displayed antiques and curios of various kinds which he buys and sells. He also has six substantial log cabins located on the lake bluff which he has rented at a profit sufficient to give himself and wife a comfortable living.

Mr. Chesebro has had an optimistic outlook on life and a sense of humor. Signs posted about the grounds to announce his wares or tell a joke will cause a smile and ofttimes may bring a sale. Here is a sample:

"In June of 1907 from this point the great sea serpent was seen at sundown, when this monster crossed the path of the setting sun, going south one-half mile out. Mr. and Mrs. Milton Gruber and myself estimated the part above water to be 70 feet long. It was during the famous local option days.

Allen Chesebro."

This spring the water has risen so high in the lake that it has undermined the bluff and broken it down to within a rod or less of the cottages. An effort has been made to keep it from washing out further by fastening one end of heavy wire cables or chains to trees well back from the shore, and the other end to planks pressed against the bluff. This has been expensive, and it is to be hoped it will be effective.

We called at Evergreen Bluff April 26. Mr. Chesebro was out dynamiting. His wife answered the call. She told of the havoc the water had wrought and said they were near to discouragement. It was a cruel blow. What the future has in store for them they can only guess. Lake Michigan is a good servant but a very bad master. They may even yet find a way to outwit it.

In looking over some discarded possessions in a store room I came across my first spectacles, pince nez (pronounced pans na), purchased just 30 years ago. My nose isn't shaped right for this style of spectacles and they frequently slid off onto the floor. This reminded me of a Sunday morning some three quarters of a century ago when I attended the Presbyterian church and disgraced myself by laughing out loud in the meeting.

The pastor, Reverend Mr. Noerr was an earnest man and an eloquent preacher. He sometimes became so absorbed in his subject that he would walk away from the pulpit and gesticulate with fervor. On this particular morning in one of his most eloquent passages his hand struck the side of his prince nez spectacles with such force that they shot across the platform and onto the curch floor, where they remained until after the service.

It is strange how such an inconsequential incident should have so affected a small boy, but did you ever get into a predicament where you just had to laugh and just couldn't? There is nothing more painful.

Another unusual thing is that these glasses, replaced by a stronger pair some 20 years ago, should again fit my eyes and would be put into service if only they would stay where they belong.

We took an hour's ride about the country with Roy and Grace Hinkley and drove past some of the oil wells near Lawton. I had no idea the wells over there were producing so abundantly. Roy says that some of them are pumping at the rate of 100 barrels a day, and there must be 15 or 20, maybe 40 of them. New ones are being drilled every few days, and big tanks are at the wells from which to truck the oil away. There is still some drilling in the vicinity of Decatur and lessors are living in hopes.

I learned that Myron and Ruby Hinkley of Fresno, Calif., were called to Plainwell, 12 miles north of Kalamazoo, a few weeks ago by the death of a relative of the latter. They flew to Chicago (a six hour trip), took a train to Kalamazoo, where they were met by their sister, Ceclia Hinkley Pearce, and drove the latter's car to their destination. They remained in Michigan less than three days, leaving Chicago for their home by train the following Sunday. The atmosphere of California is thoroughly mixed in their blood and they say they will not return to Michigan except to visit.

We learned on this trip that Frank Drury, who went west from Lawton many years ago and settled in Clovis where Myron edits the Independent, died a year or two ago, soon after his 100th birthday. He was a remarkable citizen and we won't stamp him as being old. He never claimed that distinction. He was an active man, fond of horseback riding and led the parade in the Clovis annual celebration when he was well along in the nineties.

A few weeks ago the letter following was sent to Postmaster Creagan and he sent it on to the writer at Marblehead, Mass. Instead of answering it at once the letter was brought back to Decatur to be answered here:

Dear Sir:

The object of this letter is to make contact with some member of the family of Dr. C. T. Baker (I think first name Charles) who was a physician in Decatur many years. He was born in 1829, and of course is now not living, but I hope that some of his descendants are. I shall greatly appreciate the fav r if you will send me names and addresses of any Bakers who now reside in Decatur, or refer me to someone who might be able to give them to me.

He is kinfolk through his brother Hiram and I hope that some descendants of his may be able to give me information of early Baker family data.

Sincerely,
Addie Loucks Lehman
8705 Garfield street
Bethesda, Maryland

Dr. C. T. Baker is indeed an old time Decatur physician. He was born in Steuben county, New York in 1829. He graduated from the University of Michigan in 1854 (just 100 years ago,) and located in Decatur the same year, where he practiced until his death. Time out was when he served as a contract surgeon during the Civil War. He was on duty at City Point, Va., General Grant's headquarters, when General Lee surrendered his army to General Grant on the memorable 14th day of April, 1865—the day of President Lincoln's assassination.

Dr. Baker gave up his practice in the early part of the present century. I write from memory. Perhaps some reader can set the date more accurately.

Older residents of Decatur are familiar, with his spacious well kept home on the northeast corner of Delaware and George streets. A filling station is now in front of the house and there is little evidence that it was one of the prettiest corners in town.

We know of no members of the Baker family in the village, but the address of Miss Ione Haydon, a granddaughter of Hiram Baker, is Decatur, Mich., RFD. 2. One of the granddaughters of John Baker is Mrs. Lucile Osborn, Hartford, Mich. She has taught school in Keeler for many years and must be close to her retirement year. John and Hiram Baker settled in Keeler township.

Here is a little unexplained local history which we should like to see cleared up: The Decatur high school Alumni book states that the first class was graduated in 1867 and that the three members were Morris Foster, Charles Baker, M. D. and Sarah Rogers Andrews.

According to the Van Buren county history and the letter from his relative in Maryland Dr. Baker in 1867 was 38 years old, a little old for a high school graduate, especially as he graduated from the University of Michigan in 1854. Would like very much to get the explanation from anyone who knows the facts. There may be another M. D. of the same name who graduated and located elsewhere.

Walter Squier of Battle Creek and his mother, Mrs. Harley Squier of Buchanan called last Saturday. They reported that Harley, who was 92 September 20

What has become of the old school house bell? If any reader can furnish information or reminiscences concerning it the same will be welcome. The bell was probably fastened into its place in the belfry when the building was completed in 1864, and it did faithful service there until that fateful night of February 11, 1919, when the school house was destroyed by fire.

In the days of long ago it called the children to school and in from recess every morning and afternoon of the school week. It was rung five minutes at 8:30, one minute at 8:50, and tolled five minutes at 9:00 o'clock. Promptly on the second of nine the janitor who had the complete mastery of the ringing of the bell, gave three sharp sounds of the gong, and woe to the pupil, big or little, who was not then in his room. If a pupil was tardy he was compelled to bring an excuse from one of his parents. It did not often happen.

For the afternoon session the bell was rung at 1:00 o'clock, 1:20 and 1:30.

Clayton Howe and family drove over to Evergreen Bluff, South Haven, one day last summer, and became interested in the proprietor, Allen Chesbro's collection of bells. He had all kinds, big and little, church bells, school bells, dinner bells, car bells, cow bells and general purpose bells. Clayton discovered one on which were cast the words, "Concklin, Decatur, Mich.," and bought it. The bell was 12 inches in height and 20 inches in diameter at the base — a typical school bell. The Evergreen Bluff proprietor said he found it in a South Haven junk yard and knew nothing about its previous history.

J. T. Concklin once owned and operated the Decatur foundry which was located just west of George street near the South Side store, and the family lived in the house opposite the store on the corner. He had a wife and two children, Johnnie and Flora. I was about Johnnie's age, and we were all in the grades in school. His father bought crackers by the barrel, which was quite wonderful to me, and we had unlimited access to them. There was a large trough kept filled wi'h water in the foundry, and we boys went swimming in it in the summer time.

In the gay nineties the Knights of Pythias Lodge was organized in Decatur. It was a secret society for men based on the friendship of Damon and Pythias.

The lodge was founded in Washington, D. C., by Justus H. Rathbone and six companions in 1864. It forged rapidly to the front among the secret organizations of the country, and for many years was popular in our village. The First World War took most of our young men away from home, and gave those left something else besides the friendly contacts of lodges to think of. Older organizations held up better, but all for a while had a struggle to keep going. The K. of P. Lodge of Decatur finally gave up its charter and disbanded. The Supreme Knights of Pythias of the World continues to be an active organization and is well represented in Michigan.

The early years of the present century were glorious years. The world was at peace. The people were fairly prosperous and contented. The young Pythian lodge in Decatur flourished and many social events grew out of its activities.

The Grand Lodge sent its best young members out as visitors to the suborbinate lodges. Their work was to create local enthusiasm and to give instruction in the work when needed. Will E. Hampton of Ann Arbor was most frequently assigned to this section of Michigan. He was Grand Keeper of Records and Seals while I occupied the same office in the Decatur lodge.

A friendship grew up between us in those early years which will last as long as life itself. For over fifty years we have kept in touch with each other, and at each Christmas he has brightened the day for me with one of his clever Christmas poems. Have shared them in the past with readers of the Republican, and this year, through the kindness of my successor, Editor Eleanor Kinney am giving it the space of my column, THIS WEEK.

My dear old friend this year announces that he has passed his ninetieth birthday, and that he is leaving the pretty city of Ann Arbor for a new location. The passing of Mrs. Hampton, his faithful companion of many years necessitated this change.

May the years continue to lay lightly upon him, and if he is permitted to write his Grand Christmas poem ten years hence that will round out his century of birthdays, I hope still to be here to receive it and to give it its accustomed place in the Republican.

HOW DOES IT SEEM TO BE NINETY?

How does it seem to be four score and ten??
An age attained by very few men?
That was a matter I had wondered about
When a friend of mine found that, his lot.
And now that I am in that class,
I can hardly believe it has come to pass!
When I was young, years went so slow
I was happy to have them come, and go.
When my fiftieth birthday came along,
Life was still, to me, "One Grand Sweet Song."
At seventy it was still the same—
I was happily playing Life's daily game.
Then along came eighty, and I "retired" —
Though able to do all that Life required
Of a man still in his early prime—
Thumbing his nose at Old Man Time!

And now I am ninety — 'most ninety-one,
With a start for a hundred just begun!
And should you ask me — "How does it seem?"
I can truly say — "It's like a dream!"
I don't take stairs two steps at a time
As I always did when in my prime,
And at golf no more play eighteen holes —
In some aspects Age takes its tolls.

A year ago I was living alone,
And the lonesomeness had steadily grown,
So I've decided to live with a son
'Till my stay on earth is finally done.
How long that will be, only God can know,
But when the day comes I'll be ready to go —
Though as long as my heart continues to beat,
Life for me will still be very sweet;
And that sweetness very largely depends
On the many guys I call my friends.
So "Merry Christmas" I wish for all—
May the good God see that nothing befall
To you and yours throughout the year,
With naught to cause a single tear. Will E. Hampton

Old time residents like to read stories of the Decatur of yesteryear and their welcome contributions aid in increasing interest in this column. An effort is being made to induce the young people to become better acquainted with the history of our country and the reminiscences printed here may properly be classified as local history.

Mrs. Roy (Grace) Hinkley, daughter of Orris and Harriet Garwood Roberts, writes, "I am sending you a certificate which my mother received in 1877. Henry Upton was principal and Allie Ward her teacher. My mother was very fond of Miss Ward and spoke of her as being one of the best teachers she ever had. I wonder if anyone else can remember her. George McDol was in mother's drawing class at that time. Also I enclose the contract which mother signed when she taught the Code school in 1880."

This is a copy of the certificate of advancement:

"Wise Men Lay Up Knowledge"
Decatur Graded School

This certifies that Hattie Garwood has passed a satisfactory examination in bookkeeping and that her standing was 98 per cent.

Decatur, Mich., April 28, 1877.

Allie Ward, teacher
H. Upton, principal

Perfection is 100%, Necessary to pass 85%.

Mrs. Hinkley also sent a teacher's third grade certificate issued to her mother March 28, 1881, and signed by Henry Upton, Township Superintendent of Schools. Some of her standings were, Reading 98, Penmanship 95, Grammar 90, Arithmetic 98, Geography 85.

But the prize relic of these old records is the following:—

Teacher's Contract.

It is hereby contracted and agreed between S. H. Mallory, director of School District No. 6, Township of Hamilton, etc., and H. E. Garwood that the said H. E. Garwood, shall teach in the Sawyer School of said District, for the term of FOUR months commencing the 30th day of November, 1880; and the said H. E. Garwood agrees faithfully to keep a correct list of the pupils and the age of each attending school of said district, agrees to keep the schoolhouse in good repair, to provide the necessary fuel and pay said H. E. Garwood for said services as teacher the sum of EIGHTY-EIGHT dollars before the first day of May, 1881.

Provided, that in case said H. E. Garwood shall be dismissed from school by said board for gross immorality, or violation of this contract, or have her certificate annulled by the town superintendent she shall not be entitled to compensation after said annulment or dismissal.

It is also agreed that said H. E. Garwood shall board herself and build the fires and sweep the schoolhouse.

November 22, 1880.

S. H. Mallory, Director; Hattie E. Garwood, teacher. Approved by H. A. Bradley, Moderator; Orin P. Maxon, Assessor. This is a standard form.

It will be noted that the present Code district was formerly the Sawyer district.

President's Day: The day the President of the United States is inaugurated. It occurs every year next after a year divisible by four. It occurred on March four previous to 1934. Congress changed the day to January 20 and Franklin D. Roosevelt's first inauguration was on that day. Thus Herbert Hoover served the shortest time of any President serving a full term,—44 days less than four years.

Now that March 4 is no longer Inauguration Day a movement has been started by a Congressman from California to make it a holiday and call it President's Day. It would be a day devoted to the study of United States history and especially the Presidents from George Washington to the present, in the schools and elsewhere. The promoter suggested that pupils be assigned to write essays on the Presidents, and submitted some that had been written. Here are three of them:

George Washington, 1789: "I was a general, first President of the United States and Founding Father. I saw 13 colonies become a free nation. I am remembered as 'First in War, First in Peace and First in the Hearts of my Countrymen.' I married Martha Custis, a widow with two children."

Abraham Lincoln, 1861: "I was known as 'Honest Abe.' I was a lawyer. I went to Congress. Debated against Stephen A. Douglas against slavery. I won the hand of Mary Todd, but lost the debate with Douglas. Four years of Civil War lay ahead. My Cabinet was against me, but I struggled on, freed the slaves and declared at Gettysburg that 'government of the People, by the People and for the People must not perish from the earth.'"

Franklin D. Roosevelt, 1933: "I am a New Dealer and a friend of the poor. I told the people the only thing to fear was fear. I ushered in old people's retirement money. I proclaimed four freedoms — freedom of speech, worship, want and fear. I married Teddy Roosevelt's niece, Eleanor, who became famous going everywhere to see how people lived. I contracted polio, but I had the will not to be an invalid. I was elected President four times."

BOSS AND BOSSED

As manager, then president
For many years I managed men,
But when I came back home at night
I failed as boss in my own den;
For wife e'er told me what to do—
My well laid plans were often crossed,
But finally I learned one thing—
To make the best of being bossed.

— Alonzo N. Benn, 5000 East End Avenue, Chicago, Illinois.

Three quarters of a century ago Decatur was a lively village and nearly as large in population and wealth as it is today.

Decatur's population in the early years has, however, been the subject of some discussion by persons interested in local history. In its formative years great things were expected of this village. There was no limit to which the enthusiastic early settlers expected it to go in population and wealth.

The Van Buren County Gazetteer published in the office of the Decatur Republican in 1869, contains this paragraph:

"The village was first incorporated by the legislature by an act approved March 16, 1861. The first president was E. P. Hill, the first recorder, Orrin T. Welch.

"Since its incorporation the village has grown rapidly, and more especially since the close of the late war. Village lots have been laid out and put on the market. It is safe to say that no town on the line of the Michigan Central enjoys a greater degree of material prosperity. It now contains a population of two thousand five hundred." This last statement that did the mischief was published right here in Decatur in 1869.

The census reports for Decatur village and for Decatur township are as follows:

Year	Village	Twp. including village
1860	564	1,216
1870	1,420	2,512
1880	1,267	2,248
1894	1,336	2,158
1910	1,286	2,100
1920	1,270	2,253
1930	1,582	2,618
1940	1,599	2,565
1950	1,664	2,756

It is plain that in giving the population of Decatur as 2,500 the combined population of both the village and the township was meant, but it was not so stated. A few years later a patriotic citizen in praising Decatur claimed for it the larger population, and this further spread the mistaken belief that we are in part a "deserted village."

A few weeks ago mention was made of a call from a member of the Chadwick family, prominent residents of Van Buren county. He was the grandson of Frederick M. Chadwick and son of Will Chadwick. They resided in Decatur about twenty years following War, then moved to

...y-
...nset, you can
...im and watch

Minneapolis. The man, accompanied by his wife, was trying to locate the place of business and homes of his relatives here, but they were in such a hurry that we failed to get their first name and address.

The story of the Chadwicks interested Decatur old timers. Several asked for further information about them. One desired to send them a piece of silverware with the name "Chadwick" engraved upon it, which had been in his family for many years.

Another wrote: "Will you please send me the address of Mr. Chadwick, if you have it, as I would like to write to him. I am much interested in the family but did not know that I could ever contact any of the descendents."

Would like to bring the family back to acquaintance with Decatur people, if possible.

For many years they occupied a prominent place in its social and business life. Will the readers help?

Grace Chadwick was once an efficient clerk in the Decatur post office. She married John O'Leary and they moved to Cassopolis. Both are now dead, but we think they left two sons who may be in touch with readers of the Republican.

Have enjoyed getting in touch again with the Ruggles family. Eli Ruggles came into this county before the Civil War and acquired a farm in Hamilton township. Money came in slowly from the farm, too slow to meet the needs of a growing family, and the desires of an ambitious hard working man like Mr. Ruggles.

Then came the Decatur boom and the Ruggles family sold the farm and came in on the boom. In his story of a busy life he says: "I have stated that we moved to Decatur to speculate and make money easier. We didn't do it, but lost all we had. Soon after going to Decatur other railroads were built which shut off its trade in all directions and Decatur was left with but little territory to support it. Property went down. Houses and lots could be bought for a song, and the Ruggles family finally moved to the growing town of Oak Park, near Chicago.

In Chicago, Harry Ruggles became one of five men to found the Rotary Club. Now he is the oldest living member of the club, he has been invited to be the guest of honor at its Golden Anniversary to be held in Chicago on May 29 to June 2, 1955. He resides in Los Angeles, California, and was 83 years old the 16th of last September; but his health to date is good and he expects to be there. We hope he can come and will come to Decatur to visit the scenes of his boyhood.

The Ruggles home is the pretty house among the trees at the south east corner of George and Wheeler streets, now the home of Asa Root and family. Eli Ruggls set out those trees.

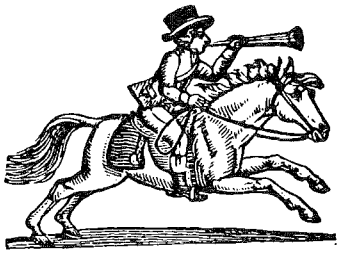
Noises in the night. I was awakened in the night by a rumbling noise that might have been caused by the beating of rain on the roof, the gas giving off heat from the furnace, or an engine under steam on the track. These three noises are much alike. It is also difficult to judge the distance of a sound in the silent night.

Our former townsman, Charles H. Mahoney, American representative of the United Nations, has drawn the fire of the Chicago Tribune for a speech he made before that organization last week.

Mr. Mahoney argued that the member nations aid countries that are victims of future wars by providing arms for any troops willing to help defend them but unable to arm themselves.

The Tribune's editorial was the first one in the issue of Sunday November 7. The Tribune is quite liable to be on the losing side of an argument and Mr. Mahoney will undoubtedly be able to defend his side should he care to. He has the backing of President Eisenhower.

A little poetry for the close:
I think that I shall never see
A billboard lovely as a tree.
Indeed, unless the billboards fall
I'll never see a tree at all.
Odgen Nash.



When former residents write to me and their letters are noted in this column other old timers also receive the benefit of their friendly comments. The writers increase the pleasure they give and I hope they do not object to being quoted. Whenever they do object their request, "for you only" or "not for publication," is always respected.

Mrs. Elizabeth Dewey Rice of Lodi, California, a resident of Decatur in the last two decades of the century past, wrote sometime ago of her pleasure in hearing from old friends. She takes the Republican just to hear about them, and gives this column credit for keeping up her interest in the paper. She mentioned receiving holiday letters from Maude Lyle, Charlotte Huyck, Luella Sprague, Eva Hamlin, Alice Hampton, Clara Harris, Bessie Wassman, Harriet Tinkham Hill and Belle Lyle, all well known young people of her early Decatur years. She adds, "How I enjoyed them. The trouble is that of late years they have gotten to be only annuals."

Her brother, Fred Dewey, who once owned a half interest in the Decatur paper, suffered a stroke of paralysis last year which made him an invalid and unable to talk. When this letter was written he seemed to be a little better. His address is — Lilly's Rest Home, 1217 Grand River, Lansing, Mich.

Last fall Mrs. Rice and husband visited her sister, Vedah Rouse at her home in Los Angeles. From there they went to Catalina Island and saw Ray Dodge and family who live there. Ray was once a Decatur boy. His sisters live in Southern California and one of them is the wife of Otto Van Hise.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Keller of Birmingham and the latter's sister, Mrs. Lucille Rudzinski drove to California and from there sailed on the Lurline for Honolulu. An airmail card was received from Lucille April 5. She wrote that they were staying at the beautiful Royal Hawaiian Hotel, and from the picture sent it is both beautiful and spacious.

On the boat going over they met Maurice Brooks, a former Decatur citizen. He and Charles Propp conducted a general store on the northwest corner of Phelps and Delaware streets where now is the gas station run by Merton High. Maurice is in business in Tucson, Arizona.

Our travelers flew to the island of Hawaii but could not go to the volcano because there had been an eruption that morning. The temperature at Honolulu was 82 degrees.

Lucile Carney Rudzinski has been a resident of Decatur all of her life. She graduated from the high school in 1905, and her college work was taken at the M. A. C. She was married to the late Robert Rudzinski, whom she met at East Lansing, and returned to Decatur to spend many years in the drug store of her father and husband. Then, when their days on earth were finished she went through the trying years of managing the estates of both. It now seems possible for her to have a few years, more or less, of carefree enjoyment. She fully deserves them and has the sincere good wishes of this department. (Editor Eleanor checks this paragraph and says to let it go for the entire paper).

Birthday congratulations. Mrs. Alice Hill Gordon 95, March 10, 1954. Mrs. Gordon is the oldest living graduate of the Decatur high school. She finished under Professor Upton in 1879. There were 16 in the class and it was not until 1895 that the school turned out another class as large.

The members were Clyde Tucker, Alvin Hathaway, Jennie Buell, Lincoln E. Buell, Mary Shookman Wells, Anna Jordan, Emma Priest Waters, Mary Shaad Hanks, Alice Durkee Rosevelt, Anna Creagan, Rose Northrup Miller, Addie Haydon Williams, Alice Hill Gordon, Minnie Coleman Kern, Blanch Smith McWilliams, Lillian Rosewarne Goddard.

Ten years later, on the last day of school, 1889 members of this class met in the high school and reorganized the Decatur Alumni Association which had been inactive for several years. Since that time the Alumni has not ceased to function as an important part of the program marking the close of the school year.

Mrs. Gordon was married to the late James A Gordon who came to Decatur during the nineties as pastor of the First Presbyterian church. From here he was given a larger assignment, serving in Van Wert, Ohio, for a number of years. Mrs. Gordon now resides at Winona Lake, Indiana.

Seventy-two years ago this coming summer the Henry Upton family left Decatur to establish a home in the then sparsely settled state of Nebrasko. Mr. Upton served Decatur six years as superintendent of schools. The Upton home was situated on School street across from the high school building. It has been kept in good repair and is changed but little from the time they occupied it. It is now known as the Van't Zelfde home.

Henry Upton served his country well in the Civil War and carried a wound he received in action to the close of his life. After a few years residence in western Nebraska the family moved on to the western coast where Miss Lucy and Mrs. Belle Van Atten, the surviving members, now reside in Long Beach, California.

In the early part of November Miss Lucy wrote a letter to this editor and directed it to Decatur. It was received at Marblehead. In it she wrote that she had sent a copy of the "Christian Advocate" of October 8 containing of complimentary mention of her neice, Mrs. Beth Van Etten Waterman. The paper was not forwarded.

After waiting a week and the paper not having arrived an effort was made to see a copy at this and the Salem libraries. It was not on file at either of them. Next I enclosed a dime in a letter and asked the publishers at Chicago for a copy. The letter was not acknowledged and it was later learned that the enclosure should have been 15 cents. Finally the paper was found on the editorial desk of the Republican office where, true to tradition, many things given up for lost may be found, and it was received in Marblehead last week.

The interesting story was written by Amy Fox and its subject was "The Church Down Under." It is the story of the building of the new Methodist church at El Centro, California, a half page picture of the edifice is shown and the enterprise of the members is well set forth.

Concerning the granddaughter of our well remembered Professor Upton the nationally prominent writer, Amy Fox, says:

"It is a singing church. Twenty years ago Mrs. Eugene Waterman, because of her husband's work, came to the valley to live. At that time she was one of the topflight soloists in Los Angeles. Now she is an outstanding example of the command, 'Put down your net where you are.'

"She has seven choirs and four directors working out an amazing music program: a chancel choir of 70 voices; the Methodist Choral, a group of 20 young people; a male chorus of 28 men; the Melodeers, a male quartet that is in much demand up and down the valley; the Caroleers, a choir of 27 girls from 10 to 15; the Crusaders, a boys' choir of 28 voices; and the Angelets, some 40 little girls.

"Every so often this amazing minister of music fills the chancel and the steps of the chancel and the balcony with her singers, and seven choirs sing together. This is the plan for the 11 o'clock service on Mother's Day morning. This service is usually broadcast."

El Centro is situated in the center of the Imperial Valley in Southern California and has a population of 12,590. It is 45 feet below sea level and the climate is extremely warm. This valley, once a barren desert, has been changed by irrigation into one of the most fertile agricultural sections of the United States. It produces a great abundance of lettuce, cantaloupes, watermelons, peas, sugar, beets, tomatoes and carrots.

The All-American canal, built at a cost of $38,000,000, near the city limits of Calexico, furnishes water for the Imperial Valley. It is the largest irrigation canal in the world.

Encouraging report comes from Mrs. Beulah Hemenway who is under treatment at the Battle Creek Sanitarium this winter.

Double congratulations to Mrs. James A. Osborn. She was 91 years old the 19th of January.

Alice, one of the three polly Brown sisters of Decatur 50 to 80 years ago, has for some time been a patient in the Michigan State Sanitorium, and in her helplessness her thoughts often dwell on those happy days of childhood. A few of her Decatur friends have clubbed together each year and sent her the Republican. They have given her added pleasure by repeating the act this year.

A favorite pastime of this columnist is to wander back in thought over the century past and write a word picture of Decatur as it was when our grandparents were the active citizens of the community. An appeal for help to Frank Thomas of Chicago, a friend of those early years, brought from him these interesting reminiscences:

"Do you remember way back or were you born to late to enjoy that wonderful piece of woods opposite Lakeside cemetery? It extended from the Brownbridge farm south to the first street north of Pine Street, which at that time was nothing but a sand road leading toward the lake. It reached from the cemetery to the lake and was covered with a great many large red oaks, some hickory, and near the lake many sycamores, and much underbrush everywhere. About half way to the lake was a natural picnic ground containing many large oaks where picnics held. I was always there when it came time for the three layer cakes and big dishes of home made ice cream. I never missed a meal nor paid a cent.

"Then toward the lake was a large opening which was a part of a brick yard, and there were several large holes filled with water where the clay has been taken out, and then farther on was a point out in the lake where there were a few large elms and the grandest swimming hole you ever saw.

"This land contained much game partridge, quail, squirrel, rabbit, and a couple of dens of that highly scented pet which you had better let alone if you wish to remain healthy.

"As near as I can remember this was in 1874 or '75. I spent much time in these woods when I was not playing 'One Old Cat,' with a ball my good mother made for me of store string stitched all over to hold it in place.

"Then comes man with his ax, and those grand trees went into railroad ties and firewood. What a beautiful park it would have made for everybody had it been preserved, and large enough for all the athletics of today."

Yes, I can remember the Lake of the Woods in those primitive years, and the wonderful woods from which it was named. One of the curios of the Republican Office for over a half century was a large bill advertising the Fourth of July celebration of 1876 held in the grove. I was there with parents and grandparents and ate my full share of the big picnic dinner and the ice cream and cake.

I can also remember the immense crowd there and the famous Constantine band that vied with the speaker for the star attraction of the day.

Have forgotten the speaker but not the band. Have a vision in memory of those gaily uniformed players led by the drum major wearing his tall fur piece. The Constatine band in that early day was rated one of the best in the state.

No one would recognize Lake of the Woods today as the same lake where we played so freely some seventy years ago. Almost or quite 100 pretty residences around it now, and the Lake of The Woods area is a city by itself.

J. G. Hirst and Dalton Kinney have been leaders in developing the Lake of the Woods project.

Thanks to Postmaster H. H. Creagan for a list of the members of Company G. 35th Michigan Infantry, who left Decatur for the front on that memorable Fourth of July, 1898. They were Richard Abrams, Will Labadie, Will Fox, Henry Mahoney, Robert Oaks, Will McIntire, Will Pike, James Hall.

The captain of the Company was Nathan F. Simpson of Hartford, who later served as representative in the state legislature and as warden of the state prison at Jackson. The first lieutenant was a stranger locally, and the second lieutenant was Bret H. Cocket of Decatur. Lt Cockett was a natural born soldier and popular with the men under him. He married Florence Palmiter of Hamilton township and practiced law in Decatur for several years. He received an appointment in the state tax department which he held until his death when residing in the township of Keeler.

Information concerning Michigan's part in the Spanish-American's part in the Spanish - American War is hard to find, but there is much to read about the participation of the United States in that war.

The war had been brewing for almost a century. Cuba was held by Spain and her rule was somewhat despotic. The United States, controlled as it was in the first half century by the slave states of the South, desired to annex the island, after the Civil War the South had no interest in the slaves of Cuba. But by 1895 the government was ready to do something for the island through sympathy.

When President Cleveland stepped out of office on the fourth of March 1897, he said to his successor, William McKinley, "Mr. President, I am about to turn over to you a War which has long been in the making." It came in the following year. The "Maine" was sunk and the sinking was laid to the Spaniards, although it was determined later that the sinking was due to natural causes. The war followed, and it was mainly naval.

The Americans under Admiral Dewey opened fire on the Spanish squadron. His order to his captain was, "Fire when you are ready". Gridley was ready at once and the result of that firing foretold the loss of the war to Spain. It was a victory that went round th[illegible] and made Dewey one of the greatest naval heroes of all time.

This reporter's lines were published in the Topeka Capital Daily on May 3, 1898:

"O Dewey was the morning
Upon the first of May,
And Dewey was the Admiral
Down in Manila Bay
And Dewey was the Regent's eyes,
"Them" orbs of royal blue!
And Dewey feel discouraged?
I Dew not feel we Dew."

A Lincoln story now and then is relished by the most of men. Have been reading an autobiography of Shelby M. Cullom entitled, "Fifty Years of Public Service." Cullom was a citizen of Illinois. He was born in 1829 and his public service began in 1855. The book was written in 1911 at the close of an eventful career in the public offices of city attorney of Springfield, in the state legislature as governor, member of the national house of representatives and the United States senate. He knew well the history and public men of his time and was a fluent writer.

In connection with the comment above concerning the Spanish-American War will quote from the early part of the book: "In 1854 the country seemed on the verge of a war with Spain over Cuba which was happily averted." And the Ostend Manifesto which was as follows: "If Spain, actuated by stubborn pride and false sense of honor, should refuse to sell Cuba to the United States, then by every law, human and divine, we shall be justified in wresting it from Spain, if we possess the power." The Ostend Manifesto was repudiated, but it is certain that war with Spain would have followed then had not the Civil War clouds been so threatening.

But here is the Lincoln story we set out to tell: "A man wished to employ Lincoln in a law suit and told him the facts which did not satisfy Lincoln of its merit. He said to the man"I can gain your case; I can set a whole neighborhood at loggerheads; I can distress a widowed mother and six fatherless children, and thereby get you six hundred dollars, which it appears to me as rightfully belongs to them as to you. I will not take your case, but I will give you a little advise for nothing. You seem to be a sprightly young man, and I advise you to try your hand at making six hundred dollars in some other way."

This is the substance of a letter received from Congressman Hoffman a few months ago. It was found in a collection of notes saved for comment and is offered here as something still worth thinking about.

The United States, up to the present time, has sent over one hundred and nineteen billion dollars to the Eastern nations, but it has not been enough to purchase their friendship. France, which has nearly five billion dollars. will not follow the recommendations of our secretary of state, and Britain declares she will not back our administration policy with military support. We must in some way get along with Russia or fight her alone. It is well to remember that today, as always in the past, self-interest guides the activities of all other nations.

We should discontinue robbing ourselves in this fruitless effort to curry favor with foreign nations and turn to a policy of efficiently and economically building our own national defense, and to make our own country secure.

George Washington was the Father of our country. He was "First in peace, first in war and first in the hearts of his countrymen." He led the colonies through the Revolutionary War, which won for them their independence from England. He served the first two terms as president, 1789 to 1797, and when the young states would have him serve a third term, because he was unselfish as well as a great statesman, he declined.

His Fairwell Address stands out in literature as one of the masterpieces of the English language. From it is quoted this paragraph, as good advise today as it was when it was given 158 years ago:

"Why quit our own to stand on foreign ground? Why, by weaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor or caprice?"

A call from Charlie Frye brought our pleasant memories of the years of long ago. He. is a pioneer of the first class, meaning that he has been a resident of the village of Decatur for over fifty years. A pioneer of the second class is one who has been a resident over twenty-five years. Our caller was born in Decatur, but he prefers not to reveal how long it was over fifty years ago. As he entered the front door he remarked, "This is the first time I have been in this house for over sixty years".

Charles was quite a boy when his father, the late John Frye, built this house at 108 East St. Mary's street and the Gwilt house next door. John himself rented this one and his son-in-law, Jack Johnson, the other. They were small houses in an imposing neighborhood.

W. F. Harlow, who lived in the large square house across the road, now occupied by George Sikkema and family, did not like the new improvements and called them dog houses. Of late years, however, as the cost of living and keeping up a home have gone up the desire for large houses with big rooms and high ceilings has gone down, and these small homes are in ready demand.

John Frye was a soldier of the Civil War. He fought valiently for his country, was captured and served six months in Andersonville prison. He weighed 145 pounds pounds when taken prisoner and 65 pounds when released. That hardly seems possible but it is according to the records handed down from that terrible time.

Andersonville prison was one of the worst blots on the South in their conduct of the Civil War. It was established at Andersonville, Georgia, in November, 1863, and consisted of an unsheltered enclosure of 27 acres. The superintendent was Henry Wirz, a Swiss. After the war an investigation was made of his conduct of the prison. He was convicted of injuring the health and destroying the lives of prisoners and hanged.

The evidence showed that conditions which prevalled at the prison were due to mismanagement and cruelty. Into the enclosure as many as 33,000 were at times crowded, for the most part completely without shelter, and insufficient food.

From February, 1864 to April, 1865, there were received at the prison 49,485 prisoners of whom 12,800 died there.

J. J. Sherman, another early citizen of Decatur, was also a prisoner in Andersonville prison and never recovered from the hardships he suffered there.

A SONG WITHOUT A NAME

As stated last week in the Vanderhoof story of their hard winter in Dakota Territory, they were sometimes compelled to go to bed to keep from freezing. While the storm raged without, the parents sang songs to keep up the spirits of those within.

The mother's favorite was "Rock of Ages." The father's was a comic song which caused them not only to forget the fear and discomfort they were in, but to actually laugh and be gay.

Most all of us are familiar with the beautiful gospel hymn. But what was the song that raised the rafters and made the little folks thing they were having a circus instead of a blizzard? Amos could repeat only a line or two of it, and would not attempt the tune. His sister could do no more, but she did suggest that her son Louis of Adrian might remember it. A letter to him brought this answer, which is too good to keep. Am sure he will not object to its being printed here as he wrote it:

Arba N. Moulton
Decatur, Michigan

Mother Hall has asked that I try to reconstruct from memory one of Grandfather William's old songs. I never saw it in print; the words are spelled as they sounded to a small boy. The tune I never heard either before or since. I could never sing, so that will be lost forever; Grandfather could. But now to the words, if I may:

(Title Unknown)

VERSE I

There was an old frog lived in a spring!
Nip-Cat-Polly — Won't you Ki-Me-Oh!
It was so cold he could not sing!
Nip-Cat-Polly — Won't you Ki-Me-Oh!
I pulled him out and laid him on the ground!
Nip-Cat-Polly — Won't you Ki-Me-Oh!
He rolled and tumbled all around!
Nip-Cat-Polly — Won't you Ki-Me-Oh!

(Chorus)

Ki-Mo-Key-Mo-Dare-a-Ware!
Me-Hi-Me-Ho-Me-Nib-Sty-Fuma-Diddle!
Suit-back-Penny-Winckle — Leather-Hat-Hame-Me-Nim-Sty-Fuma-Diddle!
P-O-O-D-L-E!

(Grandfather William Vanderhoof would load the note on that last word "Poodle" to what seemed like 15 seconds to a small boy. The song was emphatically executed by him.)

VERSE II

Way down south on Cedar Street!
Nip-Cat-Polly — Won't you Ki-Me-Oh!
There the darkies grow ten feet!
Nip-Cat-Polly — Won't you Ki-Me-Oh!
To go to bed would be no use!
Nip-Cat-Polly — Won't you Ki-Me-Oh!
Feet stick out for the chickens to roost!
Nip-Cat-Polly — Won't you Ki-Me-Oh!
(Repeat chorus.)

There were at least two more verses which can not now be reconstructed from memory — you see, it has been just 50 years since Grandfather and I sang the song as a duet on cold winter evenings.

There was the hard coal fire burning. Grandmother Ann Elizabeth had prepared a treat of popcorn or home made candy; and there were always apples. After lessons there was a chapter read in a good book by Ann.

Boys who did not know of a grandfather of those days, or a grandmother, or the life at the turn of the century have missed a great deal.

It has been said that the present century did not begin until World War I. There will never be such a good life as I experienced prior to that period; and it has never been the same since that period began. I'm glad that I am 60; had I been younger I would have missed it.

Father and Mother were away except during the 12 weeks in the summer, so many people had an influence in my early life, in addition to the grandparents. There was the good Uncle Amos, who has a terrific philosophy of life. He is just about everyone's friend, even today. His has been a useful life, as I see him.

And then there was the man who worked the farm for us in Hamilton. — Will Parish. He had a very good influence on the youth. He had seen everything, it seemed, and hoped to point out the many pitfalls in life to the youngster who was always inquisitive. He was a good man.

And then, I met "Ted". Yes, a lasting friendship with the Roosevelt family, where I spent more time in that house than any other save my own. To [illegible] the [illegible] notice of the "Colonel" for [illegible] things for me. There were [illegible] trys on [illegible] boys and [illegible] on Magic, [illegible] and [illegible] To know that I belonged and was accepted meant much to me.

So you see, your inquiry for material for a western story of the 1880 period has brought out these recollections of the influences shaping the character of a boy from 1894 to 1914, when I left Decatur for Michigan State.

It is good that some of these things are written and recorded for future generations to read and appreciate. I could only encourage you to continue.

I am quite sure that my successes I may have had as a County Agricultural Agent have been greatly influenced by many of those early experiences. In football they call it fundamentals.

Louis G. Hall.

Some Decatur people of the present generation have expressed a desire to know something about their fellow townsmen of the past. The character of the citizens of 25 to 100 years ago was in part what attracted the residents of today, and has kept the village as it has been from the beginning, an ideal home community.

And as to those who once lived here and have moved away, it makes little difference where they now reside or how pleasantly they are situated, the place where they lived in childhood and youth will always be home to the most of them — the Old Home Town.

In looking back over the early years Henry Upton, superintendent of the public school from 1876 to 1883, and his interesting family have come often to my mind. There are some still living who went to school to him and more who remember him.

A request for a biographical sketch of Professor Upton brought two tributes to him and several anecdotes remembered by members of his family. Following are one of the tributes and the anecdotes:

HENRY UPTON

A tribute paid by the Reverend Moses Noerr, former pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Decatur, Michigan:

"Henry Upton, son of Daniel and Electa Upton, was born in Batavia, New York, June 20, 1835. He studied at Lima Seminary, New York, and at Oberlin, Ohio. With this preparation he entered Yale College in 1856. While at this institution, because of his natural fondness for mathematics he so mastered that branch that he was far in advance of the usual college course. For this reason, soon after leaving Yale he was elected professor of mathematics in an Illinois college, a position which, however, he declined. He was also at this time engaged in writing a methematical work in calculus, a book that he did not finish because he found one that completely satisfied him.

"As a man, Henry Upton was physically and intellectually richly endowed. With a fine physique, he was able to make use of mental faculties which were of highest order. His memory was remarkable because of its quickness, grasp, and tenacity. His reasoning faculty was strong and true. He went into everything, when he concluded to take hold of it, with force — with all his mind and heart — it was seen in business, in farming, in teaching, in church work, and in any public reform he espoused. Hence, he readily gained the attention of men, and impressed them with his sincerity and earnestness, generally meeting with success in his efforts.

Mr. Upton was a noble, decided Christian. He sought always to live as a Christian not in name only, but in service. He was a true, practical, growing Christian. His religion was in his mind, in his heart, and in his conscience, and he endeavored to make its excellencies appear more and more in his life. In business, he was strictly honest. In his general intercourse with his fellows he was kind and forbearing; in his defense of the truth of the right, he was courteous but decided and strong."

Anecdotes Remembered
By The Family

When Father was teaching a country school, he had a pupil named Tommy Cute, who was true to his name. When the little boy was asked why he persistently refused to know the letter A, he responded, "Because if I say "A" I'll have to say "B."

Later, to teach him the word hay, Father prompted him by asking, "What is it that your father feeds the cow?" With shining eyes Tommy replied, "Oh, karn starks, sir!"

When quicksand was found in a well being dug in the Decatur high school grounds, all of the pupils were warned to keep away from the well. Toward evening Father went over to see if everything was all right.

A small boy lying flat on the ground, looking down the well, seeing Father coming, jumped up, saying, "Professor, when you told us not to go near the well, I was so busy studying I didn't hear what you said."

When Father took an examination for a teacher's certificate in Illinois, the examiner was so impressed that he stopped the examination and gave Father 100 in everything.

One pupil said that she had been perfectly content to be at the foot of the class until Father came as teacher. Under his inspiration she took hold, and later was graduated from Oberlin, married a minister, and became the head of a girl's college.

Another of Father's pupils wrote that he had kept her from discouragement in arithmetic by telling her how good she was in history. She said, "I think that Professor Upton would have felt rewarded had he known that for seven years I kept the government accounts of Indian affairs, said to be the most difficult in the country."

At the homecoming celebration at Andalusia, Illinois, the paper reported that the highlight of the day was the trek to the old school house, where men with tears rolling down their cheeks told of Father's mental arithmetic classes, fifty year before.

The mayor of Pierce, Nebraska, where Father lived, said to my brother Dan, "If it weren't for your father's principles, we would make him governor of the state."

My Father's parents were deeply religious. As Father was leaving for a new home in Illinois, his father said to him, "Henry, when the Sabbath Day comes, I hope that it will find you in church."

The next spring Father thought to hunt up a cow that had been missing for many months, presumably lost in the nearby woods. When he realized it was Sunday, he remembered his father's request — put on his Sunday-go-to-meeting clothes, and started for church. As he opened the door — there was the cow!

When Neal Dow was a candidate for president on the Prohibition ticket, a man, with whom Father was discussing politics, asked, "What party do you vote with?" Father replied, "I belong to the Neal Dow party." The man looked puzzled and then replied, "You are right my friend, there would be better politics if we would all kneel down more."

As an evidence of appreciation Father received four handsomely bound volumes of Shakespeare's works, which are still in our library. The books were sent by four boys, including Merritt Starr, who had been his pupils in the Rock Island high scool. After studying in universities in the United States and Europe, they agreed among themselves that they had never studied with a teacher of mathematics who compared with him.

SEEKING A SIGNER

In the olden days when wages were low, profits small and money was scarce, certain Decatur people were occasionally cramped for ready cash and found it difficult to obtain.

When the credit of an individual was questionable the bank required a note with a responsible signer before releasing its currency, and the would-be borrower went out to seek a friend to sign with him. It was not easy to turn down such a request, and a reluctant signature was usually obtained.

Over the desk of one of Decatur's leading merchants was a note of this kind for $70, which had been paid by the signer. The note was framed and under glass, and it hung in such a conspicuous place that the owner could readily point to it as his answer to others who might call upon him for a like service.

Will Moulton, out in Seattle, Washington, is one of the Republican's interested readers of the Decatur days of long ago. He likes to look over the times of his youth, and recall the fun he had when the farmers drove to town on Saturdays in a cloud of dust, and the merchants closed their stores when the Decatur champions played ball on the home grounds.

Will posed a baseball question a few weeks ago, about who was the Dowagiac player who shot off firecrackers in center field and entertained the crowd with his antics. It was a Fourth of July game here about the year 1886.

No one could answer the question, and so it just naturally died. Stape remembered the occurrence, but could not identify the player. Now Will comes back with the name, which was "Neff." But that is all he remembers about him,— that and the big firecrackers he exploded.

This is quoting from his letter: "To an old timer your newspaper skits in 'This Week' are the high lights of the paper.

"I remember well the night the old tannery burned, and I was right there to see it. Have often wondered about the history of that old land mark, — why it was built, by whom, and when, and why so big. I never dared go through it and all I ever knew about it was that Grant Mabry once lived in it, and I feared for his safety."

The old tannery was one of Decatur's ancient evidences of wealth and prosperity, but its wealth faded away and its end, as related above, was disastrous.

Today the tannery exists only in the memories of our oldest inhabitants and, with their help, I may be able to get more definite information concerning it.

The writer of this column will be away for the next month or two, but letters directed to him here will be forwarded. Address 5 Madison Road, Marblehead, Mass. Letters from old friends are gladly received, especially when they help to keep up this column.

It has been pleasant pastime to follow the fortunes of the Vanderhoof family in their pioneering into the land of the Dakotas. Mrs. Hall has the thanks of all of us interested people for furnishing the information.

After that first winter, 1880-81, their post office was changed from Herman to Madison. This was because the railroad company would not build a station at both places. This decision started a feud between the towns, each wanting it and neither willing to give up to the other.

One night the people of Lake Madison moved their stores to a site about half way between the two towns, and so Herman people moved to the same site. The combination town was given the name of Madison, which now has a population of about 5,000. Lake Herman is now included in a state park and is a beautiful place. Lake Madison is two miles east of the town of Madison and is also very pretty.

A few years later Grove Hall obtained 160 acres near the Vanderhoofs and a friendship was started between the two families which lasted throughout the years. Mrs. Hall says the first time she saw the son Howard he was on the roof of the Hall shanty watching a prairie fire; the next time he was driving a pair of black and white oxen hitched to a stone boat, hauling stones for the wall of a new claim shanty his father was building. They both attended the normal, now called the Teachers' College, at Madison, and they were married in 1888. The families returned to Michigan in 1891, after eleven years of farming in Dakota. They prospered fairly well there and were able to buy the farm home in Hamilton township, which was their home for the remainder of their lives.

I hope to complete this account of the Vanderhoofs' pioneering in Dakota with a sketch of the life of Howard Hall, who achieved success as an actor and passed away in 1920 at the height of his notable career. Howard Hall still lives in the hearts and minds of the older residents of Decatur and Hamilton. He spent the summers on the farm and was almost a daily visitor to the village. He was bright and buoyant, hail fellow well met, and to know him and to meet him was a pleasant event in a day's experience.

Miss Helen Hathaway of Ann Arbor wishes through this column of the Republican to send her love and best wishes for all that is worthwhile in 1954 to all of her Decatur friends. Miss Hathaway counts many friends in Decatur and the home of her youth on Little Prairie Ronde was one of the show places of Southwestern Michigan. During the past few months she has taken on some church activities, attended several WCTU gatherings and become a substitute teacher in her adult Sunday School Outlook class. She also attended the 100th birthday party of a gentleman who still gets up at six a.m. and tends the furnace. "Your residence in Marblehead furnishes material for 'This Week' which we like. The east coast of Massachusetts has an atmosphere all its own."

A pleasant line from George and Nancy Greenman says that George is over halfway through his internship. It is hard work but he is learning much that will be of value to him later on. The work is at Danville, Penn.

Would like to thank the Sinclair Publications for their holiday greeting,—a card 8x11 inches in size showing two young men reading a copy of the Hartford Day Spring. Our guess is that they are eight and ten years old and are the sons of Editor and Mrs. Jack Sinclair. If correct another guess is that in another ten years they will be valuable assistance in the publication of Hartford's enterprising newspaper.

Mrs. Will J. Nower has continued to reside in Decatur since the death of her husband which occurred on November 30. She is selling the home farm in Paw Paw township and hopes to make her permanent home in Decatur.

An interesting discovery we have made in Marblehead is the charming family of Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Graham and their two sons, 14 and 17 years of age. They reside in a house overlooking the ocean and within a block of our own home. Mr. Graham has been with the General Electric plant in Lynn for the past 18 years. He resigned Dec. 1 and will devote the next two years to the study of writing. Lynn is about five miles from Marblehead which is becoming the residence city for many of the General Electric employes, numbering 15,000 at this plant.

Mrs. Graham is the former Harriet Hunt, daughter of the late Hazen Hill Hunt and granddaughter of Mr. and Mrs. Danna Hill. The Hill family were residents of Decatur almost from its beginning. Harriet Graham's great grandfather, Hon. E. P. Hill, was the first president of the village after its incorporation in 1859.

The Village of Decatur came into existence with the coming of the Michigan Central Railroad in 1848, and in 1854 Trowbridge and Hill (E. P.) were established there in the wholesale and retail grocery business, on the Northeast corner of Phelps and Delaware streets. DeLos Hill and Charles Leavans published the first Van Buren County Directory in 1869.

Most of the houses out here have blinds painted all colors — green, red, yellow, black, etc., and when the residents go South for the winter the blinds are closed tight. It is easy to tell in driving along the streets when they are gone. Many of them go. One old fellow I met in a barber shop and his wife were leaving the next day. Going by train. The lady, who may be something of a character, had never traveled in an air plane and never intended to. She was not going to trust her life to one of those dangerous air ships. New England people cover nearly all parts of Florida in their attempts to escape the rigid winters of the North but this winter they are disappointed in their excuse to travel, the winter lacks considerable of being rigid as it is expected to be.

The Heaps, Thomas and Iryl, have a new home in Maryland. The address is California, Maryland. Town Creek Manor: "Tamarack." Iryl writes that it isn't necessary to put the whole address on the envelope when you write to them. But it is just as well to know it all in case you may be driving that way when summer vacation time comes around. It is within easy driving distance of Tom's job in the Navy. The pictures of it show it to be a pretty and commodious bungalow, located in the timberland, and the Patuxent River lies just over a ravine to the rear.

This is the story as it came to me:

"A 'possum sat in an old pine tree.
As he looked around he said to me,
'The Lord be praised — the Heaps have lit,
For 25 years they did nothing but flit,
All over the country without a home.
And the more they roamed and the more they flit,
The madder they got. So this is it.
So said the 'possum.

Mrs. Heap is a daughter of Ellen Goble and her early life was lived in Decatur. That establishes her right to be classed as a Decaturite. She also, in her 25 years of flitting lived for a short time in Marblehead. That accounts for her interest in the short description of the city in this column.

AMERICAN COLORTYPE BEGINS OPERATIONS

As of Monday the American Colortype company under the supervision of Fred E. Pennell began production with 16 employees operating one assembly line that packages an 80 piece Christmas assortment. On Wednesday additional workers were hired and a second assembly line was put in operation that packages a 72 piece Christmas assortment.

New machines are still to be installed and it is thought that within 30 days the two shifts will be working at full capacity. Next week the tag stringing machines will be in operation and in 10 days the two partial shifts will be working.

The first two orders received by the Decatur branch of the American Colortype was one for 900,000 package assortments and one for 350,000. As soon as the company is in full swing, the personnel will be announced.

Letter Revealed After 49 Years

FRANK BISSENGER, while remodeling his farm home on CR 215 back on October 12, 1920, nailed a letter to a stud in the wall, addressed to "Whom it may concern." The letter came to light just one day short of 49 years later when Jim Postello, present owner of the farm, was removing the wall in the process of renovating the farm home. Jim Postello and his wife Barbara (Conway) are relatives of F. M. Bissenger, and bought the farm from other members of the family in Oct. 1968. Pictured holding the framed letter is Jim Postello and Art Creagan, his neighbor, whose farm is referred to in the letter. Mr. Bissenger's message to posterity appears below. -

To Him or Her who finds this paper!

Greeting!

This part of the house was nearly 50 years old if not more. The back part, the kitchen, and what is now the enclosed back porch, had fallen down 1½ In. Everything was out of whack and joint. Mrs. C.M. Knoll, widow — decided to raise the roof of old part 3½ Ft. up to the eve of the larger part of the building. That has been done by N. Nelson of Decatur, carpenter who is one. To speak with Armour & Co.: "The Ham That Am." He did and does a splendid job.

Little Tommy Conway, 4 years old, plays around. His aunt Elsie, the golden-haired, very good wife, just came back from picking grapes at Creagan's, neighbors. Grapes, this year, are abundant and bring from $80.00 to $100.00 or more a ton. We have had no frost to speak of this fall. It's too dry to plow. Pra tors around the house here and up to the road promises well. Real estate will be booming next spring. The great idealist, President Wilson, will — I hope — be defeated next month and normal times will prevail again. Just now, things are in bad shape. Factories are shutting down and thousands of men lose their employment. — How will things be when you read this? Once more: Greeting.

THIS WEEK

By ARBA N. MOULTON, Editor

"It isn't the thing you do, dear;
It's the thing you leave undone,
Which gives you a bit of heartache
At the setting of the sun.
The tender word forgotten,
The letter you did not write,
The flower you might have sent, dear,
Are your haunting ghosts tonight."

I thought of these lines, by Margaret Sangster, when reading in the Republican last week of the death of Frank W. Thomas. For many years we were occasional correspondents. Whenever I wanted to know something in particular about the early history of Decatur I would write to him and receive an interesting reply. No other person living could go back in memory of people and events of the village as far as he and he enjoyed recalling those early years of his active life.

I do not know his exact age, but it was not far from ninety. He was born in Decatur, and the county Gazetteer of 1869 gives this information about his father: "Sela N. Thomas, hardware dealer, east side Phelps street 4 south Delaware. Home corner Phelps and St. Mary's." It was not long afterward that he built the brick building at the northeast corner of Phelps and Delaware, which was the Thomas hardware for nearly fifty years, and is now the Decatur Plumbing and Heating.

In the early seventies S. N. Thomas moved farther north on Phelps street, and in his time Frank built the spacious residence just beyond it on the corner of Phelps and Pine streets, one of the finest in the village.

In the late eighties S. N. Thomas gave his son a half interest in the business and it became known as S. N. Thomas and Son. It was at the time when modern improvements in living were beginning to take the place of the old. The floor of the Thomas hardware was filled with Round Oak heaters and kitchen ranges, but furnaces were slowing up their sale and it was plain that they would ultimately go the way of the horse and buggy.

Frank was young and ambitious and took up the new method of heating. He soon had more work than he could handle, and in his desire to please his customers, he worked early and late, responding to their calls, day or night. This undoubtedly was what caused him to sell the business and to leave Decatur. He was worked out.

Frank Thomas was the pitcher of Decatur's famous ball team of the eighties, and Frank Stapleton was the catcher. These two young men were known far and wide as the bantam battery, and they won many a hard fought ball game for their home town. They were without doubt the equal of any amateur battery in Michigan. Thomas practiced pitching on the second floor of the hardware store, and in the years the team was at its best he put in every available minute at mastering his curves and control. For ten years or more Thomas and Stapleton were the survivors of that famous Decatur ball team, and now our fine citizen, F. C. Stapleton has outlived all of the others. He will be 91 years old next May, is in good health for his years, and may he continue to be with us and to represent those golden years of the eighties for a long time to come.

The last letter I received from Frank Thomas was written about a year ago. It was about some early Decatur history which I had asked him, and it can be found in the files of the Republican. Have been intending ever since to answer it, and today it is too late. It's "The letter I did not write."

The names of those Decatur champion ball players of the eighties, were F. C. Stapleton, catcher; F. W. Thomas, pitcher; John Hughes, first base; Claud Haydon, second base; Harvey Taylor, third base; Dan Carney, short stop and captain; George Kruse, right field; E. J. Rawson, center field; M. E. Chadwick, left field; John O'Leary, Ralph Slater, Stanley Briggs and Howard Smith, extras.

THE OLD GREENMAN INN

By Leland Sherburn

From D.H.S. Local History Stories

The old Greenman Inn was build on the Valley Road near Decatur in 1834, 121 years ago. It was one of the historical buildings of Southwestern Michigan, and although in 1953 it was entirely destroyed by fire, it is still an interesting subject for comment in the minds of our early settlers, and its location should be marked for the benefit of future generations.

It was a two story building, the first contained the kitchen and bedrooms, the dining and living rooms. On the second floor were the ball room and two more bedrooms.

The outside of the Inn was yellow with white trim around the windows. A balcony ran almost the entire length of the second floor, and below it a porch extended the same length. There were large stone steps leading up to the porch, and there were also two back porches.

The ballroom on the second floor was 35 feet long. It had a spring floor which caused the Inn to literally jump with joy when a merry crowd of young people assembled there for a dance. It was built with double joists so that the floor had "give." Everyone joined in the fun, even though some did not respond to the rhythm of the waltz and quadrille.

Sound boxes 14 inches square were installed in the ceiling, an early attempt to control acoustics.

The Lewis Sherburn family moved in to the Greenman Inn in 1909, and since 1917 had used the ball room as a storage room. Lewis Sherburn well remembered the dances his father held there in his early years.

Some people think that Jacob Charles built the Inn, selecting a place by a flowing spring for it. The spring still bubbles and my Grandpa Graham remembers that when he went from his home near Newton Woods to Paw Paw the horses would start stepping off when they got to within a mile or two of the spring. They knew that they would get a good drink of water out of the old wooden trough there. The Inn was best known when Boston Greenman operated a tavern.

The old trail, which was the old stage coach road from Dowagiac to Paw Paw is still fairly discernable. A traveler down the Valley road could be carried away in imagination at the sight of the old Inn. On that spacious balcony while the dance was in the swing, stole the gay couples of pioneers for a breath of air or a gaze at the moon. Below on the veranda early settlers of the region paused for news and refreshments.

Those were the days when Ezra Stuyvesxant came home from the Civil War and earned his living playing the fiddle for dances. And it was said that he had a genuine Stradivarious violin . It was in the front yard of the Inn that Dan Gant dropped dead of a heart attack. There was much mystery surrounding his death, but no one in the neighborhood is left who can tell the story of it.

Charles Wickett, who is past 82 years of age, remembers the Inn from the time he was a little boy.

The Sherburns had been planning for some time to tear the old Inn down and build in its place a new home. They had decided that an old spring dance floor is no match for a modern kitchen. But before they could tear it down the Inn caught fire and burned to the ground. This was in the fall of 1953. No one knows how the fire started, but the accepted theory is that a little bird carried a lighted cigarette to its nest and started the blaze.

A fine new modern house will occupy the same spot on which the famous Greenman Inn stood for over a century, and the old building will henceforth exist only in the memories of our oldest citizens.

THE THOMAS FAMILY

FOR MORE THAN HALF A CENTURY AMONG THE MOST ENTERPRISING AND PROGRESSIVE CITIZENS OF DECATUR—THEY ARE NOW ALL GONE.

With the sale of his home here and the removal of Frank W. Thomas and family to Kalamazoo, disappears the last vestige of one of our oldest and most respected families from Decatur.

Nelson Thomas, the grandfather of Frank, came originally from near Chautauqua lake in New York state. Sometime about 1856, the family moved to Iowa, and the son Sela N. Thomas bought and lived on a farm there until he moved to Decatur in 1864. Miss Libbie Thomas, the daughter, came to Decatur about the year 1858, and opened a millinery store in the little building next to the old photograph gallery, on the corner of Delaware and St. Mary's streets, lately occupied by Frank Baker. She carried on this store for a number of years.

Some time in the opening years of the war her father removed to Decatur and bought and lived in the house at the north end of Delaware street lately owned by Alden Knights, and his wife died there in 1865.

In 1864 Sela N. Thomas came to Decatur from Iowa, with his wife and son Arthur, and bought a partnership in a hardware store owned by E. L. Hawks, situated about where the doctor's offices are now. S. N. Thomas soon bought out Mr. Hawks, and afterwards conducted the business alone for over forty years, finally retiring about ten years ago and turning the business over to his son Frank.

When S. N. Thomas first came to Decatur he lived in the little building next to the old photograph gallery where his sister kept the millinery store, and Frank Thomas was born there. The older son, Arthur died in 1884, and his mother died in 1886, and Sela and his sister, Miss Libbie, continued to live in the old homestead until their death less than two years ago.

Frank's wife died some six or seven years ago, and last summer he had the misfortune to lose his daughter, Miss Ruth, by typhoid fever. He has only one child left, a little boy, and naturally the town has very few attractions remaining for him.

So Decatur has lost one of its best and most reliable families but we hope that wherever Frank may go good fortune will follow him, and that he may have a long and prosperous life; and we can safely say that this is the wish of all his friends.

ICE CREAM

A few weeks ago this column contained a story about Decatur's great Fourth of July celebration of 1876 in what was then a beautiful grove on the easterly side of Lake of the Woods. Grandmother made ice cream for the family picnic dinner and it was the first I ever ate. The story brought out these reminiscences of early Decatur days which I am privileged to share with other friends of many years.

To "This Week:"

The printed page seems to me like holy ground, a place to find something helpful and interesting. It is only the friendliness engendered in your column, and your appeal for help in writing it, that impels some of us to write our personal views and happenings.

Our own events seem unimportant, but the things others tell about are intensely interesting, no matter how trivial, when written by people whom one remembers.

And so, your story about ice cream in '76! It was not bought at a store, but laboriously cooked, cooled, packed in a hand freezer, after crushing ice to surround it in a heavy wooden tub. The ice was stamped down securely, and then a strong arm was needed to turn the crank for a half hour to break up the mixture of eggs, milk, cream and vanilla into the right consistency.

I think it took three hours to make a freezer full of ice cream. I wonder who discovered this delectable concoction? I went to the Encyclopedia Britanica to find out, but not much was said about its discovery, only a few words were given about that. The rest was about modern ways of manufacture.

Your grandmother must have been among the first to make ice cream, because I remember it was a rare treat in 1886, when Mrs. John Chadwick served ice cream at a party and half the guests were deathly ill that night and the next day of ptomaine poisoning which had developed in the metal can of the freezer. People had not then learned the necessity of perfect sterilization.

The last time I made ice cream was in 1910. There's nothing like it—just the plain ice cream. Your column about Lake of the Woods, the old and the new, almost takes one's breath away. What wonders can take place in 84 years!

I have just read that Thomas Jefferson introduced ice cream to Washington, probably when he was president, from 1801-1809. I know it was a rare treat when I was young, and still would like to know who invented it.

Thomas Jefferson published a cook book and filled up the blank pages with his own favorite recipes, some of which he made up himself. Maybe your grandmother had Jefferson's cook book. Am sure my grandmother didn't make ice cream, being interested more in strawberries.—Benj Hathaway

I am interested in what Helen Hathaway writes because she belonged to that Little Prairie Ronde Group of people I shall never forget. Her father loved to propagate new plants. When he died they said he had 700 tiny seedlings developing in his cellar, of hopeful improved types. He said if only he were given time he could develop strawberries as big as apples. I think he propagated a kind of corn. One is reminded of corn every day in Iowa, and it always makes me think of Benjamin Hathaway. His brother Judson loved to hunt, —no poetical trends there.

Benjamin wrote "My Creed", a wonderful religious point of view. I wrote music for a quartet to those words. There were phases in the poem that seemed appropriate for a short solo for each part of the quartet and these were disposed through the composition. We sang it several times at services in the country where we lived not far from Helen's home. Writing this song was an experience only, it was not for publication. We learn something from every effort we make.

I wish Helen would send a copy of 'My Creed" to you, I would like to see it again. E. O. L.

In these days of retirement on pension, in order to take advantage of the law granting the pension, a person is required to furnish the government a birth certificate. This certificate must show that the applicant is an American citizen, the time and place of birth, name of parents, and one or two other facts to indicate one's eligibility to receive a pension.

If the birth is recorded at the time in the county clerk's office the clerk will make a copy of it and the requirement is met.

If not, the applicant must 'go before the Probate Judge and furnish the affidavits of two witnesses that the party is known by them, that he or she was born at the time and place, stated, and give sufficient reasons why the facts are known to them, the witnesses.

F. C. Stapleton, whose residence in Decatur dates back to 1885, and the writer, whose residence in Decatur dates back to 1872, are often appealed to to sign birth certificates, in fact they have signed three during the past six weeks. The age of retirement is 65, and there are not many who can make affidavit to the birth and parentage of a person that far back.

Here is an applicant whom I am unable to assist and pass the information along to readers of the Republican in the hope that some one among them can come to the lady's aid. If so please call, phone or write to me. Judge Williams turned the letters over to Officer Frank Hazzard who turned them over to me.

Los Angeles, Calif., May 4, 1955.
Probate Court, Van Buren County, Michigan.

I am in need of a birth certificate and have been unable to get it through the regular channels. Will you be good enough to provide this registration as per Act No. 35, P.A. of 1931, and bill me for the expense?

Name, Alice Smith, Born January 31, 1897, at Decatur, Mich.

Mother, Sarah Ann Smith (Nee) McGrew.

Father, William Henry Smith.

Race, Negro, both parents.

Second Letter.

Dear Sir:

I am sure you can appreciate how impossible it will be fore me to locate any neighbors in Decatur, Michigan, after 58 years who know the circumstances of my birth. I was taken to California when eight years old by a white family named Crockett. I was worked and treated like a slave until I was 14. At that time I ran away, hoping to get back to Michigan. Instead went to school for the first time and eventually worked my way through the University of Washington.

Now I have a fine position with the county of Los Angeles, and an opportunity to go abroad with a group of fellow workers this summer in the event that I can secure a birth certificate.

This is all the information I have. Please try to help me. I have no relatives.

With appreciation,

Alice Smith.

WHAT LINCOLN SAID

1. I happen temporarily to occupy this big White House. I am a living witness that any of your children may look to come here as my father's child has.

2. I am not afraid to die and would be more than willing. But I have an irrepressible desire to live till I can be assured that the

3. To add brightness to the sun, or glory to the name of Washington is alike impossible. Let none attempt it. In solemn awe pronounce the name, and in its naked, deathless splendor, leave it shining on.

5. I want it said of me that I always plucked a thistle and planted a flower where a flower would grow.

6. Let us do one thing at a time and the big things first.

7. The Lord must love the common people, he made so many of them.

8. Yes, I have changed my mind and I don't think much of a man who is not wiser today than he was yesterday.

Simeon Huff was a veteran of the Civil War. He was born in Pennsylvania, January 1,1844, and came with his parents to Volinia township soon after. His father was Isaac Huff.

Simeon enlisted in the Fourth Michigan Cavalry at the age of 18. He was captured by the rebels in December, 1863, and confined six months in Libby prison. Then he escaped and came home. He re-enlisted and took part in over 200 engagements.

At the close of the war, with other members of his regiment, he helped to capture Jefferson Davis. He took a scarf worn by Davis from the saddle on his horse and kept it as long as he lived.

For good service he was promoted to rank of sergeant, and received $400 of the $100,000 reward given by the government for the capture of the president of the Confederacy. He spent his declining years in Decatur.

We had some delay in getting the telephone re-established in our home at 108 East St Mary's St. But now we are prepared to receive calls and the number is 4271.

A very good old time friend writes: "I do like everything you write about Marblehead and its environments. In telling recently about Waltham, Mass., you did not mention the watches that are made there. I received a Waltham watch for a wedding present. It looked very small then, 1889, but in a few years it became too big and had to be laid away. Later my generous son-in-law gave me a handsome wrist watch."

A TRIBUTE TO WALDO PHILLIPS

Read before the Decatur Alumni Association meeting, Saturday evening, June 4, 1955.

Waldo Philips, who seldom misses one of these annual Alumni Banquets, is unable to be with us tonight, and so let us, instead, be with him in our thoughts, and extend to him our warmest greetings and heartfelt wishes for his speedy recovery from the severe injuries sustained in an automobile accident two months ago. His wife, Edith Osborne Phillips, only slightly injured in the accident, looks forward to the day when her husband can come home from the hospital, and we add our prayers to hers that that time may be soon, and that all will be well with them again.

Mr. Phillips received an award from Michigan State College Farmers' Week this year for distinguished service to agriculture, and he also received the congratulations of Secretary of Agriculture Ezra Benson, who made the keynote address in honor of the centennial anniversary of the college. Mr. Benson took the time personally to thank our townsman for his accomplishments in Michigan agriculture.

We of the Decatur Alumni Association know Waldo Phillips best as a good neighbor and friend. We have known of his frequent trips to the capital on business of state importance, and of his many calls to speak at farmers' meetings.

We know that his life has been devoted to the promotion of Michigan agriculture, and that he has made these demands on his time first in the course of a busy life, but the most of us have not known the extent to which his work has become known, accepted and valued in his home state, and even throughout the nation.

Realizing that leading agriculturists throughout the state, who have worked with our townsman, would know best what he has accomplished in his chosen field, I wrote to James R. Bliss, General Manager of the Michigan Elevator Exchange, for further information about him, and received this much appreciated reply:

Michigan Elevator Exchange
Lansing, Michigan

May 24, 1955.

Dear Mr. Moulton:

I am very happy to acknowledge your letter of May 20 and to supply you with some biographical material on Waldo Phillips.

I am attaching some notes which Mr. Phillips supplied us for use by Michigan State College on the occasion of the presentation to him of the "Distinguished Service to Agriculture" award last spring. This material covers his history pretty well.

The citation accompaning his distinguished service award from Michigan State College reads as follows:

"For his farm leadership—for his help in organizing the Michigan Elevator Exchange and the Michigan Farm Bureau—for his years of service to the Grange—for his total of 151 years of service on boards of directors or in offices of trust."

I have known Mr. Phillips for a great many years and I can supply an observation that his biographical notes do not cover. I have known him to work untiringly for what he thought was best for Michigan agriculture without a thought of personal recognition or gain. He has given of his time and his energy down through the years in the various positions and offices he has held in farm organizations and government agencies at considerable personal sacrifice. He has been a natural leader by always retaining the humility which has made him a host of friends throughout the State.

If one were to pick five of the people who have done most for Michigan agriculture in the last 50 years, certainly Waldo Phillips would be among those five.

We are delighted to know that the Decatur High School Alumni Association is going to pay tribute to Mr. Phillips on the occasion of the annual reunion on June 4. Knowledge of this fact I am sure will do a great deal to cheer him in his present ordeal.

I had the opportunity to visit briefly with Mr. Phillips at the hospital Sunday, May 22, and was exceedingly pleased to know that he is continuing to show improvement.

If there is anything else we can do to be of service to you, please feel free to call on us.

Michigan Elevator Exchange
James R. Bliss,
General Manager.

WALDO E. PHILLIPS

Mr. Phillips was born November 2, 1883, on a farm near Dowagiac, Cass County. His father died when he was 11 years old. Graduated from Decatur High School in 1900. Attended University of Mich 1900-1901, majoring in science and mathematics.

Returned to the farm in 1902, working for an uncle.

Married December 9, 1903, to Edith Osborne, Decatur.

Started farming on his own in 1904 on rented farm, giving note for 3 horses, 3 cows. 3 heifers, 2 gilts, and very limited farm equipment.

Took correspondence course in accounting in 1907 and quit farming the following year to accept a job with the Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C.

Resigned this job after a year and resumed farming near Decatur in 1909. Purchased 20 acres in 1915, 100 acres in 1917, and 80 acres in 1937.

Followed general farming, some dairy cattle and hogs, some wheat and potatoes for cash crops.

Sold 120 acres of farm in 1953, and rents out the 80 acres on which he and Mrs. Phillips still maintain their home. Although retired now from actual farm operation, farming and farm organizations are still the main interests and investment of Mr. and Mrs. Phillips.

Mr. Philips was a township clerk 1905-06, treasurer, 1907, and supervisor, 1910-17.

He served as master of his local grange for 7 years and master of the county grange for 6 years.

He helped organize the Van Buren County Farm Bureau in 1917 and served as its president for 20 years—from 1919 to 1939.

He helped organize the Michigan Farm Bureau in 1919 and served 20 years in all in various terms on its board of directors, including 3 terms as president.

He also served 10 years as a director of Farm Bureau Services.

Mr. Phillips helped organize the Michigan Elevator Exchange in 1920 and was a member of the original board of directors and has continued as a director since then —34 years. He is the present president of the Exchange.

He has been chairman of the Michigan Association of Farmer Cooperatives since its organization about 9 years ago.

He also served on the board of directors of the Lawrence Cooperative for many years.

In all of Mr. Phillips' efforts for the advancement of agriculture in Michigan his wife, Edith Osborne Phillips, has been his loyal supporter and has accompanied him on most of the trips that have called him to Lansing and to other places about the state and nation.

In his answer to my letter last spring, congratulating him upon receiving the splendid award from the state, Waldo included this paragraph:

"In presenting the award, Dean Coroden recognized Edith in the audience, asked her to rise, and said some very nice things about her and her cooperation with me. This pleased me very much, for it was her due as much as anything he said about me."

Edith Osborne Phillips was a graduate of the Decatur High School in the Class of 1902, and shares in this tribute to her husband. We all regret that they cannot be with us tonight, but shall look forward to greeting them both at the Decatur Alumni reunion of 1956.

7. The Lord must love the common people, he made so many of them.

8. Yes, I have changed my mind and I don't think much of a man who is not wiser today than he was yesterday.

Lincoln was never a coward, and he may have been just a little ashamed of himself in permitting the Pinkerton detectives to take him into Washington by stealth when he entered the city for his first inauguration. After that, throughout his administration, he went where duty called him, more or less independent of body guards. He once remarked that if marked for assassination nothing he could do would prevent it.

One of the most intense books I have ever read was one entitled "Mr. Secretary," by Ben Ames Williams. It comes near to directly charging Mr. Stanton with implication in the plot to murder the President. I have often wondered how he dared to publish such a book. But it is surely interesting reading.

Have just received a gift of the last Lincoln book published. It is entitled "The Day Lincoln Was Shot," by Jim Bishop. The author gives for the first time the dramatic hour-by-hour story of a tragic day in history. The book is highly praised by reviewers for its interest and accuracy, and if there is anything that can be added to the facts already stated as to Lincoln's death, Jim Bishop has it.

Lincoln's son Robert was burning a trunk full of the private papers of his father at his home in Manchester, Vermont, when his friend, Nicholas Murray Butler called and induced him to turn them over to the Congressional Library at Washington. He agreed to do so provided they would not be given to the public until ten years after his, Robert Lincoln's death. Prominent writers and Lincoln lovers looked for startling information to be released at that time, but they were disappointed. If any papers of unusual importance had been preserved there from the President's time, Robert Lincoln destroyed them before Dr. Butler reached him.

We were seeing and hearing Ed. Sullivan's program on television when the canny announcer announced that, "The Rotary International Club will celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of its organization in Chicago in May, and we have with us tonight the club's oldest living member, Mr. Harry Ruggles of Los Angeles, California. Mr. Ruggles, will you rise and take a bow?" And there was our boyhood friend from away out on the west coast standing in that big New York audience which included the husband of the late Gertrude Lawrence, movie stars and people prominent in other walks of life. The program was to honor Gertrude Lawrence. Harry stood and received a generous applause. He is a fine appearing man and carries well his 84 years.

It was in the summer of 1883, the World Fair year in Chicago that I last saw Harry Ruggles. He was getting established in the printing business there, was young and ambitious and the future was bright to him. The Ruggles family had been residents of Decatur for some twenty years, and before that they had resided in the country nearby. Their home was at the corner of George and Wheeler streets. It was a spacious residence set well back among the trees. The father, Eli Ruggles, a master carpenter, built it, and to my young mind it was one of the most attractive homes in the village.

The early nineties were dark days in Decatur, as well as elsewhere. Hard times were upon us, and Mr. Ruggles decided that he would seek a location where he could better provide for his growing family. He built a home in Oak Park, a suburb about ten miles west of Chicago, and it proved to be a wise move for him. In the year 1893 I also went to Chicago to work, and the Ruggles family were very nice to me on several occasions.

I had not heard from any of them that year until last, when a letter came from the daughter Lena, Mrs. Quenby, of Minneapolis. She wrote about her brother Harry and his work, and a little later I was pleased to receive a letter from him. He wrote about his activity in Rotary and that he hoped to attend its fiftieth anniversary in May.

Paul Harris founded the Rotary service club in Chicago in 1905, and Harry Ruggles was one of the first four friends he invited to join it. Mr. Harris and the other three friends have passed away, leaving Harry the oldest surviving member. He was the club's treasurer for a number of years.

Back in those early years of the seventies and eighties when the Ruggles family, the Olcotts, the Fosters, the Carneys, the Moultons, the Codmans and others were all neighbors in Decatur, we were a happy care-free crowd of children, and the friendships of those early years have lasted throughout our lives. A pleasant letter came from Mrs. Eva Olcott Lawrence of Ottumwa, Iowa a few days ago in which she wrote: "My eyes ache and keep me from writing much, but I am bursting with thoughts. I was fortunate to see the February edition of the Rotarian Magazine. Do get one somewhere because Harry Ruggles is portrayed in it wth much praise and so is the Rotary Club. Myra's husband receives the magazine and so does Lawrence, her son. They are both members. If you do not find it I will send you one of these."

Last Monday when driving in Salem we stopped at a news store to buy a copy and were informed that it is not a newsstand publication. Then we went to the Salem public library and found a copy on file. I could not take it out so stayed there until I had read the fine tribute to Harry and the story of the Rotary club.

In those last three decades of the last century there was a large hollow that extended along the west side of East street almost from St. Mary's to Wheeler. It was known as the Big Hill, and when the snow was on the ground in the winter it was the most popular place in town for the young people and children. There were three separate hills. One was short and steep, one was shallow and used only occasionally, and the other was the longest and best, and most of the fun was had there. Some great stunts were played on this hill. The boys would build bumps on it so high that it would almost shake a fellow's anatomy apart to go over them. Sometimes a half dozen or it would tax one's strength to stay on.

The Ruggles children had the sled that was the favorite of the crowds and all were welcome to use it. It was the frame of a cutter, so stoutly built and would carry as many as could pile on to it. There was plenty of fun for all of us when the Ruggleses came to the hill. The old hill is still there, but buildings have been erected near it, and cultivating for crops have leveled it to some extent. Then also what the children and young people considered fun 75 years ago and what they do today may have undergone a change. This seems to be the explanation. In the time of the pioneers children made their own sports and found their own play grounds,— the lakes for skating, fishing and swimming; the hills for sliding, some vacant field for baseball. They played other exciting games, like pull-away prisoners' goal, polo, etc., but all on their own initiative. A sports director or coach, was a person unknown, at least in small town schools, up to the turn of the century.

We got along fairly well in the early years, were contented and undoubtedly have been as successful as we would have been under modern conditions, but while this writer enjoys the pasttime of reminiscing, he is by no means advocating going back to the self-reliant kerosene—horse and buggy—stove wood days.

I am looking eagerly forward to the time when Mrs. Lawrence's eye sight will improve so that she can write more of those rare old Decatur stories.

OUR GENEALOGY HOBBY

February 17, 1955
Venice, Florida.

Dear Mr. Moulton,

I received your letter and thank you for the information, it was just what I needed. I had heard only rumors about a Decatur Jake Byers and was not sure there was such a person. I have written to my sister who lives in Dowagiac to see if she can find his tombstone in the Decatur cemetery to give me his dates. I know all about his father and mother but have not been able to trace any of their children.

The others you wrote about were my uncles. My father was the youngest brother, Frank Byers, who was always interested in machinery. He moved to Dowagiac and had the first automobile garage there.

I am coming fine with my book. I visited the old homestead in Livingstone county, New York on my way down to Florida, but it turned so cold I did not get pictures of the tombstones I wanted. I also went to the court house in Lancaster county, Penn., then to the Library of Congress, looking for the immigrant ancestors. I have 550 descendants of my great great grandfather and think that by summer I will have found everyone of them. I gave up trying to trace only the Byers name as it ran out to girls, so I am tracing them all. I certainly appreciate the help you have given me.

Yours truly,
Bertha Byers Broadhurst

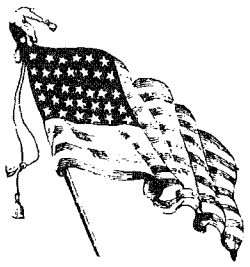
Mrs. Broadhurst first wrote from her home in Lansing inquiring about her ancestors, and her letter was printed in this column.

Simeon Huff was a veteran of the Civil War. He was born in Pennsylvania January 1, 1844, and came with his parents to Vollnia township soon after. His father was Isaac Huff.

Simeon enlisted in the Fourth Michigan Cavalry at the age of 18. He was captured by the rebels in December, 1863, and confined six months in Libby prison. Then he escaped and came home. He re-enlisted and took part in over 200 engagements.

At the close of the war, with other members of his regiment, he helped to capture Jefferson Davis. He took a scarf worn by Davis from the saddle on his horse and kept it as long as he lived.

For good service he was promoted to the rank of sergeant, and received $400 of the $100,000 reward given by the government for the capture of the president of the Confederacy. He spent his declining years in Decatur.



We had some delay in getting the telephone re-established in our home at 108 East St. Marys Street. But now we are prepared to receive calls and the number is 4271.

A very good old time friend writes: "I do like everything you write about Marblehead and its environments. In telling recently about Waltham Massachusets, you did not mention the watches that are made there. I received a Waltham watch for a wedding present. It looked very small then, 1889, but in a few years it became too big and had to be laid away. Later my generous son-in-law gave me a handsome wrist watch."

Here is a litle more about Waltham. If you want to go there you will find it ten miles west of Boston. It has become famous around the world for its two watch factories. At the American Waltham Watch Works the first successful attempt was made to manufacture watch movements, on a large scale, by machinery. Up to a few years ago it was the largest watch factory of its kind in the world.

And Waltham has other important industries which combine to make it one of the most important industrial centers of New England.

W. L. Congdon has sold his herd of 15 Guernsey cattle and retired from the dairy business. He began with Guernseys over fifty years ago, for many years he has kept up the milking of 15 head. It has been a long time and the work has been hard, but he has enjoyed it, and it is only because of ill health and the advancing years that he has given it up.

There comes a time with all of us that the ways of life must change, but the change can be for the better, and Mr. Congdon's many friends believe it will be thus with him. The best wishes of this column and the Republican are with him.

LYLE'S TURKEY FARM

(From Local History Sketches by Pupils of the Decatur High School)

By Mary Lyle

Kenneth Lyle got his start at raising turkeys when, in 1932, the day before Thanksgiving, he won a turkey gobbler. Having their Thanksgiving dinner all planned, the Lyles didn't eat the turkey. They then planned to eat him Christmas Day, but again fate stepped in and saved the turkey. The Lyles had been invited away for Christmas dinner.

Having raised ducks, geese, and rabbits, he decided to try raising turkeys. Upon purchasing two turkey hens, he began a new enterprise, which has grown into a business of almost two thousand turkeys today.

Turkeys are a hard bird to raise. They are apt to suffocate when they are small. They become frightened and pile up, the ones on the bottom suffocating. Turkeys are also susceptible to worms and Blackhead. Blackhead is the worst of the turkey diseases. The turkeys are constantly kept under observation. They have to be kept off wet ground for fear of getting it. They are treated with a medicine called Iodine Vermicide. This is given to them when they are twelve weeks old, and off and on from that time.

The Lyle turkeys eat up to three and one half tons of feed a week. This feed is made up of corn, oats, wheat, and barley. To this is added meat scrap, soy bean meal, alfalfa meal, and several other materials. Oats or cracked corn are fed as supplements.

In late February, Kenneth Lyle starts taking turkey eggs to Holland, Michigan. There the eggs are hatched by Brummer and Frederickson. The young turkeys then are either sold or brought home. These weekly trips continue often into early April.

The young turkeys upon their arrival home are put into battery brooders, which are in the dressing room. When they are ten days to two weeks old, they are moved out to the brooder houses. These houses will hold from three hundred to three hundred and fifty birds. In the early summer, sun porches are attached to the houses, Then the turkeys can get out of doors. When the pasture has grown up, the turkeys are turned loose. Large sun flowers are grown and are fed to the turkeys as an extra treat, which is also good for them.

Turkeys grow very fast. By Thanksgiving, it is possible for them to weigh thirty pounds live, twenty three pounds dressed. Many are sold for Thanksgiving, Christmas, and New Years. The rest are sold to weekly customers.

The turkeys are dressed about four days before Thanksgiving. This process requires about six men. These men are used in the dressing part of the operation, which consists of killing the birds and taking their feathers off. A group of women draw the turkeys.

The building in which this is done is called the dressing room. It contains the scalder, the picker, the water tanks, the eviscerating table, and the freezer. In here also the turkeys are wrapped for freezing and for sale.

For the last four years, Kenneth Lyle and his wife, Dorothy have been going to the Turkey Conventions. They have been to Long Beach, California; St. Louis, Missouri; Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and Dallas, Texas. The convention is in the middle of January. These conventions are very interesting and have many things to offer. There are lectures, special trips, and an annual contest to judge the largest turkey from all over the United States. The largest turkey last year weighed forty-two pounds alive, thirty eight pounds dressed.

STRAWBERRIES

Jack Frost threw a chill into the hearts of the fruit growers of this section on that fateful Monday night, the ninth of May. Peaches, pears, cherries, apples and grapes suffered, but the damage we heard the most about was to the strawberries. What the rose is to a garden of flowers, so is the strawberry to the fruits of the North. The comments are that strawberries will be scarce this year and the price will be high. Those delicious strawberry shortcakes will not be so plentiful, and some pickers will miss their annual job.

But a drive through the country last Saturday showed clearly that all is not lost, and it proved to be one of the most delightful drives we have ever taken. It took us from Decatur to the five mile corners and on past Magician Lake, Dewey Lake, Sister Lakes, to Keeler Center and the Decatur-Keeler road home.

We passed many orchards, the trees of which were still rich with blossoms. But the grandest sight was the vast fields of strawberries well tended and white with blossoms. There was no indication from the highway that the crops had been damaged by frost, although it is quite probable there was some damage.

At any rate we are going to keep our appetite attuned to strawberry shortcake, and expect to have more than one feast of the delicious dessert.

A line came last week from Alonzo Newton Benn, a friend of many years. He sent a copy of "Masonic Temple Topics" published at Rochelle, Illinois, of which he is one of the editors. It was the Illinois Masonic Hospital number published this month. The short Timely Topics by which Mr. Benn has become nationally known run through the entire magazine and I counted 26 of them altogether. They are all good and this is a sample.

CHOOSING

Don't blame a man for relatives
For such he cannot lose;
But blame him for the friends he keeps
When he could better choose.

Presented this week is another of the local history stories prepared for the Raider Review, which is edited and published twice a year by the pupils of the Decatur high school. This one was written by Jane Reits, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Reits, and it received an "A" mark from her teacher. It is a story of the development of the land located on the easterly side of Lake of the Woods and of the shore. To those who remember this area as it was 70 to 80 years ago when it was a part of the great natural forest of Michigan the extent of this development is almost unbelievable.

My first remembrance of Lake of the Woods was on the Fourth of July, 1876, when a great celebration was held in the grove by the shore. It was there that I first ate ice cream, at the picnic dinner served by Grandmother Moulton. The appetite for it created there has never been lost.

It was a favorite place for the boys in school, as well as for the older fellows who did not attend school. — skating in the winter, swimming in summer, fishing all of the time. When the ice was on the water the boys would take their skates to school, and as soon as school was out at four o'clock they would take the nearest route to the lake. It was a short walk for the boys of those years. A favorite skating place was in the cove at the west side of the lake. It was sheltered from the wind and the ice was generally smooth there.

L. D. Roberts was the first owner I remember of the land east on the lake. He may have cleared it of its timber. He did set out a grape vineyard there which was in bearing for a number of years. Dalton Kinney, who bought the land of J. G. Hirst and is developing it, is the joint owner with Mrs. Kinney of the Decatur Republican. It is principally through his enterprise and developing ability that Decatur has this fine addition to the village, and the end is not yet in sight.

DOUGLAS LEE ADDITION AND LAKE OF THE WOODS

By Jane Reits

Seventy-five years ago the land where the new school is now located, was all woods. There was just a sandy vacant lot where the Douglas Lee Addition is now.

At this time no one owned the lots in front of the lake. Anyone could build a boat-house anywhere without permission. The boat houses were small, and had a door in each end of them. They dug a channel underneath where the boats were kept. The boats were hand-made of wood and had to be kept in water all the time so they wouldn't warp.

The people of Decatur never thought of Lake of the Woods as having a good beach, nor as a site for cottages, much less as a location for year around homes. They all thought the lake had no possibilities whatsoever.

In later years Mr. Hirst bought some of the lake frontage. He and one or two others were about the only owners.

If some people had bought land when it was "dirt cheap" they might have been "near wealthy" today.

The present improved Pine Street road leads down to what was known as "Welchers Cove."

The old swimming hole where the boys went swimming (girls didn't go swimming very often in those days) was off the point to the right of Welchers Cove.

There were two sand bars in the lake near the old swimming hole. One has disappeared as the lake has receded.

There is a sunken island in the lake somewhere near the present "Lake of the Woods Camp." The cove by this camp is called "Long Cove."

Around to the left of the present Pine Street road there was another indentation called "Coply Cove."

Before the days of the electric refrigerator, Decatur depended on Lake of the Woods to fill its ice-boxes.

Mr. Lewis Roberts had charge of an ice house on the East end of the lake. In later years Mr. Charles Youells (Mrs. Raymond Gale's father) had charge of it. Marlin Haney stored ice in it in more recent times.

The ice was cut with a gasoline engine cutter. They would cut a skidway of ice up to the ice house, and by using an inclined plane, the men skidded it up with pike poles and placed the blocks side by side on the floor, using sawdust to separate the layers.

Where the Douglas Lee Addition is located now, there used to be a few old farms. The cement posts, which were used to mark the driveways, are still scattered around in that area.

A few years ago there was a girl scout camp where the Dalton Kinneys now live. It was dark green and was used for quite a few years.

Next to Bob Athey's house there was an old barn used for dances in the late twenties. There is a new house being built in that area now. They had to bulldoze the foundation of the old barn out before they could start building the new house.

Ten years ago the Kinneys first came to Decatur. Mr. Kinney is known as a contractor, and builds new additions in various towns. He bought fifty-five acres of land from Mr. Hirst. He chose that spot for the addition as that was the only place where he could buy enough land to lay out in streets.

Before Mr. Kinney started building in this area, the land was used as a landing place for airplanes. Edgar Bergen once landed there on a visit to Decatur.

There are four streets in the addition. They are: Memory Lane; Douglas Drive; Lee Avenue; and Kinney Road. They are named in the memory of Douglas Lee Kinney, the late son of Mr. and Mrs. D. R. Kinney.

Mr. and Mrs. Bob Athey's house was the first house built in the addition in 1945. This house is located on Douglas Drive.

Mr. Kinney plans to make a canal, coming from the lake, this winter, which will pass by Austin Boulevard. He also plans to build more houses in this location.

This section has been an added attraction to our town. It is the most modern part of the village of Decatur.

DEATH OF MRS. ALICE HILL GORDON

Mrs. Alice Hill Gordon passed away at Winona Lake, Indiana last Friday, July 15. She was the daughter of E. Parker and Harriet Hatch Hill and was born in Decatur, Thanksgiving Day, November 27, 1861. She would have been 94 years old her next birthday.

Mrs. Gordon was one of three children, all natives of Decatur and among its earliest residents, Delos L., the oldest was one of the publishers of the Van Buren County Gazetteer, published in Decatur in 1869. He went South, located in Atlanta, Ga., and died there many years ago. L. Dana Hill was cashier of the First State Bank for many years and is well remembered by older residents. Their father was the first president of the Village of Decatur.

Alice Hill and Rev. James A. Gordon were united in marriage in the early nineties. He came here as pastor of the Presbyterian church and she was the church organist. From here Mr. Gordon was called to the pastorate of the Presbyterian church of Van Wert, Ohio, where he remained 22 years. They then went to Winona Lake where he helped to build the Presbyterian church of that city. They built a nice home there, and there spent the remainder of their lives. Misses Therza Hunt and Ethel Ward, cousins of Mrs. Gordon, resided with them in Winona Lake.

Mrs. Gordon graduated from the Decatur high school in the class of 1879 and was the school's oldest living graduate.

Funeral services were held in Presbyterian church Monday afternoon and burial was beside her husband in the Winona Lake cemetery.

BOOK WANTED

Miss Hathaway's father was Benjamin Hathaway of Volinia township, an unusual man in various ways. George R. Fox, in his factual history of Cass county published in 1941, refers to him as follows:

"Hathaway Plantation. A grove in which the former owner, Benjamin Hathaway, a farmer and Cass county poet, planted in rows every kind of tree found in Michigan. The trees are now mature and of maximum height. Located on northwest side of Bunker lake, 1½ miles north of C-324, five miles west of Marcellus."

Many of these beautiful trees were destroyed by a windstorm which swept through this section since the above was written.

Mr. Hathaway was also known as Michigan's farmer poet and his poems published in several volumes. Miss Hathaway is desirous of obtaining one of them entitled "The Finished Creation" and authorizes the writer to pay one dollar for a copy.

If any reader has a copy to spare and will notify or bring it to me at 108 East St Mary's street I will send it on to her.

ELIJAH P. LOVEJOY

Elijah Parish Lovejoy was born in 1802 at Albion, Maine. Graduated from Waterville college, Maine in 1826. Emigrated to St. Louis, Mo., taught school and in 1828 published the Times which supported Henry Clay for the presidency.

In 1832 he embraced Christianity and entered Princeton Theological Seminary to study for the ministry. Graduated in 1833 with license to preach the Gospel.

In the fall of 1833 he edited the Observer in St. Louis, Mo. St. Louis being the center of a large slave-holding aristocracy, his writings denouncing slavery brought about him malignant and unsparing enemies.

They soon organized a mob who passed resolutions that the discussion of slavery was obnoxious and he must discontinue it. Lovejoy did not heed the warning.

The mob demolished the office of the Observer. He removed across the river to Alton, Illinois. The mob followed and destroyed his press there. A new press was purchased and on September first the Observer came out with a double circulation, and with arguments no less powerful and eloquent against slavery.

On the 21st of August, 1837, a mob from St. Louis, some 20 in number, again utterly destroyed his press and wounded two of his employees.

Another press was obtained and on November 7, 1837, near midnight, while defending his property in the warehouse at Alton, he was shot. A short time before his death, at about 11 o'clock at night, while going to the drug store, a mile from his home, Lovejoy was arrested by a mob of 10 or 12 men, who told him they were going to tar and feather him. With perfect composure and calmness he replied to them: "Gentlemen, I have but a single request to make of you. My wife is dangerously ill, and it is necessary she should have this prescription immediately, and which I was on my way to town to procure. Will one of you take it and see that it is delivered at my house, but without intimating what is about to befall me? I am in the hands of God and am ready to go with you."

For a few moments entire silence reigned. It was broken by a medical man, one of the disguised party, exclaiming: "Boys, I can't lay my hands upon a brave a man as this is," and turning away followed by the rest.

Thus Lovejoy was spared the degradation they were about to impose upon him. A few weeks later, as has been stated, he suffered the death of a martyr in defense of the liberty of the press and of speech. As the historian says, "A nobler and braver man never engaged in reform, or made tongue and pen more effective in the cause of human freedom. Elijah P. Lovejoy was the Arnold of Winkelried, who by his heroic death, made way for universal liberty throughout the land."

GREELEY CRITICIZES LINCOLN

Horace Greeley, in Lincoln's time, was the best known editor in the United States. He felt the responsibility of saving the government was upon his shoulders, and took it very seriously. He attended the national convention that nominated Lincoln for the presidency, but did not support Lincoln. During the Civil War he was one of the President's severest critics.

On the all-important question of freeing the slaves, which Lincoln had under constant consideration, Greeley lashed out at him in an editorial in which he said, "The Prayer of twenty millions" of loyal voters demanded that he strike out boldly at slavery.

Lincoln replied in one of his famous statements in which he said: "My paramount object in this struggle is to save the Union and is not either to save or destroy slavery. If I could save the Union would do it, and if I could save the Union by freeing some and leaving others alone, I would also do that. What I do about slavery and the colored race, I do because I believe it helps to save the Union; and what I forbear, I forbear because I do not believe it would help to save the Union. I shall do less whenever I shall believe what I am doing hurts the cause, and I shall do more whenever I shall believe doing more will help the cause. I shall try to correct errors when shown to be errors, and I shall adopt new views so fast as they shall appear to be true views. And I intend no modification of my oft-expressed personal wish that all men everywhere should be free." The Emancipation Proclamation went into effect the first day of January, 1863.

GREELEY'S ADVICE

One thing Greeley did that met with popular favor was to advise young men to go west and grow up with the country. Many thousands of young men and their families followed this advice and found it to be good.

Every New England state has furnished a governor for Michigan. Maine gave us Alpheus Felch who also served as auditor general and justice of the supreme court. New Hampshire sent Lewis Cass; Vermont, John S. Barry; Massachusetts sent General Hull, although he was born in Connecticut. Being not quite satisfied with his record Massachusetts also furnished Epaphroditus Ranson and H. H. Crapo; Connecticut, William Woodbridge. Even little Rhode Island was not to be left out and sent H. P. Baldwin. Michigan has been governed by men of New England 38 years or more, and with the exception of General Hull, all of them have been a credit to the state. Our Civil War governor, Austin Blair, is of New England parentage, as also is J. J. Bagley.

The above information is taken from an address by Rev. Wolcott B. Williams, entitled "New England Influence in Michigan."

INDIAN LORE IN AND AROUND DECATUR

A Decatur School History Story by Larry Macek

Some of the history concerning the Indians of Decatur and vicinity is based upon legend, the battle of Lake of the Woods, perhaps, being the most romantic. However several of our pioneers have authentic proof of their relatives of an early day having lived and played with Indian children.

Among them were two from Little Prairie Ronde, south of the village. John Eckenberger, who lived near Charleston when the country was a wilderness, knew the Indian language and could speak it as well as his own. He spent much of his younger years with them, and from the Indians he learned to be a hunter and trapper, and to dig the herbs which afterwards became so valuable.

John Eckenberger and Chief Pokagon were good friends and the former visited with the tribe whenever he had the opportunity. Eckenberger was fond of his Indian friends and never forgot his childhood association with them.

One time the early settlers of this section became alarmed over a rumor being circulated that the Pottawattomies were planning an attack on the white settlers, and Eckenberger made a special trip to Niles on the pretense of making a friendly visit to the Chief. During their visit the old Chief mistrusted his errand and hastened to assure him that the whites had nothing to fear from his tribe.

Mrs. Caroline Wilcox Sherburn was a resident of Van Buren county in 1835. Her playmates were Indian children, and Indian Chiefs came to her home and stayed weeks at a time. They hunted and trapped there and she learned to talk their language.

In that early time bear and wolves roamed the forests and wolves came up to the door to get in. At one time the children were playing in the woods close by the house when the mother went to the spring and was gone about a half hour. She saw a wild bear gazing at her from across the stream. She ran to the house, got the children in and bolted the door, and the father killed the bear when he came home.

Mrs. Edna Carney Green of this village relates that her grandmother, when a little girl, lived among the Indians. She was always afraid of them and on one occasion when she was alone in the house, her brothers having gone to the woods to cut trees, she heard a rap on the door and opened it. It was an Indian who tried to make her understand in his broken English that he wanted to borrow some salt. She took all the articles of food out of the cupboard and placed them on the table, then ran out of the house and hid behind the woodpile. After a while her brother came, and the Indian, who was still there, remarked that he had scared the little squaw.

THE AMERICAN INDIAN

Before the white man took over this country the Indians held undisputed possession of it and roamed at will over its vast area of mountains and streams, its lakes and forests and prairies. Now they are gone, crowded off the earth by the more aggressive civilization.

Judge Joseph Story, one of the greatest judges in the United States, well depicts the sad fate of the American Indian when he says 'There is something in their hearts which passes speech. There is something in their looks, not of vengeance or submission but of hard necessity which stifles both, which chokes all utterance, which has no aim or method. It is courage absorbed in despair. They linger for a moment. Their look is onward. They have passed the fatal stream. It shall never be repassed by them. No never! Yet there lies not between us and them an impassable gulf. They know and feel that there is for them still one removed further, not distant, nor unseen. It is the general burying ground of the race."

This beautiful peninsula of Michigan was a favorite place for Indians. Many tribes made it their home, and this southwest section was the hunting and camping ground of the Pottawattamies. A hobby of Aorney Carl Benton of Lawton is to discover and trace the Indian trails of Van Buren and nearby counties, and to locate the mounds which were their burying grounds. In this way he has learned much of the habits and customs of the Indians and also some of the trials and hardships of our first white setlers. Mr. Benton is one of the county's best local historians.

The following article written by a pupil of the Decatur high school is about the Indians. It is not signed, so the name of the writer cannot be given, but if furnished it will be printed next week. The title is, —

THE LONG INDIAN TRAIL

Indian trails crossed this country from the Northeast to Southwest. They crossed the Paw Paw river and through what is known as the Pe Pe Yah farm This trail was deeply worn in many places. The Red men walked along silently and were followed by squaws, papooses, dogs and camp equipment.

The land in places was covered with fine timber, and the Indians had ample sugar camps, making pails out of bark to catch the sap. The pails would hold about four quarts and were hung in the middle of the wigwam A fire of white ash wood was used to evaporate the sap.

The squaws did the entire work of maple sugar making, while the men hunted or slept under the trees.

Indian families were fond of hulled corn. They sat in a circle and passed a pot of it around until everyone had his fill.

Pe Pe Yah was the chief of his tribe. He died at Pokagon in the spring of 1836, and was buried beneath the altar of the Silver Creek Catholic church. Old Shavehead was there too. He claimed to be 100 years old and was a great warrior. He claimed to have killed 100 men in his life time. He died in 1837.

During the sugar season of 1836 two men in a canoe saw two bald eagles making a nest in a tree by the lake so they called the lake Eagle Lakes, which it has been ever since.

Indian mounds and garden beds were plentiful here in early days. There were many mounds between Three Mile and Four Mile lakes. They averaged four feet high, and oak trees two feet in diameter grew about them. Bones, arrowheads, and trinkets have been found in the mounds.

Jesse and Hazel Kelsey have a Buick automobile which they bought in 1927. For many years it has taken them to the cherry picking country as far north as Traverse City, and it is still in good running condition, and Jesse says he would not hessitate to start out on a trip to California or Boston with it.

For their present driving it has been succeeded by a car with more up to date gadgets, which is parked out of doors, but they keep the Buick housed in Calvin Millard's two car garage. Hazel's brother Calvin has been in poor health the past year or two and they are caring for him in his pleasant home north of Decatur.

Questioner. What is the population of Decatur?

Answer. Village of Decatur is 1664. Township of Decatur including village 2,758.

Ernest Edward Cook, bachelor grandson of Thomas Cook, travel agency pioneer, died in March at the age of 89. He lived in an elegant 17 room mansion at Bath, England and left a fortunre of $2,376,000.

His vast collection of paintings, silver, and other art works will be distributed to public galleries, libraries and museums. He ordered that none of the pictures should be sent out of England.

This item will be of interest to some Republican readers because our former fellow townsman, the late John Cook, sr., was closely related to the Cooks who originated the world famous Cook's tours and excursions.

John Cook, sr., was a well known character. He was active in Decatur, Lawton and Paw Paw for some 30 years around the turn of the century. He lived on his farm near the Porter town line. He walked the five miles to Decatur and in the sumer time went bare footed. He loved his farm, loved the soil and the sandy road and the walking was a pleasure to him.

I remember him best at elections in the old town hall. The polls opened at seven in the morning and he was always there at the opening. He never held an official postition on the board but constituted himself the official challenger of the Democratic party and no one challenged his right to the honor. We all liked him and an election day would have been dull in those days were he not on the board.

He was short and fat and bald, and his hair, where he had any, was curley and gray. He had a soft pleasant voice and some of his words rolled out of his mouth in a way that it was music to hear.

His public school education was limited, but he knew nature and was an interesting talker. He knew no political party but the Democratic. He gloried it his loyalty to Andy Jackson and his followers and to the principal he established that to the victor belongs the spoils. That may be why he never held an office in Van Buren county. But he liked the Republicans with whom he associated on the election board, and I do not recall that he ever tried to exercise his office as challenger.

He had received cordial invitations to visit his relatives in England, and I think he was considering the trip when death put an end to human planning.

The Raider Review is a magazine to be published twice a year by the Communications class of the Decatur High School. The first number was issued about the first of February and I was greatly pleased to receive a copy. The magazine is printed on a choice stock of heavy white paper and is immaculate in appearance. It reminds one of the first issues of the new magazine, American Heritage, except for the heavy covers of the latter. It is made up of contributions of its staff, among which were several interesting stories of local history similar to those the Republican ran some ten years ago.

One of the stories is entitled:

OLD STAGE COACH

by Barbara Leighton

The old stage routes that used to run from Lawton to St. Joseph and from Decatur to South Haven are slowly but surely being forgotten, bu to some of the old timers around Decatur they bring back many memories.

Southeast of Decatur there was once a stop for the workers. The old taverns were the scene of many gay dances, and the subject of many a legend. Probably some of the old timers around town could tell you some hair raising stories of what they used to do out there. They had good times as well as brawls and quarrels, but it all makes up the history of the old stage routes. These old routes are still traveled even though they are curvy and winding. The only difference is that the roads are now paved, and in those days they were just dirt packed hard from much travel.

The stages they used were old Concords, drawn by four or six horses which they exchanged at the stops. The stages were not very comfortable, and if a person was going on a long trip he would be exhausted before arriving at his destination. The dust sifted in through the drawn drapes or curtains, got in their throats and made it very hard to sleep. Mail was also transported over the stage lines, making an additional source of revenue to the owners of the routes.

Finally the railroads took over and the stages gradually disappeared.

In 1869 Decatur was an important stop for stage coaches. The South Haven line was operated by W. Graves whose advertisement read: "This old reliable line having been reorganized and restocked presents to the traveling public as good facilities for getting to and from the Lake Shore, and intermediate points as can be found in the state. Express matter carried at reasonable rates. Each village on the route has a gentlemanly agent who attends to the welfare of the passengers and express matters."

Another ad. of the sixties: "Duncombe House, corner Phelps and St. Mary's streets. H. Galloway, Proprietor. Conveniently located to the business center of the town, spacious sample rooms and well ventilated sleeping apartments. A free hack to and from the cars, and baggage carried free. Stages will leave this house daily for South Haven, Lawrence, Breedsville, Bangor and Hartford. Tri-weekly for Keeler, Millburgh, Benton Harbor and St. Joe."

The magazine section of a Sunday paper contained a sensational story entitled "Who Really Killed Abraham Lincoln?" It pointed the finger of suspicion by implication to friends and associates of the murdered president, even to his much maligned and despairing widow. My friend who sent the story wrote across the top, "Do you believe this?" and I can positively answer that I do not.

There are, however, a number of things connected with Lincoln's death toward which a clever writer can turn one's thought to misgivings, and this has been done many times in the past, as in the article referred to.

Mary Lincoln was the wife of the President of the Union, and she had two brothers and a brother-in-law in the Confederate Army, one or more of them being killed in action. Yet throughout her troubled life her loyalty to her husband and the cause for which he stood was never questioned.

Edwin M. Stanton, Lincoln's pompous Secretary of War, felt himself above the President in ability and discipline, and Lincoln was always fighting with him to save the life of some poor soldier whom Stanton had ordered shot for infraction of the rules of warfare.

Also it was well known that Lincoln's plans for ending the war and bringing the South back into the Union were much too liberal to please the Northern politicians, and the political road ahead of him looked anything but bright. Had he lived, Lincoln's second term undoubtedly would have been marked with discord and strife, and he might have been persecuted to the point of desperation. But the South will never know the extent of its loss by his death. John Wilkes Booth was the planner and leader and brains of the terrible crime, and nothing else he could possibly do would have given greater injury to his beloved Confederacy.

Mrs. Bessie Hamilton Lawrence of 420 South Main Street, Coolidge, Arizona writes that since the death of her husband she has been managing the store he left. Her son Hiram and two girls are helping her. It is a good jewelry business and she expects to continue it as long as her health will permit. Mrs. Lawrence spent the Christmas holiday with Hiram and his family. Her son Louis teaches navigation at the air field near Austin, Texas.

We are glad to keep in touch with Bessie Lawrence. She was a member of the Lewis Hamiton family, who for many years were active citizens of Decatur. She graduated from the Decatur high school, went west to teach and married there. Later she returned to her home town and endeared herself to its people by her good work as the Decatur librarian.

A recent issue of the South Bend Tribune magazine contains a story about business secretaries, called by the writer "girl Fridays", and Monica Howland of Decatur is featured in the illustrations.

The secretaries have a well developed organization of their own, and through it their secretarial jobs are increasing each year in importance. The branch of the organization in South Bend is named River Bend Chapter. One nice thing that it does is to make available an annual scholarship to nearby high school graduates who need help in financing their training.

To raise their working standards the Association has established the rating, "Certified Professional Secretary", for members who are able to pass a hard two day examination, and their ambition is to make the letters "C.P.S." have as much value to a secretary as the letters "C.P.A." have to an accountant.

Miss Howland is shown in the illustrations as she is taking dictation from the Boss, George S. Harrison.

The November 30 issue of the South Bend Tribune tells of the passing of its veteran president-editor, F. A. Miller, November 29, as he was nearing his 87th birthday. He had served as the Tribune's editor for over 63 years.

Richard H. Lyon, who began his newspaper career on the Decatur Republican when it was established in 1867, was working under Mr. Miller on the Tribune when he became editor of the Republican 30 years later. Mr. Lyon was a frequent visitor here, and through those bright men of the Tribune we learned much about how to edit a good newspaper.

Perhaps you would like to hear more of this aged and proud city of Marblehead and of our experiences here. In 325 years it has grown from a settlement of a few houses to a city of 14,500 inhabitants. It has one industry, which makes potato chips, and there are several places where boats are built. It claims to be the birthplace of the American Navy and the yachting center of the world.

Last August yachtmen from long distances came here to take part in a week of racing. It was estimated that a thousand yachts participated. The hurricane which came on a month or so later destroyed over a hundred of the yachts and damaged many more.

Old Marblehead is as odd as it is ancient. It consists of a cluster of stores and houses near the harbor. There are three or four shopping centers and the houses are built on or close to the narrow streets. It is all up and down steep hills.

New Marblehead surrounds the old part. Most of the houses are new and some of them are very pretty, but it too is mostly rocks and hills, and of course the ocean which makes the landscape beautiful. The General Electric Company employs 25,000 men in its factory at Lynn only five miles away and many of them have built homes here.

Marblehead is 16 miles from Boston, but is not a suburb of Boston. In fact it is not a suburb of any place. Boston may be the Hub of the Universe, but that does not include Old Marblehead which has a glory all its own.

It is said that on the pavement where Swampscott and Marblehead join some wag had posted this sign:

"You are now entering Marblehead, the streets of which are narrow and crooked. The people of Marblehead are not crooked." If the story is true the sign has been removed.

A few months ago we wanted over night accommodations for a guest. A local friend recommended Fish Cabin, a fashionable inn overlooking the harbor. He said the widow of President Coolidge stops there when she is in the city, and Margaret Truman stayed there the week she took part in the summer theatre here last August. The recommendation appeared to be quite sufficient and I went there to ask for the accommodation.

This was the result, and it was something new in my experience:

I was asked if I were an old settler of Marblehead, or any of my ancestors ever lived here. I did not try to qualify to this form of questioning and so sought and found good accomodations elsewhere.

I could have replied that one of my ancestors was John Low, master of the ship "Ambrose" and vice-admiral of the fleet that brought Governor Winthrop's colony from England to Salem in 1630, five years before the settlement of Marblehead was named and 19 years before it was incorporated as a town. But why take the trouble to explain to a snob. I have my genealogical friend, Mrs. Corliss of South Haven, to thank for this tracing of my ancestry.

I knew but little about Marblehead before coming here, but have since learned that many Decatur people are fairly well acquainted with it. They know, also, Whittier's poem, "Skipper Ireson's Ride" and his clash with the women of Marblehead.

The poem is too long to print in this column, but here is a part of it:

Of all the rides since the birth of time,
Told in story of sung in rhyme, —
The strangest ride that ever was sped
Was Ireson's, out from Marblehead!

Small pity for him! — He sailed away
From a leaking ship, in Chaleur Bay, —
Sailed away from a sinking wreck,
With his own town's-people on her deck!
"Lay by! lay by!" they called to him.
Back he answered, "Sink or swim!
Brag of your catch of fish again'"
And off he sailed through the fog and rain!
Old Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart,
Tarred and feathered and carried in a cart
By the women of Marblehead!

"Hear me, neighbors!" at last he cried, —
"What to me is this noisy ride!
What is the shame that clothes the skin
To the nameless shame that lives within?
Waking or sleeping I see a wreck,
And hear a cry from a reeling deck!
Hate me and curse me — I only dread
The hand of God and the face of the dead!"

Said old Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart,
Tarred and feathered and carried in a cart
By the women of Marblehead!

Then the wife of the Skipper lost at sea
Said, "God has touched him! — why should we?"
Said an old wife mourning her only son,
"Cut the rogue's tether and let him run!"
So with soft relentings and rude excuse,
Half scorn,half pity, they cut him loose,
And gave him a coat to hide him in,
And left him alone with his shame and sin.
Poor Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart,
Tarred and feathered and carried in a cart
By the women of Marblehead!

The incident which the poet related took place many years ago when Marblehead was more of a fishing center than it is today. The explanation is that the fisherman who could fill his boat and get to the market first would get the highest price for his catch. Floyd Ireson's excuse for not stopping was that he could not control his men who had a share in the catch. A good price meant more to them than the lives of their neighbors and they would not obey his command to stop and aid them.

Whittier was a Quaker poet, and a man highly esteemed in New England where he lived. It is not believed that he would knowingly do any man an injustice, but we do not know that he ever offered any apology for writing the poem. Descendants of Ireson still live in Marblehead.

Sometime ago the families who at different times occupied the big square house opposite the high school building on School street were listed in this column. In the listing the family of George Nesbitt was omitted and attention was called to the mistake by our old friend and critic Norman Webster of New York. He graduated from the Decatur high school in 1884 and is well informed on early Decatur history.

His letter follows:

"Some time ago I bantered you about your recital of the successive occupants of the house across from the school on School Street. You had mentioned the two Upton families and more recent residents but not the George Nesbitt family.

Perhaps the item in The Republican of December 9 may have reminded you of that family and the three girls.

Maude, widow of John Hughes, was the oldest. The item told of her death in Chicago, December 6.

Kate, who was about my age, died long ago. I think she never married. But of her I remember that when, at a party at the Nesbitt home, I spilled a cup of coffee on her she insisted that she had never liked her dress and was glad it was ruined. The perfect hostess!

Gay, the youngest, married a Kalamazoo boy, Clyde McGibeny don't know whether he is still living but the news item says that she is.

I knew their father at his store but my most vivid memories are of the girls.. And why not?

Don't you every travel via New York?

Cordially,
Norman Webster

The death of Maude Nesbitt Hughes did remind us that the George Nesbitt family occupied for a number of years the big square house on School street.

George Nesbitt was a son of Robert Nesbitt, one of the outstanding early citizens of Hamilton township, and George himself was a farmer there in his early years. He moved to Decatur in the early eighties.

Kate, the second of the three Nesbitt daughters, died when a young lady. She was a beautiful girl, — generous, kind and intelligent, and a favorite with the young people. She taught me to dance and her untiring patience with an awkward boy was never forgotten.

Note a Webster mistake. The name is Clarence McGibony. He was the Silver Tongued Coach of the Kalamazoo Blues, a well known ball team of the eighties that frequently played Decatur's invincible champions. He died many years ago.

As in the years of the past many greetings have come to gladden our holiday season. Some have contained news items of interest to residents of the community. This one concerning a former well known lady of Little Prairie Ronde was sent by Miss Helen Hathaway of Ann Arbor:

Flora Buell has moved bag and baggage at 89 from her home in Ann Arbor up to the home of her nephew, Bruce Buell, RFD1, Oneda, Wisconsin. There in that lovely home, where she can enjoy the trees, the birds and the wild flowers she expects to spend the remaining years of her life.

Her thoughtful tenants, the Hunters, had a remembrance book made up for her for Christmas.

A card from Jesse and Hazel Kelsey contains a picture of their yard with the ground all covered with snow comment: "Eight inches of snow in our yard October 31, 1954."

This new item from the Paw Paw Courier-Northerner is of interest to Decatur people as well as those of the county seat:

'Judge Glenn E. Warner who has been receiving treatment in Borgess hospital, Kalamazoo, for the past three weeks was brought to his home here Monday afternoon and is somewhat improved but still requires constant attention by a nurse."

The item was published in the issue of December 31, and we trust that by this time Judge Warner is much better.

In renewing his subscription to the Republican Dean Foster of Keeler expresses appreciation for this column and gives a brief account of his fine progressive family. Ruth, Mrs. Foster, is teaching the Byers school in her final farewell year, and Dean likewise, in addition to his other activities, is completing his eighth pedagogical year, they, making a combined teaching experience of 75 years. He has been instructor of the Dowagiac Veterans' Institute for the past eight years.

Bill and Bob did the heavy work in managing the strawberry harvest last season, with their parents coaching from the sidelines. The nimble pickers are expected from the South again in May and of the 50 families some of them have been coming for the past 19 years. Bob is in his Sophomore year in the MSC and will major in agricultural subjects.

It is the common report that this Foster family raises 100 acres of strawberries and that Dean is the strawberry king of Michigan.

THE OLD TOWN OF CHARLESTON

By Jack C. Rutty

(This is another of the local history sketches writen by pupils of the Decatur high school.)

On June 25, 1836, Jacob Morlan, Jacob Charles, Elijah Goble, Alexander Fulton and his brother, David, laid out Charleston, Michigan. The location was on Little Prairie Ronde in sections three and ten, Cass County, and about 4 miles south of Decatur. One reason why the town was laid out there was because of its rich soil. But the most important reason was because it was a stage coach route from Detroit to Kalamazoo, and on to Niles and Chicago. It stopped daily in Charleston at the Tittle Hotel.

Elijah Goble opened a tavern there in 1837 and named it the "Brown Eagle." It was one of the town's biggest buildings. The tavern had a good-sized dining room and sitting room which was cleared for dancing. Dinners were from two dollars and a half to three dollars. That was in 1865 and 1866.

The first house in Charleston was built by James Huff.

Before Charleston was a town the land was Elijah Goble's farm. There were one hundred and sixty acres which later became Charleston, then the land was divided into thirty-two lots.

Among the buildings in the town were four taverns, two blacksmith shops, one general store, a boot and shoe store, and a schoolhouse.

The taverns were the "Brown Eagle" owned by Elijah Goble, the "Tittle Hotel" owned by James Tittle, the "Draper House" owned by Mr. Draper and his son. Austin Charles and Doc Curry, a mischievous pair, had a special sign made for Hallowe'en to hang on the Draper House. It said, "Hot Hellity Bum, Kept by Draper and Son." The Charleston House was built by Elijah Goble. One of the blacksmith shops was owned by Ezra Lawrence. He wasn't paid for his work in money because not many people had much money so instead of money he was paid in meat, butter and wheat.

The Charleston schoolhouse was made of brick, the seats and tables were made by hand, and the boards in the floor were very wide. A big stove stood in the middle of the floor. The teacher who taught the children stayed at each pupil's home for about three weeks or more.

People came to town in wagons and sleighs drawn by horses and oxen. Some of the things they got were clothing, black molasses, brown sugar, but not much flour—maybe a gallon or two of whiskey.

Charleston wasn't a dead town in its day. They had horse races from Main street to Morlan's corner. Fifty to one hundred people gathered to watch them. There wasn't a farmer who didn't have a horse in the race. Also they had sugar parties, spelling schools, sleigh ride parties, and dancing at Elijah Goble's tavern.

Some of the old timers say that there was a big circus once shown there.

Before the Civil War it was thought that Charleston would someday be a very prosperous town. In the early forties and fifties railroads were pushing their way all over the United States and the people of Charleston thought a railroad was going to be laid through their town. They were disappointed in this and gradually the town began to vanish.

Elijah Goble kept his tavern over twenty-five years, but in 1869 not a building remained. Now it is only an historical reord. It has only a cemetery and a foundation of a house next to the cemetery which used to be the old Charles farm.

Charleston is a ghost town today. There is nothing to mark its location but a cemetery and an historical plaque.

I have been asked to write a tribute to Mother for Mother's Day. I never was much impressed by the setting aside of one day in the year to remember Mother. To me it should be a matter of every day. But the special day may not be amiss for those who are inclined to forget on other days.

Moses also remembered Father, but modern invention has set aside another special day in the year for remembering him. It would be well if the Fifth Commandment could be so conspicuously displayed in every home that everyone would be familiar with it:

"Honour thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."

The Bible also says, you will find it in Proverbs, "Despise not thy mother when she is old."

In proportion as we prize this life we should honor the giver of it, our mother, and in so far as we are able we should keep her in comfort and peace so long as she remains upon this earth.

Some great man, and I think it was Lincoln, once said, "All that I am I owe to my sainted mother." And one of my good friends has made everlasting the memory of her mother in these glowing lines:

Is it the beauty of the rose
Unfolding to my view,
That stirs again this heart of mine
To gentle thoughts of you?
Or is it that the thought of you,
Which sweetly in me glows
Can make me see each time anew
The beauty of the rose?

Alice Brown, oldest of the three sisters, Alice, Pearl and Dorothy (Dot) has been a patient for several years in the State Sanitorium at Howell. She writes that she has been returned to her home with Dorothy in Ann Arbor and would like the Republican sent to her there. She thanks the good Lord for his wonderful care of her. She can't walk yet but is hopeful. Dorothy keeps going but is far from well. Her address is 516 Detroit Street, Ann Arbor, Michigan.

The Brown sisters were born in Decatur and lived here until after their father died, when they moved to Ann Arbor. Their father was hostler for the late Dr. G. L. Rose. Alice worked in the home of Dr. Hooper. Pearl died in Ann Arbor. Decatur has always been the dearest spot on earth to these girls. their best friends and the Decatur paper gives them their news from home.

Thomas Bass sent word by his son Harley that he will be 96 the first of May, but the word did not come in time to give the advance notice. Tom gets about the house but does not wander far from home. He expects to be the first Decatur person to celebrate his 100th birthday. Harley Bass will be 66 the tenth of May.

Decatur's most active citizen for his years is Frank Stapleton. He will be 90 the 13th of May and still takes short drives in his car.

Mrs. Ell Keyes, who lives with her daughter in Kalamazoo, celebrated her 90th birthday in March and is in good health for one of her years.

In Hamilton township, Mrs. Capitola Fassett will be 93 the 12th of May, James Osborn was 87 the tenth of April and Mrs. Osborn was 92 in January. These are fine examples of a healthy community, and may peace and enjoyment be their lot each succeeding day.

Clara Sutton Newman was born in Decatur, August 18, 1891, at the home of her grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. R. J. Rawson. The Rawson home was on George St. near Prospect. She has lived and worked for many years in Duluth and is now nearing the age of retirement. Certificate of birth is required and I was asked to be one of her vouchers. Her husband works for the railroad that carries iron ore from the mines on the iron range to the docks at Duluth and Two Harbors.

Clara writes, "I get lonesome to see Decatur and wish it were possible to fly there, if just for a few hours. I miss the old home and my Aunt Mary so much. I would like to see the condition of the lots in Lakeside cemetery, not that it makes much difference as my folks are not there, we know. I wonder who are in Decatur that know me. Are the Newells still there, and Frances Squier, and the Upfield family? Yes I am hungry for news of Decatur, as it was my second home, as you know."

Clara's grandfather was Judson R. Rawson, who is listed in the Gazetteer of 1869 as a stone mason living on the east side of George Street, second house north of Prospect. It is now the home of Lyle Howe and family. Her Aunt Mary was Mrs. W. H. White, wife of Decatur's postmaster at the turn of the century. Both Judson Rawson and brother Silas were soldiers of the Civil War and well known citizens of Decatur in their day. Silas was the father of Charles who ran a restaurant here for many years.

Clara Sutton Newman's address is 105 W. Oxford Street, Duluth 3, Minn.

I have two pamphlets on the Spanish-American War lent me by some friend. Have forgotten the lender, but if he or she will make known his identification, shall be glad to return them, if desired.

Am pleased to state here that the story about Seth Fasset, well remembered musician of Hamilton township, was writen by Marilyn LaBarge. It was one of the school papers published in this column a few weeks ago.

15-CENT DIVORCE

A wife in the Ait Haddidu tribe in the High Atlas mountains of Morocco can legally divorce an unwanted husband for 15 cents. Some of the tribeswomen have had more than 20 husbands.

The following article is one of a group of stories written by high school pupils about the history of Decatur:

HISTORY OF THE DECATUR REPUBLICAN

(By Mildred Howe)

The first attempt for a newspaper for our village was made by Rufus C. Nash in 1859. It was printed in Paw Paw and circulated in Decatur. The publication closed down and no name was left on record. At the same time, in 1860, C. P. Sweet published the "Decatur Clarion" in 1865. After six months, he sold out to A. W. Briggs who discontinued the publication after another six months had passed.

In 1867, the newspaper from which the "Decatur Republican" was adopted, was founded by Prof. C. F. R. Bellows and E. A. Blackman. Bellows, who was the superintendent of schools at that time, soon turned all responsibilities for "The Van Buren County Republican" over to Blackman. A copy of the first publication of the "Van Buren County Republican" is among the treasured possessions of Arba N. Moulton.

In 1872, the newspaper became the "Democrat" going along with Horace Greeley, the defated candidate for United States president.

In 1876, H. C. Buffington bought the paper and returned it to Republicanism.

The paper changed hands quite a few times during the next few years. In the late seventies, it was owned by a brilliant young man by the name of Mac Wooster, who met a tragic death on a freight train going to Dowagiac. Sometimes, in those days, men were allowed to ride in the caboose. A tramp, riding on the same train, was not hurt.

For a short time, Robert L. Warren was editor of the paper. At the time he was editing it, he was elected to represent Van Buren County in the State Legislature of 1883-1884. His son later became the American Ambassador to Japan and to Mexico.

In 1890, it became the possession of O. W. and M. O. Rowland, father and son. These men, experts in the newspaper field, moved the paper to Paw Paw in about 1893.

Almost a year passed before William E. Secord and Fred H. Dewey began publishing the "Decatur Independent". The paper was printed on the second floor of the Stewart Building (where Gale's Farm Store is now located).

After about two years, the paper was put up for sale. It was bought by Arba N. Moulton on January first, 1897. It was then changed back to the "Decatur Republican". Secord was hired as foreman and he worked for dollar-a-day wages for quite a few months.

At that time, Fay Beach was a "printer's devil" to learn the trade and he continued to work for the paper for quite a few years.

The building which is now used to publish the paper was built by Dan Carney and Harvey Taylor, masons, and Sidney Sweetland, carpenter. Mr. Moulton stated that Sweetland worked for $2½ wages for a ten hour day. The construction work was carried on all summer of 1900. The paper was moved into its new home during Thanksgiving time of that year. The office force had a great celebration on that occasion.

In 1904, Myron Hinkley began his apprenticeship. He acted as manager during Mr. Moulton's absence from 1917 to spring of 1926. He then left to establish a newspaper of his own in California. Clayton Howe worked as an apprentice from 1911 to 1917, but he was then called to serve in the First World War. Other men who served on the staff of the newspaper were Bruce Bassett, Lucius Hubbard, Carl Athey, Rex Stroh, and Otis Howe.

Arthur Howe was employed by Mr. Moulton for over thirty years. The late Charles Danner worked at the publishing office from World War I to the time of his passing in 1945. Clayton Howe was again hired.

Mr. Moulton owned the newspaper from 1897 to 1951, when it was sold to Dalton and Eleanor Kinney. He was responsible for the progress and success of the paper during this time.

Mr. Moulton rendered a great service to our community during this fifty-four years as editor of our local paper. The geniune love that he has for his home town is matched only by the love and devotion which he shows for his country. Mr. Moulton's life should inspire the younger generation to lead a good and useful life.

Here are a few appropriate lines from a poem by Will Carleton:

THE EDITOR'S GUESTS

And 'tis thus with our noble profession, and thus it shall ever be still;

There are some who appreciate its labors,
And some who perhaps never will.

But in the great time that is coming when loudly the trumpt shall sound,
And they who have labored and rested come out of the quivering ground;
When they who have striven and suffered to teach and ennoble the race,
Shall march at the front of the column,
each one in his God-given place,
As they pass through the gates of the City,
with proud and victorious tread,
The editor, printer, and "devil," will travel not far from the head.

Dear Editor:

We have been subscribers to your paper most of the time for over fifty years, and tho we have not lived in or near Decatur since 1904, we still read occasionally of people we used to know in the first years of the century, and before then.

The former Editor, Arba Moulton was a schoolmate of mine, and I have written many letters to him in the past that he printed in the paper. We were sorry when he had to retire and turn the business over to younger people, but it was the best thing that he could do, and we hope he is enjoying his retirement years, he certainly earned them. His column is the first thing we look for when we tear the wrapper off the paper, so many of his items are about people we used to know. We hope he can continue to keep it up for many years to come.

Respectfully yours,

Louis D. Dwight

Just a small mistake of a single letter in the issue of January 27 caused me to make a misstatement which some of the older readers may wonder about.

The line said in effect that Richard H. Lyon was working on the South Bend Tribune when "he" became editor of the Republican. It should have said when "we" became editor of the Republican. It is quite likely to have been a slip of the typewriter.

Mr. Lyon was never editor of the Republican, but he did get his first newspaper experience under Blackman and Bellows who established the Republican in 1867. He is listed in the Gazetteer of 1869 as a musical genius and he was all of that. He boarded with his father, Eli Lyon. The Lyon house does not now exist in its original form. It was located on East Sherwood street, was rebuilt by Hueston Elliott and is his home.

In the early days Decatur was a great town for amateur theatricals. It has talent and the shows put on by its clever young people were almost professional in quality. In fact several professionals did begin their careers in Decatur. As a musical genius Dr. Broderick was the equal of Dick Lyon and the two were close friends. The Broderick family moved to Buchanan early in the present century and the son Will has been a druggist there for many years. I have not heard from him for some time and he may still be in business there.

I was a young boy when the local talent began to disperse and the shows ceased to exist. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was the most popular of the local talent shows and excitement ran high in the town on the nights it was to be staged in the old town hall. Can remember but a few of the players. Hiram Slocum was Uncle Tom, Mrs. Hiram Slocum was Topsy, Mrs. Hooper was Miss Ophelia. Cannot remember definitely about others in the cast. Here is an opportunity, for other old timers to come to the relief of this recorder with what they can remember of those early times. Who took the parts of Little Eva, Sinclair, George Shelby, the Lawyer Marks, The Quaker who helped the slaves to escape, and others.

From these amateur plays Frank Tucker became a professional, organized a company here and for years was known across the country for his clever acting. Mr. and Mrs. Howard Hall joined the company here and Mr. Hall began his bright career that ended only with his death in the early twenties.

That very interesting Gazeteer of 1869 lists the Decatur Dramatic Association which "gives select entertainments once every four weeks during the winter season". The officers were E. D. Hitchcock, Pres.; Dick Lyon, Vice Pres.; Hames F. Crandall, Sec'y.; and Charles H. Crandall, Treas.

The Decatur Cornet Band also flourished at this time. Its members were John M. Steele, C. H. Crandall, E. D. Hitchcock, Wm. Mead, Stewart Davis, Dick Lyon, Dan Knight, Henry Seymour Fred Seymour and Wm. Beals.

Ten or twelve years later this band was succeeded by another band, the most of those members are remembered by our oldest residents. A large picture of this band has been lost, but we have a post card copy of it with names of players written on the back. It was taken in front of the hardware store of S. N. Thomas in the time of the wide board sidewalks. The boys were in full uniform, gray swallow-tailed coats, black trousers and gray helmets. All members are gone but Harley Squier who is over 90 and resides in Buchanan.

The members of this band were Harry Hughes, Millard Russell, John Struble, Charles Rawson, Nick Huff, Frank Clark, Homer Hinkley, Harley Squier, Will Carney, Chas. Pritchard, Will Sutton, Harry Russell.

On Lincoln's birthday, February 12, the Michigan State College will be 100 years old and will begin a year long celebration of the event. In these 100 years it has grown to become the eighth largest university in the nation.

Decatur and Van Buren County have taken an active part in the development of the M.S.C. and we may have more to say about it later.

Once a year we hear from Frances Rosewarne Hicks, and the receipt of her letter is one of the pleasant events of our still eventful life. Frances married Vernon Hicks, a forester and their early married life was spent in the government service in Northern Michigan. They were transferred to Darrington in northern Washington and their next transfer was to Portland, Oregon where they are now located. They have two children, Katherine and Tommy, and they live busy and happy lives. Frances is a daughter of Vivian Rosewarne of Little Prairie Ronde; and she is a graduate of the Decatur high school and has many friends here.

They have a home and two acres of ground and raise 300 chickens a year. They sell chickens, both dressed and alive, and eggs. They have no trouble to sell all they produce. May their lives continue to be joy and progress, and all the work they want.

Have received such a friendly letter from Edna Clark Brown, Mrs. Guy Brown, that I cannot refrain from printing a part of it here. Mrs. Brown is a daughter of the late Frank Clark, who was associated with his brother, William H. Clark, in operating a large tract of muck land on the New Swamp road south of Decatur. Edna graduated from the Decatur High School, married Guy Brown, a progressive young man of Decatur, and they have lived in and near Detroit since leaving the home town. Guy has stayed with the Chrysler Corporation and done very well, so if they decide to build a home on a hill overlooking the ocean they can do so.

This is what Edna writes: "Ever since you moved to Marblehead I have wanted to wish you happiness in your new home and to tell you I know and love every inch of that wonderful country. We lived in Boston and Beverly for a long time before moving to Decatur, and Papa loved to travel in those days. I have seen every place of interest or beauty in New England. Some day I want a home on a hill overlooking my beloved ocean. Please keep writing for the Republican for a long time."

Marblehead can furnish an ideal hill and view of the ocean. A contractor who lives a block from our No. 5 Madison Road has built 72 houses in this neighborhood all within the past three years, some of them within sight of the ocean and all of them within a few blocks of it.

A house may be ideally located with respect to the ocean today and tomorrow some one may commence the building of a house that will shut off all or a part of the view of it. This contractor is breaking ground now for a house that will hurt the view of our neighbor to the west. We say breaking ground, but it is really blasting rock. The workmen were three days dynamiting to make a place for the basement. The only way to be sure that the ocean view will be permanent is to build on a bluff by the ocean side. Some of the prettiest homes in Marblehead are thus located. But even here all that glitters is not gold. Those hurricanes were no respecters of quality. They spent their fury on the little and the great. The best of the ocean side palaces suffered grievously.

But don't let anyone be discouraged by what is written here. There is no such thing as perfection on this earth, and it is always commendable to follow our ideals, even if they are never quite attained.

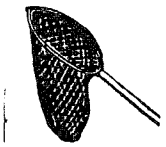
A few weeks ago the Republican announced the death of Albert Gantz at the age of 85. He was born in Decatur, September 25, 1869 and died in Decatur, January 13, 1955. All of his long life was lived here.

He graduated from the Decatur high school in the class of 1889. That is why I feel impelled to write about him, he was one of my classmates. There were five of them— six in the class altogether and all of these years I have had this special interest in each one of them. They have stood out in my mind because I took the march with them down the long aisle of the old Presbyterian Church to the platform, and received with them the certificate of graduation which is still preserved among my treasures. The certificates may have meant much or little to other graduates, but mine has meant much to me.

There were three boys and three girls in that all important class of '89, and now only four of them are living. Jennie Simpson, later Mrs. Will Lyle, was the youngest and the first to go. She was a good student and a fine woman. After her graduation she taught school until her marriage. Bessie Howland never married but took up the profession of nursing, and made a record for herself in the First World War of which we are all proud. Her address is Women's Cottage, Veterans' Administration Board, Los Angeles, Calif. Hubert O'Dell is also in Southern California. I have not heard from him for some time and would like his address.

The classmate who remained the nearest to the home town is Fern Hawks Smiley. Her home has been for many years in Galesburg, Michigan, the station just east of Kalamazoo, where her husband, the late Joseph Bert Smiley, was editor of the Galesburg newspaper. What I remember about Minnie Hawks, as we knew her then is that she was one of the best spellers in the school. Down in the grades, on Friday afternoons, the teacher appointed two captains to choose sides. These captains stood together against the wall in the rear of the room, and the pupils as chosen lined up on either side of them. The teacher then gave the words and the contest was on. I was proud of my ability to spell and more than once thought I to myself, if it were not for Minnie Hawks I could spell down all of the school. I surely hope the year 1955 will be kind to her.

The motto of the class of '89 was, "Not wise but lovers of wisdom." I do not know who pinned it on us, but if fit me all right.



Our superintendent was D. C. Pierce and our preceptress, Mrs. Jennie K. Hill, both of revered memory.

I trod the grades with Albert Gantz, and the only school that either of us ever attended was the good old Decatur public school. The probate notice now running in the Republican gives his name as Anthony Gantz, but he was known in school and in the town only as Albert. A change also in the spelling of his surname probably took place somewhere down the years. The Gazeteer of 1869, published in Decatur, lists "Frederick Gontz, carpenter, n East Decatur road 2 e George." The name "Gantz" is not listed, so this must be the family of my classmate.

The father, as I remember him, was a little man who kept much to himself. It is said that he even lived by himself in the barn. Besides the mother there were four children in the family, of whom Albert was the youngest. The others were Fred, Matilda and Charles. Albert was the only one who made any progress in school. There was no law in those years compelling parents to send their children to school. The older brothers spent much of the time fishing, — spearing in winter, hook and line in summer. Everything went well with them until the state began making laws to curb their liberties, and wardens kept bobbing up when not expected to see that they were obeyed. Like many others in those unhappy years for the fishermen, when licenses and regulations first began to take away their rights and privileges, the Gantz brothers soon learned to beware of, if not respect the wardens. A half century and more ago it was no uncommon sight to see Fred and Charlie coming up from Lake of the Woods with a prize pickeral, bass and perch and bluegills.

Charlie Gantz was strong as an ox. He and Ellis (Hoss) Wheeler and George Mahoney carried all of the heavy machinery of the Republican down from the second floor of Gale's hardware, then Stewart's grocery store, and across the street to the new building, and helped to set it up. This was all done on Thanksgiving Day, in 1900.

The sister Matilda, known as 'Tilda, did the marketing for the family. She carried a round bottom, closely woven basket about the size of a market basket, which would now be prized as an antique. I met her often on the street, as we both traversed the same street to town. She was always friendly but not talkative. The only words I recall ever hearing her say were the short salutation, "'Do, Arb."

The elder Gantzes came from Germany and one or two of the children might have been born there. I have a recollection, but no proof, that they came here from Berrien County. As none of the children married the family is now extinct.

A new Lincoln book is on the market. Its title is "The Day Lincoln Was Shot." The author is Jim Bishop, the publisher Harper and Brothers, New York. A reviewer says it has all the suspense of a high grade thriller.

On his last day, April 14, 1865, "The President moved placidly along his appointed course of appointments, cabinet meetings, an afternoon carriage drive, conversation with old cronies and an evening trip to the theater. If he anticipated danger, he did not show it, for Lincoln had long ago become a fatalist about assassination. "I know no one could do it and escape alive", he said. "But if it is to be done it is impossible to prevent it."

It is a Book of the Month Club book and the writer has been notified that he will receive a copy to add to his Lincoln bibliography. It should be available at the library soon and it might be well for persons desiring to read it to enter their names on a waiting list. I entered as number 13 on a waiting list for a new history of Marblehead about a month ago. Sometime I will receive a notification that it is at the library for me.

A letter from Mrs. Iryl Heap of California, Maryland gives the information that her mother, Mrs. Ellen Goble, is going through the winter nicely. Mrs. Goble broke her hip when she fell on the floor of her home on Wheeler last summer and is being well cared for at the Dunkleburger Convalescent Home in Bangor. She will be 90 years old in April.

The Republican has two sets of subscribers, those at home who know first hand almost everything that is going on in and around Decatur, and those who have gone to distant places and must depend on letters and the Republican to keep them in touch with the home town. The paper cannot get all the news, although one paper, I think it is the New York Times, advertises, "All the news that's fit to print."

From one interesting letter is gleaned this item: "Mrs. Anna Mahoney is caring for Judge Glenn E. Warner at his home in Paw Paw this winter." Judge Warner suffered a stroke last fall and spent some time in a hospital. He praises his nurse which is the best sign that he is improving.

He served 24 years as Judge of the 36th Judicial Circuit comprising the counties of Cass and Van Buren, and through his never failing courtesy and his fair and upright decisions he became universally respected and beloved in both counties.

Judge Warner began his political career as Prosecuting Attorney of Van Buren county, and only last summer he reminded me that he tried his first case before me as Justice of the Peace. After the law suit we had dinner at my home, and then we all attended Hamilton fair. If the wishes of his many friends prevail he wil soon be in good health again.

GINSENG — AN EXPERIMENT IN DECATUR

By Betty Rutty,
Pupil of Decatur High School.

Ginseng is a fleshy rooted herbaceous plant of which the two best known varieties are the Chinese and North American. They resemble each other so closely that the discovery of the latter near Montreal in 1716 was based upon a description of the former.

American ginseng grows naturally on the side of ravines and in shady, well-drained hardwood forests. In its wild state it grows from eight to twenty inches high, bearing three or more compound leaves, each consisting of five thin leaflets. A cluster of from six to twenty small greenish yellow flowers is produced in midsummer, to be followed later by as many bright crimson berries, each containing from one to three seeds the size of a small pea.

The root is thick, shaped like a spindle, two to four inches long and one half to one inch in thickness. Ginseng seeds, as a rule, do not germinate until a year from the spring following their ripening. It usually takes at least six years for the roots to reach marketable size.

Ginseng is considered very valuable by the Chinese as a cure for all illnesses. As ginseng originated in China, the Chinese have a superstition about the plant. They believe the root must have a shape similar to man because ginseng is a Chinese word meaning "The likeness of man."

Ginseng has long been cultivated in China and Korea, and since 1885 it has been cultivated in North America. When placed under cultivation, ginseng should be shielded from direct sunlight by the shade of trees or by lath sheds. The soil should be fairly light and well fertilized. Ginseng needs little cultivation, but the beds should at all times be kept free of weeds and grass. A winter mulch over the crowns is usually necessary.

The destruction of suitable forest has resulted in greatly diminishing the output of wild or native ginseng. Practically all ginseng that is grown in the United States is exported to China, where it is used for many different purposes. The Chinese prefer the wild roots, and prices therefore are several times as much as the prices for cultivated roots. The maximum price recorded in the United States Department of Agriculture for wild ginseng roots is $23 a pound.

The late Dexter E. Brigham raised ginseng in Decatur before the twenties. He raised it along the railroad tracks back of his house on the corner of Sherwood and Williams streets, in a lath shed fifty or sixty feet long and thirty feet wide. The lath shed provided the shade for the plants. It was an interesting, but costly experiment which did not materialize into a prosperous business.

We have a family of neighbors whose spacious residence overlooks the ocean. It is so near the ocean that they have no cause to fear that anyone will ever build in front of them. The hurricane of last year, however, lashed the wind and water against the building with such fury that it cost several thousand dollars to repair the damage, and caused the owner to remark that the location was hardly worth the hazard.

These same good neighbors own a farm in New Hampshire and enjoy spending a part of their time there. It is about fifty miles from their home here. They have harvested a bountiful apple crop and we were presented with a basket of the McIntosh variety. Yes, they have a bountiful crop, but the market here for apples is below the profit line. These friends are indeed fortunate that they are not dependent on the farm for a living. They do not get it from this New Hampshire farm, although it is a high class one.

One of the great problems facing the country is what is best to do for Agriculture. The Democrats and some Republicans are ready to give the farmers a definite bonus in exchange for their votes. The Republican administration says that is not the answer. President Eisenhower is backing Secretary of Agriculture Benson in promoting the flexible farm price support policy adopted in 1954.

I once worked for the Sanford Manufacturing Company of Chicago, makers of ink, and one of the first things I learned there was that the Company could easily make four times as much ink as it was making, but it would make only what it could make and sell at a profit, only so much and no more. Other companies making ink did the same thing, and all of them sold the same amount of ink for the same amount of money. There was no over-production, no cutting of prices and all of the companies made a profit and prospered, provided they were sufficiently competent advertisers and salesmen.

It is not so easy for farmers to control production. The American people demand that they shall be well fed, whether the season be favorable or unfavorable for crops. But no one can tell in the beginning if the harvest time will produce too much or too little.

Until man is able to fulfill his God-given dominion over the earth, until he can tell the rain when to fall, the sun when to shine, the frost when to keep away, and just what shall the harvest be, I can see no satisfactory solution to the farm problem.

In the paying of money for subsidies it must be clear that it is the people's money the politicians vote to pay, not their own. It is added to the tax burden, already high, and the government itself can suffer by overdoing it. The government is endeavoring to solve the problem by limiting production and guaranteeing fair prices, but the plan does not work out any too well, and the farmers are indeed facing an unpleasant situation. The President and his Secretary are working together harmoniously and are giving the matter much thought. They think they can find the right solution, and it is to be greatly hoped that they can.

STONEMASONRY

By Patsy Woods, a pupil of the Decatur Public Schools.

Stonemasonry is an art and trade that is disappearing as rapidly and as surely as the horse and buggy. One reason for its disappearance is the work and skill it requires. This art had been handed down from father to son for generations, but the modern young man refuses to become as skilled as needed. The accomplished mason, in addition to manual skill, must have an intimate knowledge of geometry.

I have been told that there are only two stonemasons left in Michigan. One is Merle Rowe of Dowagiac, who does much of the masonry in this area, and the other is Lou Morlan, originally of Decatur. Lou Morlan's father, Ed. Morlan, was one of the best stonemasons in the state. He built his little stone house on the road to Lake of The Woods, Pine street. It has a finely cut, geometric design on one side, a circle made of perfectly chisled stone slabs.

Two of Decatur's early stonemasons were Daniel Carney and Arthur Carpenter. Mr. Carney helped to put in Decatur's first sidewalks. They were black—made of tar and gravel. Before these sidewalks were built only the swankiest parts of town had sidewalks. These were made of boards and were considered in those days to be very modern.

The stones used in masonry must be of the finest quality. Weathered stones, laying on top of the soil, are too hard for chipping. Only an experienced mason is capable of selecting the best stones to be used. "Green" stones are used because they are more easily chipped. "Green" stones are stones that have been buried under gravel.

Granite is the stone most widely used in masonry. Others are flint, chert and conglomerate, plum pudding stone. A good mason gets the most colorful stones he can find. You cannot tell from the outside whether or not a stone is beautiful inside.

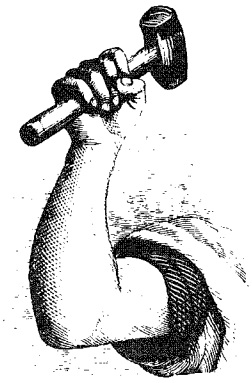
A mason uses in his work various hammers, chisels and gauges. These tools cannot be purchased in a store, they are made by blacksmiths in forges. The disappearance of the blacksmith makes the tools hard to get. Some of Merle Rowe's tools are one hundred years old.

There are three major kinds of stonemasonry: range, rubble and polygonal. Range consists of evenly squared stones, irregularly placed and composed of four sided blocks. Polygonal consists of blocks with various numbers of sides.

For thirty years of the last century Daniel Carney, sr., built tar and cement sidewalks and did all kinds of masonry in Decatur. During the earlier part of the period his sons, Will, Henry and Dan, jr. worked with him, but as they grew older they stepped out for themselves and continued their trade in the cities. Will went to Chicago, Henry to San Francisco and Dan, jr. to Seattle.

In 1900 Dan Carney sr. and Harvey Taylor did the mason work on the Republican office. They took great pains with their work and did a fine job. George Kruse furnished the white brick from his brick yard south of town, and the pressed brick for the front came from the Porter Pressed Brick Company of Porter, Indiana. Carney and Taylor were so desirous of doing a good job for me that they sent to the city for an expert to lay the pressed brick front and entrance, although they could have done it fairly well themselves. The Republican office was built by good friends who were as anxious as was I that the building should be a credit to the paper and the village.

Sidney D. Sweetland did the carpenter work. I had plans and specifications drawn by an architect from South Bend, and asked Mr. Sweetland if he would like to take them and figure the cost of doing the carpenter work He took them and kept them a week, and on returning them, said: "I just don't know how to figure the cost from those plans, but if you will give me the work I will put in ten hours a day at $2.50 a day and do you a good job."



PAPERS BY PUPILS

HAITI

By Carl Keyes

Haiti is the western third of the island Hispaniola. The Dominican Republic makes up the rest.

The island was discovered in 1492 on the first voyage of Columbus. Some years later it was divided between Spain and France. Haiti is an Indian word meaning "High land."

The island is located in the tropical zone southeast of Florida. It has a dry winter and a rainy summer and autumn. It has forests of cedar, mahogany, satinwood and a few others. The island yields minerals of iron, silver, gold, copper, platinum, tin, coal, sulphur, nickel and gypsum.

Haiti is ruled by a president named Paul Eugene Maglous. He is married and has five children.

The capitol city is Port au Prince. In this small country where donkeys are the main means of travel the language spoken is French, but most of the natives use a French dialect called Creole.

Haiti is a "Black Republic" of 3,500 inhabitants. They think of themselves as colored French. Their main religion is Roman Catholic. The principal products of Haiti are coffee, sugar, cotton, pineapple and bananas. The towns and cities are small but growing every year.

Sometime ago we had a visitor, a former pupil of Miss Howland. Her name was Miss Wilma Ludlow and she had been a missionary in Haiti. During her four years there she learned much about the people and their way of life. An interesting part of her talk to the school was about the Mardi Gras they had, the same as the celebration in New Orleans. There was a drunken man driving a truck with several others riding with him at the time a parade was in progress on the same street. The man did not have any brakes on his truck and he ran into and killed seven people. The Mardi Gras lasts for several days and nights, but this year they are trying to do away with that kind of a celebration.

Haiti's new president is a good one, and is trying in every way he can to improve the country.

DESERTS

By Lynda Conway

If someone were to ask you to give a description of a desert, what would your answer be? Perhaps yours like millions of others, would be inaccurate. Would your answer be similar to the following? "A hot, bleak, billowing sea of uninhabited sand dunes reaching off to a flat horizon?"

The boys who trained in the American desert for service in North Africa learned that deserts can be pretty cold on winter nights. Also that deserts are more likely to be rocky than sandy and that they are hilly and mountainous as well as flat.

Observing the different deserts, they are all alike in one respect. They are all extremely dry. A desert has been defined as a region that gets on the average less than ten inches of rain a year, but this is false, as the rainfall on deserts is highly irregular.

The main reason for a desert is lack of rain, and bordering many desert are mountain ranges, which are the cause of this. The mountains cause the winds to drop all moisture and they continue on to the desert as dry winds. These same winds blow the sand into hills, or dunes, a few hundred feet high. Traveling dunes move across the desert as they gain sand and lose it. Another cause for a desert is, the air becomes dry when it flows over a warm region. A desert may be hot like the Sahhara, or cold, like the tundras of Siberia.

Temperatures on the desert may reach as high as 130 degrees Fahrenheit in the day time to freezing point at night. It hardly ever snows in the lower regions of the subtropical deserts, but it is not an unusual sight to stand on a blazing desert and look at a snow covered mountain peak in the near distance.

The animals and plants that live in the desert are made so they can survive under the circumstances. The camel can store water in his stomach and has wide feet for walking in the sand. The cactus plant stores water in its thick stem. Lizards and other small animals have skin coloring like the sand to protect them from their enemies. Horned toads and desert mice bury themselves when their enemy approaches. Many animals sleep during the day and are able to close their eyes and nostrils when sand starts blowing. Aninals on the desert are known to consume less food.

The cactus plant and sagebrush store water in their thick stems and are able to survive the extreme heat and dryness.

A spot in the desert where a natural spring bubbles up is called, an oasis. In there localities farming is carried on. These are like green islands in a sea of sand. Some oasis are only large enough to support one or two people, others support over a million. Irrigation supplies enough water for fruit, vegetables, dates and other crops.

The largest desert in the world is the Sahara. It is a little larger than the United States, and it stretches across North Africa from the Atlantic Ocean to the Nile. Southward it stretches to the Niger River and Lake Ichad. Only a few people live in the Sahara. Some of them raise crops on irrigated land in an oasis. Others make a living by tending flocks, goats, sheep or camels. These people live in tents so they can move easily as soon as the grass is eaten in one place.

The United States has small deserts in Neveda, Utah, California, Arizona and New Mexico.

Death Valley, a desert in Southern California, is noted for its hot temperatures. Until just recently it held the record temperature ever recorded, 134 degrees Fahrenheit, during one of its warm summer days. In 1849, eighteen members of a band of 30 adventurers, died on their way to California gold fields because of thirst. The twelve survivors who made their way out named the place "Death Valley."

This Death Valley desert is now a National Monument.

HOWARD G. HALL

Famous Actor from Decatur.

(From the Local History Sketches written by pupils of Decatur High School.)

By Janice Redmond

Howard Girard Hall was born in Evanston, Illinois, May 30, 1867.

When a young boy he went west in a covered wagon, and made his home in North Dakota, where he went to school and college.

When Mr. Hall was in school recitation was very important and he was one of the best in his school.

Mr. Hall was married on June 26, 1888, to Carrie Viola Vanderhoof, who was born in Decatur Township. They were the parents of two children, Marie Hall, who passed away, and Louis Hall.

At an early age he learned the printer's trade at which he worked until he was about twenty years old.

He then met a group of players and joined Horace Lewis who was organizing a company to play "Monte Cristo."

After that time Mr. Hall appeared with some of the best actors and actresses of his generation; among them Robert Mantell and David Warfield.

He wrote many successful plays and books. One of his books was "Soldier of the Empire" in which he was the leading character in the dramatic version.

He advanced in his acting and appeared in such plays as "Within the Law," "Poor Little Rich Girl," "The Man Who Dared," and many others.

But the play which was his most famous and won world wide acclaim was, "A Man of the People" in which he portrayed Abraham Lincoln. Howard Hall was Abraham Lincoln, not only in makeup, but in picture and voice. He was Abraham Lincoln come to life.

Headlines in newspapers read: "Lincoln, by Howard Hall Declared Marvelous."

The critics praised him, saying, "Howard Hall breathes human breath into Dixon's work with his splendid interpretation of the leading character, Abraham Lincoln." Others said, "Howard Hall's Lincoln is the most beautiful, enduring, and truthful, with an almost haunting materalization of the president as we like to remember him."

He went down in history as one of the most famous portrayers of Lincoln in acting history.

Although the most of his career was spent in active stage work, Mr. Hall found time for other work in this line, and served as a director and producer.

Later Mr. and Mrs. Hall came to Michigan to reside and purchased a farm in Hamilton. He had a great many friends in this vicinity. Mrs. Hall now resides at 104 Pine Street in Decatur.

Mr. Hall passed away July 25, 1921, at Long Beach California at the height of his brilliant career.

He died a great actor, one of the best portrayers of Lincoln America has ever known.

The following verses are taken from "The Prophet's Paradise," a book written by Mr. Hall in 1903.

"Thou canst not err if thou but use thy wits,
Thy safest guide by day, thy lamp by night.
Give ear to every thought. Thy conscience sits,
A wary censor to discern the right.
With earnest zeal tread thou the wisdom-way;
Solve every riddle and each tangle trace;
Make this thy creed, and, if thou needs must pray,
Seek thou of Nature's God a throne of grace.
So live that thou canst proudly say —'The World
Is better for my having lived,' nor sigh
Because thy name may never be unfurled
On scroll of fame to fill the envious eye."

Ross Hudson, President.

The newly organized First National Bank of East Lansing held open house last Thursday afternoon and evening in its new building on Grand River Avenue. Ross I. Hudson, who began his banking career in Decatur, is its president.

The new bank opens under bright promise of a prosperous future. It is the third bank in a city of 20,325 population, the seat of the Michigan State College, and it closely adjoins the Michigan State Capital.

The new bank was organized in March, 1954, by a group of leading citizens of East Lansing, with a total capitalization of $350,000. There is $200,000 in common stock, $100,000 surplus and $50,000 in undivided profits. The new building, owned by the vice president, Irving H. Hill, is valued at $115,000. It has a frontage of 90 feet along Grand River avenue and extends along Division Street 135 feet. It contains the modern banking equipment and provides drive-in teller windows on one side. Ample parking is provided at the side and rear.

Following his banking experience in Decatur, Ross served about 25 years as state banking examiner, and left that work to take his present position. In his long service for the state he has gained the confidence and respect of banking men throughout his territory, and his simple, honest and friendly manner has endeared him to those with whom he has come in contact. His many Decatur friends are greatly pleased over his success.

Mrs. R. V. Swihart and daughter, Mrs. Warren Hudson, attended the bank opening last Thursday evening. Warren is a lieutenant in the Air Force stationed on the Island of Newfoundland.

Two more birthdays of old friends for the month of May are Mrs. Lulu Bowers, 83, May 30, (her present address is 321 Jones Street, South Haven, Michigan) and Henry Howland, 87, May 15.

VAN'T ZELFDE FARMS

(From Local History Sketches by Pupils of Decatur High School)

By Stella Van't Zelfde

Mr. and Mrs. Dennis VantZelfde came from the Netherlands to America on the twelfth of May, 1913 and located in Kalamazoo. The next spring they came to Decatur to live on a farm near Fifield Hill. They lived there three years when they moved to a place south of town by the railroad tracks.

In 1917 the brothers Jake, Dan, John, Pete and Gerrit bought a farm on the Duell road to work with their father. They all liked farming.

As the years went by they bought a number of farms. My father bought an 80 acre farm in 1947.

In 1931 old Mr. Dennis VantZelfde died. The brothers have since worked together on the farms raising corn, carrots, onions, celery wheat, rye, peppermint and spearmint. They have worked together all of these years, have learned a lot about farming and like it.

As the years went by their work increased until they were compelled to hire outside help for weeding, and they found good help in the school children. The weeders kept clean the carrots, onions, spearmint, and potatoes we had grown for our own use. Anna Rohl was the boss of the weeders. Pete VantZelfde's daughters, Anna and Pauline, and sons Dennis, Neal and Leonard, also helped when needed.

In their years of farming they bought new machinery and tools, and they got along with some of the old.

When my father, Dan VantZelfde, was farming with his brothers he was also thinking of farming alone, and in 1954 he realized his ambition. My brothers Ben and Dan also liked it because they could learn more about the work and how to handle the tools and machinery.

My father's farm is 80 acres and is located on the New Swamp road. He raises pickles for us kids to pick, and also corn, onions, carrots, spearment and rye.

We all like to live in America better than in the Netherlands because there is more freedom here, and more modern machinery, and they have to work harder there for their living.

THE FLORY GRAPE AND BERRY HOE

In December, 1944, Willis Flory opened a welding shop in Decatur. He repaired farm equipment of all kinds, and an implement that seemed to need repairing often was the grape hoe. One man came in with a certain make of hoe. It was all twisted and bent, and he asked to have one made like it, only heavier. Flory made what he wanted.

Before long other grape growers were coming in to have him make hoes like it. The man who made the original hoe heard about it and ordered him to stop making them. It was hard for him to tell customers he couldn't make the hoes any more, for he knew the farmers really needed a hoe that was heavier and stronger than those on the market.

He remembered the old story about building a better mouse trap than your neighbor, and he decided to build a better grape hoe. He spent many evenings making drawings and finally he made a model hoe and took it out to see if it would work. He made many changes in it and took it apart and put it together again many times, but at last he had a good working model.

Some of the new hoes were put to work in nearby vineyards and proved their worth.

The grape hoe is a farm tool used to cultivate the soil in the row between the plants. It is attached to the right side of the tractor from between the front and rear wheels. The driver of the tractor operates the hoe in and out between the plants with one hand by means of a long handle or by an hydraulic lever.

In 1950 Mr. Flory applied for a patent on his hoe to the Commissioner of Patents at Washington, D.C. He applied through Attorneys Clarence A. O'Brien and Harvey B. Jacobson. Nearly two years later, on June 24, 1952 he was granted patent No. 2,601,380, and since then he has made a number of improvements on the hoe.

He now has two models on the market, a Manual and an Hydraulic, and it is being built heavier and stronger than before.

All parts of the hoe are made here at Flory's Welding Shop. He has sold over 500 hoes and has 12 dealers in Michigan. He also has customers in Indiana and Ohio.

Sometime in the near future he hopes to expand his business, and with the help of his two sons, introduce the hoe into other localities where grapes, blueberries and raspberries are grown.

I read this poem a few days ago. It was in a magazine and I liked the sentiment. Still I could not go all the way with it, for even the man who is hired to wreck has his place in the world. He is several notches in the scale of usefulness above the man who can work and needs work and won't work.

The man who cuts the weeds by the road side, when they are cut, or carries the brick to the sixteenth floor where "the man up there does the work," has his place in the world. He is doing according to his ability and is entitled to credit. The lazy, shiftless man who sits and eats and drinks and breathes, and "lets the women do the work," is the man who earns only contempt.

Let us praise the builder, but despise not the man who prepares the ground for him.

And now for the poem:

"I watched them tearing a building down,
a gang of men in a busy town;
With a ho-heave-ho and a lusty yell, they swung a beam and the sidewall fell.
"I asked the foreman: "Are these men skilled,
the men you'd hire if you had to build?"
He gave a laugh and said: "No indeed!
just common labor is all I need.
I can easily wreck in a day or two what builders have taken a year to do."
And I thought to myself as I went my way, which of these roles have I tried to play?
Am I a builder who works with care, measuring my life by the rule and square?
Am I shaping my deeds to a well laid plan, patiently doing the best I can?
Or am I a wrecker, who walks the town, content with the labor of tearing down?"

THE WORLD IS MINE

By Dr. Tennyson Guyers.

Given at the fortieth anniversary of the Kiwanis Club and copied from The Mendon Globe-Leader.

Today upon a bus I saw a girl with golden hair.
she seemed so gay, I envied her,
and wished that I were half so fair.
I watched her as she rose to leave, and saw her hobble down the aisle.
She had one leg and wore a crutch,
but as she passed — a smile.
Oh, God forgive me when I whine;
I have two legs — and the world is mine.

Later on I bought some sweets.
The boy who sold them had such charm
I'd thought I'd stop and talk awhile
If I were late 'twould do no harm.
And as we talked he said, "Thank you, sir. You've really been so kind.
It's nice to talk to folks like you because, you see, I'm blind."
Oh, God, forgive me when I whine;
I have two eyes — and the world is mine.

Later, walking down the street, I met a boy with eyes so blue;
But he stood and watched the others play; it seemed he knew not what to do.
I paused, and then I said, "Why don't you join the others, dear?"
But he looked straight ahead without a word, and then I knew he couldn't hear.
Oh, God, forgive me when I whine;
I have two ears — and the world is mine.

Two legs to take me where I go,
Two eyes to see the sunset's glow,
Two ears to hear all that I should know.
Oh, God, forgive me when I whine;
I'm blest indeed, for this world is mine.

INDIANS AND HOW THEY LIVED

By Elsie Hoekstra, Tenth Grade
Decatur High School.

Indians were the first people in America. They lived in wigwams and hunted deer and buffalo, and used the skins for clothing. The skins were tanned to make better clothing. Indian farmers were the first to grow corn, potatoes and many other foods we use today.

The Indians played games of chance whereby a man might lose his horses, buffaloes and everything he owned. Indian dances were held for religious or magical reasons in order to honor their spirits or gods. Singing went along with every public ceremony.

Most tribes made pottery jars in which to cook and store food. Boxes and dishes were fashioned from bark and wood. Indian women made rough storage baskets of twigs in which to store food to keep the animals from eating what they had saved for the coming year. The homes of Indians were made of coarse grass, mats, or fringes which were used to cover the roofs.

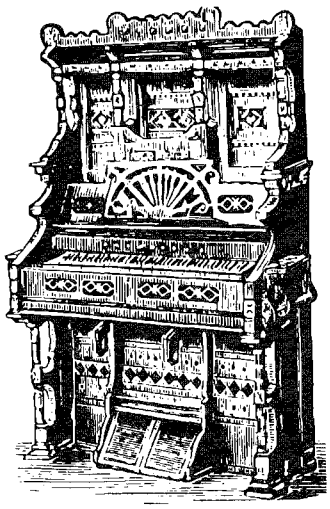
In hot climate Indians found little need for clothing. Children wore none at all. Men wore breechcloths of deer skin or rabbit fur. The women wore double aprons made from fibers of sage brush bark. Both men and women tattooed designs on their skin. Designs were tattooed on a girl's skin as a part of the ceremony celebrating her "coming of age."

The religion of the Indians was quite different from ours. When an Indian faced a critical problem or decision he sought help from the spirits. To make himself worthy of help he cleansed himself, prayed and sometimes underwent severe tortures. Their methods of disposing of the dead varied among the different tribes. Burial in the ground was most commonly practiced. Among certain prehistoric Indian people mounds were constructed for burial.

Government was generally extremely simple and Democratic among the tribes. The Chief was chosen for his ability and wisdom, though in some tribes the office was heredity.

One of the earliest Indian quarrels broke out in 1637 between Connecticut Colonists and a group of Piquots. The last victory won by the Indians in their many clashes with the white man was June 25, 1876. The Indian Reorganization Act, passed by Congress, June 18, 1934, stopped the alottment and sale of land outside the tribe. It also provided for their regaining some surplus and authorized land.

There are today some 250,000 Indians in the United States. They have the use of tax free land on which to earn their living. This freedom from land tax was part of the price allowed them when they sold out to the government.



The writer has received from the teacher, Miss Catherine Mahoney, another packet of local history stories prepared for the Raider Review, edited and published by the pupils of the high school. The name of the writer of the story is not given and will be published later if furnished.

I am selecting this one first from the sizable number of excellent contributions for the reason that Mr. Fassett himself had promised to write the story of his life for the Republican but he was taken by death before the work was accomplished. The composition received the highest mark — A — by the teacher.

AN OLD MUSICIAN

Seth Fassitt was born in Lawrence, Michigan on January 8, 1856. Being a very patriotic man, the Civil War had a great influence on his music.

His business, which was the land and stock, took him many places. He took his violin everywhere he went.

He taught violin in all parts of the country. The pieces and exercises for the students he wrote himself. He refused to write for many music houses.

Although being almost self-taught, he had a perfect violin position.

Even though he had not heard Ole Bull, a Norwegian composer and violinist, play, he admired him greatly.

Ole Bull was born in 1810. His violin had a flat finger board and bridge that he made himself.

Chopin and Ernst introduced him in Paris in 1832 which brought him recognition as a virtuoso. He gave concerts all over Europe and came to the United States five times.

His favorite composers were Mozart and Paganini. The public liked best his own compositions which are seldom played today.

He died in 1880, the greatest violinist of his time.

Seth Fassitt started his career by playing between acts in theaters. At one time he was so moved by a scene that when it came time for him to play, instead of playing the scheduled song he played one fitted to the scene. When he was asked to repeat his performance he was not able to do so. The song had just come to him and he was never able to play it again.

He married Capitala Briggs in Keeler, Michigan. All four of their children were musically inclined.

On warm evenings friends and neighbors would often gather in the front yard to hear the Fassitt family play.

His granddaughter, Larida Scott, who has a special aptitude for music, graduated from Olivet College and later became a member of the faculty in the department of music.

Seth Fassitt died on May 2, 1937 at the age of 81. His family and friends will remember his as an unusual and talented musician.

THE OLD VIOLINIST

Years have come and passed away
Silver threads have turned to grey.
Time has changed to silver hair.
Bring my violin to me again,
Let me feel its gentle strain.
Let me feel those chords once more
E're I pass to yon bright shore.
Now my back is on the stream,
I can see its waters gleam.
I can see where angels roam,
Dear violin, I'm going home.

Greetings to Decatur, My native home. It is good to see its majestic trees, its pretty homes and verdant lawns, its pleasant reminders of many active years in the past.

Eleanor and I left our home in Marblehead, Mass., for our home here Monday morning, April 18, and arrived in Decatur at three o'clock Thursday afternoon. The distance covered was 1,075 miles. The weather was perfect for driving, save a few hours of rain storm on Wednesday afternoon, which was not severe enough to delay the trip.

An automobile trip from Massachusetts to Michigan is not a novelty anymore, but a few comments on our trip may interest Republican readers. Our route lay southwest through the Bay State, Connecticut and New York, bypassing Hartford, New Haven and New York City. We paid five tolls of ten cents each over the Merritt Parkway in Connecticut and a 50 cent toll to cross the Washington bridge. Entered the New Jersey turnpike at Palisades Park and left it at Hightstown, toll $1.25. Stayed over night at the Hightstown Motel. Rooms, AAA recommended, $6.00 each. Took U. S. 1 through Trenton and entered Pennsylvania turnpike near Philadelphia. Drove all day on this turnpike and left it at New Stanton, Penn., for the night. Found splendid accommodations here at the same price.

Returned to Turnpike Wednesday morning and continued on it to Ohio border. Total distance 360 miles, total toll $3.70. This included seven tunnels totaling 6.7 miles through seven mountains of the Appalachian range, and three bridges spanning the Susquehanna, Beaver and Allegheny rivers. Along this turnpike are 21 restaurants under the management of Howard Johnson.

The Turnpike System is covered by a modern radio communication system for the safety and convenience of the motoring public. Patrol vehicles are constantly cruising over the Turnpike and any distress is given prompt assistance.

The Ohio Turnpike follows the Pennsylvania and we drove over it for the 22 miles that are completed. When completed it will be 243 miles long. The Indiana Turnpike is also started, and in time the entire United States may be spanned in this way.

The Turnpikes are wonderful highways for travelers who are desirous of covering the territory in the shortest possible time. The speed limit varies from 60 to 70 miles per hour for cars, and 50 to 60 miles per hour for trucks. Cross roads are over or under the Turnpike so nothing but an accident or lack of gas need interfere with the steady speed of the vehicle. But the driving becomes too monotonous for pleasure. We both have decided to by-pass the Turnpikes on the next trip. And that is a reminder that the question of M-40 by-passing Decatur has not yet been publicly decided. Well, most cities and villages, both big and little, are giving way to the demands of through traffic and are meeting trade competition in other ways. City stores are establishing community shopping centers and branch stores are being set up along the new pavements in many places.

Our third and last night out was spent at Perrysburg, Ohio. It is across the Maumee River from Maumee. At the place where we went first, the only AAA motel had no vacancies, but the obliging proprietor helped us by phone to a good location in Perrysburg, so we went back to it. Here we saw the hard side to the motel business. It seems to be a fascinating business, but some take naturally to it and some do not. The standard requirements are higher than they have been in past years. The average run of travelers have more money, demand more conveniences and are willing to pay more. Somewhere I have read that a good up-to-date motel costs up to $7,000 a room and is a source of worry to some who have borrowed their limit to build and equip it. Most of the travelers are one nighters and the proprietors start without a customer in the morning. The lady who served us at Perrysburg brightened perceptably when we signed for the rooms. She had but one or two rooms taken when we stopped at 3:30 and we heard her say to a man who called later and said he might come back, that she would be very happy if he would. We got friendly with her and pulled for her to be able to put the "No vacancy" sign out, and were pleased when at about eight o'clock she could do it.

Among the places on the route, passed or by-passed, were Worcester, Mass., a city of colleges and industry, population 293,486; Hartford, capital of Connecticut, important manufacturing city and greatest insurance city in the United States, population 177,397; New Haven, seat of Yale University, and from 1701 to 1875 joint capital with Hartford, of Conn., population 164,443; New York City, largest city in the world, population 7,891,957; Trenton, capital of New Jersey; Philadelphia, Harrisburg and Pittsburg in Pennsylvania; Youngstown which ranks fourth in the United States in the production of iron; Akron, the rubber empire; Fremont, home of President Rutherford B. Hayes, etc.

We stopped at Sturgis and called at the home of Miss Grace Osborn to inquire about the condition of Mrs. and Mrs. Waldo Phillips who who had suffered a serious automobile accident; the news was not favorable and Miss Osborn had been called to the Dowagiac Hospital where they were patients. Since then we are greatly pleased to state that they are improving.

A few weeks ago, while waiting for service in a barber shop in Marblehead, I met a fellow resident who said he was a pilot on the American Airlines. I replied that I had a friend in Michigan, Al DeWit, who was connected with the American Airlines. He said he knew Mr. DeWitt, that he was a chief pilot, but that Mr. DeWitt might not know him for he was one of 200 or more. In reply to my inquiry he said he was Jerry Phillips. It was another indication that the world is smaller than one sometimes may think.

Another incident of interest to me was that we had a caller at the Marblehead home that gave us all pleasure. He was Allen Hoban of Chicago and Decatur who was in the vicinity on professional business for a Chicago client. He was the first from Decatur who had paid us the honor of a call, and I was sorry to miss him. Last Saturday I met him in Decatur.

Our Great Donnybrook Fair
(Hamilton Township)

From Local History Sketches written by Pupils of the Decatur High School.

By Lynn Etter

This is the story an old timer told about the Donnybrook Fair.

In the spring of 1876 there was a sheep shearing festival at the home of one of the neighbors. The farmers from miles around arose early in the morning to get an early start for the festivities. The day was perfect. Cherry, peach and apple trees were in blossom, and their fragrance scented the air. Laughter and gaiety were enjoyed by young and old.

The affair was so successful that about a month after the Grangers held a business meeting in the Hamilton Grange hall and decided to have a similar festival every year. They called it the "Hamilton Fair." The name Donnybrook was attached to it later, probably by the Irish people of Decatur who still retained fond memories of the Donnybrook Fair on the big day of the fair to see a group of barefooted boys treading along the road on the way to Donnybrook. They were up with the cows, had done their other chores and had announced that they were off to the fair. They were tired boys when they returned home at night, but satisfied, as only boys can be, after a day of sight seeing, baseball and horse races.

It was not an uncommon sight of Ireland.

Because of rainy weather the first two years of the fair were unsuccessful. The first really successful fair was held in 1878. Everyone came, by foot, buggy or wagon, and everyone brought some of farm produce to display. In the morning prizes were given for the best exhibits of livestock, handicraft, canned fruit and vegetables. Baseball, horse racing and public speaking were the features of the afternoon. The old race tract is still to be seen in the wood lot adjacent to Grange Hall. Booths where home made candy, taffy and popcorn were sold were popular with the young folks. In the evening anyone who could play a fiddle or banjo was invited to play for a dance which was always well attended.

Hamilton Fair was popular for many years, but gradually the modern living edged the idea of a local fair out of the minds of the people.

The plan for a fair was first conceived by the Grangers, who called a meeting to select a site for the ground. The suggestion was heartily endorsed by Captain Josiah Hendryx, Arthur Haydon, Gideon Osborn, Henry Smith, Daniel Lee, A. S. Wise, James M. Weeks and others, with the result that the present site of the Grange Hall was selected.

Two years ago the adjoining land, forty acres, which was used for the fair grounds, was bought of the state and is now the property of the township.

The first officers of the fair were A. H. Williams, president; Royal Abbott, vice president; Erastus Osborn, treasurer; R. T. Riddle, secretary.

In 1896 the attendance was the largest in its history, a conservative estimate being 5,000. Today the Donnybrook Fair is a thing of the past, but the old Grange Hall stands as a silent testimonial to the good times had there in those early days, and it is by no means inactive in the present time.

THE NARROW GAUGE

One bright summer Sunday in the late seventies or early eighties our family drove over to Lawrence to spend the day with my Grandfather and Grandmother Taylor. The narrow gauge railroad was then under construction and the rails had been laid through Lawrence to within two miles of Hartford. I fell in with some young men who took me down to the place where the depot was to be built. There they found a handcar and took possession of it for a ride of about four miles to the end of the road. It was one of the hardest rides I ever took. To hold on to the handle bars, as the young men forced them up and down in propelling the car, taxed my strength to the limit, but I did my small share and hung on for dear life.'

The roadbed for the most part was cut through the native forest, and the track was laid as fast as the way for it was prepared. We spent a little time exploring the surrounding woods, and returned to Lawrence the way we came.

The building of the Toledo and South Haven narrow gauge railroad through Van Buren county to the city of South Haven makes an interesting story. It is well told by Thomas D. Brock in the June number of "Michigan History," published quarterly by the Michigan Historical Collection, Lewis Benson, Editor, Lansing, Michigan.

About the year 1885 the city of South Haven held a Fourth of July celebration. The Narrow Gauge had just been completed, and advertised excursion rates for the occasion. The people responded far beyond the ability of the road to accommodate them. I was one of a crowd of young people who went from Decatur. The train was scheduled to leave Lake Cora at 10:00 a.m., but the crowds waiting at Lawton and Paw Paw were so large that the superintendent was compelled to attach its other car, and was nearly an hour late.

When leaving Lake Cora standing room was at a premium. At the up-grade just east of Lawrence the train was completely stuck and nothing short of ordering all of the passengers out to push would help matters. Instead the train was backed down to the station, divided and sent on in two sections. I was with the second section, and as the road owned only one available engine we had to wait until that engine could deposit its load and return. Our section got to the celebration at about 3:00 o'clock in the afternoon and it was in the wee small hours of the morning that we arrived home again.

According to Mr. Brock's article the railroad enthusiasts were many years in bringing the railroad situation up to the completion of the Narrow Gauge. The talk and plans began in 1837 when Michigan was admitted into the Union of states. By 1846 the Michigan Central had been constructed from Detroit to Kalamazoo. It was losing money and the state sold it to private owners, who at first thought to extend it through Paw Paw to St. Joseph. Later it was decided that it must connect with Chicago, and that sent it four miles south of Paw Paw through Lawton which was at first called Paw Paw station.

That was bad for the county seat town, and its citizens in 1857 organized the Paw Paw Railroad Company. The commissioners of it were T. A. Granger, Alonzo Sherman, O. H. Newcomb, Sylvester Murch and John Lyle. The Civil War slowed up interest in the project, but by 1868 other companies were formed including the Lawton, Paw Paw and South Haven Railroad Company. In August, 1875, a meeting was held to discuss extending the Paw Paw road to Lawrence with a narrow gauge. This is the first notice that the narrow gauge fever had spread to the Paw Paw area. The True Northerner reports the Detroit News as saying: "When the engine of the Paw Paw narrow gauge railroad jumps from the track the engineer calls one of the firemen to his aid and a moment later they have the little thing back on the track before the passengers find out what is the matter."

The narrow gauge was the butt of many a joke. It was said that when an engineer got a cinder in his eye he stopped the train at a brook to get it out, with the passengers helping. When a train ran out of wood it stopped and the crew pulled down neighboring fences to use for fuel. On the long grade just west of Lake Cora the engine had trouble getting over it with a load of three cars. The engine was put to its highest speed of four and one half miles per hour but could not make it, so the engineer pulled up the passenger car alone, uncoupled and went back for the other cars.

Once a block of wood fell from the tender to the track and derailed the coach, the passengers rode into town on the engine. A train coming out of Lawton dropped a connecting rod, disabling one cylinder, the train ran in all right with the other one. A flat car ran over a child's leg while he was playing under it. No bones were broken.

The True Northerner noted in 1893 that the narrow gauge railroad had been practically closed to traffic for several days because of snow and two broken down engines. "This has caused considerable delay, nuisance and expense. With a standard gauge railroad no such delays would be experienced Let's have a full sized railway right away. Are there not sufficient able-bodied, live, energetic business men in Paw Paw and its vicinity to get about the work of securing this desirable and needed change?"

Finally, in 1899 the railroad became standard gauge throughout its entire length, its name was changed to the South Haven and Eastern, G. H. Patterson was made general manager and business began to pick up.

On April 1, 1903, the Pere Marquette purchased the South Haven and Eastern, but neglected it, let it run down and finally leased it and it became the Fruit Belt line. In 1923 the Pere Marquette resumed operations of the road. Although the date is not known passenger service was probably abandoned sometime in the early thirties.

Freight continued to move over the road from Lawton, through Paw Paw to Hartford but traffic was reduced to a little or nothing and the line from Paw Paw to Lawton was abandoned. In 1942 the tracks on this stretch were taken up to provide steel scrap for the war.

The Pere Marquette, which is now owned by the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad Company continues to operate the line west from Paw Paw, with three freight trains running a week, on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays.

Mr. Brock concludes his article with the remark that in its early years the railroad was an indispensable aid to the commerce of Paw Paw, but now with good motor trucks on the highways, and with good highways everywhere, railroad service is not as vital to a small town in Michigan as it was from the 1850's to the 1920's.

Credit must be given to the business men of Paw Paw and vicinity who suffered financial loses to build and operate the road so that they (Paw Paw) could be provided with rail transportation.

DECATUR HIGH SCHOOL STUDENT PAPER

By Betty Lou Christensen

My father started bee keeping with his father in Decatur when he was ten years old, and has kept bees ever since. He once had over 300 hives, but now has about 200.

When the trees in the orchards begin to bloom he sends the bees out to them. He has to move the bees at night because most of them are out gathering honey in the day time. Once when he was going up a steep hill a hive of bees fell off the back of the truck. The hive broke open and the bees swarmed all over.

There are over 5,000 bees in one swarm. When the season of flowers does not yield enough honey for the bees during the winter the bee keeper has to feed them a mixture of sugar and water to keep them alive until spring.

When my father moves the bees he nails the two stacks of bodies together and nails a screen to the entrance of the hive. The bees sometimes fly as many as five or ten miles away to find flowers. They work very hard all during the spring when the flowers are in bloom.

You must have a smocker, hive tool and a hat with a screen around it to keep the bees out. My father sets the hives on bricks to keep them off the ground so insects cannot get in to them.

A colony of bees have a queen bee. All she has to do is to lay eggs. A few drones are raised to mate with the young queens, and the rest of the colony is made up of the workers. The workers gather nectar and pollen, make honey, care for the young, clean the hive and perform all the other work necessary for the maintenance of the colony.

Honey-bees have been domesticated since earliest times, and bee keeping was practiced by the ancient Egyptians and Greeks.

When the queen bee lays the eggs part of them are to be young queens and they are fed royal jelly. The queen is five and one half days a larva and eight and one half days a pupa. When the young queen hatches out, the old queen and the older workers of the hive leave the colony in a swarm.

The writer of the above article is the daughter of Roy Christensen. Roy and his father, Hans P. Christensen, have kept bees for many years. It is a most interesting work, but rather hazardous from the fact that the bees are generous stingers. That may account for few people being engaged in it.

A few years ago Roy showed for my benefit moving pictures of bees and how they work. They were most interesting, and he still may have the films.

Honey has the flavor of the blossom from which it is extracted. Flavors easily detected are apple, basswood, buckwheat and clover. Buyers of honey are cautioned to keep it in a dry warm place, never in cellar or refrigerator.

Occasionally a swarm of wild bees will lodge high up in a large hollow tree in the woods. They make their honey there and when the tree is discovered it becomes known as a bee tree. Many years ago I took part in the cutting down of a bee tree on the Greenman farm. It was great fun and a boiler full of comb honey was secured. The combs were large, perhaps six by twelve inches in size. Some of them were borken and it was a sticky job to get them out. I wonder if any other readers of the Republican ever had this experience.

When returning to Marblehead we bought of Hans Christensen several packages of strained honey to take to friends we have made here, and they proved to be very acceptable gifts.

We drove to Rockport for dinner Sunday. It is being done, more and more, this going out to Sunday dinner. It is nearly impossible nowadays to hold to the old fashion habit of thrift in which I was brought up. Families do not try to save as they once did. The new way of life is to spend as you go and let the government support you when you are old. The new way is not confined to New England; it is the same all throughout the great and prosperous United States.

Nearly every village and city along the New England coast has its popular restaurant and all of them are liberally patronized. The restaurant where we ate this Sunday was Hedlund's on Bearskin Neck. It is built on a bluff at the water's edge, and from our seats we looked out onto the harbor containing many yachts and sail boats and an occasional excursion boat.

Bearskin Neck is a narrow street several blocks long extending to a mass of rocks overlooking the ocean. It is lined on both sides with small buildings where artists live and paint and sell their pictures, if they can. We saw some fine exhibits and some that would scare the dogs away. People in other cottages had all kinds of curios for sale. Almost anything that could be attached to one's clothing as an ornament would sell. Pebbles picked up on the beach are made into earrings. Other occupiers of the little cottages sold hot dogs, ice cream, candy, and fruit. Crowds of curiosity seekers ambled up and down the street and sunned themselves on the rocks by the ocean.

Rockport is on Cape Ann five miles north of Gloucester, a city of 25,000, and 26 miles from Marblehead. We passed through Salem, Beverly, Manchester and Magnolia. At Gloucester is the Fishermen's Memorial dedicated to more than 10,000 fishermen who have lost their lives at sea since the beginning of the fishing industry from that port.

Houseman Has Varied Career

(The article is reprinted from the Grand Rapids Press and was sent to the office by Mrs. Anthony De Young.)

Doctor, lawyer, merchant, chief . . . go down the old rhyme with Henry Houseman and he'll pick out three occupations for himself—teacher, preacher and farmer.

To give him one of his titles, Rev. Houseman is supply minister of the Methodist Harmony chapel Edwards Corners.

Farmer Houseman raises muck crops as a part time occupation on his plot of land near Decatur.

Between times the 58-year-old Houseman is continuing his studies as a candidate for full ordination as a Methodist minister.

Houseman started his working career at only one job—in the Citizens State Bank at Decatur. But he soon took up studies to become a teacher at Western.

Before he got his degree, he started teaching in Augusta High School. He returned to Decatur High, from which he had graduated, and has been there for 30 years—28 of them as principal.

Houseman's interest in the ministry began with part time preaching appearances at churches in the area. He won a full-time appointment in the late 1930's as pastor of the Volinia Baptist church.

He helped reorganize the church which had been about to close, and then was given a post at the Plainwell Presbyterian church. In 1941 he was invited to preach as a guest minister at the Morris Methodist Chapel in Niles and stayed eight and a half years.

He has held the pulpit at Harmony chapel for nearly five years. He is taking graduate work at Winona Lake, Indiana, School of Theology.

A fourth job might be added to Houseman's list—he's also the father of four children. His wife is also a teacher and is employed in the Lawton elementary schools.

A Decatur High School Local History Story by Esther Ruff.

THE HAYDONS OF HAMILTON TOWNSHIP

Ione Haydon was born in 1879 and has lived on the Haydon homestead in Hamilton township all of her life. The homestead had been owned by her grandfather, Philotus Haydon, her father Arthur Haydon and herself 112 years. Her grandfather was one of the all time outstanding citizens of Van Buren county. Her father, who is well remembered by our older residents, was also for many years a leading citizen of our county.

No man who ever lived in Van Buren county was more universally honored and esteemed while living, and more sincerely and generally mourned when dead than Philotus Haydon. There are many now in easy circumstances living in this vicinity, where Mr. Haydon lived from the year 1863 to the time of his death who refer with emotion to the timely assistance he rendered members of their family when struggling for existence in the early settlement of the country. He was never known to take advantage of a man's necessities, never taking more than simple interest for loans, and often none at all, on even a note.

No honest man, no matter how poor he might be, was ever turned away empty handed when applying to him for assistance. If by misfortune a neighbor had lost a horse or an ox out of his team, he knew where to go to get it replaced.

Philotus Haydon never professed or talked religion, but would every day do more Chirstianly acts than many who do profess it. He let his works speak for his christianity. In politics he was a Republican, when that party was organized, and an able advocate of the party's principles on the stump. He served in the Michigan state senate from 1844 to 1851, and was elected supervisor of Hamilton township as long as he could be induced to serve.

The following poem was attached to one of the Civil War diaries of his son, Charles Haydon, a rising young lawyer of Kalamazoo, who joined the Union Army in April, 1861, as a private and was mustered out as a Lieutenant Colonel. He died from wounds received while in action, in 1863. Written on the margin of the poem was this notation, now dim and almost illegible:

"While visiting the picket post I found this lying beside the path in a place very similar to the one described. For that reason I put it in my pocket. November 27, 1861."

THE PICKET GUARD

"All quiet along the Potomac," they say, say,
"Except, now and then, a picket
Is shot as he walks on his beat to and fro,
By a rifleman hid in the thicket.
" 'Tis nothing, a private or two, now and then,
Will not count in the news of the battle;
Not an officer lost, only one of the men
Moaning out, all alone, the death rattle.

All quiet along the Potomac tonight

Where the soldiers lie peacefully dreaming;
Their tents, in the rays of the clear autumn moon
Or the light of the watch-fire, are gleaming.
A tremulous sigh of the gentle night-wind
Through the forest leaves softly is creeping,
While the stars up above, with their glittering eyes,
Keep guard, for the army is sleeping.

There's only the sound of the lone sentry's tread,
As he tramps from the rock to the fountain
And thinks of the two in the low trundle-bed
Far away in the cot on the Mountain.
His musket falls slack; his face, dark and grim,
Grows gentle in memories tender,
As he mutters a prayer for the children asleep —
For their mother — May heaven defend her!

The moon seems to shine just as brightly as then,
That night, when the love yet unspoken
Leaped up to his lips — when low murmured vows
Were pledged to be ever unbroken.
Then drawing his sleeve roughly over his eyes,
He dashes off tears that are welling,
And gathers his gun closer up to its place
As if to keep down the heart-swelling.

He passes the fountain, the blasted pine tree;
The foot-step is lagging and weary;
Yet onward he goes, through the broad belt of light,
Hark! was it the night-wind that rustled the leaves?
Was it moonlight so wondrously flashing?
It looked like a rifle . Ha! Mary, good-by!
The red life-blood is ebbing and splashing.

All quiet on the Potomac tonight;
No sound save the rush of the river;
While soft falls the dew on the face of the dead —
The picket's off duty forever.

—Ethel Lynn Beers, (1829-1879)

MRS. NORMAN E. WEBSTER

Rose Rezeau Webster died May 25, 1955 at her home, 39 West End Avenue, New York City.

She was of the tenth generation of John Webster, a founder of Hartford in 1636 and governor of the colony of Connecticut in 1656. Her lineage is on page 630 of the History and Genealogy of the Gov. John Webster Family of Connecticut, 1915.

Her parents were Edward Rezeau 1842-1883—perhaps of the Rezeaus of New Rochelle and Staten Island, and Jeannette Price Rezeau 1853-1903. She was the oldest of four children, three born in Avalon, Missouri, the last in Denver, viz—

Ella Rosabell, August 27, 1871-May 25, 1955; Mary Ethel (Mrs. Fred Hall) June 18, 1875-Sept. 28, 1901; Charles Edward, (Breining) July 19, 1877-February 1940; John Price, May 1882-1887.

After the death of her father October 27, 1883 she lived in the home of Dr. and Mrs. A. J. Kinnea gradaunt, sister of her grandfather- for a short time in Homer, Michigan, and several years in Decatur where she was erroneously known as Rose Kinne.

From Decatur in the late 1880's she went to Elgin, Illinois and was employed in the Elgin National Watch Works until about 1894, after which she spent a year or more with her mother and stepfather, George A. Zimmerman, manager of Christina Lake Mining Company at Atlantic City, Wyoming, where as a diversion she worked a small quantity of ore to gold.

On December 17, 1895 in Denver she was married by the Reverend John N. Freeman, Pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church, to Norman Edward Webster, born March 26, 1869 in Decatur.

They lived in Washington, D.C. to November 15, 1909 and thereafter in New York City except for six years 1914-1920 when they resided in Dobbs Ferry in a house which they built under her supervision because her husband, a public accountant, was traveling most of the time.

She was educated in the Decatur School and in a collegiate institute in Avalon. She had only a little training in music but her ear for it was such that when a circus band or other such organization visited Decatur, she would play the new marches as the pupils assembled in school. For a considerable period she was the organist at Universalist Church in Decatur and for a longer period at Grace M. E. Church in Elgin.

Subsequently, she was a member of that Church in Elgin, of the Church of the Covenant (Presbyterian) and of the Second Church of Christ, Scientist, in New York. On November 7, 1919 she became a member of the Mother Church in Boston.

In Washington she was active in a women's organization and after much research prepared and read papers on Italian artists. In New York she was a member of the Town Hall Club for many years and later of the English Speaking Union, of the Woman's Theodore Roosevelt Memorial Association and of the Woman's National Republican Club. And with her husband's membership she was usually at his country clubs, Coldstream, Rockwood Hall and Sleepy Hollow in New York suburbs, and Higby Big Moose Club in the Adirondacks where they spent each summer from 1923 except 1929 when they had eleven weeks in Europe.

Her health was excellent until about 1949 when she began to lose weight. She became ill in December 1952. Though better at times she gradually grew worse, sometimes rapidly.

A service was held in their home which she had furnished and greatly enjoyed. Cremation followed at Ferncliff near Ardsley in Westchester County.

June 22, 1955

Dear Arba;

I thank you for your friendship which I think was meant as your tribute to the memory of my wife and also I hope and believe as a solace to me, which it is.

Of course I miss her - I missed her in the too frequent periods when she could not speak although we knew that she heard and understood - and I expect to miss her hereafter when I wish to tell her of things which would be of interest to her.

But I try not to dwell in thoughts of the future or of the recent past, but of the remote past - of the June day in 1844 when I first met her at a garden party and we were of the mature ages of twelve and fifteen. And I not only smile, I laugh at more of the incidents of the over eleven years that followed to December 17, 1895 when she accepted my name and said "Yes" to the preacher's question.

But the fifty-nine plus years that I had her were so full of incidents that I can't think of all at any one time, and that's a blessing for I have new memories come up so often. My memory is a file cabinet with numberless folders.

Very sincerely yours,
Norman E. Webster

The column this week records the passing of two of my boyhood friends, and the visit to his old home town of another. All three were my fellow residents of Decatur seventy and more years ago, but in later years had established homes in the widely separated cities of New York City, Seattle and Los Angeles.

But they had always remained my friends, and this column is written in sorrow for those who are gone and in greeting to the one who survives.

MRS. BASIL EWALD

Mrs. Nellie Arnold Ewald died at her home in Seattle, Washington Tuesday, June 14. Funeral services and burial were June 18.

Mrs. Ewald was a member of one of Decatur's oldest families. She was born here 86 or 87 years ago, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Arnold, and is survived by her daughter Irma, her husband, Basil Ewald, and her sister, Mrs. Eva Hamlin Engle of Kalamazoo. A brother, Frank Arnold, died here some 20 years ago.

Mrs. Ewald was first married to Daniel J. Carney of this village many years ago and he died after they moved to Seattle.

Her grandfather and father were in business together in Decatur and are listed in the Gazetteer of 1869 as H. Arnold and Son, dealers in drygoods, groceries, hats and caps boots, shoes, clothing, etc. They occupied a two story building on the lot where the Republican office is now located.

Mrs. Ewald was the last survivor of the class of 1886 of the Decatur high school. Mrs. Maude Nesbitt Hughes died in Chicago last year and her ashes were then brought to the family lot in Lakeside cemetery for burial. The other members of the class of 1886 were Ward Copley, Minnie Warner Jessup and Nellie Murphy.

Nellie Ewald had a pleasant home in Seattle and she liked the west. But her thoughts were often on Decatur and her old friends still living here. Two years ago when visiting our brother Will and wife, we called on her and gave her an up to date account of the village, which greatly pleased her.

Alice Moulton, in writing of her death, said: "A few days before she died, Nellie called me over the phone and said she did not feel too good, but the doctor told her she would be all right. We talked a long time and the next I heard of her she was dead. One thing about her which stood out was that she was full of kindness. I liked her very much, and on my way home from her funeral I had the feeling that I had lost a very dear friend."

Mrs. Eva Arnold Engle of Kalamazoo had planned for a log time to visit her sister, Mrs. Ewald, in Seattle. They left a few weeks ago, making a leisurely trip by auto and enjoying the scenery along the way. They arrived on Friday, only to find that her sister had passed away on Tuesday. The funeral was held until Saturday so that they could be present.

HARRY L. RUGGLES

I was greatly disappointed to miss a call from Harry L. Ruggles of Los Angeles, California, a few weeks ago. He was born in Decatur 84 years ago and the family moved to Chicago or Oak Park when he was a young boy.

He and Mrs. Ruggles drove here with friends from Chicago following the Rotary International golden anniversary convention held there the first of the month. Harry is one of five whom Paul P. Harris invited to help organize the Rotary club. He is now the sole survivor and an honorary member. His attendance was given special mention in the Chicago papers.

Delegates attended the convention from 65 countries in the Americas, Europe, Asia and Africa. They were business and professional men and statesmen, and the number was estimated to be about 20,000. Vice President Nixon was among the speakers.

Harry left me a souvenir of the convention. It is a medal about the size of a silver dollar. On one side is a bas relief likeness and the name, "Harry L. Ruggles, Originator of Club Singing. Number one Rotarian." On the reverse side is the following: "Golden anniversary. Harry L. Ruggles, Honorary member. 1905 Rotary Club 1955, of Southwest Los Angeles, California Rotary International."

A TRIBUTE TO A FRIEND

In the issue of June 30 was published an account of the life and death of Mrs. Norman E. Webster of New York City, whom Decatur people of the 1880's knew as Rose Kinne. Her correct name was Rose Rezeau. Mr. Webster, in referring later to her death, said: "Perhaps no one will remember her except Eva Olcott, whose letters you have printed. But others may recall that at one time the corners of Delaware and George Streets were the locations of the homes of Dr. C. T. Baker, A. N. Chamberlin, William E. Trowbridge and Dr. A. J. Kinne. I am pleased to note that pupils of the Decatur public schools are writing papers on local history, and that you are publishing them in your column."

It is probable that even Mr. Webster did not know his wife, in the years of her girlhood, as well as did Mrs. Lawrence, whom he refers to as Eva Olcott. This beautiful tribute from her to Mrs. Webster was received last week and I take pleasure in passing it on to readers of the Republican: To This Week:-

Norman E. Webster's sketch of the life of Rose Kinne is adequate, but I wonder how many persons are living who knew her as well or as lovingly as I did. I mean in Decatur, of course. She has lived a long and useful life. When I read of her death in the Republican of June 30, my mind went back to the little neighborhood where Rose and I were neighbors in the eighties.

Dr. Kinne and family moved to the present site of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Brigham, two or three years after my family moved to the westerly corner of George and Sherwood streets.

Dr. and Mrs. Kinne were characters in no small way. They had keen minds and a sense of humor. They were different! Their home seemed to reverberate with a sort of mental energy that influenced all of us. Mrs. Kinne had a penetrating mind and was an unswerving disciplinarian. Rose and I were many times under the spell of her disapproval. We were 12 to 15, "When nobody sympathizes or understands." That was true in the eighties, and it is true today to my great grandchildren, 13 and 15.

It doesn't seem possible that Rose and I were neighbors only three years. So many things happened to us in that short time. I was glad Mr. Webster gave the story of her life, for Rose was such a memorable person. I have often wondered if others also attributed to her the supreme qualities I gave her. I was too young then to name those qualities, I just felt them, and she didn't even know she had depth and poise and confidence within herself. I analyzed these qualities in her after seventy years.

In the summer time the Kinne corner became a bevy of lovely girls, when the Kinne granddaughters always came. They were all musical and added distinction to our neighborhood.

I love to remember that Rose and I were both organists in the little Universalist church on Delaware street. I never became a Christian Scientist as did Rose, but I played the piano for their services for six years, mostly in the Universalist church, which the Christian Scientists rented. It was a delightful experience, for I liked the people very much, and the spirit there.

I was glad to read that Rose was a church organist so much of her life. There is something satisfying about playing for church services. Once upon a time Rose and I met in Mrs. John Chadwick's parlor to rehearse a song duet. As far back as I could remember Mrs. Chadwick had lived in the first house east of the Presbyterian church. She was a sophisticated lady, and her house was a center for musical activities. Her grand piano always faced a corner opposite the audience. On that certain day, the corner was ideal, the grand piano was ideal, the performers were happy, and our devoted listener, Mrs. Chadwick, alone, a perfect audience!

These thoughts were prompted by Mr. Webster's letter. We are sorry he has lost Rose, but it is a rewarding experience to have known such people, for they give one so much to think about. There is a sadness when one does not see them or hear about them for years and years, and then learns that they are gone from the earth.

LACHMAN'S MILK PARLOR

By Mary Nemeth, 10th grade Pupil

Four miles north of Decatur on M-40 and not far from Eagle lake is the Lachman farm with its wonderful "Dairy Parlor," the only one of its kind in this vicinity.

Myron Lachman was interested in a career for himself and family. He was not satisfied with what he was doing in Chicago, so decided to come out in the country and establish a dairy farm. He began in the spring of 1951. There were no improvements whatever on the land he bought, and it took the carpenters from six to eight months to complete the building of the barns. They are built in a pen type loafing style, the cows are never tied. He maintains a herd of fifty head and milks an average of twenty-two, all of which are registered Holsteins.

In one of the barns he has a maternity pen, and if a cow freshens during the night he can hear her over his communication radio in the house. This eliminates walking back and forth several times between the house and the barn.

When it is time for the cows to be milked they are led up on a ramp and into individual stalls where they are fed grain and washed. They are then milked two at a time. The milk goes into the way pails and hence directly into the cooler. This saves the handling of heavy milk cans and it is more sanitary. The cows are strictly on a "self fed" feeding program. In other words they eat when they are hungry.

The Lachman milk parlor contains the most modern and convenient utilities. It has an eight can milk cooler, utility tubs, communication radio, and hot water heater.

The walls of the barns are of glazed tile, the ceilings are of knotty pine and the floors are of cement. The barns are treated with carboleneus preserver, which guards against disease. It also protects the wood in all kinds of weather. Once a month all pipes are sterilized against bacteria. Every night all pipes are flushed with P-K powder, which is a bacteria killer.

Few towns can boast of a better equipped milk parlor.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Curtis celebrated their Golden Wedding Anniversary at the Volinia town hall Sunday, July 24, and relatives and friends came from far and near to do them honor on the happy occasion.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Curtis are among the pioneer families of Cass and Van Buren counties, and Mrs. Curtis was a granddaughter of William N. Pardee, one of Decatur's very first citizens. He came here with the Michigan Central,

Here . . . There . . . and Yonder

A HEAVY toll of traffic accident deaths, drownings and miscellaneous accidents, — 599 in all, were recorded by American motorists during the three-day Labor Day week end. It exceeded earlier predictions and the toll of 430 for last year's holiday. The record year for deaths was 1951, when a total of 658 was reported. Safety council statistics show that 32 other persons are injured for every traffic death. Also for every three persons killed a fourth dies later of injuries. MANY LOCAL people stayed close to home Monday and enjoyed a peaceful day. The Slacks called in a few friends and all enjoyed a picnic in the backyard with grilled hamburgers and all that goes with a picnic lunch. It was also a good day for working on new lawns as was the case at the Don Weises' with the help of Clarence Reits, and Bob Sandberg had a bit of extra help at his home raking and leveling the yard in preparation for sowing grass seed. These sunny days are wonderful for cleaning the weeds out of the flower gardens, those, that persist to grow along with the perennials and annuals. Mrs. Marion Fisher was taking advantage of the late sun, Monday as she worked in her flowers. The Fishers have a very attractive home and the nice lawn and flowers show they have had a lot of good grooming. There are any number of attractive homes in the village and many spend hours tending their lawns, shrubs and flowers. A SHORT time ago an ordinance was passed to protect all homes against undesirable situations. Right now there is a problem of a house trailer that has been moved into the village. This was one thing property owners were supposed to have been protected against. The trailer is very lovely and its cost can be compared to many homes, yet if it is allowed to come in, won't there be others who will do the same. The council has yet to decide the issue and its decision will be known early next week. THE GRANDMOTHER, on the $64,000 question, again showed that the old gals could still keep up with the younger generation, when it comes to answering questions for the big money. The following years of 1942, 1943, 1944 and 1946, correctly answered the $8,000 question put to her by Hal March. SEE GINO, the shoemaker who was a winner, was pictured greeting his father in a Tuesday evening daily. However the caption below Gino's pictures dealt with the three men who have just been released by the communists and the three column caption telling of his reunion with his 92 year old father was found beneath the cut of the three men. Even dailies make mistakes. WE HAVE a new puppy at our house — a six-weeks old Saint Bernard and we have named him "Rasco" the same name given to the other one we had last summer. He's now in dog heaven, since he was ill with a disease from which he could not recover. Dr. Davis, the veterinarian at Benton Harbor put him to rest. This "baby" has a part white face and four white feet. Most of his body is brown. We bought him through a classified advertisement in the South Bend Tribune from a family at Berrien Springs. If he reaches the height of his father, he will really be a beautiful dog and one that all the children in the neighborhood will love to pet. Jade, our great dane thought he should follow Gregory to school Tuesday. However, she was called back, and with a dejected look, went slowly into the house.

Decatur's Newest Subdivision

Decatur's newest sub-division—Lakeview Park, consists of 17 lots designed and plotted by Raymond Gale on land owned by Mr. Gale just across the road north of the new school. Being near the school it was designed for safety of families with youngsters. There are no four corners. There is a circular drive Shady Lane, an angular drive Rosewood Avenue. Also a west drive, Oak Lane and an Elmwood Road.

Many hard maples, some silver maple, red maple, sycamore and mountain ash and over 200 shrubs have been set. The lots are of various shapes and are large enough to take the new modern ranch type homes. Michigan Gas has run electric lines, and the village will put in water mains this spring. Streets will be graded and gravelled.

Donald Drenth has a home started on Shady Lane facing Oak Lane Drive and Randolph Gale has the frame up for a three bedroom house with full basement. All lots are in the village limits.

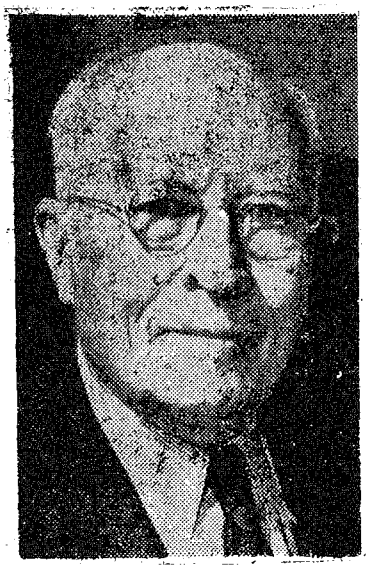
Former Republican Publisher Dies



Arba N. Moulton

Arba N. Moulton, 84, well-known in this community, died Sunday [illegible] the Harmon Nursing Home in Kalamazoo, where he had been a patient for one week. Mr. Moulton [illegible] a short time.

Mr. Moulton was the editor and publisher of the Decatur Republican for more than 50 years. He retired August 13, 1951 at which time the paper was sold to the Dalton Kinneys. However, Mr. Moulton continued as a member of the staff and his column "This Week" appeared as a front page feature until a few weeks ago, when he became unable to carry it on.

For the past few years he had been in Marblehead, Mass., with his wife and daughter and spending a few weeks each summer at their home on St. Mary's Street.

Mr. Moulton was a member of the Library Board, active in Republican circles, member of the Lions club and former postmaster from April 18, 1909, until June 17, 1913.

Mr. Moulton was born in Decatur May 6, 1872, the son of Mr. Arthur L. and Ella Taylor Moulton. He was married to Marion (Mollie) Willison, June 19, 1901.

He is survived by his wife, a daughter, Eleanor, and a brother, William of Seattle, Washington.

Funeral services were conducted Wednesday at 2 p. m. at the Methodist Church with Eber C. Chase, first reader of the Dowagiac First Church of Christ Scientist officiating. Burial followed in Lakeside Cemetery.

Pall bearers were Otis Howe, Earl Copely, Clayton Howe, Lyle Parker, Arthur Howe and Elmer Adams.

Honorary pall bearers were Mr. Whiteley of Dowagiac, Mr. Lewis of Lawton, Donald Cochrane and Mr. Jack Sinclair of Hartford, and Mr. Spicer of Paw Paw.

Mr. Moulton attended the local schools and graduated from the Decatur high school in 1889. Following his graduation, he went to Chicago to work and in January of 1897 began his career as editor and publisher of the Republican.

The following is taken from the Centennial Souvenir Book printed in 1948, written and compiled by Rolland Haefner.

"The Decatur Republican stands as a vital monument to the niche that Arba N. Moulton has carved in Decatur's history and in the hearts of a multitude of people.

. . . The character of Mr. Moulton is personified in his newspaper and radiates most of all the spirit of genuine friendliness and neighborly good will. Never a word enters the print to debase the character of a person nor to achieve an end that would trample the dignity of a fellowman."

ARBA MOULTON'S FAMILY

Charles H. Mahoney

Born in Decatur, Charles Henry Mahoney has grown into a man more than six feet tall and weighing 210 pounds.

Charles Mahoney was the first resident of Detroit, and the first North American Negro to be appointed a full delegate of the U. S. to the ninth session of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

Since 1917, when he first became active in the affairs of his city, Mr. Mahoney has been marking up "firsts" for his race. In 1918 he was appointed by Mayor J. Couzens to Detroit's City Planning Commission. He was "first" of his race to serve on a city commission. He served on this commission for four years and then was chosen for ten consecutive years as a member of the Wayne County Board of Supervisors.

In 1939 the State government beckoned to Mr. Mahoney again, as Governor Frank Fitzgerald appointed him to the State Department of Labor and Industry, an important post in such an industrial state. Once again it was a Michigan "first" for his race. He served in this capacity for seven years.

Mr. Mahoney says that he has never been interested in being "first." "I want to do the best job I can for my Country, and I want to leave the door open for those who will come after me."

Graduating from the local high school, he entered Olivet College, the sole Negro student in the college. Finishing three years at Olivet, he went to Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee, where he taught in the University's elementary school while completing work on his degree. Then he entered the University of Michigan where he received his law degree in 1911, the same year he was admitted to the bar. With $12 in his pocket, he went to Detroit to build his law practice.

In 1928 Mr. Mahoney and a small group of businessmen organized an Insurance Company, which was reorganized in 1944 as the Great Lakes Mutual Life Insurance Co. It now has about $50 million worth of life insurance in force and assets of more than $5 million. Mr. Mahoney is President of the Company. He is also President of the Great Lakes Land and Investment Company and of the Great Lakes Agency Company.

Mr. Mahoney has tried unsuccessfully three times for public office "Nothing I ever tried for did I get," he mused recently, "and nothing I ever got did I try for."

Five colleges have conferred Doctor of Law degrees upon him. In 1955 he was advised by the Department of State at Washington D. C., of his appointment as a member of the Panel for Inquiry and Conciliation which has been created for the purpose of assisting the United Nations in settlement of disputes. The appointment will run for five years.

Mr. Mahoney and his wife maintain a home at Holly, Michigan. They also have an apartment in Detroit. They have no children.

The walls of his home are lined with books and Mr. Mahoney says, "I've read two or three books a week as long as I can remember." "I also like to fish. Not to catch fish. Don't like to eat them particularly, but to relax, to get myself together after a hard day. I like to hunt, too. Not to shoot the animals. Some days I will just go up the hill and sit hours and watch what's happening."

Lincoln Believed In People . . .

Abraham Lincoln could have told modern dictators a thing or two. He could have told them that you should never sell the common sense of the common people short in any country under the sun. And that while you may mislead the people for a time, time eventually runs in THEIR favor, never yours. He said: "You can fool all of the people some of the time, and some of the people all of the time but you can't fool all of the people all of the time." A very common sense truth that Hitler, Mussolini and Peron found out too late.

Dr. Dalton K. Rose

Outstanding Physician and Surgeon.

Dr. Dalton Rose, a former Decatur boy, has for many years resided in Clayton, Missouri, a St. Louis surburb, where he is engaged in private practice and was also professor of Urology at Washington University Medical School in St. Louis.

Five years ago when the doctor reached 65, he became 'Emeritus' professor "and with this partial release from responsibilities," he writes, "together with approaching retirement from medical practice, he and his wife (the former Cora Lee King of Olivet, Michigan) began taking longer and longer vacations.

Last year they purchased a house on Belleair Beach which is situated on a key in the Gulf of Mexico, directly west of Clearwater and their postoffice address is Indian Rocks Beach.

Dr. and Mrs. Rose plan to spend six or eight months a year in Florida and the remaining months in Clayton, Missouri.

For their retirement project they have chosen an "improved" black walnut orchard. Previous to this, they raised cattle for many years. However, they sold the herd seven years ago and became interested in the unique orchard.

The walnut trees are planted 50 feet apart on the square plan and cover 80 or 90 acres of the old pasture. The doctor explains the orchard as follows.

"Improved black walnuts refer to varieties accidentally discovered somewhat like the original "Delicious" apple was found. They have quite a thin shell, large kernel, and crack out a very high percent of halves and quarters. This inproved variety must be budded or grafted upon seedlings grown from 'wild' or forest black walnuts. We trim the trees to at least a 16 foot bole-log. This means continued interest. It is well known that older people enjoy planting trees. Mrs. Rose is the chief 'budder' and 'grafter,' and warmly advocates this as interesting work "for the ladies."

Dr. and Mrs. Rose have a duaghter, Anne Lee Stewart and two grandchildren, Mike, age seven, and Molly, four. Molly was named after the doctor's mother Mary Kelly, called Molly as a child. They live in New Canaan, Connecticut, 45 minutes from New York City. Mr. Stewart is connected with McKinsey and Company, Capital Management Consultants in New York City.

Dr. Rose and his wife drive east to visit their daughter and family and also his brother Max, who lives in New York City. We also have a brief account of his life in this special issue.

Dr. Rose visits his boyhood home every year and adds that he is antiscipating a visit to Decatur in the near future.

N. E. Webster Dies in New York

Norman E. Webster, a former resident of Decatur, passed away at his home in New York City, on July 15th, at the age of 87. Crematory services were held on July 17th. He left only distant relatives, his wife having passed away in May, 1955.

Mr. Webster was born in Decatur on March 26, 1869, and graduated from the local school in 1886. He was married to Rose Rezeau about 1887 and then left Decatur to follow his accounting work in broader fields. In 1893 he was Division Superintendent at the World's Fair and was admitted to the bar and continued his work with the Treasury Department at Washington, D.C.

He formed the partnership of Webster, Horne and Elsdon of Broadway, N.Y. and continued active until the past few years.

Mr. Webster always took a great deal of interest in the progress of Decatur, and made many visits here to keep contact with its growth and betterment. Among his close friends was Arba N. Moulton with whom he worked to preserve the history and background of Decatur, and future development.

Dale E. Hathaway

Agricultural Economist on the staff of C. E. A. for President Eisenhower since Sept. 1955.

Last September, Dr. Hathaway was appointed to the staff of President Eisenhower's Council of Economic Advisors in Washington.

Dr. Dale E. Hathaway, a native of Decatur is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Roy Hathaway of route 2, and was a member of the 1941 graduating class of the local high school.

He was given a leave of absence of one year from the Michigan State University where he served as an Agricultural Economist.

He is the only agricultural economist on the staff of the CEA.

After graduating from high school, Dale received a bachelor's degree from MSU, a master's degree in 1948 from Harvard and in 1952, his doctor's degree was granted from the same University.

While serving on the faculty of MSU, Dr. Hathaway was an extension specialist in public affairs. During this time he did much research on agricultural prices in farm policy.

The former Decatur man has written several articles and bulletins in the agricultural economics field. He was awarded the prize in the Journal of Farm Economics last year.

Dr. Hathaway married the former Helen Jean Pollock, granddaughter of Fred Pollock, in 1941. They have three children, Ann Lee, Linda and Roy Randall.

ARGUMENTS STILL CONTINUE

Paw Paw's 'Ride' on Railroad Boom Full of Bumps, Rebels, Bankruptcy

(Editor's Note: This article was written for the Gazette by Thomas Brock, vice president of the Kalamazoo Historical Society. It is a condensation of a research report he authored for the "Michigan History" magazine, journal of the Michigan Historical Society.)

By THOMAS BROCK

PAW PAW, Mich., Jan 28 — "Paw Paw might have been as big as Kalamazoo—or bigger—if the railroad had gone through here as originally planned."

You can still hear that argument in this village of 2,500 persons. And there may be some truth in it.

As it was, when the State of Michigan sold the Michigan Central Railroad to private owners in 1846 these owners changed the route. Instead of going west from Kalamazoo through Paw Paw to St. Joseph, it headed southwest from Kalamazoo to Niles and New Buffalo. This was done so to to get to Chicago by the most direct route from Kalamazoo.

SOUTH OF TOWN

The Michigan Central missed Paw Paw by four miles. It established a station four miles south of Paw Paw and called it Paw Paw Station. This name was later changed to Lawton.

Paw Paw was the largest village in Van Buren County at that time and the county-seat. To get a railroad outlet the business men of Paw Paw got together and sponsored a four-mile connection to the Michigan Central. Although this railroad was started in 1857 it was not actually built until after the Civil War in 1867.

Named the Paw Paw Railroad, its tracks were the shortest railroad in the state. It had one old engine named the "Vulcan" and one caboose which served as passenger and baggage car. All of its rolling stock came from the Michigan Central.

The railroad never made any money and in 1875 the Paw Paw Township Board, which had loaned it $36,000, investigated its financial affairs and found some shady dealings. A group of Paw Paw and Lawton business men got together and bought the road out. The leader of this group was John Ihling, who was the road's superintendent.

Since the road hadn't made any money, Ihling and his friends decided to extend it farther with the hope that it would then be a paying proposition. Since a "Fruit Belt Line," never found enough money to convert its line to electricity and so it ran steam engines. In 1911 it leased its property to the Michigan Electric Railways (interurban) but this company never succeeded in electrifying the line, either.

In 1914 the "Fruit Belt" was returned to its original owners. In 1923 it went bankrupt and the South Haven and Eastern section went back to the Pere Marquette. The section from Lawton to Paw mazoo was abandoned. Part of this abandoned line is used by American Telephone and Telegraph for cables and also is used as a bridal path.

CLOSED SECTION

The Pere Marquette continued to run the line from Lawton to South Haven. In 1942, it closed the section from Paw Paw to Lawton and sold the iron to a war scrap drive. Thus, Paw Paw's connection with the Michigan Central was finally gone for good. After all, trucks could now handle Paw Paw's kind of freight better than trains.

The Pere Marquette, which is now controlled by the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad Company, still runs the line west of Paw Paw. Three times a week a freight comes in from Hartford, where the Pere Marquette mainline crosses the old South Haven and Eastern.

Where would Paw Paw be today if the Michigan Central had built through it in 1848? Without a mainline railroad, Paw Paw remained small in spite of its efforts to build its own line.

LINE EXTENDED

As the years went by, this narrow-gauge line from Lawton through Paw Paw to Lawrence was extended. In 1883 it was opened to Hartford. Finally in 1887 the road was completed to South Haven and Paw Paw had a connection to Lake Michigan and the lake freighters.

The road did not show a profit even then. It went bankrupt in 1890 and new owners acquired it in 1894 and changed the name to South Haven and Eastern Railroad. The road was still in bad shape physically and a lot of it was due to the fact that the road was narrow gauge. At a large expense the new owners made the line standard gauge in 1899. For a few years after this the road made money.

In 1903 the Pere Marquette purchased the South Haven and Eastern with the hope that it might use it as a line to Kalamazoo. This would have fulfilled a Paw Paw dream of being on a through railroad.

However, the Pere Marquette had financial troubles and in 1907 leased the South Haven and Eastern to an interurban line. This was the Kalamazoo, Lake Shore and Chicago which hoped to build an electric line from Kalamazoo to South Haven, with boat connections to Chicago.

It built a line from Kalamazoo to Lawton and used the South Haven and Eastern for the rest of the trip to South Haven. The K., L.S. and C., known as the

WE SPENT the weekend in Indiana with my mother, brother and sister and their families. was a special occasion in that th Home Builders of Anderson wer displaying a "Show of Homes" an my brother, who has been in the building game for 20 years, showec a tri-level home, in Nor-Wood Hills, a restricted sub-division. There was a continual stream of people entering and leaving the house and in the two days, the total number who visited the house almost equaled ¾'s of the population of our fair village. . . . . EARLY MONDAY morning we were saddened by the news of Mr. Moulton's death. He was indeed a grand person and his passing is greatly mourned by his family, our local community, by those who once lived here and by his friends he made in and around Marblehead. When we first bought the Republican office in August of 1951, he came regularly for a few months to the office and enjoyed doing a bit here and there to help out. He was also eager to read the galley proofs, check the paper and always brought down the copy for his column "This Week" which has filled a prominent place on the first page. We are sorry it is no more — We shall miss it. Mr. Moulton was editor and publisher of the Republican for more than 54 years. He delighted in his work and kept long hours. He was known to all and all knew and respected him. If there was any one who wanted to know about the long ago — they were always referred to Mr. Moulton. He possessed a keen memory and knew of the development of the town and the history of its people. Mr. Moulton was a familiar figure about the village and in speaking to those on the street, he was always able to draw out an item for the paper. For these jottings, he usually carried the back of an envelope and a short, stubby pencil. He liked to visit with those who called at the office and in the past five years, we have had many callers who stopped by just to say hello to Mr. Moulton or to inquire how he was. Many were disappointed if they found he was not in Marblehead. Even though Mr. Moulton liked Decatur and lived here the greater share of his life, these last few years he spent in Marbelhead were truly interesting and he enjoyed being with his family, he lovingly referred to "as the girls," and enjoyed the drives through the country and his visits to places of interest. He also enjoyed those Sunday dinners at the quaint old Inns. He liked watching the sail boats that were anchored just beyond their home. Coming back to Decatur each summer was a highlight in his life as it was for us, who also looked forward for the house on St Mary's to be re-opened. We always enjoyed a dinner together during these summer visits. Mr. Moulton could liven up any dinner conversation by recalling some interesting incident in connection with the Republican office. I am truly happy that I had the privilege of knowing Mr. Moulton and as I write this column, my heart is heavy and my eyes well up in tears, realizing that I have lost a fine friend. Getting the Republican to press today is really a chore and am not much interested in doing it.

ALONZO NEWTON BENN

A letter from a friend in Chicago contained a notice of the death of Alonzo Newton Benn. It occurred Tuesday, February 14, at the age of 89, in his home, 5000 East End Avenue.

Only a few weeks ago there was printed in this column a short sketch of his life taken from the Chicago Tribune. Our last letter from him was written to express his appreciation for the writeup and to say that he had ordered a dozen extra copies. He wrote a cordial letter, giving no intimation that he was not in the best of health, so we conclude that his passing was sudden. He said that his wife, who had been seriously ill for the past three and one half years, was slowly improving, for which he was very grateful.

When he retired as vice president and general manager of the G. H. Hammond Company, meat packers, his active mind rebelled against idleness, and he decided to make a name for himself as a writer. Mrs. Benn's remark that he couldn't mix pigs with poetry led him to the attempt to convince her that he could. In a little time he succeeded. He gave the Republican credit for helping him to get started, and he was a loyal and generous friend. We printed his autobiography in weekly installments which ran for over a year.

Alonzo was a consistent and persistent advertiser and gained his national audience in this way. When the Republican had published enough of his Timely Reflections to cover a sheet of paper the size of a letterhead, he would make up a sheet of them in the order he desired and send us an order for 1,000 copies. He would send these out to newspapers, magazines and house organs everywhere with the notice that the recipients were welcome to publish them. He wrote not long ago that his Timely Reflections had a circulation of over a million copies. This was Alonzo's hobby. He did not try to make money from his writing. It satisfied him to be able to command a sizable reading public, he enjoyed the business activity the hobby furnished him, and he was generous in paying for the work required of others.

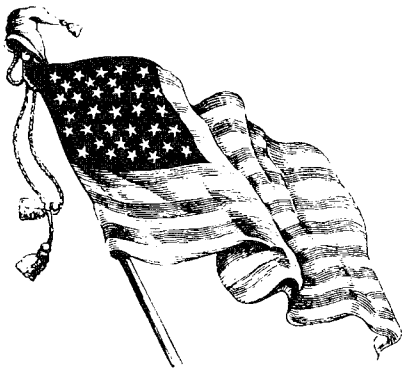
Mr. Benn owned patents on methods of curing and smoking meats, and devised a system of receiving and copying telegrams by typewriter rather than by hand.

He was twice president of the Illinois Society of the Sons of the American Revolution. He also was a former secretary of the South Shore Country Club, a member of the Chicago Athletic Association, the Union League Club, and the Executives Clubs.

Here are samples of his Timely Reflections:

OLD GLORY

I love each shining star because
It tells a wondrous story;
I love each stripe no whit the less
And shall as I grow hoary!
I love its field of azure blue
Wherein each star does twinkle;
I love its red and snowy white
And every fold and wrinkle!
I love to see it float on high
Above each tower and steeple;
I love to doff my hat to it,
The flag of a free people.
I love Old Glory more each day,
The banner of our nation;
The grandest country in the world,
The best of God's creation!



OPPORTUNITY

Each golden sunrise ushers in new opportunities for those who retain faith in themselves and keep their chins up. No one ever saw a cock crow with its head down, but always high in the air; nor can one gain the right outlook on life with his head held low. Courage to start and willingness to keep everlastingly at it are the requisites for success. Meet the sunrise with confidence and fill every golden minute of the day with right thinking and worthwhile endeavor and there will be joy for you in each golden sunset.

A school paper by Vernon Davis:

PROGRESS OF FARM MACHINERY

In ancient Egypt the plow was for many years just a forked stick with which the slaves worked the ground. Next the Egyptians used a larger forked stick which oxen drew and slaves guided. Later, people found that if a board was nailed to a post and drawn by horses they could plow quite well.

Still they were not satisfied and always were looking for improvements. In 1837 John Deere invented the first steel plow which was one of the greatest improvements in the farming profession. Today farmers have steel plows which range in size from one to six bottoms.

The Tractor

In the early days of farming the people used slaves, oxen, horses and the tractor. The early tractors were run by steam and were large and powerful. They did much to speed up the progress of farming.

One drawback was that they had to have water for steam which meant that early farmers who owned tractors needed a horse drawn water wagon. Then with the coming of gas engines they were able to do away with the water wagon. Also the tractors were made smaller which meant that they could do much finer work. There were many more jobs which the tractor was able to do. Still they had steel wheels.

Today tractors are as highly mechanized as our cars, and can do many more jobs on the farm than the early tractors. There are many attachments which do the jobs, such as plowing, cultivating, combining, planting grain and picking corn. These are only a few of the many jobs that tractors can do.

Threshers and Combines

In early times the farmers used a flail to beat the grain out of the shock and on to a large sheet of metal. Next they sifted the grain on the sheet of metal very slowly so that chaff might blow away and the grain land in a large bucket.

The tread mill was the next step in the threshing of grain. The tread mill was a box about eight feet long and four feet wide. A horse was placed inside it and made to walk in it causing a belt to work another machine behind it. The grain which men were placing in the mill to be harvested was shaken out along the box.

They used horses next to run the thresher. They were fastened to a post by means of a spoke running from the post. As the horses walked around in a circle they turned the post.

A belt was fastened to the post and the thresher, and when the horses walked around they provided the power for the thresher. The thresher was a machine that took the grain out of the hull and placed it in bags held by the men. After the grain was taken out of the hull the straw was blown into a pile.

Today, farmers harvest their grain with a combine. This machine cuts the grain, takes it out of the hull, cleans it and makes it ready for sale or use as feed.

Since Decatur was founded in '48, one hundred and eight years ago, about twenty thousand people have come here to establish homes. Some of them have remained until taken by death, some are still here, and some have moved on to seek greener pastures. Twenty thousand is but a rough guess and may be far from correct. There is nothing definite to go by, but anyone can make a guess.

The names of many of the early settlers are familiar to readers of the Republican, some can be recalled by a few, and others are completely lost to the present generation.

Mrs. George Corliss of South Haven has done and is doing more than anyone else in establishing a link between the present and past generations of our citizens. She has put years into the study of genealogy, and has copied the census records of Van Buren county back to the beginning. She has helped many an interested person to trace his or her ancestry for eligibility to membership in the Sons or Daughters of the American Revolution, and in this work she has been ably assisted by Mrs. Louis Longcore of Lawrence.

A recent letter from Mrs. Corliss tells of her search for data on the Nash families of Cass and Van Buren counties, and asks for assistance. The name was once in prominence in Decatur, but seems to be extinct at the present time. She has learned from the Decatur census of 1870, that Ira Nash, then 64, was born in Connecticut, and from other sources that he died in Kalamazoo in 1880 or 1881. The Van Buren County Gazetteer of 1869 gives Ira Nash as head of the firm of Nash, Keables and Nicholson, dealers in drygoods, groceries, etc., Poor block on Phelps street. His home was on the east side of George street near the south village limits.

Polly Nash, 61, probably his wife, was born in New York, and we have no further record of her. Was she living when Ira died, and did she continue to live in Decatur? Two daughters were Frances who married Jacob Hoog in 1864 and Flora A. who married George L. Linder in 1869. Linder is recorded in the Gazeteer as a Decatur farmer, but the interest centers in Polly Nash, whose maiden name was Crandall.

The Crandall families in 1869 were among the most prominent in Decatur, but they have apparently dropped out of the records completely. The Gazetteer contains a large adv. of "Crandall Brothers, Chas. H. and James F., Resident Dentists, office over Chadwick's store, Decatur, Mich. Dentistry in all its branches performed with neatness and dispatch. Teeth extracted without pain. All work warranted and satisfaction guaranteed in every particular or no pay required. Special attention given to preserving and filling decayed and ulcerated teeth. Examination free of charge. We take pleasure in referring those who wish our services to the following gentlemen: Dr. Chas. T. Baker, Dr. G. W. Rogers, Dr. J. T. Keables, Dr. Wm. Ross and S. G. Toof, Surgeon Dentist.

James F. Crandall was secretary and Chas. H. treasurer of the Decatur Dramatic Association, C. H. was vice president and played second E-flat in the Decatur Cornet Band. Rev. Nelson Crandon was pastor of the Baptist Church and lived at the corner of Delaware and Boughton streets, and C. H., J. F. and Samuel N. Crandall lived with him. Now is there anyone living who knows anything about the Crandalls?

Mrs. Corliss also asks if we ever knew a family in Decatur by the name of Barden or Borden, and the answer has to be no. The nearest we can come to it is the well remembered Milo D. Barton who farmed for many years on the west side of Lake of the Woods and retired to a home on the northeast corner of St. Mary's and Williams streets.

What has become of these families once prominent in Decatur?

DOUGLAS LEE ADDITION

High School Essay

Writer not named.

Seventy-five years ago, where the Douglas Lee Addition to the Village of Decatur is now located, there was nothing but a pasture and scrub oak land. Seventy-five years ago you could build a boat house on any part of Lake of the Woods by scooping out a channel for it so the boards would not warp.

People in Decatur never thought of building houses on Lake of the Woods. No one bought any of the lake frontage until later years. If some one had bought land around the lake fifty or more years ago and held it until now it would have made him wealthy. Before summer resorts became popular the land could have been bought dirt cheap.

The present improved Pine street road leads down to what was known as Welcher Cove. The old swimming hole was off to the right of Welcher's Cove. In the early days only boys were allowed to swim there. There were at one time two sandbars off the old swimming hole. One of them has disappeared because the lake has receded. There is a sunken island in the lake somewhere near the camp, Lake of the Woods. There was another cove called Long Cove around to the left of the Pine street road, and another indentation called the Copley Cove.

Before the days of electric refrigerators Decatur depended upon Lake of the Woods for ice to fill its ice boxes. An ice house was built on the east end of the lake and Lewis D. Roberts was the first man in charge of it. Later Churchill Youells, father of Mrs. Raymond Gale, had charge of the ice house. Next Marlin Haney stored ice in it. They cut ice by a saw run by a gas engine. By the use of an inclined plane the ice was then skidded up into the ice house. Men stood on the sides with pike poles to push the ice blocks up the grade. In storing the ice they would put down a layer of sawdust, then a layer of ice, then a layer of sawdust and so on until the ice house was full.

In 1947 Dalton Kinney bought the land where the new addition is now built, naming it the Douglas Lee Addition in remembrance of his son. He built the streets too, in memory of his son. They are Memory Lane, Douglas Drive, Lee Avenue and Kinney Street.

The first house built in the new addition was in 1947 by Bob Athey. This new addition is the most modern part of Decatur. The Douglas Lee Addition now contains thirty-two houses.

How it happened I do not know, and Will says that he doesn't know. But this is the fact, as he says himself, that Will E. Hampton, a Knights of Pythias friend of many years, sent his usual holiday poem in rhyme at the usual time, "was mailed with a three cent stamp and my address for return if undelivered," but it was never received by me and never returned to him. So now he has been notified of the loss and another copy has arrived in the mail today.

Mr. Hampton was a newspaper editor at Charlevoix and at Niles before he settled down to a life time job as Grand Keeper of Records and Seals of the Knights of Pythias Lodge of Michigan. He has now settled down from that job to a pleasant life of retirement at the home of his son in Dearborn.

Year after year for many years his holiday poem has had its prominent place in this column of the Republican. It has always been original, cheerful, hopeful and inspiring, and this year is no exception. Because it possesses all of these fine qualities and reveals the surest remedy for keeping young, and because it will be an inspiration to many who read it, although late for the period intended, his greeting of the season of 1955-6 is printed here. The writer will be 92 years old in May.

MY CREED

To live my life as best I may,
Through storm or sunshine, day by day,—
Doing my best here while I stay—
This is my creed.

Speaking no ill of any man—
Seeing the good where'er I can—
Trying to live as God would plan—
This is my creed.

If Christ be Son of God, or man,
Enters not in my life plan—
To live as He'd wish near as we can—
This is my creed.

No Priest or Preacher can save my soul—

The blood of Jesus can't "make me whole."
If I sin I must surely pay the toll.
This is my creed.
That God hears prayers though not spoken aloud—
With the head not even in reverence bowed—
To believe as I must, not follow the crowd—
This is my creed.
To squarely play in Life's great game,
Seeking for neither wealth or fame
To leave my sons an honest name—
This is my creed.

* * *

May your Christmases all be merry ones—
Your New Years all be happy ones
And all your days be healthy ones;
This, too, is my "creed."

PEACOCKS

By Josephine Watson, Decatur Public Schools.

Peacocks belong to the pheasant family. There are two or three species of peacocks, two of which are found in Indo China, neighboring islands and Southern Asia. These other species have become extensively domesticated as ornamental birds in America and Europe.

Peacocks are about the size of turkeys. The male peacock has a long train of greenish feathers marked with eye spots growing from the middle of his back. His under parts are a purplish blue, and the neck and breast are metallic green. The female peacock is slightly smaller than the male and not so vividly colored. The females do not have the beautiful tails of the males.

The plumes of the male peacocks are not tail quils but tail coverlets. The female peacocks are often called peahens, and the male peacocks peafowl. The wooded hill country of India and Ceylon are the native home of the peacocks.

When courting, the male spreads his plumes and struts slowly in front of the females. He usually secures three or four hens. They then live in small flocks. Wild peacocks lay from six to eight eggs, and raise only one brood a year. The nest is rudely constructed and placed on the ground. Rarely they will build them on low branches or ruined buildings. The eggs are incubated from 25 to 30 days.

In Bengal, Java and Sumatra they shoot peacocks for sport. In India they are held sacred to certain casts and superstitions. Birds brought high prices in Greece in the time of Pericles. Peacocks eat worms, insects, small snakes, frogs, snails, juicy grasses and seeds.

The Romans' greatest dishes were peacock tongues and brains. Peacocks were also served roasted in their own feathers. Solemn oaths were also taken on the peacock. To a well known myth the strange eyelike markings of the coverlet plumes were the hundred eyes of the giant Argus, set there by the god Juno.

Under the Chinese Empire peacock feathers were given as a reward to mandarins for public service. The peacock throne of the Mongul emperors at Dulhi had for its background the figure of a peacock with expanded tail wrought in gold and precious stones.

The peacock is a well known bird, known mostly for his beautiful feathers.

This letter from Mr. Hampton was printed in a recent issue of the Saturday Post. Readers of the Post will know to what it refers:

"Dear Sirs:

" . . . Beverly Smith . . . says Alben Barkley fathered the story of the preacher who prayed for help in his need, but 'Please, Lord, no more pepper.' I heard that story under a different dress when I was a boy of twelve, eighty years ago! It originated in Emmet County, Michigan, during early days when homesteaders were needing aid from 'outside' to get through the severe winter of 1876, and was credited to a parson praying for help, and in his enthusiasm asked for a 'bar'l of pork, and a bar'l of flour, and a bar'l of sugar, and a bar'l of pepper—no, Lord, not so much pepper.'

Will E. Hampton, Sr.,
Dearborn, Mich.

Among the prized possessions of the young people of the century past was an autograph album. My autograph album was given me as a Christmas present when I was ten years old. It cost 15 cents, but that was a fairly good price then, and I had a good time getting relatives and friends to write in it. Am sure I have it stored away among the keepsakes in the Decatur home.

This story is about the autograph album of Norman E. Webster of New York City, N. Y., a Decatur school boy during the seventies and eighties; and older readers of the Republican will recognize some of the names written in it. He writes: "Recently I found a small autograph album which my teacher in the Second Intermediate, Celeste Roben, gave me in March, 1879 when I was ten years old and my parents moved to Sturgis. Time has faded most of the pen writen contributions, but besides Sturgis names there are these of Decatur friends:

"Freddie Chamberlin, Ward Copley, Will P. Harlow, Carl Nicholson, Ralph A. Slocum, Charlie Warren, Frank Thomas. The last named wrote, 'I only ask a little spot--' You know the rest.

"Others who wrote were Frances Allen and Sylvia Maxham, sisters of my father; Mary A. Northrup and Carrie G. Northrup, sister and niece of my mother.

"The greetings and advice in the little book are too long to be copied here, and I ought not to include some and omit others. But one was a prophecy as follows:

"May your album be a treasure
Full of autographs of friends.
May it always be a pleasure
To read all pages to the end."

"That friend's wish was realized, and still is."

Freddie Chamberlin was a son of A. N. Chamberlin, a Decatur wheat buyer who sat in the Thompson barber shop, later White's, on the lookout for the farmers coming in with their loads. Then he would go out, climb on the load, end up a sack and run the wheat through his fingers to determine its quality and make his bid. There were generally several bidders. If he bought it he would order it delivered at the freight depot. If some other buyer bid higher he would get back to the barber shop to wait for the next load to come in.

The Chamberlin home was a small house on the northwest corner of Delaware and George streets, now the site of the Harvey home. After attaining the age of sixty years and working steadily, Newton Chamberlin saved enough money to build a better house on the corner. He moved the old house to the next lot north and the family occupied it till the new one was finished. It was a good house well built, a credit to the good location and to the village. The family was proud of it and looked with great expectation to the day not far distant when they could occupy it. But, alas, that day was not to come in its completeness. On the very day that they had set for the moving, Mr. Chamberlin suddenly died. The widow and children moved in later and it was their home until the mother passed away.

There were four children in this family and all are long since dead. George, the oldest, was a druggist in Hartford for many years. Fred, also became a druggist and we think located in Carson City, Montcalm county. Allie, the youngest son, became a doctor, located in the west and died while yet a young man.

Cora, the only daughter, graduated from the Decatur high school and taught for several years in the grades. I went to school to her in the fourth grade and remember her as one of my best teachers. She was engaged to be married to James Jennings, one of the bright young men of the Christie Lake community north of town. His death while a student in the University of Michigan, was one of the sad events of the time. Miss Chamberlin later married Dr. Whalen, a student friend of Jennings, but she died while still a young woman.

Ward Copley was a son of Hon. A. B. Copley, who organized the First State Bank of Decatur. He graduated from the high school in 1886 and from the law department of the U. of M. He practiced law in Detroit and from there was sent to the state legislature. From there he decided to go west, and established himself in Los Angeles, California, where success followed his efforts for the remainder of his life.

Will Harlow was a son of W. F. Harlow, a traveling salesman for Reid, Murdock and Company, wholesale grocers of Chicago. His territory was the Northern Peninsula and he was away on his route most of the time The family located here in the late seventies, practically among strangers. They lived first on Phelps street and later bought the big square house on the northeast corner of St. Mary's and School streets which was their home for many years. Mrs. Harlow was one of the organizers of the Every Tuesday Club.

The Harlows had two children. Leila, the younger, graduated from the Decatur high school in 1890, and from the University of Michigan. She married one of the University doctors and lived out her life in Ann Arbor.

It is my remembrance that Will went to Colorado with Stillman Slocum, but when the hard times of 1893-4 came on he lost his job and was forced to return home. Several of Decatur's ambitious young men were in a similar plight among them being myself. Finally Will was able to finance the course in medicine at the U. of M. and from that time on his condition improved. He graduated from the University and in time became Dean of the Medical Department of the University of Colorado at Boulder, where he remained until his death some time ago.

Charles Beecher Warren was born in 1870. Place unknown. The family moved to Decatur from Lawrence when the father, Robert L. Warren, became Editor of the Republican. In 1884 they moved to Albion.

Charles attended Albion College two years and while there won an oratorical contest. He followed at Ann Arbor completing the course in law in two years. Here he secured funds to build a house for his fraternity. He was invited to study law in the office of Don M. Dickinson, attorney general under Cleveland, and later became a partner in his Detroit office. He was with Dickinson and Robert Lansing, secretary of state under President Wilson, as U. S. Counsel in the Bering Seal Arbitration, and became head of the Michigan Beet Sugar Corporation. He was nominated by President Coolidge to be his attorney general, but through the enmity of Senator Couzens he was rejected by the senate. He served the government as Ambassador to Japan and later to Mexico. He married a daughter of Senator McMillen of Detroit and died about the year 1935.

In 1933 Mr. Warren paid a visit to Decatur and Paw Paw. He saw the site of his old home on the southwest corner of Sherwood and Williams streets and the familiar scenes of his boyhood, and a big meeting was held in his honor at Paw Paw in the evening.

Ralph Slocum was a son of Hiram Slocum who came to Decatur in the flourishing days of the hosiery factory. His brother Stillman and his father also came and the three families made a fine addition to the social life of the village. Miss Bertha Slocum graduated from the Decatur high school in the class of 1887.

The name Nicholson was once prominent in Decatur but it has been many years since it has been listed among our residents. Mr. Webster can remember little about Carl Nicholson except that he was a school boy of about his age. The Gazetteer of 1869 records the firm of Nash, Keebles and Nicholson as drygoods and grocery merchants, located in the Poor Block on Phelps street. The Poor Block was the three-story building just south of the Potts house and the buildings in front of it, which was destroyed by fire about 20 years ago. The last time the name was identified with Decatur was when Miss May Nicholson was postmaster sometime in the eighties or nineties.

The Pardee family were French Huguenots. Nearly all of them came from the cities of France where they were skilled workmen, merchants and scholars. The historian says of them, "They brought to the new world their habits of industry, their keen intelligence and their upright character, and they have furnished a large number of leaders in every department of life in America."

Miss Helen Hathaway's request for a copy of her father's poems entitled "The Finished Creation" was answered by H. P. Christensen who received it as a birthday present from Mrs. Hathaway over fifty years ago. Monday John Jurgensen of Dowagiac brought another copy. He said he and Hans worked on the Hathaway farm at the same time, and he also received one of the books. Both were pleased to do this favor to Miss Helen and neither would accept payment for the book.

The holiday season brought letters from friends who were once a part of the life of Decatur and the temptation is great to pass along some of the news in them to others who read the Republican.

Marietta McDole Taylor was once a Decatur school-girl and a graduate of its high school. She served for several years in the local telephone office in the time when we had a central office, and she was a courteous and competent operator, and we recall with pleasure, a time when she worked in the printing office. She married Clarence Taylor and in a few years they established a permanent home in East Lansing.

In her holiday letter Marietta wrote about Ross Hudson who had been compelled by ill health to give up his position as president of a new bank in East Lansing which he had helped to establish, and we do not recall seeing an item about it in the Republican. He and Flora, Mrs. Hudson, have disposed of their home there and gone to Florida. His many friends in Decatur and elsewhere sincerely hope he will soon recover. Mr. and Mrs. Hudson were in Boston over the Thanksgiving holiday to visit their daughter Phyllis, and on the following Sunday drove out to Marblehead to call on the Moulton family. It was a great disappointment to us that we were out at the time. Would like here to record our telephone number, which is Neptune 2-1310, Marblehead.

Marietta also wrote that Mrs. S. H. Dwight (Cleo Flagg) and Mrs. Malcolm Denise (Margaret Pierson) underwent operations at the city hospital last month and [illegible]

Last May Mr. and Mrs. Dayton took for their vacation trip a visit to their son Bob and family in Phoenix, Arizona. Bob has a good job there, it pays well and he likes it. It is an engineering job. His oldest daughter is a ninth grader in the Phoenix high school. The youngest, twins, are over two.

HENRY GEERLINGS

Some fifty to sixty years ago, when the writer was young in the Republican office, there was called to the Presbyterian church as pastor, a young man by the name of Henry Geerlings. He had just been ordained as a minister and this was his first charge.

He was an eloquent speaker, — earnest, sincere and friendly. We soon became good friends and spent some pleasant hours together. He once said that he found it difficult to decide whether to fit himself for the ministry or the law. He knew that he had a natural gift for public speaking, and for a while was undecided as to which profession would afford him the better opportunity for success. He finally decided upon the ministry and it brought him to Decatur. But the choice did not turn out as satisfactory to him as he thought it would, and we believe the short time he spent in Decatur was all that he ever served as a pastor.

He returned to his home city of Holland and the next we heard of him he was established in a bank there. He served many years as mayor of Holland and represented his home district in the state legislature. One of Mr. Geerlings' numerous activities is that of writing for The Holland Evening Sentinel and we occasionally see extracts from his articles in that paper. This one appeared in the Christian Science Sentinel under "Signs of the Times:"

"The Christian religion is a power that may bring warmth in the hearts of the people. Through it the love of God is realized....The warmth of Christ's love is like the warmth of the sun as it rises in the morning sky. The forces of hatred have been loosed....and the only thing that can cure the lonely and aching hearts of the world is the gospel of God's love. It can draw people of all races and beliefs into one fellowship, and there is no other power that can do it."

AN OLD FIREPLACE

Miss Helen Hathaway sent a picture of the fireplace in the home of [illegible] Hathaway [illegible] township, [illegible] owned and occupied by Mrs. Kittie Hathaway in about the year 1906, and the fine old home was destroyed by fire some years later.

In the picture were a deerhead, from a deer shot and the head mounted by Benjamin's brother Judson; a crane and trammel hook relics of old days; a kettle. Kettle kept filled by Aunt Kittie with ferns from the Judson Hathaway woods; rocking chair, was once on rollers and Grandma Hathaway rolled herself around the house in it; Grandma Hathaway's spinning wheel, went to Cousin Lillian Eddy; powder horn, sickle and mortar and pestle, relics of early days; tray that was in Aunt Kittie's family, used at weddings of girls in the family.

It is a pleasant pastime to compare the Republican with the newspapers of other towns of similar size. Mrs. Thomas Heap has sent the writer a copy of the Saint Mary's Beacon published in Leonardtown, Saint Mary's County, Maryland, her home town, or near it. We are not going to say it is a better paper than the Republican, although it claims to have the largest circulation in Saint Mary's County and it has been published since 1839. The Beacon is worried about the tobacco situation in Maryland. The quality of "free burning" tobacco has been common only to Maryland and it gives the leaf extra value. Now some other states are claiming that they can produce the same results with a chemical treatment, and Maryland is intimating that such treatment may have an unhealthy effect on the user.

It is amusing how the argument goes on over the ill effects of tobacco on the user, when it could be so easily settled simply by refraining from using the weed. Financial experts, however, claim that the cigarette industry has turned the corner, and investment in the leading companies offers attractive yields. Clever and persistent advertising has overcome in large part the fear of cancer from smoking, and a market statement says that "A recent report about cigarettes and heart disease made no significant market impact."

But Mrs. Heap did not send the Maryland newspaper for the information it contained about the state's tobacco troubles. It was for what the paper told of an antique doll display in Leonardtown in which she was a valued contributor. She has long been a collector of dolls as has been her mother, Mrs. Ellen Goble, who is now in Mrs. Dunkleburger's Convalescent Home in Bangor. Mrs. Heap resides in the town of California, Maryland, and is a regular summer visitor to Decatur.

"Poor man! He was ruined by untold wealth."

"Un-told wealth?"

"Yes, he didn't tell about it in his income tax return."

Mrs. James Osborn is 93 years old today, January 19, and is receiving the congratulations of many friends.

Mr. and Mrs. Osborn have sold their beautiful farm home (located about half way between Decatur and Dowagiac) and will reside in their Decatur house.

Mrs. Osborn, who was formerly Mattie Morehouse, has resided on the farm nearly 80 years, her father having bought it in March, 1872. With the exception of five years spent in Chicago, it has been her home since that time.

A card from Mr. and Mrs. Ben Weinman of Coral Gables, Florida, says that they read the articles on Marblehead and nearby historical points in the Republican. They are well remembered in Decatur where Mr. Weinman was manager of the big muckland farms of Becker and Company.

A sketch of Jacqueline Cochran appeared in Time Magazine of January 9. It is especially interesting to Decatur because she is the wife of Floyd Odlum, once a Decatur school boy and now a multi-millionaire and one of the best known financiers in the United States, or the world.

Jacqueline is running for congress in the Coachella and Imperial Valleys of California, where her husband owns a 600 acre ranch. She came up from nowhere about 47 years ago, and does not know who her parents were, or her exact age. Her childhood was spent in Florida and Georgia cracker shanties. At eleven she left what was then her home to work in a beauty parlor. She became a beautician, a nurse, a good airplane pilot and the wife of Floyd Odlum.

Now she is running for congress; and because we like ambition, energy, intelligence and enterprise, we wish her success.

The Fosters of Keeler, of whom the strawberry king Dean Foster is the head, sent out their annual holiday letter last month. It gave an account of the numerous activities of the family during the past year and was rich reading.

The letter opened with an announcement of the marriage of son Bill and then took up the big trip to the Southwest, the first big stop being at Albuquerque where their cousins, the Lucius Bucks, reside. Then they drove on into Texas, taking in the state from top to bottom, with special stops at Weslaco and Brownsville, and Uvalde for a chat with that Democratic statesman, John Garner, who served the Nation two terms as Vice President. They left Texas and went to Pineville, La., and to Hughes, Ark., where Dean discovered his "flair for gumbo driving."

Ruth completed the interesting year of work and play by viewing the sights of New York City on an eight day trip with her friends, Carol, Ellen and Lucy Klett.

This joyful, jolly, gracious letter closed with this paragraph: "For helping to keep the Christ in Christmas we pay tribute on this 115th anniversary to our two most cherished local institutions — The Keeler M. E. Church and the Keeler School. Since 1840 they have gone hand in hand to make our community a more spiritually enlightened place in which to dwell. What we want for our nation and all nations we must put into our churches and schools."

A few weeks ago this column contained a notice of the death of Mrs. Maude Beard Folks, 88, in Yonkers, New York. The item said she was born in Decatur and graduated from Albion College in 1889. We were unable to obtain definite information about her, but the Van Buren County Gazeteer of 1869 under the Hartford directory gives this information: "Union Church, Rev. — Beard." And this under the Keeler Village directory: — "Beard, Rev. E. pastor M.E. Church, home e Main, 1 s church." And now some member of the Methodist Church of Keeler may find in the records more definite information about this refined lady who was born in Decatur and passed away in Yonkers a few months ago.

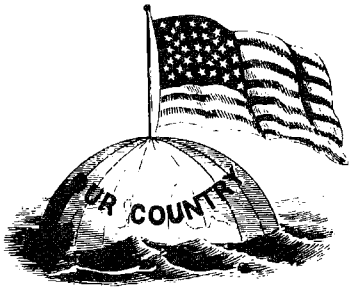
We are following up this meager information about Mrs. Folks with all the persistency of a professional genealogist. In fact, genealogy is a most interesting study, and we are indebted to Mrs. Corliss of South Haven and Mrs. Longcore of Lawrence for our interest in it.

The writer of this column wishes the Republican readers a prosperous and happy New Year. The wish is written on the first day of January, 1956, but it will be a few days later when it appears in the paper.

There is in Abbot Hall, Marblehead, the original painting of "The Spirit of '76." It is a thrilling picture showing the indomitable courage of the Continental soldiers who won America's independence in the Revolutionary War, 180 years ago. This year it is the spirit of '56 which we celebrate, — the spirit of peace, — and we hope it will bring a better understanding of the problems of other nations and a greater application of the Golden Rule.

These lines by Edwin Markham should represent the spirit of '56:

"He drew a circle that shut me out
Heretic, rebel, a thing to flout.
But Love and I had the wit to win:
We drew a circle that took him in."



INDIANS AND FIREWATER

By Jack Wolf, Decatur High School Essay.

Besides the Pe Pe Yah Indian band there were other Indians who had escaped from the government and were living near Paw Paw, and when the Indians had things to trade they went to the post there. They had at times red and black berries, furs and game and even maple sugar.

When the Indians came to town to trade the business men, or some of them, would try to get their money. Sometimes they did get it, but if they failed the whiskey sellers would get it, so the poor Indians were no better off. Most Indians had no control over themselves when they were drinking. When under the influence of liquor they gave whatever they had of value to the whiskey sellers for more whiskey.

There is an impression that all Indians in liquor are dangerous and should be feared like wild animals, but when sober they are talkative and agreeable. Not all Indians drink. Some of them live sober lives and provide things for their families. The quarrelsome ones were bound hand and foot by their friends and disarmed.

The old settlers have told stories of how the bucks would become so drunk they could not sit up, and the squaws would continue to pour whiskey into their mouths, because a dead drunk Indian was safer than one not so drunk.

In a log hut near Agard's trading post, by the river north of Paw Paw lived an old Frenchman named Jos De ro sha. The Indians called him Ke-no-sha. He spoke both the Indian and English languages. His wife was a Pottowatomie and he was faithful to her until he died. Another old French-Canadian was called by the Indians Moo-Saw, but his real name was Lash-na. He made pets of muskrats and skunks. He spoke half Indian and half Canadian-French.

On the Gremps farm on the west side of the river lived a Canadian-Frenchman with his half breed daughter who was noted for her great beauty. Her name was Agnes-shaw-wan-eese, a name partly French and partly Indian.

Judged by the standards of the white man the Indians were not very clean. Of course some were cleaner than others. Indians had an armour plated stomach that would not revolt at anything. They bagged the finest game of the forest, but the way they prepared it for the table would take away the appetite of the average white man family.

The squaws used their blankets in various ways, — as a covering in bad weather, to wrap the papoose in or a sheet to sleep in. In the maple sugar season, in the absence of something better, they would use the blanket as a strainer for the syrup.

One hundred and fifty years ago the American Indians roamed through the forests of Southwestern Michigan and were "Monarchs of all they surveyed." Now they are almost extinct and those we know have taken on the characteristics of the white people.

A REPUBLICAN FOREMAN

Would like to begin these notes by mentioning a letter received a few weeks ago from Bruce and Ann Bassett. Bruce is a native of Decatur, son of Clarence Bassett, and the name carries back to the Gazetter of 1869, which lists G. S. Bassett as a land owner, Section 21, Decatur, and James Bassett as a farmer in Porter township. One of them quite likely was Bruce's grandfather. If we remember correctly, his mother was a Lucas and there are Lucases recorded in the old Gazetteer as living in Paw Paw, Hamilton and Decatur.

Bruce was one of the ambitious and competent young boys who early decided he would like to become a printer. There was no required age then that boys must attain before they could go to work, and they came into the office as apprentices when they were as young as thirteen. They worked about a year under the instruction of the foreman, without pay, and then as soon as there was an opening they were ready for it. Bruce was foreman when he married Ann, who came here as a milliner for Mary Shaad, and he continued as foreman until he decided to try his fortune in the west. As the years passed by, his friends learned that he had established himself in the mercantile business in Southern California. But no definite word had come from him until this recent letter.

In it he and Ann write that they sold their business in Santa Monica, California several years ago, and came up in the San Bernardino mountains to retire. Their address is P. O. Box 163, Crestline, California.

This they wrote which marks the flight of time: "Both of our two daughters have been married for many years and have famllies of their own. One lives in Sacramento, and the other in Cornwallis, Oregon. Wish we could drop in on you, but I doubt if we will ever get back to Decatur."

THE MIELKE FAMILY

Walter M. Mielke was born in Decatur in 1883, as near as he can remember, but he has no record of his birth. He attended the Decatur public school, and when a young man left home to make a place for himself in the world. About ten years ago he returned on a visit to some of his school boy friends. He was then working in Chicago and was the same well dressed, courteous gentleman he was in his youth.

Last week he wrote to the Republican that he is employed as a pharmacist for the Cook County Hospital and is in need of a birth certificate which he is having trouble to obtain. The letter was sent on to me at Marblehead, and he was sent word that the required affidavits could undoubtedly be secured for him.

Walter was a son of Fred Mielke. He had an older brother, Willie, who died in his youth. The father was the village tailor. His shop was on the second floor of one of the three story buildings on north Main street. The home was at one time on Wheeler street, but they moved several times that I recall.

The family located in Decatur sometime in the seventies. Just how they came to select this little town in which to open a tailoring shop is not on the records, and it would be interesting to know. It was the "talk of the town" at that time that Mr. Mielke was a Commoner and Mrs. Mielke belonged to the German Nobility. They were deeply in love and the young lady defied her parents and the custom of her country by running away and getting married. The next move of the young people was to seek the freedom afforded them by the United States, in which to work out their life's problems. The way may have been hard for them. Money was not plentiful in those years, and they were alone among strangers. No doubt they were often discouraged, but if they were, they were never known to complain. Their life story, if it could be told, might make interesting reading, and a good job for Walter in his years of retirement.

Mrs. Mielke was a refined lady and it was said that she never went out on the street except when immaculately gowned, and for years she wore the same black satin dress and picture hat.

Fred Mielke knew his trade and was a painstaking workman. He eked out a living by making an occasional suit of clothes and doing the repairing that came to him through the clothing stores and homes.

He spoke brokenly and perhaps did not always understand perfectly. I once bought an over-coat of Squier Brothers for $5. The sleeves were too short, but Emory said Mielke could fix it. When he saw the coat he said, "I fix it." But he misunderstood the instructions and shortened the sleeves instead of lengthening them. When the coat was delivered the sleeves were nearly up to my elbows and Emory took the coat back. I never heard of Mr. Mielke making another mistake like that, and a short time later he made me a suit of clothes that were entirely satisfactory. In that period it was the style for the trousers to fit tightly around the legs and there was to be no sign of a crease in the trousers. The legs were as round as stovepipe. But that was the style, and I was proud of my new suit.

I liked Fred Mielke. He was an honest man. When a small boy, I lost my jack-knife, and a boy at that time could hardly go through the day without a jack-knife. Mr. Mielke found it, learned it was mine and returned it to me. That made me his friend for all time.

Have a recollection that in about the year 1880 the Poore house caught fire and was practically gutted. The Mielke family lived in it and their furniture was damaged or destroyed. The fire got in between the plaster and the siding, and the firemen worked most of the next day to put it out. The doors were left wide open and for several months the boys romped all over the house. Then James Potts, who ran the Old Reliable grocery store, bought the wreck, repaired it and it has since been known as the Potts house. J. F. Potts sold it a few years ago, but the name clings it it still. Mr. Williamson built store buildings on the front yard, but the tall spreading elm, the largest and finest for many miles around, helps to make Decatur one of the most beautiful country towns in all Michigan.

MARRIED 65 YEARS!

Charles Beebe and Daisy Griffis were married 65 years ago the 31st of December, and are still able to stay by themselves and do their own housework. They are not as active as they were in the days of long ago, when things were lively on the farm, but Charlie still likes to keep in touch with what is doing on Main street, and manages to get to town two or three times a day. He was 83 his last birthday, and Daisy will be 85 next March. She was the eighth of a family of nine children of Mr. and Mrs. James Griffis, who were among the well known and prosperous farmers of Cass county. Daisy Beebe and her younger sister Rena, Mrs. Lytle Robinson of Dowagiac, are the last survivors of the Griffis family. They have two daughters, Mrs. Gladys Behrman and Mrs. Helen Goble.

It doesn't seem possible that it was five years ago that we had that jolly celebration for your 60th wedding anniversary

It is a pleasure to be counted among the many friends of Mr. and Mrs. Beebe, and to wish them health, comfort and happiness for the years to come.—A. N. M.

RECALLING FORMER YEARS

Will Moulton writes from his home in Seattle, Washington: "It is remarkable how you keep your column up and make it so good." Will is one of the Republican's subscribers who likes to go back over the years into the century past when he was a boy in Decatur. He has a keen memory of those early years. He likes to read the tales that are told about them, and it may be that he is encouraging his brother to keep on writing them.

Will helps occasionally with his own memory tales and what he tells here is along that line. Mrs. Nellie Arnold Carney Ewald, the daughter of Edward Arnold, was born and grew up here. She graduated from the Decatur high school in the year 1886. She married Dan Carney, Jr., and they too located in Seattle where Dan died. Nellie then married Basil Ewald and all went well with them until last summer when, with but little warning, Nellie died at the age of 86. She left one daughter, Irma Carney Williams, who lived in the house next door to her.

Now to go on with Will's letter: "Irma Carney, Dan's daughter, came to see us one day last week and brought along Nellie's graduating diploma dated June 18, 1886. When she spread it out before me the first thing I saw was father's name as director of the school board, followed by A. B. Copley, Ransom Nutting and Marvin Hinkley, other members of the board, and David C. Pierce, superintendent.

"It was old and faded and badly torn in the center where it was rolled, but I was glad to see it."

Seattle has had so far the coldest winter in 60 years. We are doing better in Marblehead. The coldest we have had is 20 above zero, and only a few days of that. Today, December 3, the temperature is in the forties.

Here is a letter from a good friend, Mrs. Henry Lindeman. It is dated November 8 and should have been answered weeks ago. She and Henry once lived in East Decatur, but sold their farm a few years ago and moved to Romulus, near Detroit. She wrote that she wanted to tell how much she enjoyed the Decatur paper, "and when I read that verse about putting off writing to your friends until it is too late I sat right down to write to Mr. Moulton. Henry has been laid up since last December 29. He fell on the ice when putting his car away and broke his hip. Well, he got out of the hospital on Good Friday, and now he is able to walk with a cane instead of the crutches. He didn't have any insurance at all, but we paid our own way and the cost wasn't small. We couldn't get out to Decatur this year but hope to next summer. Was glad to read that the Editor lady's mother is better. We gave Susie, our pet coon, away after Henry fell. Mrs. Henry Lindeman."

Have learned recently that Arthur and Maxine Howe have purchased the Mendon Globe-Leader and now are listed as its editors and publishers. Mendon is a pretty village situated in a prosperous agricultural district in St. Joseph county. It has a population, according to the census of 1955, of 884.

In a letter from C. E. Lewis, who has been publisher of the Lawton Leader for sixty years or more, he writes, "I set type on the Mendon Globe 67 years ago. The editor had at one time published a newspaper at Tamauqua, Penn., while the Mollie Maguires were active in that town. A daughter of the Mendon editor for whom I worked later married Mr. Stowe of the Michigan Tradesman and continued with the paper until her death."

We started out one morning to pay a call at Whittier's homes. We went first to Amesbury where he lived from 1836 to 1892, the year he died. He wrote most of his poems there, including "Snow Bound." It is a pleasant home, but ordinary, is painted white and is kept up by a society of Amesbury ladies. Mr. Nun, a retired Congregational minister from New York, and Mrs. Nun keep the house open. They live in the rear and keep the front of the house the same as it was in Whittier's time. They are given a place to live for showing the house to the public, and get expense money from the sale of Whittier post cards and literature.

They were good to show and describe the old furniture, pictures of the poet and his relatives, and interesting anecdotes concerning his life. New England has many such places, homes of noted persons, bought by societies organized to preserve the property for future generations. Most of them charge admission of from 25 to 50 cents and the keeper delivers a lecture as often as a few are ready to go through at the same time.

John Greenleaf Whittier never married but stayed by the home until he passed away at the age of 85. He was born in Haverhill, Mass., in 1807. He was born on a farm and lived there until a young man. He was a descendant of an emigrant to New England in 1638 whose children became members of the Society of Friends. He early showed a talent for verse and published his first poem when he was 18. It was published in the Free Press, an anti-slavery paper edited by William Lloyd Garrison. He was well known as a leading anti-slavery man and did much work in aid of the movement.

Among Whittier's best known poems are Ichabod, Barbard poems are Barbara Fritchie, Ichabod, In School Days, Maud Muller, The Barefoot Boy and Snow Bound.

Both Haverhill and Amesbury are near the beautiful Merimac river in northern Massachusetts, and are nine or ten miles apart.

Haverhill has a population of 47,280. It was settled in 1640 on the site of the old Indian village of Pentucket. It suffered frequent Indian raids, and in 1697, Hannah Dustin was kidnaped by the savages and, according to tradition, scalped ten of her captors, escaped and reached home safely.

Amesbury has a population of 9,711, and is the Whittier birthplace. The two cities are 25 to 30 miles from Marblehead and the trip to them made a pleasant days outing.

BONINE ELK FARM

A School Paper by Bernard Abbott.

(The farm has been sold since this story was written, but we understand the new owners are maintaining the elk.)

Near Vandalia, Michigan in Cass County, there is an elk farm. The elk, which are native to Michigan, are being raised in a park and will be there many years, G. Elwood Bonine said. We have thought of doing away with the elk, but have never done it. The Elk Park Farm got its name from the elk herd and has had it since 1862. A man gave his grandfather a pair of elk, and so he fenced in a twelve acre lot and his grandmother took care of them. Soon a fair sized herd was developed. Bonine said in the wild state the female would have a calf every year, but in a fenced in lot less than fifty per cent of the cows equal this record. Nevertheless, it has been necessary to have a butchering program.

The meat has generally been used for dinners and banquets of a public nature such as conservation club affairs and service club dinners. The Boy Scout camp located in Cass County always gets a share.

Bonine says there are a few little known facts about elk. For one thing, they can outrun a horse. While he has never timed one he thinks that at top speed they travel as fast as fifty miles per hour. During the summer, elk will not eat hay, which means that if the pasture gets short they are apt to get hungry. This has forced Bonine to keep the herd down to about 25, as he has only 40 acres enclosed in the park.

Once when there were 35 animals in the herd, a drouth cut the pasture so short some of them suffered. They will eat some hay in the winter time, but will never touch grain or most of the other feeds accepted by cattle.

At two years of age, the average elk reaches a weight of about 450 pounds, the age at which they are usually butchered for meat. The biggest ones never get any larger than eight to nine hundred pounds, regardless of age.

Elk shed their horns every year. Another little known fact, according to Bonine, is that elk have a habit of rubbing their newly grown horns on the side of a tree until the points are as sharp as a spear. They have one tree that they always use for the sharpening. Bonine said it will be interesting to see what they are going to do this year, as the tree they used for years was recently cut down.

Elk are normally shy and will not attack man except during the mating season, when the bulls are really dangerous. They are, however, death on dogs, which Bonine believes is a hangover from the days when they had to protect themselves from wolves. They simply run down and paw to death any dog that happens to get in their way.

He also pointed out that the horns of an elk are pointed back enough so that the elk can run through the thickest underbrush by simply tipping his head back a little.

A Tribute to "Old Bob"

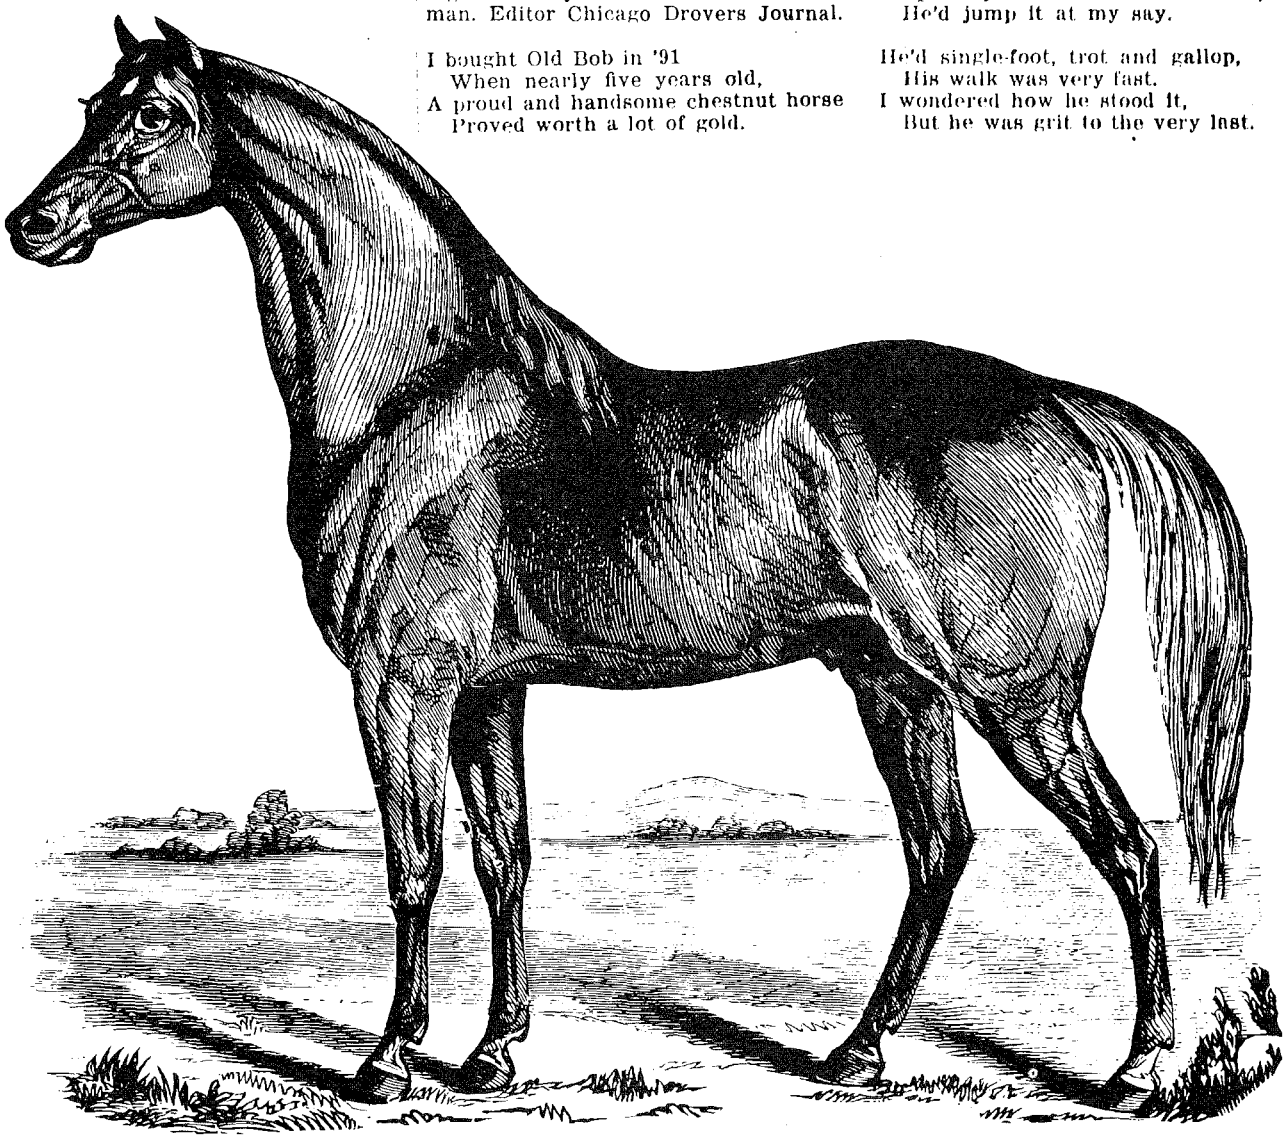
The affection of a man for a faithful horse is deep-seated. If the horse remains long in service it means that his disposition is pleasing. He does what he is asked without grumbling. A reflection of this affection for a good horse will be found in the following tribute by a veteran Illinois stockman. Editor Chicago Drovers Journal.

I bought Old Bob in '91
When nearly five years old,
A proud and handsome chestnut horse
Proved worth a lot of gold.

His mane was long; his tail was, too;
I gave them especial care;
He had those great large hazel eyes,
His coat was silken hair.

I mannered him; I trained him;
He knew my every way.
I'd put my coat on the wire fence,
He'd jump it at my say.

He'd single-foot, trot and gallop,
His walk was very fast.
I wondered how he stood it,
But he was grit to the very last.



Tribute to Doc Marks

Decatur community and the surrounding country have suffered the loss of a great and good man.

His greatness did not lie in the acquiring of material wealth nor glittering fame, but in the enduring qualities of virtue and goodness, which bespeak the noble mind.

No one came within the scope of his influence without feeling the depth of his friendship; and everyone was neighbor and friend to "Doc."

His homely philosophy and humor typified him as the "Will Rogers," of his area and many a "forlorn and shipwrecked brother" seeing and feeling the touch of his charity — could take heart again.

The inestimable virtue of the love for his fellow man was "Doc's" most outstanding characteristic. This great love, together with his honesty, kindness and unbounded generosity (often at a personal sacrifice), formed the fabric of his life.

To his daughter and six sons, he leaves the rich heritage and inspiration of a life richly lived — a life that was virtually a sermon.

Surely the poet must have had him in mind when he wrote — "Let me live in my house by the side of the road and be a friend to man."

Chief Simon Pokagon: "The Indian Longfellow"

*David H. Dickason
1965

Pokagon is now an almost forgotten name except among those travelers in the Midwest who visit the Potawatomi Inn in Indiana's Pokagon State Park or the small village of Pokagon in Cass County, Michigan. But during his lifetime Chief Simon Pokagon of the Potawatomi[1] was known to many because of his two visits with Lincoln at the White House, his appearance as unassuming guest of honor and orator for the Chicago Day celebrations at the Columbian Exposition, his various other public addresses, and his articles on Indian subjects in national magazines.[2] His most extensive literary work, the prose-poetry romance of the forest entitled O-Gi-Maw-Kwe Mit-I-Gwa-Ki (Queen of the Woods), was in type but not yet published at the time of his death in 1899.

His contemporary reputation was such that the editor of the Review of Reviews referred to "this distinguished Pottawattomie chieftain" as "one of the most remarkable men of our time. ... His great eloquence, his sagacity, and his wide range of information mark him as a man of exceptional endowments."[3] A feature article in the Arena spoke of "this noble representative of the red-man" as "simple-hearted and earnest."[4] Looked on as the "best educated full-blood Indian of his time,"[5] he was called the " 'Longfellow of his race' "—[6] an epithet then considered a high compliment. And in an obituary notice a Chicago newspaper summarized: "He leaves behind him among the Indians no successor to his poetic and literary ability."[7] From our vantage point of some six decades later it seems fitting, therefore, to look again at the career of Chief Simon Pokagon, and, if necessary, to re-evaluate his literary contributions.

Unrestrained but honest emotion is perhaps the dominant characteristic of Pokagon's work as a whole. He is sorely troubled by the social and economic difficulties confronting the Indians of his generation. He is deeply sensitive to the romantic virtues and beauties of unexploited nature; and in Queen of the Woods his affection for his ill-starred family is poignant and personal. But stylistically it is obvious that Pokagon's English phrases and figures merely echo the polite literary conventions of his day ("the woodland choir," "the happy hunting-ground," "our pale-faced neighbours," "sweet little rosebud," "naked innocence," "bloom of youth," "all nature slept," "the dark clouds rolled away," and so on). This emulation of the popular and often trite phraseology of the romantic-sentimental tradition weakens the vigor of his English style and disappoints a modern reader. One feels that he is not speaking with the spontaneous voice of his own primeval culture, but rather is borrowing the white man's nineteenth-century clichés. Nonetheless, his intrinsic subject — to the extent that it may be distinguished from its verbal form — is original and fresh; and Queen of the Woods is a unique document from a genuine Indian source, an emotional and at times lyrical remembrance of things past rather than a synthetic, sterile exercise such as Hiawatha.

It may be gratuitous to point out, also, that in putting Queen of the Woods and his other manuscripts in order for the publisher, Pokagon doubtless had considerable editorial assistance. His handwritten letters which remain show a certain unconcern for the niceties of spelling and punctuation; and the syntax of some of his published work is not beyond reproach. Evidence of his own unpolished style may be found in a typical message which accompanied a gift copy of his little birchbark-bound booklet, Red Man's Greeting, here quoted verbatim:

Secretary of Chicago Historial Society
Dear Sir:

I notice in the Chicago Tribune of Sunday that the surviving infant of Fort Dearbourn is still alive.— I recall that my father was a chief at that time.

I take pleasure in presenting you a copy of my "Red Mans Greeting" printed on birch bark which I wrote in the year of the Worlds fair—

Perhaps you will recall I rode on the Float of 1812 on Chicago Day and was permitted to ring the Liberty Bell in the morning & make a short address.

I am getting to be an old man & whish to leave this greeting with you that it may be read by future generations.

I heard my father say many times before & after he was converted to Christianity if there had been no whiskey, there would have been no Fort Dearborn masacree— I shall write up our side of that sad affar during the winter— Hoping the little book will red with the same spirit in which it is sent I remain yours truly

S. Pokagon

Hartford Mich Dec 29 1896
Box 32[8]

But many otherwise able authors have shown some deficiency in verbal mechanics; and in view of the unusual background from which Pokagon wrote, any syntactical criticism here would be picayune. O-Gi-Maw-Kwe Mit-I-Gwa-Ki (Queen of the Woods) is not a masterpiece of world literature, it is true. It is indeed rare in its genre, a literary oddity. But the reader may overlook its sentimentalities and eccentricities in view of the novelty of its contents and depth of its feeling; and if he reads sympathetically his emotions may be touched. Too, this book vivifies a segment of our national past which often is conveniently forgotten. But perhaps its ultimate worth lies in the candid self-portrait of a son of the now-vanished forest. His prose style may have been vitiated by his superficial and uncritical contacts with English literature; but his integrity as an individual was not destroyed by the white man's culture. A member of a mistreated minority group, he was able to face his changing and difficult environment courageously.

Turning now to a more specific investigation of Simon Pokagon's writings, we find that his Queen of the Woods is the central document. The events here related were derived directly from Pokagon's private life, and the book itself is the best exemplar of his literary style. Concerning this work the biographer of Chief Leopold Pokagon, Simon's father, comments thus effusively:

His Queen of the Woods has the tang, the zest, and the woodsy flavor of life. It is pulsing with sympathy, heartfelt emotion, and sensitive feeling; a quaint mixture of information, fact, history, pathos, romance, and poetry combined; a plaintive, yet uncomplaining plea for justice and an eloquent and stirring plea for temperance. Lofty sentiments, wise philosophical thoughts, and serious reflection temper and vivify all his writings.

[9]This tale (written first in his native tongue and then translated into English by the author) begins at the time of Pokagon's return to his people after his years of white schooling. It is narrated in the first person, and in spite of romantic overtones is largely a factual account. His friend and publisher, C.H. Engle, of Hartford, Michigan, referred to it as "the historical sketch" of Pokagon's life, and labeled it a "real romance of Indian life." "Nearly all the persons mentioned in the narrative bear their real names, and were personally known to many yet living."[10]

Some unusual aspects of the book immediately become apparent. The most obvious is the inclusion of many Algonquin-Algaic[11] terms, following which Pokagon gives the English translation in parentheses. This intrusion of unfamiliar and difficult Indian expressions results in a bumpy awkwardness which at first seems to break the flow of his English style. Careful reading indicates, however, that these interpolated words have a strong rhythm of their own. Most of these are single nouns of brief phrases, but in the latter part of the tale the author often inserts complete sentences. He defends this odd bilingual practice:

In consideration of the fact that the language of the great Algonquin family, which once was spoken by hundreds of thousands throughout more than half of North America, is fast passing away, I have retained such Indian words and expressions as appear in "Queen of the Woods," as monuments along the way, to remind the reader in after-generations, that such a language as ours was once spoken throughout this loved land of my fathers.[12]

"The Algonquin Language," a prefatory treatise of thirteen pages, presents in a technical and succinct form the basic data of the speech system. Far from being a "sort of 'gibberish,' " according to Pokagon, Algaic contains some twenty thousand root words on which numerous variations may be built. The seventeen letters of the alphabet include only four vowels, of unchanging pronunciation, plus several diphthongs. Nine parts of speech are distinguishable. Peculiarities of the language include great liberty in transposing word order; a very involved use of different particles depending on gender and function of accompanying words; a clipping or shortening of words when grouped in phrases; and a comprehensive body of agglutinative terms to express family relationships. The basic structure of the sentence hinges on the verb, and "nearly all the words in our language can be transformed into verbs." His own view of the effectiveness and beauty of the Algonquin language is implicit in his apology that in translating his manuscript into English in many places he lost the "force and euphony" of the original.[13]

A second obvious feature of Queen of the Woods is its semi-poetic form. Although the story begins in ordinary prose, it soon shifts to comparatively regular iambics so that, had the author chosen, much of the tale might have been printed as blank verse. This style (no doubt derived from Pokagon's reading of the English poets) might have seemd to him also to reflect the patterns of his own speech. One undeniable echo is that of the King James version of the Bible. The resulting regular "beat" occasionally becomes obtrusive, but there is unquestionably more variety than in the insistent rhythms of Hiawatha, for example; and the highly sentimental-emotional-mystical mood occasionally reached in the tale might justify a "poetic" line.

The vital framework is the factual account of Pokagon's courtship, marriage, idyllic family life, and subsequent deep tragedy. To this are added many marginal notes on the natural scene and Indian domestic arts (more trustworthy and persuasive than Longfellow's eclectic data). But Pokagon's chief concern is with the ethereal character of Lonidaw, the Indian princess who gently dominates the tale.

His initial joy in returning to his native haunts is reflected in an early rhythmical passage:

> Just as "gi-siss" (the sun) was going down, we reached our landing-place. The shore on either side was fringed with rushes, flags, and golden-rod, and grasses tall between; and scattered here and there wild roses breathed their rich perfume, scenting the evening air.[14]

Off for a pre-dawn hunt, he sketches the scene:

> It was a beautiful quiet morning. All nature slept. . . . Just as the sun tinged the topmost branches of the highland trees, a white fog-cloud appeared above the winding river as far as eye could reach. It looked as though the stream had risen from its ancient bed, and was floating in mid-air.[15]

Returning with a buck over his shoulder, he surprised his mother, who took hold of the arrows still fast in the flesh, praised him for his unforgotten skill, and exclaimed: " 'Kwaw-notch, kwaw-notch maw-mawsh-kay-she (beautiful, beautiful deer)! How could you have o-daw (the heart) to take nin bim-á-dis-win (his life)?' "[16]

Pokagon's first view of Lonidaw, his future bride, with "raven tresses floating in the breeze," was on the further side of stream where she was imitating the songs of wild pigeons and bobolinks as a snow-white deer gamboled about her. Pokagon thought that such creatures as she must be discovered only in the happy hunting ground beyond.[17]

An old Ottawa trapper, who had once given shelter to Lonidaw's mother on her flight from the forced tribal migration in the 1830's, appears and tells Pokagon of Lonidaw's birth in a swamp while her mother was hiding from the United States troops and of the child's being carried by her starving mother for fifty miles over rough country to his wigwam. Nature had taught her the language of the beasts and birds; and, he added in a practical mood, " 'if she would make use of her wonderful min-i-gowin (gifts), she could nish-iwe min-a-wa (kill more) game than a dozen old hungers.' "[18]

Away at school again after his vacation, Pokagon realized his inescapable love for Lonidaw, so when springtime came he went in search of her. Young love at first was inarticulate, and even after his declaration she protested that his white education had spoiled him for the simple life: " 'I am but pa-gwag ab-i-not ji mit-tig (a wild child of the woods), wild as ben-ish ig (the birds) that gather round. . . . but should we wed, I fear you soon would tire of my native woodland ways, and crush this childish o-daw nin (heart of mine).' "[19] But when the moon of flowers came and mating birds were moving north, young Pokagon and his beloved Lonidaw were united, without benefit of priest or formal ceremony. On an inland lake where wild rice was plentiful he built their wigwam home; and on his return from hunting trips he always hailed her, " 'Hoi (Hallo), o-gi-maw-kwe mit-i-gwa-ki (queen of the woods).' "[20]

After two years Olondaw, their son, was born; then Hazeleye, their little girl. The children grew up happily, little Olondaw learning to make and handle a bow, and his sister playing with her Indian doll. A white priest offered to pay the expenses if Olondaw were sent away to school. Pokagon agreed, hoping that his son, now twelve years old, would become "learned, great,and good, and thereby be of great service to our race." But Lonidaw was fearful of the future; and on the eve of Olondaw's departure she dreamed that by the trail she found two young robins which were drawn hypnotically toward a monstrous snake. As she tried to grasp a club, it struck its victim; and in her dream "the snake within its jaws held fast, not the bird, but the living skeleton of her son, struggling to escape."[21]

This premonition proved tragically true, for after three years at the white man's school Olondaw graduated from bottle-hunting in the back alleys of the town to an ineradicable craving for the familiar firewater. Pokagon lowers the final curtain abruptly: "I do not wish to bleed my own heart, or sadden yours; suffice it to say, as darkness succeeds the meteor's sudden glare, so his young life went out and left us in the midnight of despair."[22]

But this was only the first act in the tragedy. "Dear little Hazeleye alone was left us then; that sweet rosebud, just opening into maidenhood . . ." But one day while Pokagon was absent and Hazeleye was fishing on the lake, two drunken white fishermen rammed their boat into her bark canoe, which capsized and threw her into the water. Lonidaw, on shore, screamed for help, but the drunken men made no effort to save the child. The mother plunged desperately to the rescue, but almost strangling was herself pulled to safety by Zowan, the faithful family dog. Lonidaw lingered briefly, partly in delirium, until one evening she said: " 'Pokagon, see ke-sus (the sun) is sinking low; while it is going down, I shall pass into manito aukee we-de (the spirit land beyond). You have always been kind to me, yet I must bid you farewell until we meet beyond tchi-be-gam-mig (the grave) . . .'. "[23] Soon a simple procession of mourning, white-blanketed Indian friends bore her body to a beautiful headland overlooking the lake; white water-lillies were laid gently on her grave.[24]

The brief remainder of the book is made up of a sincere but disjointed temperance tract, inspired by the dying wish of Lonidaw that Pokagon should speak out against the source of the great triple tragedy in their own family circle.

Three short but unique publications by Pokagon also merit comment. The only other work listed on the title page of Queen of the Woods is Red Man's Greeting (originally — and more aptly — entitled Red Man's Rebuke).[25] This attracted some notice in the press, and a reviewer in 1893 commented:

> Printed upon white birch bark in its natural state is an account of the cruel betrayal of this hunted race, dating from the advent of the white man to these shores up to the present time. One reads with unutterable sadness this voicing of the outraged spirit of a race, eloquent in its pathos, yet entirely free from wild vindictiveness.

[26]Another critic for a newspaper in Chicago, the home of the Columbian Exposition, also responded to this booklet's appeal: "No words of mine can tell the pathos of this tiny book . . .It is told simply, and yet with a force that leaves an indelible picture on your mind."[27] Its scope and mood may be suggested by part of Pokagon's dedication: "To the memory of William Penn, Roger Williams, the late lamented Helen Hunt Jackson, and many others now in Heaven, Who conceived that Noble spirit of Justice Which recognizes the Brotherhood of the Red Man."

Two other birchbark booklets remain as collectors' items: Pottawatamie Book of Genesis – Legends of the Creation of Man,[28] and Algonquin Legends of South Haven.[29] The first recounts an old tradition that the Great Spirit was dissatisfied with his lower animal creations and determined to make man who should possess superior intelligence. Some of the Spirit Chiefs who already held dominion over the earth resolved in a secret powwow to frustrate the plans of How-wan-tuck, the Almighty. The act of creation occurred by a beautiful inland lake in a great wilderness:

> As he stood upon the shores thereof in the presence of them all, His eyes flashed waw-saw mo-win (lightning)! The lake became boiling water! The earth trembled! He then spake in the voice of thunder: "Come forth, ye Lords of Au-kee (the world)!" The ground opened. And from out of the red clay that lined the lake came forth au-ne-ne gaie ik-we (man and woman). . . . The bride and groom then each other fondly kissed as hand in hand they stood, in naked innocence, in the full bloom of youth. . . . They looked all about them in wonder and surprise.[30]

But when the evil Spirit Chiefs saw divinity shining in the faces of the newly created beings, they were stung by the wasps of jealousy and resolved to make man miserable. So ever afterwards man's life has been alternately controlled by good and evil forces.

Pokagon's retelling of Algonquin Legends of South Haven is most noteworthy for an Indian version of the rainbow tale, supposedly coming to the Potawatomi from the aboriginal Mashko-de or Prairie Tribe. After Ki-ja Man-i-to (the Great Spirit) had located his throne at Ish-pem-ing (a high place) on the shore of Lake Mi-shi-gan, he planted beautiful woodland flowers and filled the trees with birds.

> He also made a great mit-ig-wab (bow) at least two arrow flights in length, and placed it along the shore. He then painted it from end to end in beautiful lines. . . . While thus at work a cyclone from the setting sun swept across the great lake! Waw-saw-mo-win (lightning) flashed across waw-kwi (the heavens)! An-a-mi-ka (thunder) in concert with ti-gow-og (the roaring waves) rolled their awful burden on the land! . . .
> At length the dark clouds rolled away and the setting sun lit up the gloom. He then picked up the giant bow that he had made, bent it across mi-ka-tik (his knee), then with his breath blew a blast that swept it eastward between the sunshine and the clouds. . . .
> As He gazed upon its beauty and grandeur arching the departing storm, He shouted in triumph above the roaring waves in thunder tones, saying, "Kaw-kaw-naw in-in-i nash-ke nin wab sa aw-ni-quod (All men behold my bow in the cloud.) See, it has no mit-ig bim-i-na-kwan ke-ma pin-de-wan (arrow, string, or quiver). It is the bow of peace. Tell it to your children's children that Ki-ja Man-i-to made it . . . . that they might know He loved peace and hated war."

[31] From this perspective of Pokagon's literary contributions we might now glance briefly backward at the tribal environment from which he had emerged. Of the competitive cultural forces at work within him, the central drive was certainly to maintain and defend his own native values, with only a collateral concern for the veneer of white literary culture.

Simon Pokagon had succeeded his two older brothers in the tribal leadership handed down from their father, Chief Leopold Pokagon. For the forty years prior to his death in 1841, Leopold had been the head of the Pokagon band of the Potawatomie Indians, an offshoot of the larger Algonquin family.[32] Simon, the youngest of Chief Leopold's numerous children, was born in 1830 during the clan's annual migration north to their sugar-maple camps and cornfields across the Michigan border. Most of Simon's first eight years were spent, however, in the old Pokagon village in the St. Joseph River Valley in northeastern Indiana. Here he acquired his first skill in hunting and fishing from Joseph Bertrand, a half-breed French trader who had married Mona, the daughter of Chief Topenebee.[33]

This carefree chapter of his youth was terminated suddenly by the removal of most of the Potawatomi from their tribal lands.[34] A monument erected at Twin Lakes, Indiana, bears a succinct inscription:

IN MEMORY OF CHIEF MENOMINEE and his
BAND OF 859 POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS
Removed from this Reservation, September 4, 1838
By a company of soldiers under the Command of
COL. JOHN TIPTON
Authorized by Governor David Wallace

DANIEL MCDONALD, PLYMOUTH

This transfer[35] of the majority of the Potawatomi to Iowa and eventually to Kansas and Oklahoma burned so deep an impression on the mind of young Simon Pokagon that he later incorporated the event as one of the most moving sequences of his Queen of the Woods. His immediate family had not been involved, but the parents of Lonidaw, the girl he was to marry, were living at that time in Menominee's village. Thus Lonidaw's mother gives her version of the story concerning the arrival of the soldiers, the assembling of the Indians at the wigwam church, and the immediate eviction and march toward the setting sun. Although her husband was forced to accompany the migrants, she herself managed to escape northward.[36]

Chief Leopold Pokagon was more fortunate than most. He apparently had realized the inevitability of the treaty demands — which had been formalized by a Grand Council five years previously — so about a year before this crisis he had migrated with his immediate clan to his own property of some seven hundred acres on Long Lake, Michigan, which was not included in the ceded areas.[37]

When Simon was a youth of fourteen, some six years after this shattering of the Potawatomi patterns in Indiana, he was sent by his father to the Notre Dame preparatory school in South Bend. Then, according to his close friend, C.H. Engle, who later published Queen of the Woods, "returning home fired with zeal for a good English education, he succeeded through his own efforts, aided by his mother, in going to Oberlin College, Ohio."[38] One year's work at Oberlin, apparently with private tutors or on the preparatory level,[39] was followed by two more at the Twinsburg Institute near Cleveland, Ohio, an organization which offered free tuition, board, and lodging to the several Indians then among its three hundred students. In this school "all necessary opportunities were afforded to prepare students for college."[40] This phrase clearly indicates the secondary level of instruction, so the assumption that Pokagon was college trained is erroneous. Nevertheless, he profited from some instruction in the classics and music, for a later visitor recalled that Pokagon came to his cabin door with an open Greek testament in his hand.[41] For several years Pokagon played the piano or reed organ in Indian churches, especially that at Rush Lake, Michigan, where he also translated many sermons from English into Algiac.[42]

Pokagon's autobiographical romance, as we have seen, presents details of his life with Lonidaw, daughter of Chief Sinagaw of the Rush Lake band (who had been able to rejoin his family after the tribal relocation). But after the death of their two children and of Lonidaw herself at the age of only thirty-five, Pokagon devoted himself to the welfare of his small tribal group and of the Potawatomi as a whole. He visited Lincoln in the White House shortly after his inauguration to plead the Indian cause, and again just before the President's death; and in 1874 he interviewed General Grant. Finally, in 1894 Pokagon succeeded in arranging the payment of $104,000 by the government to the Potawatomi in compensation for the harsh terms of the original cession of their lands (at the price of about fifty cents per acre), and for various annuities previously withheld.[43] He also aided the development of schools for the Indians, such as the Haskell Institute in Lawrence, Kansas, where his own children by a second marriage and his grandchildren were sent. He likewise encouraged the production and sale of local Indian craft materials.[44]

In an address delivered, appropriately enough, to a lodge meeting of the Order of Red Men the year before he died, Pokagon reviewed his long career:

> I have stood all my life as a peacemaker between the white people and my own people. Without gun or bow I have stood between the two contending armies, receiving a thousand wounds from your people and my own. I have continued to pray the great father at Washington to deal justly .... and have said to my own people, when they were bitterly wronged, and felt mortally offended, "Wait and pray for justice; the war-path will but lead you to the grave."[45]

A Chicago paper in an obituary notice touched a eulogistic note:

> The poet chief managed with consummate ability and skill the often conflicting and delicate interests and affairs of the band of three hundred Pottawattamie Indians scattered over the State of Michigan. Gifted with a fine education, and inspired by enlightened views, he was an instrument of far-reaching good to all his people.[46]

Chief Simon Pokagon lived simply and died simply, as a brief letter from his only surviving son to the Secretary of the Chicago Historical Society suggests:

> Apr. 17, 1899
> My father's last work "Queen of the Woods" is now ready for delivery. My father left but little means outside of the prospective value of his literary work. I therefore thought you might get a few copies for your library.
> Charles L. Pokagon[47]

So it seems fitting that Pokagon State Park should bear his name, and that on the timbers of the great hall in the Potawatomi Inn should be engraved the legend: "O-Gi-Maw-Kwe Mit-I-Gwa-Ki Queen of the Woods," to remind us of a past which is now beyond recall.

At the time of their maximum development in 1820 the entire tribe numbered about thirty-four hundred persons in some fifty villages in northern Illinois and Indiana and southwestern Michigan. 38. Engle's educational data, based on oral statements by Pokagon, are included in his "A Brief Sketch of Chief Simon Pokagon's Life," prefixed to Queen of the Woods, 5-6. Instruction at the University of Notre Dame was begun in 1842; and in 1844 two charters were issued, one to authorize the founding of the university and the other to establish a "trade or manual labor school," which was distinct from the preparatory department of the university. Pokagon presumably attended the trade school. "It is even possible that Simon was sent by his father to the Notre Dame Preparatory School in South Bend to perform errands, but Father Hope is almost convinced that Simon Pokagon did not enroll in the school itself. . . . None of this can be verified by records, since all records were destroyed in the great fires of the 1870's." Leo M. Corbaci, administrative assistant, University of Notre Dame, to the author, March 16, 1961.
39. Oberlin officials report: "We have searched our records [under the variant spelling Pokagon, Pokegon, Pocagin, and Pugegun], but have been unable to find that the Indian Simon Pokagon was ever enrolled in Oberlin College." Robert R. Barr, acting secretary, Oberlin College, to the author, November 4, 1959. Pokagon's own explicit statement concerning his education is this: "About this time my dear father died; and, soon after, my mother, on the advice of one of the Catholic Fathers, sent me to Notre Dame School, near South Bend, Indiana, where I remained four or five years. But, desiring a more liberal education than I was likely to get there, I sought out my old missionary friend Coles, and laid before him my great anxiety to go to school at Oberlin, Ohio, where race and color were disregarded. The good man finally persuaded my mother to send me to that school." Pokagon, "Indiana Superstitions and Legends," Forum, XXV (July, 1898), 618-619.

A Fine New Library for Decatur

With much satisfaction the residents of the village of Decatur and of Van Buren County welcome the information, supplied by Mr. Earl E. Copley, president of the First State Bank, that a beautiful library building will be erected on one of the most important locations in the village.

The library building and a large endowment fund for its physical maintenance come to the village under the terms of the Last Will and Testament of Norman Edward Webster, a native of Decatur. For many years he was a resident of New York City until his death there on July 15 of last year.

Three outstanding residents of the village have been named as the board of trustees of the library fund. Mr. Copley is chairman of the board. His colleagues are Marvin McWilliams and Lyle Parker. Mr. Parker accepted the responsibilities of office after the death of Arba N. Moulton, for many years the editor of the Decatur Republican, known as The Grand Old Man of the community.

During the period of administration of the estate of the donor, one of Mr. Webster's partners in the firm of Webster, Horne & Elsdon, will act as a trustee, for consultation purposes.

The first step in the process of bringing the dream of the library into actual existence was the purchase, for Mr. Webster, of the plot of land and the building at Phelps and St. Mary's Streets from Dr. and Mrs. Evan L. Copeland, in the summer of 1955.

When the executors of the Will of Norman Webster are free to deliver to the trustees, the investments of the estate, active steps will be taken to engage an architect experienced in library design. After plans and specifications have been approved by the board of trustees and in accordance with the thoughts outlined by Mr. Webster during his life, contractors will be asked to submit bids for the construction and equipment of the new library structure.

On March 26, 1869, there was born to Norman Earl Webster, a carpenter of Decatur, and his wife, Jenne Chavleer, their only child. It was a boy. He was named Norfriends he was "Ed Webster" (or friends he was "ed Webster" (or "Eddie," while a small boy). He grew up to young manhood in this village and he attended the local "Graded School". There he came under the teaching of Professor Henry Upton whose influence on the life of the growing boy persisted throughout his entire life. Mr. Upton was a man who knew how to teach in such fashion that his pupils were enabled to learn. Another teacher whose character and ability had a continuing effect in the life of Ed Webster was Miss Abigail Pearce.

In his last year at the local school Ed. Webster made the acquaintance of Rose Rezeau, a fellow pupil. She was then residing with her greataunt, Mrs. A. J. Kinne. That acquaintance ripened into life-long affection. The schoolmates were married in Denver, Colorado, on December 17, 1895.

After his graduation from school the young Mr. Webster went to work in Decatur, for the Decatur Manufacturing Company, and later for the Hinkley Stave Company. From there he went to Kalamazoo as bookkeeper for the Michigan Buggy Company.

In 1892, he went to Union College in Schenectady, New York. The great Chicago Columbian Exposition attracted him to a new field of work. From that occupation he went to the United States Treasury Department in Washington. Acquaintances made there attracted him to New York City, where, as a Certified Public Accountant, he established a national reputation.

As the years passed, the memories of the school days in Decatur grew warm and golden for Mr. and Mrs. Webster, and they decided to leave to the village that which remained of their financial substance when death should claim them.

Among the papers left by Mr. Webster is a list of the Decatur families known and loved by them in the Eighteen Eighties: Arnold, Baker, Brownridge, Browning, Chadwick, Chamberlin, Charles, Coleman, Copley, Dillon, Harrison, Hathaway, Hill, Rose, Shuster, Trowbridge, Upton, Warren, "and the farm families" Buell, Hathaway, Tyler, Morris, Rosewarne, "and others."

But above all — Professor Henry Upton.

On May 23, 1951, Mr. Moulton received a letter from the Websters in which they stated that they were making new wills and he said he would like to do something for his birthplace and gave the following tentative plan:

Each of us will leave all of his or her estate to the survivor. If both die together, or if not, when the survivor dies, there will be legacies to relatives-all distant — to employees at our home, to religious, educational and charitable societies, and the residue probably not less than $75,000 perhaps $125,000 for a project in Decatur.

My wish for this is a library site and building, three choices for location, all on St. Mary's Street, are as follows:

A - Corner of Phelps Street, the former Samuel Ellis property.

B - Corner of School Street, in the same block as Ellis property.

C - Corner of Phelps Street, across from Ellis property.

Each is near the business center and near the Schools.

He further stated "I hope that the provision of a library building might lead to a consolidation of Village and School Libraries, that the Trustees might accept ours of nearly 1000 volumes with encyclopedias, globe, bookcases etc. Possibly it might some time be offered yours (Mr. Moulton's) Both Village and School Boards would have a relation to it as shown later on. I wish it called The Henry Upton Library

From some later correspondence Mr. Moulton and the other trustees convinced him that it should be named the Webster Public Library.

An officer of the Hayes law firm in New York estimated that the library fund would be well in excess of $300,000.

Mr. Webster's will filed for probate in Van Buren County and in New York state, distributes about $37,000 among relatives, two employees and a church and a college in New York.

The will also authorized the three trustees, Copley, McWilliams and Parker, to spend 60 per cent of the library trust for construction, the remainder to be used as a permanent endowment for care and maintenance.

The trustees are authorized to use the Dr. Copeland property or they may dispose of it and acquire another site. The will requires that part of the libary be available for public meetings of a non-political, non-sectarian nature.

Mr. Webster also directed that his remains, after cremation, be placed with those of his late wife in an urn to be located permanently in the library.

Also named as a trustee of the library fund is a New Yorker, Henry A. Horne. The executors of the estate in New York have reportedly been urging the library trustees to launch building plans.

the local men say they have been hoping first to find out how large the trust fund will be.

BERT KIDMAN

Bert Kidman, 70, the last of Decatur's blacksmiths, has worked a plan of gradual retirement which will insure the continuation of his business.

Born in Eau Claire, the veteran blacksmith said that except for a few years at Grand Blanc and at Lawton, he has spent his entire working life in the Decatur area.

Now, a yen for an easier pace and some traveling and fishing is bringing to a close his 55 years at the forge and anvil. He has given a three-year lease on his shop, along with an option to buy, to Edward Schubr, former operator of "Ed's Portable Welding Service."

Schubr, who has no experience as a blacksmith, will have the benefit of Kidman's knowledge of the craft during the next several months. The veteran blacksmith explained that the art of forging is a vanishing skill, one which he intends to impart to his successor before retiring completely.

"There's still a lot of demand for blacksmith," he observed, "and a man who can forge is never idle."

For many years now Kidman has been doing experimental custom work, producing special implements for Decatur-area muck land farmers.

"The farmer gets an idea of what he wants and we build it" he explained.

Besides mint settlers and steel grain and hay elevators the products have included such items as a power digger which reportedly could dig 400 fruit tree holes per day, and a carrot harvester which had a carrot-topper in front of a tractor and a digger behind with an elevator attached which loaded the produce.

"Another man wanted a machine for setting asparagus roots and we built that" he added. The blacksmith explained that he is equally familiar with wood or metal work, and added that since the horse business vanished in 1941 his work has been easier.

In the days when shoeing 20 or 22 horses was just a good day's work the blacksmith said it was not uncommon to work around the clock to get a large number of horses shod on short notice. Kidman said this was his system of satisfying customers and advertising.

Now with most of the equipment electrically-driven he said things are easier. "Electricity is the best hired man you can have," he declared.

Kidman, who started the trade under his father at the age of 15, also has two brothers who have been blacksmiths.

He explained that while he no longer cares to work all the time, he isn't quite ready to retire completely.

"I have a sister in Yankeetown, Florida, and I'm going to spend a week there this spring," he said. "and I have a daughter in Detroit. I'll go over there for Easter."

Regarding the business Kidman said, "I'll be here, maybe, 'til fall when I get Schubr going. Then I'm going to do more traveling. Later on if I find a warmer place that I like, maybe in Florida, I'll settle down there."

The blacksmith, who appears to be closer to 55 than 70 years old, enjoys hunting as well as fishing. He was once the president of a sporting club in Decatur and was a member of the school board from 1921 to 1941.

HARLEY E. SQUIER

Harley E. Squier. Among the younger farmers of Van Buren County, Mr. Squier occupies a leading position. Enterprising, industrious and progressive in his ideas, he has obtained a good start in life, not only as a skillful farmer but also as a useful member of the community in which he resides. He owns and occupies a fine body of land on Section 32, Columbia Township, which is familiarly known as "Orchard Hill," having been so named by Mrs. Squier. The farm consists of two hundred and sixty acres, thirty acres of which have been planted out in an orchard, while the remainder is devoted to agricultural and stock-raising purposes.

In Volinia Township, Cass County, this state, Harley E. Squier was born September 20, 1861. When six years old, he accompanied his parents in their removal from the farm which had been their home to Decatur, where he received a good common school education. During vacations he was employed as a clerk in the store which his father conducted in that place, but at the age of seventeen embarked for himself as a clerk for the Hinkley Stave Company. Afterward he was engaged in Decatur and Breedsville as one of the Superintendents of that company until 1885, when he entered the First National Bank at Decatur as a cashier. Two years later, he resigned the position, in order to engage in farming, and has since quietly pursued his chosen calling on his beautiful homestead.

On September 14, 1887, Mr. Squier was married to Miss Sadie E. Brown, the daugher of Amos S. and Sarah (Deming) Brown. Mrs. Squier was born April 3, 1862, on the place where she now resides and received her education in the district schools, graduating from Englewood High School in the class of '81. She is a lady of great refinement and many accomplishments, and occupies an enviable position in social circles. She is a devoted wife and an affectionate mother to her child, Paul. In his political affiliations, Mr. Squier is a decided adherent of the Republican Party and is numbered among its most influential members. He has served in various township offices and also filled the responsible position of President of the Village of Breedsville. In his social connections, he is identified with the Knights of Pythia.

The above information was taken from "Portrait and Geographical Record of Van Buren County, Michigan" which was published in 1892.

In 1892, Mr. Squier was elected as County Clerk for Van Buren County. Mr. Squier served in this office for two terms from 1893 to 1897. While serving in this office, Mr. Squier built up a large acquaintance throughout Southern Michigan and an enviable reputation as an able and efficient public servant.

On April 17, 1893, a second son, Carl B. Squier was born in Decatur, Michigan.

In 1898, Mr. Squier accepted a position with a firm that sold a new type of "Gas Light." Mr. Squier introduced the Gas Light in a large number of cities including Portland, Oregon and Seattle, Washington.

In 1901, Mr. Squier returned to Michigan, accepting a position as "Chief Clerk" at the Phelps Sanitorium, in Battle Creek, Michigan.

On September 18, 1902, Mrs. Squier passed away at the Sanitorium. This was a great loss to

Mr. Squier and his two sons. Mrs. Squier had been a devoted wife and mother. Mrs. Squier was placed to rest in the lot of her family in the Breedsville Cemetery. Mr. Squier leaving his two sons in the care of his father and mother in Decatur, returned to his duties at the Sanitorium.

In 1904, Mr. Squier returned to Decatur, Michigan to aid in the management of his father's farm. November 23, 1905, he met and married Bertha Jennings. There are five children of this union. David A., of South Bend; Walter H., of Battle Creek; Robert J., of Berkeley, California; Elouise (Mrs. G.W. Westfall), Edwardsburg, Michigan and Bettie (Mrs. Ivan Gall), Shipshewana, Indiana. Mr. Squier remained on the farm and built up a fine herd of diary cattle and became quite successful. In 1917, due to some misfortunes, he sold his farm and accepted employment at the Clark Equipment Company, Buchanan, Michigan. He moved his family to Buchanan, in 1918, where he and Mrs. Squier still resdie.

In 1932, Mr. Squier was appointed tax assessor and member of the Board of Supervisors. He continued as tax assessor until September 20, 1951, but continued on as member of the Board of Supervisors until his retirement, July 1, 1953.

After his retirement in July of 1953, Mr. Squier was taken ill in October of that year and has been in the sanitorium for the past two and one half years.

Wagon Wheels Found in Lake

Three skin divers who fished some wagon parts out of Birch Lake, near Vandalia, have turned their find over to the State Historical Commission.

Commission experts will attempt to determine if the divers located a relic of pre-Civil War days that figures in stories about the slave traffic of more than a century ago.

Three Lansing men were prepared to go back after the rest of the wagon if study shows their weekend recovery has historical value.

Ervin Morris, Ira Cooper and Merritt Nevins brought from the bottom of Birch Lake, two metal rear wagon wheels, a connecting axle and a reach apparently broken off between the rear and front wheel assemblies.

The rusty objects appeared to first observers to be hand forged.

Tales handed down in the Vandalia-Cassopolis area had it that a group of Kentucky slave-owners seeking runaways left the wagon hidden in the woods while they searched.

Local abolitionists then were supposed to have dragged the vehicle to Birch Lake and sank it about 100 feet off shore.

Veteran Mailman Retires

Decatur Area Will Miss Andy

DECATUR, Nov. 6 — The familiar toot of Andy Kemp's car horn is a thing of the past for rural Decatur postal patrons.

Kemp delivered his last bundle of mail Saturday and retired from the postoffice after 33 years service.

He'd been on the job since 1924, driving up to 62 miles a day to bring both the good and the bad news to his rural [illegible].

"There's hardly a customer on the route who doesn't recognize the sound of that horn," Kemp said as he began reminiscing.

For the first few years, Kemp recalls, he drove a horse and wagon around his 30-mile long route. Even after he began using a car in 1934, the mailman relied on the horse and wagon to get through the snow covered roads in winter and mud-dy [illegible] in the spring. Kemp still owns that wagon as a relic of those early days.

When he began using the car regularly, Kemp's route was extended to 60 miles. Since then it's been shortened to 52 miles.

Kemp was appointed by the late Fred H. Fisher, local postmaster at the time, and has served under Mrs. [illegible] A. V. Morrison, Herbert Green and the present postmaster, Otis Howe.

As a mail carrier, Kemp says he has been involved in only three accidents. The worst happened in 1952 when his car was struck by a sec[illegible] while he was attempting a [illegible]

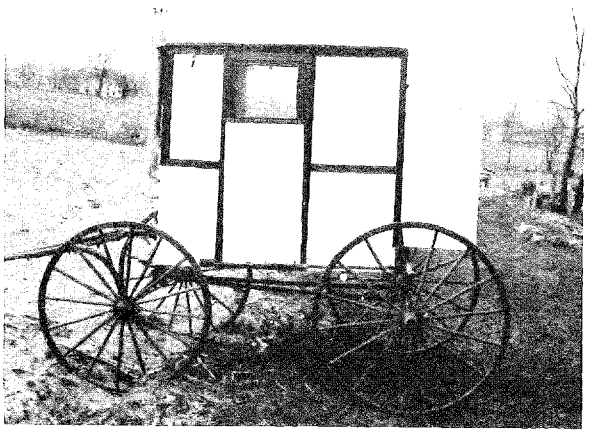
Following his recovery from surgery he underwent Monday in Kalamazoo, Kemp says he plans to farm and do custom butchering. If that doesn't keep him busy, there's always plenty to do around the house, Kemp observed.

The mail wagon owned and used by Andy Kemp was built by his father C.P. Kemp →



LOUIS G. HALL

Louis G. Hall was a graduate of the University of Illinois in 1922. He received a B.S. degree in Agriculture, with Farm Management as his major and Animal Husbandry as a minor (beef, sheep, swine, draft horses).

He served in two Illinois Counties as a U.S. Department of Agriculture Field Man in cost accounting — DeKalb County, 1922-1923; Knox County, 1923-1924. He must have been good, because he was known later as: "That H fur leather County Agricultural Agent!"

In 1933-'34 he was Van Buren County assistant to Fred Johnston, County Agricultural Agent. He worked in the capacity of Field Man on all farm programs: Corn-Hog, Wheat-and-Sugar Beets — for benefit payments by the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

After three men had been turned down for the Lenawee County job at Adrian, in 1936, some one said one day, "Why don't you try Louie Hall? He has had Farm Management and Live Stock feeding and marketing experience in Illinois." So they accepted him at age forty-one, after five men could do nothing with that county for two decades. It was "touch and go" with County Agricultural agents.

It had been said that he was a hard man to "knock down" on any question concerning the business of farming, so, he gave it a try on April 6, 1936 and stayed — twenty-four years — to retirement age of sixty-five years and nine months — which was June 30, 1960. No other man had served more than five years before him. His successor on July 1, 1960 served fifteen years. Now a new one appointed Jan. 1, 1976 must serve to the year 2000 to equal Louis Hall's tenure.

There was a distinguished Service Award granted in December, 1946, in Chicago, at a meeting of the National Association of County Agricultural Agents. Louis Hall accomplished it in ten years of service — which is the time limit before one is nominated for this award. Up to that time, no one else had achieved this distinction in ten years.

Decatur's New Industry

Allen Crest Greetings, Division of Michigan Lithographing Company, Decatur's new industry, is planning on starting production some time next month. Right now they have a small crew getting sample mounts, etc. prepared for salesmen.

Their products at present will be Christmas cards, tags and seals, also valentines for the syndicates, jobbers and variety stores throughout the country. In addition to this they will have a packaging service and they plan to package a variety of items for the general industrial trade.

Shipments of machinery will begin coming in this month and continue to do so for several months until all necessary equipment is installed for the planned operation.

Fred E. Pennell, Production and Plant Manager explained that their plans now are to do all the phases of the operation in Decatur, with the exception of the printing, which will be done in Grand Rapids. Until the machinery is all installed here, some of the work will have to be done in Chicago and Grand Rapids.

Allen Crest Greetings have offices in Chicago and will operate as a Division of Michigan Lithographing Company of Grand Rapids, with the main operation being planned for Decatur. Die cutting, assembling, stringing, packaging and shipping direct to the customer will be done at this plant, also most of the administrative work.

This new company will be located in the building formerly occupied by Colortype Publishing, Company, Division of American Colortype Company.

Colortype stopped operations the first of September of last year and moved their equipment the last of December back to Chicago. The officials of that company wish to thank the people of Decatur for their cooperation while they were located here for the past three years, but due to the change of control of the company and the sale of some of their divisions, there was space left vacant in one of their Chicago plants to move the Decatur operation back. Colortype did a lot for Decatur community while located here and it was certain to be appreciated as a result of the large weekly payroll.

Mr. A. F. Allen, General Manager of Allen Crest Greetings, is not exactly a stranger here, even though his offices are in Chicago. Years ago he used to call on our townsman Bill Beek with a line of cards, tags, seals and valentines. Mr. Allen has been in this particular business for over seventeen years and is well qualified to act as general manager, and to have the company bear his name, Allen.

It may also be interesting to many to know that the secretary of Michigan Lithographing Company is certainly not unknown here. He is Mr. Richard Court and Mrs. Court is the former Hollister Savage of Decatur. Dr. Court of Marcellus is his brother.

Mr. Pennell advises that where possible he plans on placing some of the employees that were laid off by Colortype, and that applications from others will be accepted after the 15th of March.

Growth and progress of a community can be the direct results of both small and large industries. Everyone should remember this and back both present and future industries for Decatur.

Cooperation means a great deal between local residents, businessmen and industrial management.

Lifelong Resident of Hamilton Dies

Mrs. Capitola L. Fassett, 95, a life-long resident of Hamilton and Keeler townships died at 7:30 p.m. at her home.

The body was removed to Newell Sons Funeral Home.

She was the daughter of Elam and Lucy Briggs, born May 12, 1862 in Keeler township. She was married to Seth L. Fassett of Hamilton township in 1878. Mr. Fassett died about 20 years ago.

She is survived by two daughters, Mrs. Beulah Scott of Hamilton, Mrs. Bernice Burnette of Wichita Falls, Texas; a son, Hartwell of Hamilton, five grandchildren and 11 great grandchildren and one great great grandchild.

Funeral services will be held at 2 p. m. Thursday at her home in Hamilton township. Rev. Henry Houseman will officiate. Burial will be in Keeler cemetery.

Capitola L. Briggs, daughter of Elam D. and Lucy Chapin Briggs was born May 12, 1862 at the old home place in Keeler township where she lived most of her busy life having attended school at the Gregory district and at Dowagiac.

She was noted for perfect deportment and high standing also as a music student. As a home maker, spinning, weaving, quilt making, cheese, butter and we must not forget the soap made with lye drawn from wood ashes and grease saved from odds and ends.

She made clothing, knitted socks — picked the geese and made feather beds and pillows, preserved pork in brine, smoked hams and made sausage, canned fruit and dried apples to make money for her wedding linen.

In the year of 1878 at the age of 16, she was married to Seth L. Fassett and spent a short time at his home in Hamilton a few rods from where the log cabin now stands.

For four years they played for parties every where. Then came Beulah, Bernice, Florence and Hartwell to make up the home orchestra.

It is well remembered if a teacher failed to explain problems at school, Cappy took up the matter at home even writing an essay if necessary.

In later years her vegetable garden was a picture and she often expressed her thoughts in verse.

It was hard for her to endure the changes taking place in everything especially in the world of thought.

In her song she said: "In woman's hand is held a flag as yet but half unfurled, For as of old the hand that rocked the cradle rules the world!"

She did not belong to any church but always spoke of our Blessed Lord as our dearest friend and during her last years said many things we could not understand.

In our poor ways of expressing regard for her, we can only say it is for all eternity.

JAIL FOOD at Benton Harbor seems to be poor fare and Tuesday, the prisoners in felons' row staged a minor rebellion over the food they were served for breakfast — prunes, a roll and coffee and the previous night's supper consisting of three slices of bread and coffee. The noon meal on Tuesday was scheduled to be bake beans and salad according to the Palladium. It seems the inmates plea for better food, now has been given consideration. Some dogs have better balanced meals than provided above. Rasco — our St. Bernard, keeps trim on his diet of milk, scraps, Purina Dog Chow, bones etc. He isn't exactly classed as one of "talking dogs" that appeared on Will Rogers' television show. However, he does make himself known when he is hungry and some of these hot summer days has "asked" to come in the house and share the coolness of the kitchen. He had an admirer Tuesday. A gal from Bloomington, Illinois is visiting her Aunt Grace Hill at Lake of The Woods. She use to have a St. Bernard and when she heard we had one — of course it was just like meeting a long, lost friend. Some time ago in the newspaper there was an account of a St. Bernard who was to be put to death because he attacked a man. Rasco is so very gentle and loves all the attention he gets from his admirers. . . . A ROANOKE, Virginia World-News reporter was given a rough time recently as he tried to get a bit of information for three stories before the deadline. First he called an Air Force major. He was out playing volley ball and not near a phone, but would call later. The reporter called the superintendent of a vacation Bible school for some information. A child said mama was taking a bath but would call later. Then the reporter called a businessman to check a date. The businessman couldn't say because his secretary kept the records and she was then attending a weight-reducing class. Well, of course the three illustrations might be fantastic, I do not know, they were published in the Daily News. At least they well illustrate the problems met in the newspaper field. We have local people, who no doubt say, there's nothing in the Republican, but who also wouldn't give it a news item on their own, and when approached about one — say, no, don't put that in the paper. . . . . WE DON'T think of Michigan possessing many rattlesnakes — these are found in the south, Florida, perhaps? Well, it seems a 14-year-old boy near Muskegon was treated for a rattlesnake bite on his hand suffered while he was picking blueberries. Well, also this week, two ladies on Cedar Street were startled by a snake and one had a hoe for the killing but the handle wasn't long enough to reach it. Well, it so happened a brave soul passed by and did the clabbering. Had just better name the two — Betty and Opal — less others on the street might be suspected. Brave little Eddie got the shovel and buried it in the soft sand. . . . . DECATUR, together with townships of Hamilton and Decatur have agreed to buy a new fire truck. The bidder — Howe Fire Apparatus from Anderson, Indiana was awarded the contract. That company is located in my home town on 22nd Street and it so happens that when I was a youngster — played with the grandchildren of senior partner of the company at that time. We lived in the suburbs and our house was situated on a four acre plot — about half of which was woods and it adjoined the Howe property. . . . . TIME TO plant grass seed. It is said the best time to sow the seed to thicken your lawn turf is August 15 to September 1. Our poor lawn is so burned up. Just hope this last rain will give it strength to show a little green again before the snow falls. There are some very beautiful lawns about town, but have only been kept that way with constant sprinkling. In our case the poor electric pump would really have to work to supply water. Maybe some day we will have the time to tap the water from the channel. . . . . IN SPEAKING of time reminds me of an article I read in which a family spent their vacation at home. By doing this they had time to enjoy their favorite easy chair, slept in their own beds every night didn't have to put up with just any motel, because the early tourist got the choice rooms. There might be something to consider about that kind of a vacation. It seems that many are so busy working, they don't have the time to enjoy their friends or family. . . . . AS NEW sidewalks are laid around town the old cement is broken up and hauled away. Much of it has been used in various ways by local people. See even "Cap", the McWilliams' hound, now has a stone patio in front of his dog house and around his shade tree. . .

Benjamin Hathaway

Anne Dees
Decatur, Mich.
1957

It was the year 1837 — the year which was to see the admission of Michigan as a state into the Federal Union... It was the year 1837 and the Union's economy wasthe verge of the Panic of 1837 which was to be followed by years of severe economic depression.

It was the year 1837 — the year which was to see migration of numbers of American citizens from the eastern seaboard areas to lands of the west to attempt in some way to recoup their fortunes. Among these migrants was the Benjamin Hathaway, Sr. family.

The elder Hathaway had for some years owned and operated a line of canal boats in the state of New York, but for economic reasons he was forced out of business and so he brought his family to Michigan to recover from his financial adverses. Under these circumstances did Little Prairie Ronde become the home of an unrecognized genius, the son of the elder Hathaway carrying the same name as his father — Benjamin. At this time the son must have been about nineteen years old.

Much of the favorable land in Michigan had already been homesteaded. A look at the population in 1837 shows that there were 5,296 residents in Cass County, a number nearly equalled by Berrien County, exceeded by more than a thousand by both Kalamazoo and St. Joseph Counties — yet an impressive lead over Van Buren County which could boast of but 1,262 inhabitants.

Some of these homesteaders were fortunate enough to find land in the "openings" or prairies. This meant no hard work in clearing the land before the plow share could be put to work. Cultivation could begin here without delay. One of the large prairies was Prairie Ronde in Kalamazoo County. A smaller namesake was Little Prairie Ronde situated in Cass County.

The elder Hathaway was pleased with the rich soil of Little Prairie Ronde and acquired 275 acres in Volinia township, where fortunately, tracts of land were still available for homesteading. The land was a strip 160 rods wide on the west side of sections 2 and 11, extending into section 14 at the middle of section 2. This extension was acquired from John Curry who had located on it in 1830.

The elder Hathaway died in 1844 and the son, Benjamin, inherited 110 acres lying half on each side of the road entering the middle of section 11 on the west.

Through hard work and resourcefulness the farm had become a show place by 1866 when Mr. Hathaway was presented an award for his farm on three counts: its handsome surroundings, its well kept appearance, and the excellent way in which it was cultivated. It was considered the finest small farm (160 acres or less) in the entire state. It won second place award in all farms in Michigan, of whatever size.

The Michigan State Agricultural Society which made the award figured the income from the Hathaway farm at $29.60 per acre, which was a third more than any other competing farm. It was over twice the income averaged by the Jervis D. Adams farm in Kalamazoo County which won first place. The committee also made special mention of the thorn hedges (Crataegus Virginiana) which had been planted by Hathaway to take the place of fences.

His knowledge of things horticultural and agricultural caused Mr. Hathaway to be in great demand as a speaker and writer. On different occasions he was called upon to address the Michigan Agricultural Society, the Michigan Pomological Society, and the Michigan Horticultural Society.

In his nursery Hathaway produced new fruits including raspberries and the Michigan strawberry. He developed an improved strain of field corn which became well known as Hathaway's Yellow Dent.

A trip down Hathaway Road as far as the Witness Tree today takes one past the remains of a once proud miniature forest, known in days past as Hathaway Plantation. Here Mr. Hathaway planted in rows every kind of tree native to our state. Many of the older trees have succumbed to the ravages of time, yet Nature has replaced numbers of them with their seedlings. It has been said that when a baby daughter passed away the Hathaways buried her in these woods.

Above all things, Mr. Hathaway was a poet. His first book appeared in 1876 entitled "Art Life and Other Poems" bearing the imprint of H.H. Carter and Company of Boston. In 1891 appeared a poem on the traditions of the Indian called "The League of the Iroquois" bearing the imprint of Donnelly, Gassette, and Lloyd of Chicago. A later book was entitled "The Finished Creation and Other Poems." This appeared in 1892 and was printed by the Arena Publishing Company of Boston.

A neighbor of ours acquired a copy of this last book on September 9th, 1912, when Mrs. Hathaway and daughter Helen gave a party for a group of women. Each guest was presented with a copy of "The Finished Creation" autographed by Mrs. Hathaway. Our neighbor very graciously loaned me her copy to examine.

The volume was graced with a picture of the poet as a frontispiece, made from an engraving by H.B. Haller of New York. It shows him to have been a keen-eyed, handsome man with a look of the poet about him. His hair was worn long, reaching well over his coat collar. His beard was dark and heavy, as was also his mustache.

The volume contains several interesting legends in poetic form, including a Penobscot and a Micmac legend. Also included is a poetic dedication to Michigan University on its 50th anniversary in 1887. In view of the fact that the 100th anniversary is now a thing of the past, the last verse is particularly interesting:

"O, pride and promise of our youthful State!
Build for her children such an Appian Way
As Rome did never know;
Where strong in knowledge, as in virture great,
Shall thousands come and go:
May prouder record than we read to-day
Thy hundredth birthday show."

Mr. Hathaway purchased the type and set up the contents of his own books. He was a typesetter and compositor of no mean ability and when he had the material readied for printing he delivered it in person to the publishing house and oversaw its publication. Copies of his works are genuine collectors' items because of their rarity.

His love of nature, devotion to friends and family, interest in the world around him, and dedication to the best gifts are very evident in his literary works. A favorite pastime was walking to Dowagiac and back at least once a week — and this in spite of the fact that his stable boasted some fine driving horses.

Mr. Hathaway was also an accomplished cooper, supplying his own needs and those of his neighbors for barrels in which to pack their fruits.

A favorite chestnut tree on his farm was designated for a special purpose by the owner. When it reached maturity it was cut and sawed into lumber, then stored with orders that it be reserved until his death and then be made up into a casket. A neighbor carried out these wishes. Patrick Howland who is alive today planed the chestnut lumber.

Another of Mr. Hathaway's wishes which was carried out after his death was his desire to have his body drawn by one of his own teams rather than in a hearse.

The services were held in the Huycktown school and the poet was buried in the Rose Hill cemetery at Nicholsville in 1896.

Forty Years Ago

To-day the paths my infant footsteps pressed,
I thread in stranger guise;
I climb the hills, whose woodland mantled crest
First met my infant eyes;
On grassy mound, in Autumn's paling glow,
I sit and muse, where in olden time
I sat and dreamed-dreams only Youth may know
Oh! dreams sublime,
Dreamed forty years ago.

The spot where stood the home that gave me birth,
With grass is overgrown;
Alone is left of all that ample hearth
One solitary stone.
Ah! since that day, though I have wandered so,
Have seen remotest firesides blaze and shine,
None have I found to match that warmth and glow,
That beam divine
Of forty years ago.

Still stands, as then, the school house old; renewed,
And old again; to me
The same as then upon its benches rude
I conned my A B C;
Still carvings quaint the deck and lintels show
The work of hands beyond their task's employ;
If but by this, the boy to-day, I know
Is as the boy
Of forty years ago.

Last night I sat beside that saucy maid,
The same, yet not the same;
The frosts of time had touched each auburn braid,
But left her heart, her name;
From childhood's years had it been ours to grow,
As we together grew — I questioned Fate, —
Would she, unwedded, still have waited so,
My gentle mate
Of forty years ago?

The comrades of old days — oh! where are they?
Far from their native soil,
Unto what lands gone each his separate way, —
Into what fields of toil?
Some cherished names the marble tablets show,
And some, alas! are fallen more than they,
Some toward a nobler manhood strive and grow
Still, day by day,
As forty years ago.

The vision fades, the scenes of Childhood fly, —
Recedes the Primal Age;
Upon my pen the sunset shadows lie,
My tears despoil the page;
And I full soon, the waiting fields to sow
For harvests new, afar again shall roam;
Once more adieu — the last — I bid thee, O
My Boyhood's Home
Of forty years ago!

And may I, Free from Time's decay and rust,
Still keep Youth's horoscope;
Keep all undimmed my childhood's love and trust,
My childhood's faith and hope;
That at the last when fades Earth's fleeting show, —
Falls round my life the twilight's gathering haze,
A bright Beyond shall beckon, shine and glow,
As in the days
Of forty years ago.

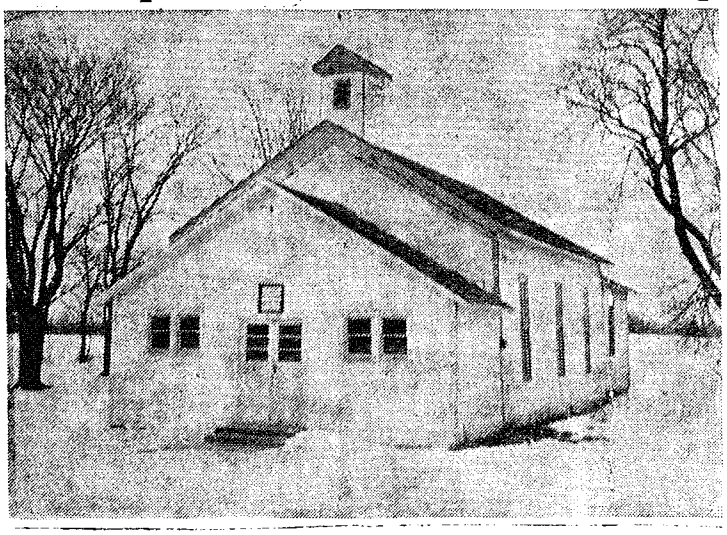
First Baptist Church, Decatur Township



First Baptist Church is located in section 6 of Decatur Township. The following church history was written by Mrs. R. A. Crosby, church clerk.

In 1868 the First Baptist Church of Decatur was established and dedicated by a community of Christian people. During the early life of the church there were about 150 members enrolled. There are two members of the church presently who were children in the early church; Essie Smith and Eve Scoot both of Decatur. They are also the only living survivors of one of the first choirs of the First Baptist Church.

The founders were Isaac Moss, Thomas Winburn, Nathan Lennox, Grief Foster, Joseph Mahoney and Dosen Brown.

The early deacons numbered seven. They were: Isaiah Brown, Dosen Brown, David Moss, W. Scott, Joseph Mahoney, Melon Bradley and Robert Lennox. Mr. Lennox served as deacon for fifty years.

Sunday school superintendents were: Grandville Foster, Mort Stafford, Sam Brown, David Moss, Robert Lennox, Henery Manual and Charlie Evans.

The church still retains the old Bible which holds some historical events. It was presented to the church by Dennis Brown who was a member. During the life of the church the Bible has only been taken out once and that was for reconditioning.

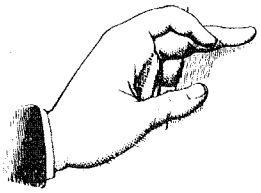
The transfer of the land on which the church stands was made October 31, 1868 from Henry and Helen Lindsley to trustees of the First Baptist Church. The transfer was recorded at Paw Paw, September 19, 1871. The plot of land is nine rods square.

The church building has undergone some changes but some of the old logs still remain.

The present pastor is Rev. Homer W. Cross of Grand Rapids who has been serving since 1949.

Services are held on the following schedule each week: Sunday school, 10:00 a. m. Morning worship, 11:00 a. m. Prayer meeting, Tuesday, 7:30 p. m.

The church owns and operates a farm some three miles from Decatur, raising and cultivating asparagus, grapes and black raspberries.



Leslie Discovers Satire On England in 'Alice' Books

BY CARL E. ZIMMERER.

A wealth of finely drawn allegorical satire buried in Lewis Carroll's "Alice in Wonderland" and "Alice's Adventures Through the Looking Glass" is revealed by Shane Leslie, Irish critic, in an essay in the current issue of "Scrip," Notre Dame literary quarterly. Under the analytical glass of Dr. Leslie the impossible happenings which on their surface have amused generations of youngsters become caricatures of the Oxford movement.

Hitherto Carroll (whose real name was Charles L. Dodgson) has been regarded as ingenious rather than profound and his delightful, whimsical logic and verbal felicities have appealed on their own merit. Carroll was ar Oxford don who lectured on mathematics from 1855 to 1881 and was a disinterested observer of the Oxford movement which swept a number of Anglican clergymen into the Roman Catholic religion.

"Alice in Wonderland" may be a secret history of this movement, Dr. Leslie suggests. Carroll inscribed a greeting on the 1876 edition of the "Looking Glass," which reads: "Some perhaps may blame me for mixing together things grave and gay; others may smile and think it odd that anyone should speak of solemn things at all except in church and on a Sunday."

Alice Is at Oxford.

"Alice, to begin with," Dr. Leslie writes, "may be regarded as the simple Freshman or Everyman who wanders like a sweet and innocent undergraduate in the wonderland of a Victorian Oxford when everybody was religious in some way or other. The white rabbit, whom she immediately meets, is the type of simple English clergyman of the day with his hole fixed like some country rectory. When he takes his watch out of his pocket (a curious proceeding for any rabbit) he strikes a supernatural note immediately."

Once Dr. Leslie has intimated that the scene is the Oxford controversy between high church and low, between Catholic and Protestant, the identification of certain characters is apparent, like the cake (dogma) while Alice eats and grows large; the caterpillar (Oxford philosophy), the mushroom (rationalism), the king and queen of hearts (high churchmen), and the angry queen (house of commons).

The game of croquet is an ecclesiastical debate, continues Dr Leslie, "although a game played with hedgehogs and clamingoes is simple, compared to the complexities of the English house of commons debating the knots of church ritual." The Cheshire cat typifies Cardinal Wiseman, and the word mad may be taken to mean religious through the books; thus the hatter and the March hare symbolize low and high church parsons with their dormouse slumbering between them.

Parallel Follows.

In the "Looking Glass," Tweedledum is the high church; Humpty Dumpty, verbal inspiration; carpenter and walrus, essayists and reviewers; red queen, Archbishop Manning; white queen, Dr. Newman; white king, Dr. Jowett; white knight, Huxley; Tweedledee, low church; red king, Canon Kingsley; red knight, Bishop Wilberforce, and the lion, John Bull.

Dr. Leslie, who is a leading authority on the Oxford movement, closes with: "As a grand finale Alice becomes a queen (shall we say a Catholic?) for she ends by feasting between the red and white queens, Newman and Manning. And for many simple folk this was the end of the Oxford movement, not without a hint of being somewhat distracted by the rivalries and embittered clashes between the two cardinals who were seldom on speaking terms. We suggest that Lewis Carroll had all this and a great deal more at the back of his mind when he wrote his two masterpieces."

THE JOLLY OLD PEDAGOGUE

(Geo. of Arnold in McGuffy's 6th Reader)

'Twas a jolly old pedagogue, long ago,
Tall, and slender, and sallow, and dry;
His form was bent, and his gait was slow,
And his long, thin hair was white as snow,
But a wonderful twinkle shone in his eye;
And he sang every night as he went to bed,
"Let us be happy, down here below;
The living should live, though the dead be dead,"
Said the jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

He taught the scholars the Rule of Three,
Reading, and writing and history, too;
He took the little ones on his knee,
For a kind old heart in his breast had he,
And the wants of the liv'lest child he knew.
"Learn while you're young, he often said,
"There is much to enjoy down here below;
Life for the living, and rest for the dead!"
Said the jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

He lived in the house by the hawthorn lane,
With roses and woodbine over the door;
His rooms were quiet, and neat, and plain,
But a spirit of comfort there held reign,
And made him forget he was old and poor.
"I [illegible] little," he often said;
"And my friends and relatives here below
Won't migrate over me when I am dead,"
Said the jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

He sat at his door one midsummer night,
After the sun had sunk in the west,
And the lingering beams of golden light
Made his kindly old face look warm and bright,
While the odorous night winds whispered "Rest!"
Gently, gently, he bowed his head;
The angels were waiting for him, I know;
[illegible] of his happiness, [illegible]
The jolly old pedagogue, long ago!

THIS WEEK

The Republican has two other scrapbooks, one that was kept by the Mallory sisters and the other by Mrs. Hattie Roberts, and we are thinking of opening another column in the Republican, entitled, "The Scrapbook."

Loslie Galehouse brought the Republican a clipping from a newspaper showing a picture of Decatur in the stagecoach days. It was taken in the late sixties or early seventies.

Decatur was the terminal of the stage line operated between Decatur and South Haven by Major William Graves of Niles. The stages, drawn by four horses, passed through Bangor, Breedsville and Lawrence, and brought express packages and mail from the wilderness towns to Decatur, their shipping point on the Michigan Central Railroad.

The general stage office was in the Galloway House in Decatur, later the Duncombe Hotel.

The buildings shown in the picture were destroyed by one of the fires which several times wiped out portions of the business district. On the front of one of the two story buildings is a wooden boot advertising the boot and shoe business of John Shaad who moved here from Three Rivers in 1865.

There is nothing in the clipping to show definitely what paper it was clipped from, but it was probably a Kalamazoo paper of about a half century ago.

It had been preserved by Millie Watson, an aunt of Mrs. Gallhouse. The Watsons were early residents of East Valley.

Next Monday, February 12, is the birthday of Abraham Lincoln, and a legal holiday in Michigan.

We would like to print a story about Lincoln every week, but lacking the time and space to do this we bring one out whenever possible.

This story of the Emancipator, is taken from Lincoln Lore, published by the Lincoln National Life Foundation, Dr. Louis A. Warren, editor. It is a story also of Sojourner Truth of whom the Republican has spoken occasionally in this column.

She was a colored evangelist, a wonderful woman. She once spoke in Decatur for the W. C. T. U., and we have printed the story of that outstanding event in our memory. Her home in later years was in Battle Creek.

It was on October 29, 1864, less than a week before the election, that Sojourner Truth visited President Lincoln, at Washington, and we have her account of the visit in a letter which she wrote a few days later on November 17th.

"It was about 8 o'clock a. m., when I called on the president. Upon entering his reception room we found about a dozen persons waiting, among them two colored women. I had quite a pleasant time waiting until he was disengaged, and enjoyed his conversation with others; he showed as much kindness and consideration to the colored persons as to the whites—if there was any difference, more. One case was that of a colored woman who was sick and likely to be turned out of her house on account of her inability to pay her rent. The president listened to her with much attention, and spoke to her with kindness and tenderness. He said he had given so much he could give no more but told her where to go and get the money, and asked Mrs. C—n to assist her, which she did.

Sojourner Truth visited Decatur once. It was on a summer day in 1880, when, if we remember correctly, she was 109 years old. She was the guest of Mrs. Henry Upton, wife of the Superintendent of schools, and she spoke before the 'White Ribboners' in the old Presbyterian church in the evening.

Mrs. Upton furnished several small boys, of whom the writer was one, with cow bells and following her instructions we went up and down the streets that afternoon ringing the bells and shouting as loudly as we could, "Go and hear Sojourner Truth tonight!"

Our pay was tickets of admission, and we were there, on the front seat, as close to Sojourner as we could get.

There were not many paid admissions that evening but to see and hear Sojourner Truth was well worth the ten cents asked.

As we remember her she was tall and thin and stately and dressed in black with a small black bonnet resting gently on the top and back of her head and tied with ribbons under her chin.

She was graceful and gentle and her voice was soft and sweet,—a gracious and courteous but dignified old, old lady. It almost seemed as though she had come from the world beyond to tell her small congregation of the glories of the heavenly kingdom.

Born into slavery, brought up in ignorance and self educated under difficulties she came with a message from on high to a sympathetic President to set her enslaved race free. President Lincoln did not need the plagues as did Pharoah before acceding to the request, to "Let us chillun go."

We all are in slavery more or less, blacks as well as whites, and even the proclamation of the President seems insufficient to break the bonds.

A higher power must be appealed to to loose the chains that bind humanity now, and the assurance that the appeal will be heeded is given in the words of the Saviour, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

Then—

"Steal away, steal away,
Steal away to Jesus.
Steal away, steal away home,
I ain't got long to stay here."

Shall it be another Roosevelt in the White House or four years more of Hoover?

Teddy once spoke of his fourth cousin as a maverick in the great family of Roosevelt, and Franklin mentally reflected, "I'll show you."

Franklin has been true to the Roosevelt traditions in indomitable courage and forcefulness. He has overcome the ravage of disease, he has won the highest political honor in the gift of his home state and now waits the call of the nation to the exalted seat attained by his peerless relative.

Teddy was wrong. Franklin is no maverick.

Upset - minded Decatur High Poised for Mighty Cassopolis

Raiders Display New Spirit in Watervliet Game

The mighty Cassopolis Rangers, considered to be kings of the Little Eight football conference, will try to make the upset-minded Decatur High School Raiders their fourth victim of the season Friday night at Raiders Field.

Cassopolis has scored 98 points in three games, allowing only six for their opponents. The single touchdown was made by Berrien Springs on a fumble.

Cassopolis, however, is expected to find the Raiders spirited and ready. A week ago, Decatur crushed Watervliet 25-6 in a game which saw the Raiders display new spark and aerial adeptness.

The passing combination was halfback Bob Allbritton to end Dick Ives. Allbritton fired two touchdown passes against Watervliet. He also threw the touchdown pass which tied the score against Mattawan in the season's opener.

Allbritton also accounted for one of the other two markers against Watervliet with a one-yard plunge. Wingback Jim Narregan scored on an eight-yard run.

Watervliet's only tally came on a four-yard smash by fullback Roger Hardy.

Decatur and Watervliet were tied 6-6 at halftime. Then the Raiders returned to the field and took charge. They scored 19 points as they limited Watervliet to a mere 39 yards.

Decatur picked up 183 yards on the ground and 88 in the air for a total of 271 yards. The Panthers made 174 yards rushing and 60 in the air, giving them a total of 234.

The Raiders tossed seven passes and completed three. Watervliet went to the air 12 times and completed three.

Decatur entered the Panthers game in the best physical condition of the season.

Head Coach Noble Arent said apparently there were no serious injuries. He expected to have the squad in top shape again for Cassopolis.

"They are fast and aggressive — but not big," Coach Arent said of Cassopolis.

Cassopolis' offense is similar in style to the Wing-T of the Raiders.

The Rangers have downed Marcellus, Berrien Springs, and last week, they buried the St. Joseph Ponies under an avalanche touchdown, 52-0.

Coach Arent took advantage of the winning edge Friday at Watervliet to provide some game experience for freshmen and sophomores. He cleared the bench as his Raiders piled up the yardage.

Though the Raiders face the Cass game as underdogs, they indicated last Friday there is plenty of power available once it is generated.

Why We Have a 'Labor Day'

Labor Day can be variously defined as: the end of summer; the beginning of the school year; a national traffic jam; or simply an excuse for a long weekend away from the office.

But the founder of the holiday, Peter J. McGuire, conceived it as a tribute to "the industrial spirit, the great vital force of every nation."

In 1882, McGuire, a leader in the Knights of Labor, proposed that a day be set aside to honor the working man. He suggested the first Monday in September, since it came almost midway between Independence Day and Thanksgiving Day.

The Central Labor Union of New York adopted his proposal and held the first Labor Day celebration on September 5. Shortly after, the Knights of Labor voted for an annual celebration and in 1884, the Federation of Organized Trades and Labor Unions of the United States and Canada voted to make the celebration national.

The first state to make Labor Day a legal holiday was Oregon, in 1887, according to The World Book Encyclopedia. In 1894, Congress made Labor Day a national holiday.

DEATH OF SISTER ADELAIDE

Sister Mary Adelaide, a member of the order of the Sisters of St. Joseph, died at Borgess Hospital last Friday evening. She had been hospitalized since late last spring.

Sister Adelaide, the former Hazel Murphy of Decatur, entered Nazareth December 8, 1903, was clothed in the religious habit on March 19, 1904, and pronounced her perpetual vows July 2, 1911.

She served for a time as a music teacher at St. Augustine High School, and as superior at St. Joseph's, both in Kalamazoo.

She also taught at Nazareth, at parochial schools in Detroit, and Bunker Hill, Michigan.

She is survived by a sister, Sister M. Imelda, S.S.J. Funeral services were held Monday at 10 a.m. at Nazareth's Holy Family Chapel. Burial was in Gate of Heaven Cemetery.

The Poets' Corner

IF LOVE IS THERE, IT'S HOME

It may be a cottage, humble and small,
Or it may be a mansion, grand and tall,
It may be a shack with the roof tumbling down,
Or it may be a farmhouse, weathered and brown,
But if love is there, it's home!
It may be nestled where pine trees sway,
Or it may stand close to some broad highway,
It may be blanketed in drifts of white snow,
Or bathed in the summer sun's bright glow,
But if love is there, it's home!
It may be a place on the boulevard,
With a terraced garden and a beautiful yard,
It may be a tent by the side of a stream,
Where a tired family vacation and dream,
But if love is there, it's home!
If, each night some eager husband returns
To his beloved hearth where the fire of love burns,
Or some weary father counts each moment long
Until he can return to his own merry throng,
Love is there, and indeed, 'tis home!

MAN IN GRAY PLAYS HIS TRUMPET

Harriet Eleanor Williams
1143 East 65th St., Chicago 37.

I recall the ancient town,
one lone, straggling street.
Chill November, eve of storm;
gray-toned, sullen sky,
and the town folk huddled close in the sharpened sleet listening to that old man play.
Radio was then unknown,
phonographs were rare,
so his trumpet spelled romance
with its martial stir.
Scarcely did he glance at them, seeming unaware of the shouts and coins they tossed.
I could visualize his youth,
in that tragic time,
blowing reveille at dawn,
mournfully retreat,
for his battered company—

brave they were, sublime—marching, plodding, to defeat.

Dear Mr. Moulton:

We have not given much thought to the brave men who fought on the other side, during the Rebellion, hence this poem.

Harriet Williams.

Shining Memories Are Recalled During The Twilight Hours

She Scratches Autobiography Before Death

Mrs. Fred Paul, nearly blind and scarcely able to hold a pencil, wrote this autobiography shortly before she died in the Cass county hospital two months ago.

The Volinia woman reflected back on 79 years of life. Her husband, almost 90 now, lives alone in Volinia.

Mrs. Paul wrote:

One bright sunny day on May 13, 1880, I, a daughter was born to Emma Jane Benner and George Alfred Norton. I weighed 4½ pounds. The lady attending my mother, a rather large woman slipped her ring off and over my wrist. At the time of my birth, my parents lived in Elbridge Township, Oceana County. My mother was Dutch descent; my father was English, Scots, Irish and Tonawanda Indian. (My grandfather Norton's mother was half Indian named Ann Clark.)

I was the oldest of three children born of this union. John Alfred was born September 15, 1885; Mary Pamelia was born August 14, 1883. I was a sickly child, always crying but with mother's good care I managed to live.

Father died very suddenly at the age of 32 years, leaving mother to raise three little children. About three years later she married John Swisher. Our own father couldn't have been better to us. A son, Neil Benner Swisher, was born to them on April 2, 1896.

At the age of four years I started to school. I don't remember how long I went but only 2 or 3 weeks, I think. They were getting me started to go regular. I remember at one entertainment, I was too tired to stand up on the platform so I sat down on it to speak my piece. Aunt Eva scolded me but I just said I was too tired to stand up.

One day our school was almost surrounded by a forest fire. Dad came to the front door. I took my books, climbed on his back and he took me out. The burning pines just crackled in our ears but I was not afraid; I thought it was fun. Mother had our clothing all tied in a sheet ready to leave our home but we lived among birch trees which did not burn so easily and our home was saved. The school house was burned to the ground.

Once on the way to school, when I was living with Grandma Benner, I went sliding down a hill with some other children. Men were hauling logs and told us to keep out of their way. They said they would not stop for our play. We didn't stop and when we saw that they weren't going to stop, we had to drop off the bridge into the Pentwater River. I didn't dare go back to Grandma's so I went on to school. I stood behind the stove to get dry.

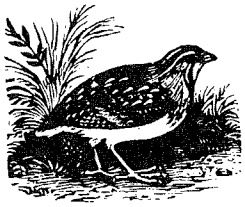
At twelve years of age, I finished the first eight grades and from there entered High School. I moved home and had one uneventful year.

In 1909, I married Fred G. Paul, a widower with four children. One year after marriage, I had a beautiful daughter born on the 8th of July, 1910. She is a registered nurse and a teacher of partially seeing children.

I taught school twenty-four years. Salaries were not what they are now. My beginning salary was only $20.00 a month. The older teachers were only getting $18.00. My largest salary was $100.00 a month.

I had many experiences teaching school; one of the boys had always run the school. I told him to come up front but he didn't and was bigger than I. A sharp point of a pin brought him out flying. One school was Indian. I had to forbid them talking the Indian language on the school ground because I couldn't understand what they said. They liked to swear in Indian.

I liked teaching very much. I taught the Warner School when I could hardly walk across the road. It was located across the road from where I lived. From then on I became so lame I could not get around very well. At the age of 78 years I am a patient at the Cass county Hospital.



Captain DeWitt's Body Recovered from East River — Tributes Paid to Famed Pilot by All Who Knew Him

No doubt the greatest tragedy that has hit our community is that of the recent death of Captain Al DeWitt.

Since word was received by his wife very early last Wednesday morning — we have read many accounts of the American Airlines Electra that went down in the East River as it was making an instrument landing at LaGuardia Field in New York.

Dr. Copeland was called to be Mrs. DeWitt shortly after the word was received. During the night they were in constant touch with New York and maintained their hopes that he would be listed as one of the survivors. In the early hours of the morning they were joined in the all-night vigil by Mrs. Tony Notzon and Mrs. Tom Brucks. However, hope was abandoned and it seemed a positive fact that he was among the casualties as only three crew members were listed as survivors along with five of the 68 passengers.

The flight engineer, Warren E. Cook (a frequent visitor with his family at the DeWitts and known as "Cooky") said he had no idea the plane was in danger until it plunged into the water. Cook had charge of the mechanical performance of the plane according to an American Airlines spokesman — "particularly the power of the engines."

Mr. Cook told investigators that they were making an instrument landing and everything seemed normal — had no idea they were so close to the water. As the plane hit — he blacked out and does not remember anything until he came to in the cold water — yet still groggy, he climbed on a piece of wreckage — a wing — saw another fellow floundering around in the river and pulled him on. Cook described their situation in the 38-degree weather as — "black, wet and cold." Soon they were picked up by a tug boat.

Divers battled savage East River tides Thursday to raise the wreckage of the jet-prop airliner.

Swirling river currents plus rain and winds up to 40 m. p. h. hampered the search for other bodies and gave rise to fears that some of them might be swept miles out into Long Island sound.

However, Saturday night we learned that a total of 28 bodies had been recovered — one of which was that of Captain DeWitt. At this time it was officially reported that the nose section and cockpit had been brought to the surface with the body of the trapped pilot — Captain DeWitt — inside.

Since the plane went down — piloted by the veteran pilot, who would have been with the Airlines 30 years in June, the entire area had been stunned.

Captain and Mrs. DeWitt had lived at the farm on route 2 for 15 years in the stately Colonial-style house. They preferred living near our small town to the city and he did not mind the drive into the airport for his scheduled flights.

Captain DeWitt liked to "putter" around on the farm and was very adept in the remodeling of the house. He was a lover of animals — enjoyed their horses and the dogs. Many of their evenings at home were spent in eating popcorn which was shared with the dogs and Al lounging on the davenport watching TV. He also got a lot of enjoyment from his organ, according to Mrs. DeWitt.

Al was a regular visitor on Main Street on his days off and by his friendly ways made many friends — even though they were only speaking acquaintances.

American Airlines officials said the Captain was "one of the world's most experienced pilots." He was the line's Chief Pilot in Chicago — had flown 28,000 hours or approximately 7 million miles on every type of equipment used by the company since 1929. He served as assistant Chief Pilot for the airlines in New York from 1947 to 1952.

A CAB regional investigator remarked "The only thing we are sure of that there is no indication of what caused the accident."

Another said — "If the proper equipment had been installed at LaGuardia, chances are 100 to 1 that the tragedy wouldn't have happened."

A spokesman for the Port Authority said the federal government is responsible for the delay in safety improvements at the field.

This was the first crash of a U. S. made jet since they were put into commercial service last November. This plane had been in service only since January 25. It was 104 feet long, had a speed of 410 mph and a crusing altitude of 25,000 to 30,000 feet. The Electra cost two million dollars and was one of the newest types of commercial liners.

The American Airline new Electras are equipped with two altimeters — one for each pilot and it is reported that flight crews training in the Electras repeatedly had misread them and had protested so violently to the operations chiefs that American had planned to install a third altimeter — one of the older types — in the center instrument panel.

One pilot at Midway said "Until further investigation brings out how the plane hit the water, or if there was some definite structural or equipment failure before the crash, it doesn't make any sense speculating. — A lot of guys here at Midway knew DeWitt and all we can say is, "They don't come any better."'

As investigators looked into all phases of what could have caused the crash — they said "The only thing we're sure of is that there is no indication of what caused the accident."

The following letter was mailed to Captain DeWitt on February 2 and was written by Mr. Edward J. Knoska:

Dear Captain DeWitt:

"Congratulations! Enclosed is a clipping from the "Suburban Life" of LaGrange which I thought might go into your scrap book. I have asked the "Life" people for the cut. Mrs. Kinney might want to use it in the Decatur Republican."

He then explains to Al who he is and that they have a week end farm on Pond Lily Lake Road, four miles west of Decatur.

"My family and I thought the "Republican" article, about your trip to Chicago the day you flew the Electra to New York, intensely interesting. We wondered who wrote it. Our own experience in getting through to Chicago in bad weather, against time, have been similar to those described in the story.

"Again, congratulations and Good Luck in all your future endeavors."

Captain DeWitt attended Lyons Township High School and Crane Jr. College in LaGrange. He studied mechanical engineering and during his school days was active in track and band.

He was a charter member of La Grange Post American Legion and during World War I service he spent time as a motorcycle dispatch rider. He was also a member of the Caterpillar Club, an organization made up of men who parachuted from airplanes in the early days of aviation.

Captain DeWitt learned to fly in Elkhart and South Bend and piloted a Loening amphibian, nicknamed "Duck" for Thompson Aeronautial Co., in his first commercial venture. The service was between Detroit and Cleveland. The Thompson Company was a forerunner of American Airlines.

During World War II, Captain DeWitt was a flight instructor in a school run by American under military contract at Midway Airport.

Survivors besides his wife, the former Gertrude Stock, are a twin brother, Rollin, of Highland Park, Ill., and a sister, Mrs. Margaret Mersereau of Rantoul, Ill.

Funeral service were held at 2 p. m. at the Emmanuel Episcopal church in La Grange and burial was in Parkholm Cemetery.

THE CIGARETTE

Of all the things that man has made,
That brings to some, regret,
'Tis that confounded stinking thing,
They call the cigarette.

When once they form the habit,
It makes them fume and fret,
If they are forced to go without,
One little cigarette.

No matter where they chance to be,
They know no etiquette,
For they are always puffing on,
A nasty cigarette.

In street car tram or railroad train,
"No Smoking" signs are set,
Yet some will never heed the rule,
And smoke a cigarette.

In public buildings 'tis the same,
No fresh air can you get,
For some one thinks he has to smoke,
A dirty cigarette.

Why will men be so selfish,
Their neighbor to forget,
When they know that some detest,
Smoke, from a cigarette.

Since women have their "equal rights,"
They too are prone to get,
The habit that some men have got,
And smoke the cigarette.

Why should they think that it will help,
Some higher standard set,
The younger set will follow up,
And puff the cigarette.

Why can't men see the folly,
And from the habit get,
They all would be more healthy,
Without the cigarette.

If men could see the danger,
By which they are beset,
Of losing mind and morals,
They'd quit the cigarette.

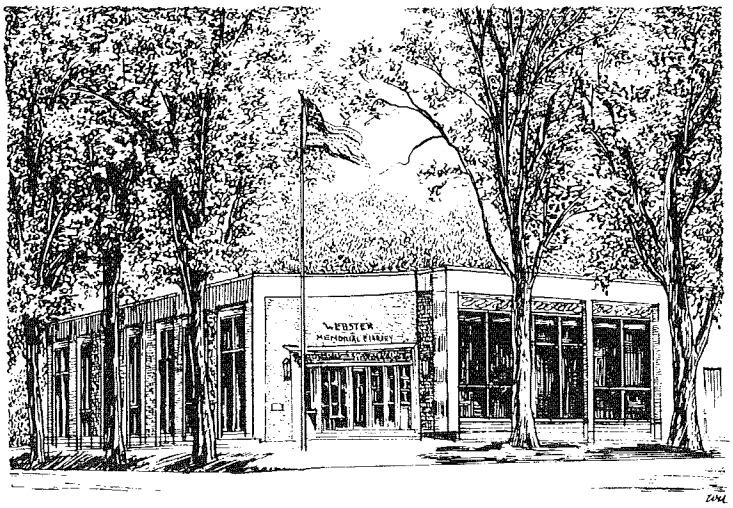
Walls Begin Skyward Climb At Decatur's New Library



Webster Memorial Library Decatur, Mich.

Walls began taking shape this week at the construction site of Decatur's new 75,000 volume Webster Memorial Library.

The combination brick and stone structure, which will cost more than $250,000 to complete, is expected to be finished by early next year.

Frank Kunde, supt. of the job for Gosnick Construction Company, described the building as 'a honey'.

Webster Memorial will house the county mobile library along with Decatur's library. The building has been designed with loading garage to facilitate movement of the county books.

The building contract was for $216,000. Furnishings and books will add another $50,000 to the price.

The late Norman E. Webster, a New York city accountant who spent his younger years in Decatur, provided for the library in his estate which reached nearly a half million dollars.

No more than 60 per cent of the money can be used for construction. The remaining 40 per cent is for operation.

General plans at the present call for the county library board to absorb 50 per cent of the operating cost. The local library board and the Webster trust will split the remaining 50 per cent evenly.

The building will contain a stack room, small auditorium, projection room, kitchenette, along with a Webster room in honor of the donor.

Webster Memorial library is expected to be one of the most beautiful in Southwestern Michigan when it is completed.

Trustees for the Webster fund are Earl E. Copley, Lyle Parker, and M. J. McWilliams of Decatur, and Henry Horne, of New York, a business associate of the late Mr. Webster.

A builder builded a temple;
He wrote with care and skill; - -
Pillars and groins and arches
Were fashioned to meet his will;
And men said when they saw its beauty:
"It shall never know decay.
Great is thy skill, O Builder,
Thy fame shall endure for aye."

A teacher builded a temple;
She wrought with skill and care; --
Forming each pillar with patience,
Laying each stone with prayer.
None saw the inceasing effort;
None knew of the marvelous plan;
For the temple the teacher builded
Was unseen by the eyes of man.

Gone is the builder's temple; --
Crumbled into the dust, --
Pillar and groin and arches
Food for consuming rust;
But the temple the teacher builded
Shall endure while the ages roll; --
For that beautiful, unseen temple
Was a child's immortal soul.

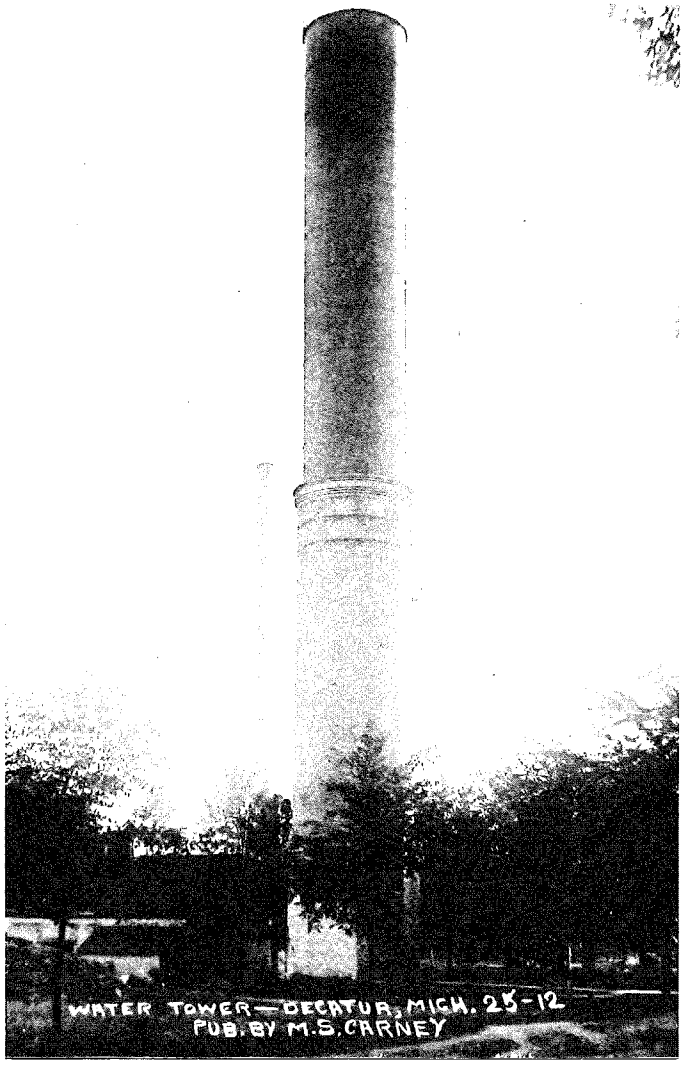
Water Tower Needs $7,000 Repair Job



Long Beams Are Honeycombed with Big Rust Spots

The water tower will need a $7,000 repair job sometime within the next eight months to keep it from collapsing, Councilman Ezra Planck told the village board Monday night.

An inspection of the tower disclosed that the six principal beams were "honeycombed" with rust, Councilman Planck said.

A representative of the Greenleaf Tank corp., of Cherry Valley, Ill., made the examination. He gave Planck an estimate on the cost.

Councilman Planck said that the price could vary $1,000 either way.

Councilmen eyed next spring as a possible time for the project. Meanwhile, Clerk Harry Schmidt was authorized to obtain information from at least one other company on the repair work.

Shavehead School Request Prompts History Research

By RUBY CONE
Tribune Correspondent

UNION, Mich. — A request by students at Shavehead School in 1957 for a story of Porter Twp., started Mrs. Claude Bowman researching the history of the township.

She spent the past winter inscribing a large map of the township with details from the history she has written. These include the trails traveled by Chief Shavehead, the sites of two Indian sugar camps and three Indian mounds. Also shown are the Robbins Lake pits, the origin of which has never been determined, which are obviously man-made but apparently built before the time of the Indians.

The Bowman home on Teasdale Lake Rd. overlooks a hill which Mrs. Bowman says is one of the highest points in the area, and the place where Chief Shavehead sent signals to the rest of the tribe.

Presented to Society

The history, which was written in 1958, was presented to the Cass County Historical Society, of which the Bowmans are charter members, and describes in detail evidences found in the township indicating man lived here thousands of years ago.

One of these was the Garden Beds, usually three to five acres in size and about 18 inches high, planted in parallel rows and blocks like modern vegetable gardens.

In 1941, Mrs. Bowman started compiling data for a genealogy of her mother's family. The project took 20 years and was printed in 1963. Copies of it are in the Library of Congress and the New York City Library, and she has a letter written to her by the head librarian of Congress, commending her for thorough research and for having all facts verified by references.

She was able to trace the family back to William the Conquerer, and discovered John and Priscilla Alden also were her ancestors.

The ancestors of the George Hebron family, close friends of the Bowmans, were friends of Mrs. Bowman's family in England 200 years ago and fought together in the Battle of Waterloo in 1566.

The Bowmans live on Shavehead Prairie Farm about two miles north of U.S. 12.

Mrs. Bowman will speak on township history at the April 25 meeting of the Tri Lakes Improvement Assn.

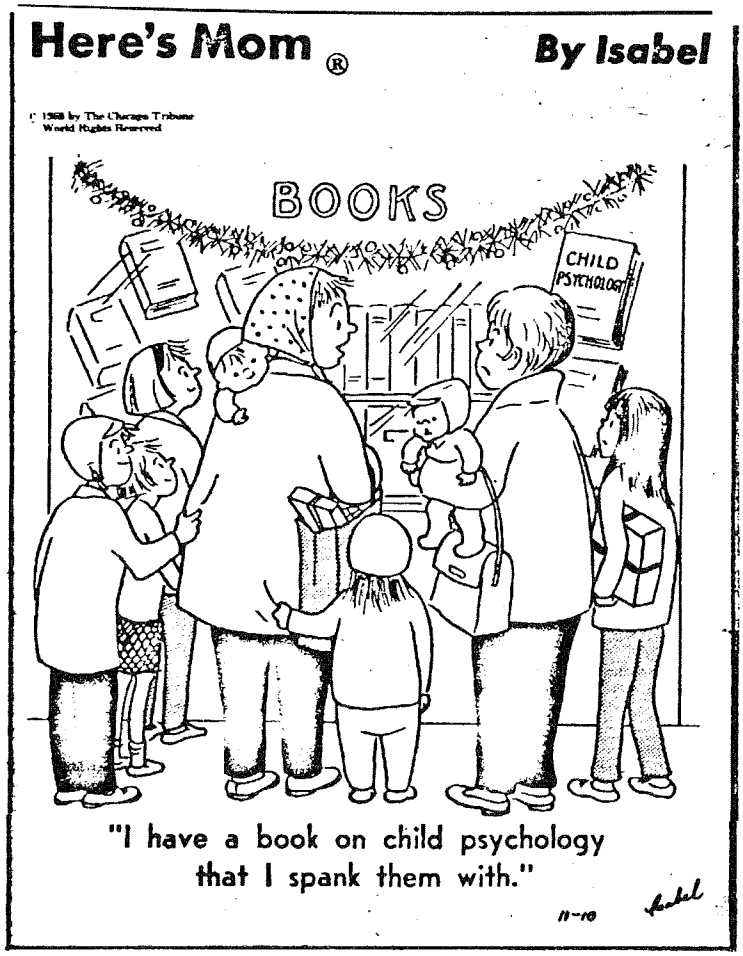
SCHOOL DAYS

Nothing to do, Nellie Darling,
Nothing to do you say,
Let's take a trip on memory's ship,
Back to the by-gone days.
Sail to the old village school house,
Anchor outside the school door,
Look in and see, there's you and there's me,
A couple of kids once more.

CHORUS

School days, school days, dear old golden rule days,
Readin' and 'ritin' and 'rithmetic,
Taught to the tune of a hickory stick,
You were my queen in calico,
I was your bashful barefoot beau,
And you wrote on my slate, I love you Joe,
When we were a couple of kids.

'Member the hill, Nellie Darling,
And the oak tree that grew on its brow?
They've built forty stories upon that old hill
And the oak's an old chestnut now,
'Member the meadows so green dear,
So fragrant with clover and maize,
Into new city lots and preferred business plots,
They've cut them up since those days.



Highways Follow Routes Blazed by Indians

Early explorers and settlers in Michigan adopted many things from Indian culture, including the canoe, moccasins and snowshoes. But of all the red man's contributions, the most useful and important were the foot trails that he blazed through the wilderness of the state's two peninsulas.

These paths, trod smooth by moccasin-clad feet for centuries, were located on high ground along watersheds and streams. Today, vacation and business traffic flows along many modern highways following these ancient Indian trails.

Then, as now, the trails served a variety of purposes, connecting major villages and leading to the best hunting and fishing areas.

Prior to the white man's arrival, the narrow paths were wide enough only for single file travel. When trappers and explorers began to use them, the pathways widened as bulky loads carried by pack horses broke off branches and bushes bordering the trails.

Settlers then moved into Michigan and their ox-drawn wagons opened the trails still further, but the paths bore faint resemblance to anything that today would be called a road.

The evolutionary process from woodland trail to superhighway was a long one, but the fact that many of Michigan's main arterial highways follow the ancient Indian routes attests to the red man's skill in selecting the best path.

Best known of the Michigan Indian trails was the Sauk Trail — in use centuries before Columbus discovered the new world. Sauk, Chippewa, Fox and Potowatomi were among the tribes that traveled this primitive thoroughfare. The first improvement of the trail to handle wheeled traffic was largely the result of Father Gabriel Richard's efforts to develop a surveyed route from Detroit to Chicago. When a straight-line route proved impractical, it was decided to follow the well-marked Sauk Trail. Today's highway US-112 is a direct descendant of that trail.

The St. Joseph Trail, running west from Detroit to St. Joseph, has become a modern expressway, US-12 (Interstate 94). Another east-west route was the Grand River Trail to Grand Rapids — now designated at US-16 (Interstate 96). The Saginaw Trail, extending northward from Detroit, is closely approximated by today's US-10.

From the city of Saginaw, the famous Mackinac Trail was the Indian route to the northermost tip of the lower peninsula. Here the five-mile-wide Straits of Mackinac, separating the two peninsulas, was an insurmountable obstacle for the Indians, but a Chippewa legend foretold of the day when a brave would fell a huge pine tree that would span the waters.

The new Mackinac Bridge realized this Indian dream and it serves to connect the modern counterparts of two old Indian routes — the Mackinac Trail and the Sault-Green Bay Trail across the upper peninsula.

Nearly all major highways in the upper peninsula follow ancient Indian courses.

These are only examples of the many instances where modern highways have followed the lead of Indian foot trails that laced Michigan's wilderness centuries ago.

Retiring After 15 Years School Board Secretary

Lisle Howe is retiring following 15 years as secretary to the Decatur school board. He is the only member leaving the board.

Mr. Howe was elected to the board in 1945 and was installed as secretary, a job which he has carried each year he served. He stated that in leaving, "I'll miss the work, and will be glad to help out any time if I am needed."

Mr. Howe also gave as his reason for leaving the board the fact that he no longer has children in school, and is at present employed out of town, which may become inconvenient with the school expansion program that is now under consideration.

Mr. Howe has served under three superintendents in his tenure of office — Frank Dodge, who is now at Bad Axe in the Thumb area of Michigan; Willis Bates who died two years ago, and the present superintendent, Wayne Hellenga.

Mr. and Mrs. Howe observed their twenty-fifth wedding anniversary Wednesday.

In Alma College "Who's Who"

Fourteen Alma College students will be listed in the 1960-61 edition of "Who's Who Among American College and University Students."

Among these is Mildred Howe, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Clayton F. Howe, 318 Delaware. Millie, a junior, is the managing editor of "The Almanian," the campus newspaper, and a Resident Advisor in Gelston Hall. She also holds an Alma College Honors Scholarship. Also included in the listing will be Roger Arbury, Detroit junior; Harold Cook, Marshall junior; David Ebert, Birmingham senior; Linus Frevel, Midland senior; Marilyn Henry, Holly senior; Carolyn Keyes, St. Clair Shores senior; Harold Kirkpatrick, Glens Falls, N. Y., senior; and Shima Murakami, Tokyo, Japan junior.

The list concludes with Mary Onapu, Frankenmuth senior; Michael Pritchard, Milford junior; Lyndon Salathiel, Pontiac senior, David L. Smith, Charlotte senior; and Nancy Vogan, Saginaw senior.

These students were nominated by the Student Council and by the college faculty for outstanding service to the school as well as for academic superiority.

Certificates of honor will be presented to them at the annual Honors Convocation in the spring.

Community Chest Drive Kick-off Monday, Oct. 31

Workers for the Decatur-Hamilton Community Chest Drive will kick-off the 1960 campaign Oct. 31. The quota set for this year's drive has been set at $3,600.

The volunteer workers are asking cooperation of all to make this year's campaign a success.

One local group that will again be aided through the Community Chest is the Camp Fire Girls Association.

The purpose of Camp Fire is to perpetuate the spiritual ideals of the home; to stimulate and aid in the formation habits that make for health and character.

It serves girls in three age groups — the seven-year-old Blue Birds, the ten-year-old Camp Fire Girls, and the Horizon Club for ninth grade through high school age.

The organization was founded on the theory that character is formed predominantly during the leisure hours. Camp Fire offers a wide range of activities that are both fun and character building.

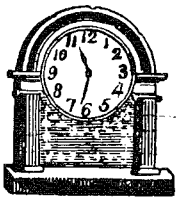
The members are encouraged to take active part in community affairs, to respect the rights of others and to obey laws.

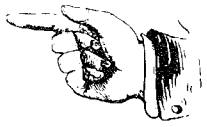
The local organization has been active in the community for a period of ten years, and has been incorporated since March of this year.

There are now 86 Blue Birds and Camp Fire Girls under the leadership of Mrs. Noble Arent, Mrs. Max Laskovy, Mrs. Mahranka, Mrs. Myrkle, Mrs. Sellus, Mrs. Martin Mang, Mrs. Baldwin, Mrs. Burton Houtman, Mrs. Orr, Mrs. McLeese, Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Koops.

Sponsors of these groups include the Altar Society, Maccabees, the Mothers Club, Womens Society, W.S.C.S., Study Club, V.F.W. Auxiliary and Eastern Star.

The girls earned $360 for the organization during the recent candy sale. This amount makes up 50 per cent of the budget for the program for the year.





A BIG 'BOO BOO' EVERY 100 YEARS

A boxy old clock in a rural Decatur home is slowly ticking toward its second big "boo boo."

In another 40 years, the clock (which is equipped with a mechanical calendar) will record a leap year.

And as bachelor gals know, leap year skips a beat every 100 years.

The clock is owned by George Lindsley, television dealer and repairman. It has been in his family since shortly after the civil war.

"It keeps good time," Lindsley commented.

It is called a perpetual calendar. It has a regular face that tells the minute and hour.

In addition, it has another face which gives the viewer the month and date.

The clock is so mechanically well-designed that it will even record the 29th of February every four years.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph McClintock of Decatur purchased the clock from Hawk's jewelry store in 1870. The McClintocks were foster parents of Lindsley's mother.

Mrs. Lindsley received the clock and then passed it on to her son.

Lindsley said he believed the clock has run almost continuously since it was purchased. It requires winding once every seven days.

The only money spent on repairs was for the purchase of a weight cord.

OUR POLITICAL POSTAL SERVICE

What we need in Congress, apparently is a greater number of competent mathematicians. This conclusion is forced by Rep. Mead, of New York, chairman of the House Postoffice Committee.

"Instead of 13 billion pieces of first class mail," Mr. Mead is quoted as saying, "reports will show that the number of pieces mailed between July 1, 1932, and June 30, 1933, will be about 8 billion. This means a loss of $100,000,000 on the 2-cent rate."

Mr. Mead figures that the postoffice has lost 5 billion pieces, which at 2 cents would have brought in $100,000,000. The multiplication is correct. The conclusion is not.

If the postal service had handled 13 billion pieces at the 2-cent rate, it would have earned $260,000,000. According to Mr. Mead, it will handle 8 billion at a 3-cent rate, which therefore will bring in $240,000,000. The loss is not $100,000,000, but $20,000,000. Moreover, as Mr. Mead admits a great deal of former first-class traffic has been diverted to other classes, thus augmenting the revenue from them.

Nevertheless, Mr. Mead is right in declaring that the 3-cent postage act was a mistake. Congress, with its experience in monkeying with the mail rates without expert guidance of which, of course, under the political control of the post office, there is none—should have known better. Not long ago it drove away a very large amount of traffic by boosting the second-class rates much it was cheaper for publishers to ship other delivery systems, and its [illegible] order rates [illegible] these services have lost much of its value they had. Those rates were all increased under the [illegible] idea that each service must be made to pay its own way. Then Congress jumped in another direction, and decided that first-class mail, which not only was paying its own way but covering the deficits of several other services, should be milked for further revenue. The people, forced to economize, thought differently. They found other ways for carrying a large part of their correspondence.

Some day, perhaps, the people of the United States will tire of the political, slipshod manipulation of the postal service, and insist that it be taken out of the hands of politicians and put into those of trained men who know how to run the postal business. —Detroit Free Press.

THE PRINTER

The printer is a faithful servant, not only for those connected with the business, but also for the public at large. Without him what would be the state of the world at large?

Why, tyrants and humbugs in all countries would have everything their own way. The printer is the friend of intelligence and thought; he is the friend of liberty or freedom of [illegible] Indeed, the printer is the friend of [illegible]

Of all the inventions, of all the discoveries in science or art, of all the great results in the wonderful processes of mechanical energy and skill, the printer is the only product of civilization necessary to the existence of free man. Decatur Once Known For Its Sawmills

In the year 1872 Uriah Ackley and Josiah Hopkins bought the mill known as the Cuddeback mill, which was both saw mill and grist mill combined, and in the field joining as a saw mill owned by Bull and Warner. Both yards were across the road from the old Rawson property.

At that time there was plenty of timber here of all kinds hardwood, oak, ash, hickory and rock elm. There was also soft wood, whitewood, bass wood, walnut and some pine. For a few years both yards were full of logs and they could make lumber the year around. In the winter months teams would be drawing in logs on sleighs until late in the night.

After a time the Bull and Warner mill burned. Ackley sold his interest in the Hopkins and Ackley mill, went in with Bull and rebuilt the burned mill, forming the firm of Bull and Ackley.

About this time Al Rogers bought lumber, and also bought logs and had them sawed into lumber in the Bull and Ackley mill. At one time Rogers bought a nice lot of white wood logs that came across the swamp. One butt log was so big they cold not roll it into the mill and had to quarter it with powder.

After a while Jack Tuttle bought lumber here also. Large quantities of lumber were piled high along the rail road from the stock yards to George street to dry.

In 1872 there were two planing mills in Decatur. One was on George St., on the corner east of the lumber yards. This mill was run by Haynes, and some time in the 80's he moved the machinery to Cadillac. The building was vacant for a time and then a firm put machinery in the building and made lasts for shoe forms. They ran for a time and quit. And afterward it was made into a grist mill.

The other planing mill was near the railroad on Williams street. At that time it was owned by Lymon Rawson, and Jerry Fortain was the foreman. They made sash and doors and all work usually done in a planing mill. After a time I think the mill was sold to Henry Babcock and later it burned.

Bull and Ackley ran the saw mill until the timber got so scarce they could not run but about half the time, which did not pay. So Ackley moved the mill to a piece of timber in Texas township and Bull went to Kalamazoo where he ran a factory for turning out different articles of wood.

... Ackley, son of Uriah Ackley, ... of the ... of Decatur ... years. He came here with his parents in 1872, when he was eleven years old. He was a son of Union Academy, and he had a ... received from the Decatur high school in 1881. She taught school in the town and county, married Levi Van Steenberg and died here. Her class mates were Ada Goss, Belle Sterrett Bowers, Flora Buell, Will Brown and John O'Leary.

The Warner referred to by Mr. Ackley in the beginning of his story was Jasper Warner, father of our townsman, Carl Warner and for many years afterward a prominent citizen of Decatur. He lived in the big brick house on west Delaware street now owned by Tony Nichols, the shoe man.

Al Rogers, who was prominent in the lumber business in the early Decatur days, was a son of 'Banker' Rogers. He left a record of honorable dealing in Decatur to go into the lumber business in Chicago, and passed away many years ago. A son and daughter now reside in Kalamazoo.

Charles Ackley who wrote these reminiscences, is now represented in this community by his daughter, Mrs. Bessie VanderWoude. He has the thanks of the Republican for his valuable contribution to our local history.

Charles H. Mahoney

Born in Decatur, Charles Henry Mahoney has grown into a man more than six feet tall and weighing 210 pounds.

Charles H. Mahoney was the first resident of Detroit, and the first North American Negro to be appointed a full delegate of the U. S. to the ninth session of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

Since 1917, when he first became active in the affairs of his city, Mr. Mahoney has been marking up "firsts" for his race. In 1918 he was appointed by Mayor J. Couzens to Detroit's City Planning Commission. He was "first" of his race to serve on a city commission. He served on this commission for four years and then was chosen for ten consecutive years as a member of the Wayne County Board of Supervisors.

In 1935 the State government beckoned to Mr. Mahoney again, as Governor Frank Fitzgerald appointed him to the State Department of Labor and Industry, an important post in such an industrial state. Once again it was a Mahoney "first" for his race. He served in this capacity for seven years.

Mr. Mahoney says that he has never been interested in being "first." "I want to do the best job I can for my Country, and I want to leave the door open for those who will come after me."

Graduating from the local high school, he entered Olivet College, the sole Negro student in the college. Finishing three years at Olivet, he went to Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee, where he taught in the University's elementary school while completing work on his degree. Then he entered the University of Michigan where he received his law degree in 1911, the same year he was admitted to the bar. With $12 in his pocket, he went to Detroit to build his law practice.

In 1928 Mr. Mahoney and a small group of businessmen organized an Insurance Company, which was reorganized in 1944 as the Great Lakes Mutual Life Insurance Co. It now has about $50 million worth of life insurance in force and assets of more than $5 million. Mr. Mahoney is President of the Company. He is also President of the Great Lakes Land and Investment Company and of the Great Lakes Agency Company.

Mr. Mahoney has tried unsuccessfully three times for public office "Nothing I ever tried for did I get," he mused recently, "and nothing I ever got did I try for."

Five colleges have conferred Doctor of Law degrees upon him. In 1955 he was advised by the Department of State at Washington D. C., of his appointment as a member of the Panel for Inquiry and Conciliation which has been created for the purpose of assisting the United Nations in settlement of disputes. Don't like to eat them particularly, but to relax, to ... myself together after a hard ... I like to hunt, too. Not to ... animals. Some days I will ... up the bull and sit hours and watch what's happening."

The Village Council and the people of Decatur send greetings to our past village president, Mr. Stapleton, on his 95th birthday, and sincerely wish him many more.

Dr. Bowers, village pres.

Frank C. Stapleton Observes 95th Birthday Friday

One of Decatur's senior citizens will observe his 95th birthday Friday, May 13. He is Frank C. "Stapey" Stapleton, who has been an important part of this community for almost 75 years.

Mr. Stapleton will observe his birthday with relatives in Howell and Ann Arbor.

Mr. Stapleton was born in Howell, Mich., one of five sons and three daughters. His parents were John and Mary Stapleton who came from England in 1851. The elder Mr. Stapleton, John, drove the stage coach from Detroit to Howell, then on to Lansing, during the Civil War period, where there was at that time no railroad.

At the age of sixteen, Mr. Stapleton clerked in a clothing store in Howell and when on a visit at his brother's home in Paw Paw, he learned that Charles Schuster of Decatur wanted a clothing clerk, and so he came to Decatur about 1886.

He married Lena Free of Paw Paw, in 1887.

Also about this time (1887) Frank was a member of the first baseball team organized here. He played as catcher, and the team won the county championship. Frank was also the Decatur fire chief about this time. The fire department had a horse cart and a hook and ladder wagon with 24 rubber buckets. They had to pump water from two wells, in the event of fire. One well was located on main street by the four corners, and the other near the park.

Frank clerked in Mr. Schuster's Clothing store until 1889 when Mr. Schuster sold his business to the Squier Bros., Emery and Harley.

Mr. Stapleton was the village clerk three terms and village president three terms. He was serving as clerk when the water works were installed in 1895. He was elected township clerk twice and was village president when the Michigan Gas and Electric Company came to Decatur.

He was cashier of the Citizen's State Bank from 1909 to 1912 and was assistant cashier in the First State Bank from 1919 to 1929.

In 1912 Gov. Ferris appointed him as deputy state oil inspector, in which capacity he served four years.

In 1931 he was appointed receiver of the State Bank of Hartford during which time he was successful in paying all the depositors in full.

In 1939 Frank was appointed by the Van Buren county supervisors as a member of the Van Buren county road commission. He served 12 years, resigning to retire in 1951.

His wife passed away in 1947, and Frank is still living in the house he built in 1895.

This information was given to the Republican by a lifelong friend who knows him, as does the rest of the community, as "Stapey."

"Stapey" recalled with pleasure that for some time he was captain of the Rabbit and Pheasant Club in Decatur. Other members of the club were Dr. Huyck, Dr. Howland, Harold Hudson, Ross Hudson, Warren Moser, and Pat Howland was game-keeper.

Another problem confronting

Michigan [illegible] by Bohling lies in the recent reorganization of lower courts in Michigan.

"We had 17 justices of the peace in the county," he reported "and they were limited to $5 costs on court cases except in cases where there was violation of local ordinances. All this money was turned over to the county treasurer who dispersed it to libraries. Now there are two district courts in the county and the justices have costs, including their own salaries, salaries of their staff, and office expenses. In fact, they are charging higher costs and lower fines so it will cover their own operation, leaving less for libraries and putting a financial burden on most libraries in Michigan."

Court Collections Down

"For example," he explained, "collections the first three months of 1968 totaled $7,500 per month. This year, the January total was $1,918.

He said inflation is also a problem that is causing libraries trouble, citing as an example the "$6 average cost of a library book today."

"The price index on books," he lamented, "rises more rapidly than the general living index, and that hurts."

Although Librarian Bolding may have some worries with politicians, financers, and inflation, his physical plant is far from a problem.

Located at the corner of Phelps and St. Mary's Sts. in downtown Decatur, the building looks as new and impressive as it did the day it opened June 30, 1960.

Costing at that time $327,000 (now valued at $500,000) the building is 80 by 120 feet square, has six rooms, including a conference room with a kitchen and seating for 100 diners. There is also a garage and basement.

Keep Donor's Ashes

One other room is set aside to house an urn containing the ashes of the library benefactor, Norman Webster, and other memorabilia, including his photograph.

Photographs of other well known Decatur residents of the past stare down the walls, such as Ventriloquist Edgar Bergen; Atty. Charles Mahoney, first American Negro delegate to the United Nations; Arba N. Moulton, late publisher of the Decatur Republican, and Carl B. Squier, builder and organizer and sales Vice-president for Lockheed Air- Craft

GRAVE YARD, ROAD — ONLY REMINDERS GHOST TOWN DISAPPEARED

By D.C. Hibbard – Gazette Correspondent – Kalamazoo

DECATUR — Ghost towns are fairly common in southwestern Michigan but Charleston, five miles southeast of this Van Buren Co. village, is a town which has disappeared completely.

Only a cemetery and a road built anro aswamp are reminders that it ever existed.

In its flourishing days from the first settlement in 1829 until the railroad came, Charleston was the business center of a rich farming district.

It was also a stage stop on the Kalamazoo-Niles line which sometimes scheduled a dozen stages a day. Three taverns took care of the travelers.

The town had two general stores, three blacksmiths, two coopers, a dance hall, a church and a town band. It was supposed to have had about three hundred inhabitants which made it the metropolis of the area, as Decatur, Dowagiac and Marcellus were still to be born.

The source of much of Charleston's prosperity was the Michigan Central Railway, now part of the New York Central system. Construction from Detroit started in 1837 and it took until 1848 to reach Kalamazoo. Passengers between Detroit and Chicago took the railroad as far as possible, then rode stages the rest of the way.

The three taverns provided plenty of beds in Charleston. Meals were tasty and reasonable, and the town had a reputation for parties and fun. Many travelers stayed the night and took a stage next morning.

The railroad tarried a couple of years in Kalamazoo and was built forward arriving in Niles in October, 1848. This wiped out the stage line.

Although the inhabitants of Charleston didn't realize it at the time, the railroad's arrival spelled the doom of the thriving village. It bypassed them, and a new community called Decatur was plotted on the line of the railroad.

Charleston people did realize that they needed access to the railroad. This belief was shared by the new settlers in Decatur, many of whom came from the Charleston area.

The towns were only five miles apart but between them stood the "Big Swamp." It started west of present day Lawton, extending about twenty miles southeast and was about two miles wide. Through it ran the sluggish waters of the north branch of the Dowagiac Creek.

It was impassable. There were no roads across it and many thought none would ever be built. In spite of the difficulties, it was decided to try to construct a road to span the muck land.

A sawmill donated two thousand dollars worth of logs, the railroad gave five-hundred dollars in cash and citizens contributed two hundred dollars. Irish laborers, who had just completed the railroad through Decatur, were hired to perform the task.

Two lines of huge logs were laid lengthwise in the swamp for stringers. Half logs of medium size, eight to ten feet long, were laid crosswise and secured on top. These cross logs were called puncheons.

Dirt was shoveled over the puncheons to smooth the road somewhat and it was opened for traffic on Nov. 3, 1849.

Six years later a new road had to be built. The reason given was that the first road had "become quite worn." More likely, as the wood became soaked, the road kept sinking into the quagmire and became impassable.

The route for the new road was shorter and ran straight out southeast from George Street in Decatur. It was constructed in the same way as the first one except that planks were used instead of puncheons and more dirt was shoveled in to lift the road above the swamp water.

There were turnouts at intervals to allow vehicles to meet and pass. The bridge which allowed the murky water of the Dowagiac Creek to pass under, was painted red. It was a familiar landmark to the old timers for many years.

As time went on, the two townships involved spent much money to keep the road operable. More and more dirt was brought in as filler until the roadway is now several feet above the level of the swamp.

In 1903, ditching of the creek was started to lower the water level and drain the swamp. By 1928 a wide and deep ditch contained the water of the creek from east of Decatur nearly to Niles.

The ditch system effectively drained the whole swamp. Formerly worthless land is now cut up into fine farms which specialize in crops that do well in muckland.

The "Old Swamp Road" did much to build Decatur but could not help Charleston which gradually declined. Many of the people moved to Decatur which became and has remained a thriving village.

Elijah Goble, who started Charleston by building his "Brown Eagle" tavern on the old coach road before 1836, was the first to come, and the last to go. His sign swung in the wind for many years.

By 1875, a county historian of the time reports that Charleston had faded until it had only a few scattered houses. Now, even these are gone without even a foundation stone to mark the site.

All that remains on the spot is a cemetery on Dewey Lake Road which formerly marked the west side of the village. The stage road has gone long ago.

The Old Swamp Road is still there. It is just a local road now, with nothing to show that it once was the only artery for north and south traffic for miles in either direction.

The shoulders are narrow and the road is rough, reminiscent of the original puncheons that jolted the wagons as they hauled the produce of the Charleston area to the new railroad so long ago.

DECATUR LIBRARY FEELS INFLATION SQUEEZE

By RAY MCCLURE

Tribune Staff Writer

DECATUR — If the books in Webster Memorial Library were divided among the entire population of Decatur everyone would have 35.03 volumes.

This points up the unusual fact of the considerable amount of reading matter available in this small town of 1,827 that boasts a 64,000-volume library.

Even with a half-million dollar building housing these extensive "literary facilities," and an endowment fund from the estate of library founder, Norman E. Webster, plus tax money, Webster Library, like all libraries, is in the unfortunate position of being hard put to make ends meet in a world of apparent never-ending price increases.

Three Kinds of Problems

Problems of public and school libraries in Michigan fall into three categories, and were pointed out this week by director Curt Bohling.

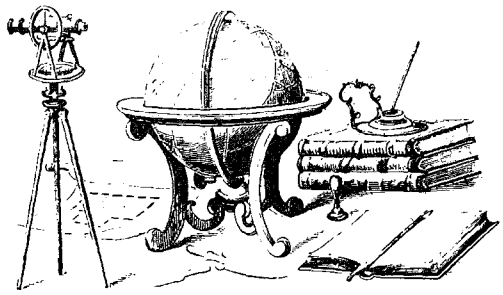
"A major problem is the Nixon Administration," he said. "The Republican administration gives lip service to the library effort but no money."

Bohling pointed out that "he (Nixon) praised the library effort during National Library Week but cut federal aid to public and school libraries, which is funneled to the states through the Dept. of Housing, Education and Welfare, by 83 per cent, and that's 83 per cent off the previous level of spending."

"Although our library has not felt the pinch yet, except in magazine subscription costs," he continued, "system libraries created exclusively with federal funds, such as Berrien and Cass county multi-unit libraries, have felt the pinch. I understand Berrien will get about $28,000 less this year, and Cass will get less also."

Federal Money Buys Books

He said most of the federal money has been used to "improve book collections," "in short, to buy books."



GIFT OF NORMAN E. WEBSTER — LIBRARY DEDICATION SUNDAY

The most striking and certainly one of the most valuable additions to the Decatur Community as well as the county as a whole, will be dedicated Sunday — the Webster Memorial Library.

Open house will be held at the library from 1:00 until 2:00 p. m. with a memorial service for the Websters immediately following.

After the services will be the program including speakers and entertainment until 4:30 when it will again be open until 6:00 p. m.

Something of the history of Mr. Webster and how the library came into being is as follows:

Norman E. Webster was born March 26, 1869 in Decatur to Norman Earl Webster and his wife, Jennie L. Chavileer. His father had moved to Michigan from Genessee county, New York in 1835. Mrs. Webster came to Michigan with her family from Hamilton county, Ohio in 1847.

Mr. Webster entered school in Decatur in 1875 and except for two years of grammar school in Sturgis, Michigan, he finished public school in Decatur, graduating from the Graded School at the age of 16, in 1884.

Because of the influence of two teachers who considered him above the average, he was inspired to seek larger fields. He went to Kalamazoo, where he was employed by the Michigan Buggy Company for six years. Later, he was division superintendent in the Department of Collections of the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago in 1893. Norman E. Webster had made a special study of theoretical phases of accounting and office organization. Because of this specialty, he made the highest mark in a special examination for an opening in the national Post Office. He was appointed to the position in the office of the auditor for the Post Office Department in Washington, D. C., where he remained for 11 years.

On December 17, 1895, Norman E. Webster was married in Denver, Colorado to Rose Rezeau, with whom he had gone to school in Decatur.

Norman E. Webster was a man who could combine many activities. While working full time, he wrote a number of articles dealing with accountancy, worked on his college degree at Union College in Schenectady, graduating in accountancy in 1896. In 1906, he received a degree in law from National University Law School, in Washington, D. C. He was admitted to the Bar of the Supreme Court in Washington the same year. He never practiced law, but used his knowledge in his accounting business and in the writing of numerous pamphlets and articles on various legal phases of accountancy.

Mr. Webster in a commencement address made at Decatur in 1945, discussed at some length the two teachers whom he credits with influencing him to make a success of his life. Henry Upton, principal of the Decatur Graded Schools, and Abigail Pearce, the assistant principal. Miss Pearce is the same teacher who taught at Ypsilanti for many years and is so well-known throughout Michigan.

After finishing school and leaving the Post Office, Noran E. Webster organized his own accounting firm in New York City. The firm was a successful one, having branches in several eastern cities. At the time of his death in 1956, Mr. Webster was senior member of Webster, Horne and Elsdon, which firm still bears his name.

Norman E. Webster and his wife were interested in collecting Oriental rugs, antique furniture and clocks. He collected and organized into files and scrapbooks, numerous clippings and articles about his hobbies. This material is now in the Webster Memorial Library. Some of the furniture, clocks and rugs were left to the library, also.

It is evident from the many letters which were carefully saved that the Websters gave considerable time and thought to the disposition of their money. No doubt many things were considered, but always in their minds was the idea of doing something for Decatur, the village where Mr. Webster had been started on the road to success by Henry Upton and Abigail Pearce.

The Websters finally decided that what they wanted was to provide a public library for Decatur. Norman E. Webster knew that there was a small township library in Decatur, but having used a number of the finest libraries in the country most of his life, he wished for his native village a superior type of library.

Knowing that it takes time, resources, and money to develop and maintain the sort of library he envisioned, he suggested that a larger library be invited to join with the Decatur library so that his idea of good library service might be carried out. The Van Buren County Library was thus asked to join with the Decatur Township Library and both together became the Webster Memorial Library.

The merging of the two libraries made available a collection of almost 70,000 books, a record collection, 4,000 pictures, 5,000 pamphlets, specialized services of a professional librarian, and a much larger staff, to residents of Decatur and the county. Additional services carrying out the ideas expressed in Mr. Webster's will and his letters will be developed as soon as possible.

CENTURY-OLD HOME OFFERED AS CASS MUSEUM

By RAY McCLURE
Tribune Staff Writer

CASSOPOLIS — The 100-year-old resident forester's home on the grounds of Fred Russ Experimental Forest north of here has been offered to the Cass County Pioneer Historical Society for a museum, a Michigan State University official confirmed Friday.

At the same time, John Bright, forester at the MSU-owned facility, confirmed he is to be transferred by July 1 with his duties turned over to W. A. Lemmien, forester at Kellogg Experimental Forest near Augusta.

A man familiar with the area will be employed to watch over Russ Forest, but will not live on the grounds, Bright said.

It was also learned from another source, that the Cass County Parks Commission is interested in a small area adjacent to the house as an "accenting park," should the society obtain the house.

The switch in personnel and operations at the forest is the first major change in the 14 years since Bright became forester, and the move was seen as an economy move by the university to save the forester's salary by eliminating mounting expenses on the house.

Bright, a native of Concord, will become resident forester at Dunbar, about 70 miles from Sault Ste. Marie.

"The university has decided to discontinue a resident forester here since Russ Forest is close enough to Kellogg Forest for administrative purposes," Bright explained. "There will be a man here during the day to watch over things and to see that the experimentation program is continued."

Bright said the 14-room house has been offered for lease to the society. The society is expected to make a decision on the house at a meeting on April 12.

Restore House to 1870

"The society would restore the house to the time of its construction about 1870 and make a museum out of it," Bright continued. "I believe they would get the house on a five-year lease. During that period it would be determined if they could manage the property."

Bright reported Westgate Center, a work activity center for adult mentally retarded has also inquired about leasing the house for use as a group living house for retarded boys five through seven years old. Westgate Center is sponsored by Cass County Mental Health Clinic and the Cass County Assn. for Retarded Citizens and currently occupies the former Salisbury School.

"I am not sure who will get the house, Bright added. "If someone does not take it, I understand the university plans to raze it. The society has first choice."

Although the house has picture-postcard beauty, has been well kept, and is typical of its time, it is not in itself particularly historically important.

Bright said he understood the house was constructed by Christian Haefner for George Newton, a state legislator, about 1870. Following Newton's death, it was purchased by the late Fred Russ, a Cassopolis attorney. During his ownership Russ planted 60 acres of tulip poplars. Wanting to keep the forest intact, he made an outright gift of the property to MSU in the early 1940's.

There are 580 acres at the Russ Forest area at Decatur and Marcellus Rds. There is also a 200-acre parcel south of Marcellus.

Soon after receiving the property, MSU began its forestry experimentations, particularly in forestry genetics, fertilizers and herbicides, forest management and spacing studies.

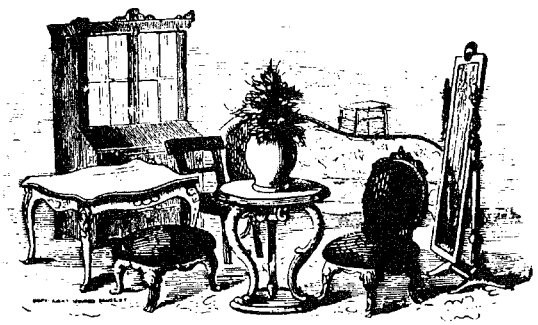
White oak is the predominant tree in the forest along with maples, Scotch pine, walnut and English oak.

Few Thefts So Far

Also included in the immediate vicinity of the house are a smokehouse, garage, horse barn and a workshop Another large barn is located within the forest.

In a day when wood has become more and more expensive, Bright said tree thefts have been minor. The worst theft was a "year or so ago" when five walnut trees disappeared.

"We have good, observant neighbors who can hear a saw and axe at work over long distances," Bright noted. "There are also the sheriff and state police patrols."



NYC DEPOT CLOSING; FREIGHT SERVICE BEING CENTRALIZED

The Michigan Public Service Commission, acting on a petition from the New York Central Railroad, ordered the immediate removal of freight agents from the stations at Decatur, Lawton, South Haven and Bloomingdale.

The NYC petitioned the Commission to be allowed to set up a centralized freight service with its center in Kalamazoo. The Commission allowed that the NYC ". . . has an adequate and experienced staff and adequate facilities to expeditiously, efficiently and economically perform and handle all freight agency work in the territory involved in this proceeding."

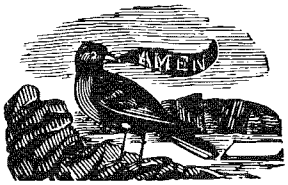
The NYC will continue to operate the freight station here, however, until Jan. 27, 1961. The Commission ordered the NYC to refrain from removing or disposing of its station facilities in the towns affected for a period of one year, or until further order of the Commission.

More complete information concerning the coming freight arrangements may be found in an advertisement on page five.

Depot Built in 1886

The first depot was built in Decatur in 1848 and remains today as part of the mill at the Decatur Elevator Co. The present depot was constructed in 1886.

Due to the shortage of passengers in recent years, that service had been sharply curtailed by the railroad, until now Decatur is just a flag stop.



Aye Strain

By GAR!

Each year, as surely as death and taxes, the rumor pops up to the effect that the Lake of the Woods is unfit for swimming. This year is no different, and the basis for this year's version is the evidence of an unusually large number of dead fish at the lake shore.

The rumor is, of course, 100 per cent nonsense. The lake has been checked by authorities and is deemed an excellent lake for swimming, fishing and other summertime water sports.

The unusually large number of dead fish which appeared this year and brought concern to local residents, also focused the attention of the authorities on our lake. Following considerable investigation, probable causes were offered by Les Brown, the county sanitation officer, Stan Hayes, conservation officer, and Chet Harvey, district engineer with the water resources commission in Lansing. The concensus seemed to be as follows:

1. Sudden changes in the weather this spring were more drastic than in recent years. Just a 15 to 20 degree change in water temperature will kill fish. This is particularly possible in the channels where the water and fish are more confined.

2. The spraying of the elms this spring for Dutch Elm Disease with a 12 per cent DDT solution. This chemical is deadly to fish, as it is to birds and insects. There was strong possibility that this spray drifted out over the lake and caused the death of many fish.

3. Many of the dead fish examined were found to have suffocated from fine, paste-like silt clogging their gills. This could have been increased this year through the use of a sand sucker or dredge, used to make channels and clear bathing beaches.

Any of the above causes may have been responsible for the high fish kill this spring but in the opinion of those who know, the rumor of water pollution in anyway prohibitive to swimming is utter nonsense.

Ma, where's my swim suit?

Certainly was nice to see the majority of the stores on Main street displaying American flags on Flag Day yesterday. Lisle Gwilt certainly did his part by reminding merchants to set out their flags.

Fred McWilliams stopped in the other day and brought to our attention what he calls the "Eighty and Eight Club." Fred pointed out that we have a whole generation of friends and neighbors who are almost forgotten in our everyday bustle of living. They are the Decaturites who are at least 88 years of age; folks who have outlived their lifetime friends and are now living a rather secluded life.

A list of the "club" members that Fred knows personally appears below. There must be many more who can qualify for this honor — being at least 88 years old and having lived most of their lives in Decatur — and their names should also be mentioned here.

It would be nice if these "club" members would receive a card or note wishing them well and reminding them that they are still valued members of our community even though they are not as active as they may have been in the past.

Fred's list is as follows:

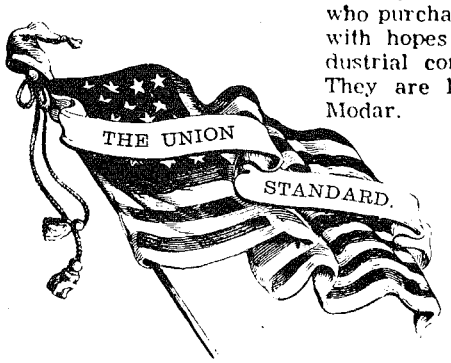
Ethel Ireland, 88; Lucy Howland, 89; Katherine McLeese, 89; Orrie Clark, 89; J. G. Hirst, 89; Susie Sollenberger, 89.

Grace Wickett, 90; Charles Wickett, 90; Mina McWilliams, 90; Dr. Bope, 90; Rev. Ellis, 90; Louis Roth, 90.

George Weeks, 91; Belle Barnum 91; Herschel Campbell, 91; Albert Brohm, 93.

Fred Paul, 92; Pat Howland, 93; Ellsworth Graham, 94; Frank Stapleton, 96; Mary Youell, 97.

A chaperone is someone who never made the team but is still in there intercepting passes.



Modar, Inc. Plans For Operation July 1 With 35 Employees

Decatur will have a new industry July 1, when Modar, Inc., of Benton Harbor sets up their cabinet fabricating operation in the former Becker building next to the railroad tracks, across from the bandstand park.

Final arrangements were completed this past week between Modar and the Decatur Industrial Corp., owners of the building.

Modar's president, Arnold Faulkner, stated that machinery and equipment will be moved in beginning about June 15 and he expected to have the operation underway about July 1. Present plans call for the hiring of about 30 women and four or five men, Faulkner said.

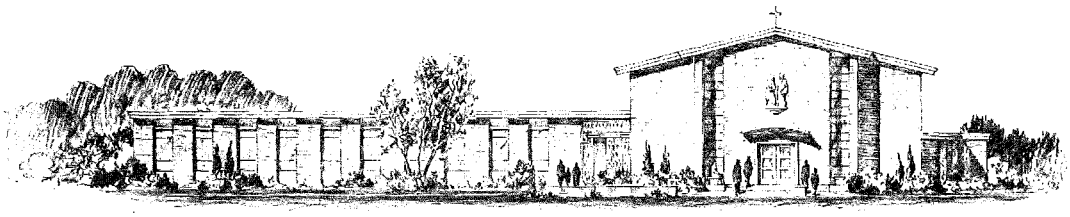
Modar, Inc. manufactures leatherette covered wooden cabinets for portable record players and tape recorders. They have been supplying thir product to such firms as Heath, VM, Webcor, General Electric, Gambles, Western Auto, Magnavox, and others.

Modar will continue the operation of their home plant in Benton Harbor where they will cut the wood for the Decatur operation. Ultimately, Faulkner said, they intend to have their entire operation in one location.

Mr. Frank Vogel will be the plant manager, and Mr. John Clagett, office manager will reside in Decatur.

Modar is one of the largest manufacturers of its kind in the midwest. They began business in Benton Harbor in 1954, started building their present plant there in 1957 and moved the entire operation into that building in 1959.

The Decatur Industrial Corp. is a group of 11 Decatur businessmen who purchased the Becker building with hopes of encouraging an industrial concern to locate here. They are leasing the building to Modar.



The History of Holy Family Parish

About 1855 the Rev. Father Koopman of Marshall visited Decatur which had been chartered as a village in 1848. He arranged with the Catholic families there to hold religious services once every three months. Tthe first Mass was offered in the house of Henry Brown on the corner of Beers and Williams streets, where he offered Mass four or five times. After that when Father LaBelle of St. Augustine, Kalamazoo, took charge, the place of worship was transferred to the house of Denis Jordan on South George street, which remained the church for a number of years until public halls were used as the need for more commodius quarters grew. Father LaBelle remained the pastor for about 12 years and was succeeded by Fathers Sweeney, Herbert and Ruper of Silver Creek.

In 1877 the church built by the Presbyterians in 1856 and sold to the Universalists in 1869, was purchased. This church on St. Mary's street was to serve Decatur Catholics for 56 years. In 1879 Father Wernert of Paw Paw took charge and began holding services once a month. The church at this time included about 30 families, and the trustees were Daniel Kearney, James Howland and James Creagan.

In 1933 the mission of Decatur was transferred from Paw Paw to Bangor. That same year the present church, first built by the Universalists in 1881, destroyed by fire in 1891 and rebuilt in 1895, was purchased by Father Kornescki for about $800. With the help of parishoners he added the sanctuary area to make the building more spacious, seating about 200. In its history it has survived many alterations and additions.

On Sept. 12, 1938, the mission of Holy Family was elevated to the status of a parish with a mission of its own, St. Ann of Cassopolis, enjoying the distinction of being the first parish created in the new Diocese of Lansing. On Oct. 20, 1939, the present rectory was purchased from the Kearney estate and the first pastor, Father Edward Krawczyk moved in on Dec. 17, 1939. He was succeeded in 1941 by Father Philip Cook who remained until 1945. Father Al Schmitt came for a few months and was succeeded by Father William Cogley who was pastor but a year. Father Linus Ceru came in 1946 and remained until 1953. In 1948 he purchased the lot west of the rectory to be used as a parking lot and future church site. Father Howard Nooker was pastor during the next three years and built a new church in the mission of Cassopolis. He was followed in 1956 by Father Frank Burger who enlarged the church and redecorated it. On Dec. 20, 1956 he purchased the former Dodge home between the church and the Presbyterian church. Men of the parish repaired and altered it and it has served as a meeting hall, room for catechism classes and a hall for dinners and parties. Father Gilbert Rahrig was appointed pastor in June, 1958.

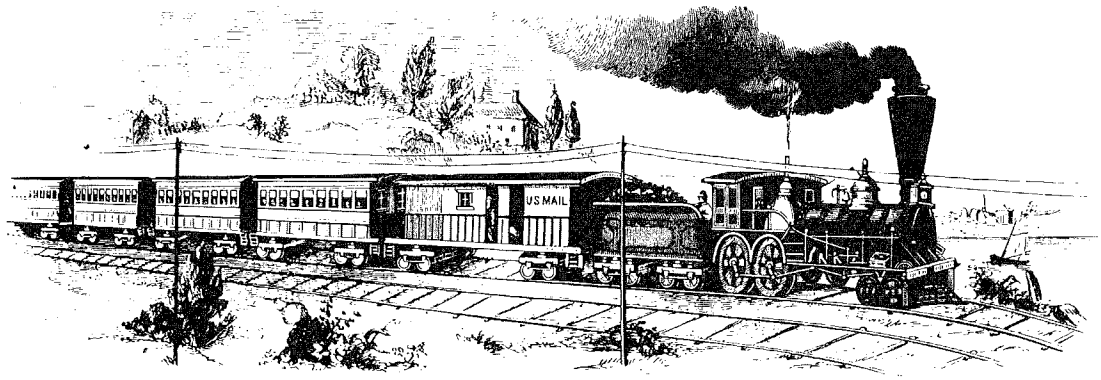
In 1959 the church purchased for $7,000 about 14 acres of land on the western edge of the village as the site for the new church and eventually related buildings. Plans were initiated for the building of a new church and the services of the architectural firm of Smith, Mass and Becker were secured. Eventually contracts for the building were let to the Holland Construction Co., of St. Joseph for the general construction; to the Barnes Electric Co., of South Bend for the electrical; and the O'Toole Plumbing and Heating of Benton Harbor for the plumbing and heating. Construction progressed very rapidly after the ground breaking on Aug. 27, 1961, and the cornerstone was laid Dec. 3. Winter arrived before the roof and delayed construction for several months. The advent of good spring weather brought a resurgence of activity with completion of the church and open house on May 20, with dedication following on May 27.

In this history is truely seen the growth of the mustard seed; from 30 families in 1880 to 175 today; from a handful of people attending Mass once every three months in a living room, to weekly Mass for 400 in the winter, about 800 in the summer, in a beautiful new modern building.

SUCCUMBS — The death knell has been sounded for one of Decatur's landmarks, the New York Central depot. Built 75 years ago, the building will be abandoned the end of this month, on an order from the Michigan Public Service Commission, acting on a request from the NYC. Passenger service has been meager for years, with no trains making scheduled stops, and with the centralizing of the freight service in Kalamazoo next month, the depot here will be closed. The building cannot be removed or disposed of for one year.



WEBBED FEET OF THE NORTH

In all the northern wooded regions of the world, man's survival through harsh winters has forever been vexed by problems of deep snow.

How can a man move through deep snow? How can he find food? If war comes, how can he chase or retreat?

The snowshoe hare long ago developed large hind feet for support while being chased through deep snow. The bear learned to store up fat and snooze away the deep-snow months. Birds fly south. Wolves and coyotes, in packs, take turns running down a snow-wearied quarry.

Developed physical traits, hibernation, migration, pack hunting; these serve the animal world in the struggle against snow and cold.

Man, on the other hand, could not hibernate, was frequently loath to migrate, and found his body puny against the rigors of winter. Pack hunting, wolf-style, proved helpful, but provided only a partial answer. Various aids, such as clothing and housing were needed to get the frail human machine through wintertime. And because deep snow mired all movement by foot, the vast inland areas of the northern continents remained unoccupied for centuries.

Then, about 6,000 years ago, after man had been on earth half a million years, the idea of snowshoes as a means of winter travel was hatched. It is thus very recent in man's history. The idea was born somewhere in central Asia between 3,000 B. C. and 4,000 B. C., and apparently in a single locale. Furthermore, snowshoes were not developed independently anywhere else, as frequently happened with early "inventions."

There is of course no record of that first crude snowshoe, either where made, by whom, or of what materials. But the idea spread from that point of origin to Europe and eastward across Siberia. It probably crossed the Bering Strait into this continent about 3,000 B.C.

At that time, it was a very simple "plank-type" of foot attachment, a wooden snowshoe, unlike the frame types of today. It had none of the webbing, upturned toe, or framework known in present-day snowshoes.

The grand-daddy of all present webbed snowshoes, the circular bearpaw type, followed the plank snowshoe by 3,000 years, crossing from Siberia to Alaska about the time of Christ.

When it arrived in Alaska, this early webbed snowshoe was on the feet of an Athabascan-type Indian. It was flat, round, had no toe-hole, and was attached to the foot by wrapping thongs several times through the shoe and around the foot. The branches or strips of hide that served as weaving material were threaded haphazardly onto the frame.

The webbed snowshoe moved south and east through the heavy snow belt of North America. The journey took 1,000 years, more or less, to penetrate from the Bering Strait to the central and eastern United States. Michigan and the Great Lakes area have thus known "snow-shoed" feet for probably less than 1,000 years.

In range, snowshoes are sharply limited to northern hemisphere areas of heavy snowfall. Eskimos of the tundra have little need for them, their world being mostly ice-covered. And farther south, snowshoes have been used locally for marsh travel, but with doubtful success; so that in general, they are limited in use to locales where 100 or more inches of snow fall in a year.

This range includes northern North America, northern Japan, Outer Mongolia and Siberia, northern Europe, Scandinavia, and a few smaller areas. In North America, the range is mainly north of the Mason-Dixon line, although snowshoes are commonly used in the California mountains, southern Nevada, and as far south as the Rio Grande Valley in New Mexico.

All those northern inland areas named above became habitable after the snowshoe was invented. The most important factor that made for this expansion into the interior was that man could now track and catch his food animals regardless of snow depth. Living inland in the winter called for constant travel to traplines, game runways, and wildlife concentration points. When the snowshoe arrived, bison, reindeer, and caribou all became available on a day-to-day basis.

The snowshoe was necessary for this original inland migration, and it is still of life-and-death importance to the northern hunting groups who survive by means of daily game kills.

Scores of separate styles have developed since the first webbed snowshoe came on the scene, stemming from these five basic frame types:

1. The bearpaw, having a one-piece frame with a round toe and round heel, 2. the unnamed but widely used one-piece frame with a round toe and pointed heel, 3. the Athabascan, having a two-piece frame with a round or squarish spliced toe, and a pointed heel, and 5. the Naskapi, limited to Northeastern Canada, having a two-piece frame with a round toe and round heel.

The wooden snowshoe really occupies a separate category, and was a type which failed to prosper in North America. The opposite was the case in Europe where the plank snowshoes prospered at the expense of the webbed type.

The most common type of snowshoe used in Michigan today is the one-piece frame with a round toe, pointed heel, and two mortised crossbars. Excepting the bearpaw, to which it is related, this is the oldest frame type of snowshoe known and has proved its serviceability throughout North America for centuries.

It is not known who developed this basic frame type. Unlike the other four frame types, it lacks a specific Indian name, perhaps because it was used so widely that no single tribal name attached to it.

While the frame itself remains unchanged, everything attached to it and to the other frame types has changed in one way or another over the centuries.

The Athabascans, for example, developed the upturned toe now common in Great Lakes snowshoes. They developed the two types of frame which bear their name. They founded a system of rights and lefts for snowshoes, presumably to ease walking. They have used up to six crossbars in their snowshoes.

The Algonkian Indians of central Canada and the Great Lakes in the meantime developed the hexagonal weaving commonly found here and originated the use of a selvage thong around the inside of the frame on which to attach the netting.

It is not known which of the two nations developed rectangular weaving or the use of a toe-hole, but both participated in these improvements. Both Indian groups probably participated in development of the single crossbar without mortising, the principle of mortising crossbars into the frame, and the use of two crossbars as in Great Lakes snowshoes.

Conservation Department field workers, who wear out many pairs of snowshoes each year, long had need for an inexpensive source of snowshoe supply. The commercial types proved both expensive and inadequate. Finally, the Department began to manufacture its own snowshoes to its own specifications.

Inmates at the Cusino Wildlife Station prison camp near Shingleton have learned the construction methods and now turn out an excellent quality shoe: enough of them so that this little Department sponsored industry now supplies all conservation officers, biologists and foresters with their annually necessary backwoods footgear.

Over the years, this inmate program has saved Michigan a considerable amount of money, while also providing a quality of snowshoe not available elsewhere.

Still Unanswered After 15 Years — WHO KILLED PHILLBROOK MUNSON?

Decatur's Only Murder Remains A Mystery

Sometime between 8:20 and 9:30 p.m. on the cold night of Feb. 11, 1946, Decatur's only murder was committed when Philbrook Munson was bludgeoned seven times on the head with a 2x4.

The murderer is still at large.

Munson, a 57-year-old section hand, lived in a railroad car on the siding in Decatur and was found a few feet from the tracks near his home by Doeko and Clifford Kline, Jr. who were on their way home from a show.

Motive for the yet-unsolved murder has been laid to either money or jealousy. It was fairly well established that Munson had received payment of an old debt of about $400 the night he was done in. Later, the jealousy angle crept into the investigation.

More Tips In 1951

Investigation slowed to a standstill until January of 1951 when more activity was sparked by new tips and more interviews — mostly on the jealousy angle.

At this time approximately 100 persons had been interviewed since the committing of the foul deed. Suspects numbered around a dozen and official files bulged with statements and reports of the dragging investigation, but still no definite lead had been established to point out the murderer.

As the crime was committed on NYC railroad property, policemen from that company, Archie and Ralph McWilliams, joined Decatur Police and V. B. County Sheriff's deputies in the investigation. Red Woolfe who was chief of the Decatur Police at the time of the murder, conducted the investigation with Sheriff Howard Englesby, deputies Doyle Wilder, Frank Hazzard and State Police Det. Victor Beck, Det. Sgt. Purlette Hinckley.

Need A Confession

As there was apparently no eye witness to Munson's murder other than the killer himself, authorities need to obtain a confession from the person responsible in order to prosecute.

The murder of Munson was kept alive on the pages of the Republican for months after the crime. A letter to the editor at the time, Arba Moulton, written by a local individual speculating on how the deed was done, was so near to the way the police figured it, that officers descended upon the Republican office with haste. However, it was eventually revealed by the shaken editor that the information had been received from a quite respectable citizen, Rev. Vance who hoped to have the killer read the story and confess.

Needless to say, no one confessed and the case still is on file, but now termed as "inactive."

Let's Clear The Record!

In the entire 113 year history of the Village of Decatur, this is the only actual murder that has taken place in the village limits and this one is still unsolved.

In order to preserve Decatur's good reputation as a law abiding community, Munson's murderer should be brought to justice.

Anyone having new information or unrevealed facts concerning Munson's murder should contact Dist. Commander Capt. Bion Hoeg at the State Police Post in Paw Paw.

Decatur Can Boast of An Astronaut, Too

Captain James A. McDivitt

With the announcement last weekend of the selection of nine new astronauts, practically every town across the country has laid claim to one of the nine as a "hometown boy."

Capt. James A. McDivitt, one of the nine-man space team that has landing on the Moon as its goal, has been a familiar figure to many around Decatur. McDivitt is the nephew of Mr. and Mrs. Harry Schmidt. He is the son of Mrs. Schmidt's sister, Mrs. J. A. McDivitt of Jackson. McDivitt has spent a lot of time over the years, visiting the Schmidts and hunting and fishing in the Decatur area with the Schmidt's son Robert.

Capt. McDivitt is a man who has been running hard ever since he made the high school tract team.

His father says he has a knack of running first. "Jim's the kind of guy who has to be first in everything he does," said his father, James, Sr., upon hearing that his son was one of nine men selected to be the second group of U. S. astronauts.

"I won't say we were surprised," the elder McDivitt said. "We had no real word, but we kind of suspected something. I knew he was working along that line. Of course, I'm kind of prejudiced, but I figured he'd make it."

Word of McDivitt's selection brought so many calls of congratulation and inquiry Monday that the elder McDivitt had to take the day off from his job as an electrical engineer at Consumers Power Co., to help his wife handle the callers. She was too overwhelmed to talk on the phone.

"She's taking this just like a mother," said McDivitt, Sr., "She is just as pleased as I am about it, but now she's starting to worry about his safety.

"The way I figure it, he's been in the Air Force 11 years, and we're used to the fact that his job gets a little dangerous at times."

McDivitt recalled how "a lot of times I used to caution him about his insistence at being first all of the time. But I guess it's nothing bad. It's just the way he is."

Mrs. McDivitt had a memory, too, of the first time her son soloed.

"I used to get excited when he mentioned astronauts," she said. "But he took the time to explain and convinced me it was all right."

McDivitt said his son's selection as an astronaut was the culmination of an ambition which took shape during World War II when he became interested in airplanes.

"After that," his father said, "there was no stopping him." He joined the Air Force, and from the minute he went in, he planned to make a career out of it."

McDivitt joined the Air Force in 1951, after spending two years in Jackson Junior College. He was born in Chicago, and the family moved to Kalamazoo while he was in high school. He graduated from Kalamazoo Central high school, and then the family moved to Jackson.

After eight years in the Air Force, during which time he rose to captain and flew 145 combat missions in Korea as leader of a jet bomber squadron, McDivitt came back to Michigan to study at the University of Michigan.

He was one in a group of 20 airmen sent to U. M. from the Institute of Technology at Wright Patterson Air Force Base in 1959. Also in the group was Capt. White who was to become an astronaut on the same day as McDivitt.

McDivitt got a bachelor of science degree in aeronautical engineering, and White got a master's in the same field.

At the University of Michigan, McDivitt finished at the top of his class with a straight A average and White had a B-plus average.

McDivitt said that although his son didn't participate much in organized sports, except for track, he always liked touch football and handball. He is 5'11" and weighs 155 pounds.

"He likes the outdoors a lot, too," said McDivitt. "I'm a little prejudiced, but I think he was good at whatever he took up. He wasn't what you'd call an extrovert, but he wasn't an introvert either. When he puts his mind to something, he really works. But he knows how to relax. He can have more fun than anybody I know."

The younger McDivitt was married in June, 1956, and has two sons and a daughter. The family lives at Edwards Air Force Base, Calif.

Michigan Girl In Civil War As Soldier

A Michigan woman fought as a soldier through the Civil war, keeping her sex a secret.

After the war, Sarah Emma Edmonds, who had posed as Franklin Thompson, disclosed her identity and qualified for a government pension.

Two of her letters are recent acquisitions of The University of Michigan Historical Collections.

"Frank" enlisted in the Flint Union Grays which became part of the Second Michigan Regiment, on April 17, 1861, age 22. Being taken for a man was not new to her. A Canadian farm girl, she had passed as a Bible salesman in Hartford, Conn., before the war.

The battle at Bull Run came on July 21. Although the Second Michigan didn't join the battle, it covered the chaotic retreat.

Emma reported that "officers and men alike confounded, regiment after regiment broke and ran and almost immediately the panic commenced. Companies of cavalry were drawn up in line across the road with drawn sabers, but all was not sufficient to stop the tide of fugitives. Then came the artillery thundering along, drivers lashing their horses furiously, which greatly added to the panic of the thousands crowded together."

Absorbed in caring for the wounded, Emma became separated from her company. She made her way to Washington under cover of darkness to rejoin her regiment.

Appointed army mail carrier in 1862, she recalled: "The floods frequently carried away the Chickahominy bridges and I was more than once obliged to swim my horse across the swift running stream. Thus cold baths in the Chickahominy River fastened the chills and fever upon me which eventually drove me from the army."

During the Battle of Fredericksburg, "Frank Thompson" was detailed by Colonel Orlando Poe as an orderly. "He carried messages through showers of shot and shell with a fearlessness that attracted the attention of officers. There was not the shadow of humbug about the soldiership of Frank Thompson."

Then in April 1863, Emma deserted, spending the rest of the war in woman's clothes nursing the sick in hospitals.

Twenty years later, when Franklin Thompson appeared in Flint at the reunion of the Second Michigan as a woman, the men were astounded.

In 1884, Capt. William R. Morse recalled, "She followed that regiment never suspected of being anything else than what she seemed. Frank was known by every man in the regiment and his desertion was the topic of every campfire."

Lower Peninsula Is A Land of "Cross Trails"

Michigan's lower peninsula is a land of "cross trails" which once zig-zagged across the mighty mitten. Hacked through the forest by Indians, many of these trails today are part of Michigan's lavish network of freeways and state trunklines, but for the imaginative traveler they still add a touch of historic color to the rolling farm and forestlands of this Great Lakes state.

Starting at the southwest border of the state is US-12, the Great Sauk Trail of the Indians which later became the Chicago stagecoach run of the 1800's, stretching from Detroit to Chicago. Today nearly paralleling this highway is the newly opened freeway, Interstate-94, a 220 mile ribbon of concrete that has made Detroit two hours closer to Chicago than before.

Along this route, either US-12 or M-60 takes the motorist to Niles of the four flags, a town that has been variously under French, British, Spanish and American rule. It was one of the stagecoach stops on the Chicago Pike of the 1830's, and as the site of Fort St. Joseph of 1691 it bears an official marker of the State Historical Commission.

Baldwin's prairie, 23 miles east, but still on US-12 — is the bed of a long-vanished lake; and six miles east is Mottville, from which pioneers shipped lumber to South Bend on the St. Joseph river as early as 1827.

Sturgis is at the junction of the Sauk and Notawaseepe Trails and is the heart of an old-worldish Amish country. Coldwater was a main hideout on the "underground railroad" by which fugitive slaves were aided in escaping to Canada. Forty-four miles east is Cambridge Junction, western gateway to the scenic Irish Hills.

At the junction of the old Chicago and Monroe turnpikes is Walker Tavern, a fabled wayside inn for pioneers and stagecoach riders. James Fennimore Cooper visited here while making notes for his novel, "Oak Openings," and there is a "murder room" in the tavern, site of an unsolved murder during Michigan's early days.

An alternate route east is M-60; from Cassopolis with its Log Cabin Museum. Three Rivers is on a trail called "Flight of the Shawnee," commemorating an incident of inter-tribal war in the Michigan Territory.

Beyond the burr oak plains of Homer is Jackson, situated at the confluence of several Indian trails and site of the founding of the Republican Party "under the oaks" in 1854.

Another alternate route to Detroit is "old US-12," now a series of county roads closely paralleling I-94. Along this route is Coloma, a Civil War recruiting center; Watervliet, an old Dutch settlement; and Hartford, near which are ruins of an Indian Mission and a Pottawatami cemetary.

Paw Paw and Oshtemo lead to Kalamazoo and its Bronson Park where Abraham Lincoln in 1856 made his only speech in Michigan. The park also is the site of an old Indian burial mound.

A few miles east of Kalamazoo is Comstock, where in 1844 an experiment in communal living called "Alphadelphia" was tried and failed. Tiny Galesburg has many historic buildings and was a stopover point on the old Detroit-St. Joseph stage route.

Continuing east from Battle Creek, it is just 10 miles to historic Marshall which almost became the capital of the state and is the birthplace of Michigan's public school system. The Brooks House, a stately example of Greek Revival architecture, marks the location. A runaway slave incident in Marshall (alluded to in "Uncle Tom's Cabin") led to the passage of the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850.

Another route into central southern Michigan is historic US-16 (now paralleled by a modern freeway, I-96 and I-196) linking Muskegon (and other Lake Michigan communities) to Detroit. This was the Grand River Trail of the Indians and explorers, and the Grand River Turnpike of wagon trains and stages. Old wayside taverns, abandoned mills and modern factories mark the transitions of a century.

Michigan's capital city of Lansing is on this highway. The city was established in 1847 with the relocation of the capitol there from Detroit. An historic marker on the east side of the capitol commemorates this move.

Grand Rapids was a fur trade center in Michigan's early days; but during the early Christian era it was a center of the Hopewell Mound-Builder culture. A county park preserves the Norton mound group, and numerous mission and pioneer sites also are marked.

And so it goes, the length and breadth of the state; Michigan exudes an historic charm which blends easily with the supersonic present to offer the traveler vacation fare well-seasoned with the old and the new.

A listing of Michigan's historic points of interest, as well as other travel information, is available from the Michigan Tourist Council, Lansing 26.

Dr. Bowers Displays Jim Beam Bottle Collection

DR. JOHN T. BOWERS is one of those unusual collectors who fancy the beautiful Jim Beam bottles that have become so popular in the last three years. Dr. Bowers is shown here with about 75 of the Beam bottles in his collection. The styles are extremely varied and they commemorate a wide range of subjects. Some of the bottles are quite valuable depending on the number that were manufactured.

. . . those were the good old days . . .

DECATUR YOUNGSTERS had the joy of good living for a few days last week when the weather was cold enough for good skating, but there wasn't any snow to foul up the ice. But a steady down pour of rain this week turned the rink to water. Records show 2.75 inches of rain fell. In terms of snow, this would have been 27½ inches. Enjoying the ice in the good old days are: Luppo Toren, Terry Newell, Bob Pike, Larry Klinkers, Evan LeDuc, Dewayne Hellenga, Don Kemp, Roger Kemp, Mary LeDuc, Diane Miles, and Maxine Vereeke.

Clark Brothers Named Youth Camp Directors

At the January board meeting of the Van Buren Youth Camp, Louis and Phil Clark of Decatur were hired as co-directors of the Youth Camp for the coming season. Frank Wangberg will be in charge of pre-camp publicity and enrollment with the Clark brothers officially assuming their dutles with the opening of camp.

Wangberg has resigned from his camp position in order to devote full time to business, beinning in June.

Phil Clark is married and teaching high school biology at the Kellogg Consolidated School in Hickory Corners. Back in 1953, Phil was a member of the second group to participate in the Leadership Training program at the Youth Camp. He participated as a camper over a four-year period. He was also a member of the Van Buren County Folk Dancers for seven years.

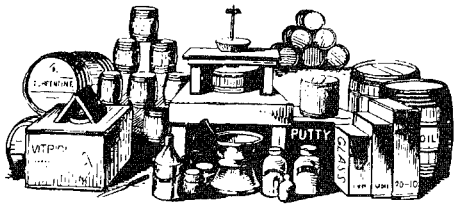
Louis Clark is a Senior at Western Michigan University. Louis also has been a Folk Dancer and a camper. He has been on the camp staff for the past four years, the last two as Program and Waterfront Director.

It is unique in the 11-year history of the Youth Camp to have Co-Directors. But working together is nothing new to the Clark brothers. It is also unique in the history of the camp to have two of the participants of the Youth Leadership Program grow into the top leadership positions.

How do two people from one family happen to be selected for such a challenging position? Part of the answer lies in their own interests, abilities and personalities. A large part of the credit also goes to their parents, Mr. and Mrs. Truman Clark of Decatur. Mr. and Mrs. Clark have been interested in the Folk Dancers and in the camp for many years. They feel that the time they have taken to help on transportation, camp and Folk Dancing business, has been a rewarding investment.

Art Drije has been busy working with a nominating committee to present a slate of board officers at the annual Youth Camp meeting. This meeting is scheduled for 8 o'clock Saturday evening, Jan. 27 in the cafeteria at Paw Paw's new high school. A summary of this past year's activity will be given at that time and an outlook presented as to the coming season.

The new co-directors will also be introduced at this meeting. Refreshments will be served, and the public is welcome.



Long-Time Resident Observes 90th Birthday

J. G. HIRST, one of Decatur's oldest citizens, observed his 90th birthday Feb. 22, at his home on Delaware St. with family and friends. Mr. Hirst began in Decatur in 1908 manufacturing coiled elm barrel hoops and barrel heads. In 1916 he went into the retail lumber and coal business where he continued until 1944. He pioneered as a developer of the Lake of the Woods peninsula and Eagle Lake north of town. Presently he is engaged in real estate and financing.

TRIO OF EARLY RADIO DAYS GETS TOGETHER IN LAS CRUCES

(The following article was printed recently in the Las Cruces, N. Mex. Sun-News. It is reprinted here for the enjoyment of the many Decaturites who will remember the McKee Trio.)

It had been 13 years between rehearsals, but the sound was good when the McKee girls finally got their string trio together again in Las Cruces, New Mexico.

It took a bit of doing, for there have been a lot of changes since the three sisters first organized the group as grade-schoolers here in Decatur. Bridges of time, change and miles were there to be crossed — but they played as though these things had never been.

The pianist is Marion Baker now, and she and her husband are Las Cruces residents, owners and operators of the Baker Apartments. Katherine McKee Anderson, violinist, took time off from her work as a medical abstract writer in Kalamazoo to be there. Irene McKee Johnson, cellist, came from Columbus, Ohio, for the reunion.

Instruments Loaned

"Mark Wechter loaned us a violin and cello for the weekend," Marion explained, "because it just wouldn't have been a reunion without music. "We've played hours every day. Oh, it felt wonderful after all these years!"

Their mother, Mrs. Jessie McKee, walked over from her home in the Baker Apartments to be their most appreciative listener. Of course, she heard two trios really. One was a memory.

The sisters are just one year apart in age, and when they were seven, eight and nine their mother started them on music lessons . . . all on the same day. By the time the oldest was in high school they were all doing well enough to be hired as the "Star Attraction" in te Decatur movie house, playing background music for silent films on Saturday nights.

Other nights of the week the fellow who cleaned up the theater was paid a little extra to fill in on the player piano. His name was Edgar Bergen. He later moved into another line of work with his friend Charlie McCarthy.

Broadcast Daily

All the girls took music degrees at Michigan State, won state music contest awards with their ensemble for five consecutive years in high school and college. The university made them its official trio, and for three years they broadcast daily "luncheon music" from the campus. They made tour appearances around the state in behalf of the school's recruiting program during the winter months, had summer jobs playing dinner music for a number of resorts in northern Michigan.

With graduation, the trio broke up. Well, it wasn't really graduation that did it. They were all married and moved halfway round the world from one another. Katherine has lived in Kalamazoo and kept up her music with the symphony there, but Irene and Marion both moved to the Middle East. Irene lived in the Persian Gulf area for 10 years, until the death of her surgeon husband. Now remarried, she and her family make their home in Ohio.

Marion went on to receive her M.A. in music education at Columbia University, later spent a number of years in Saudi Arabia. She set up the first public school music program in the city of Dhahran there. When she and her husband decided to return to the states they toured the Southwest looking for a place to settle, finally chose Las Cruces as the community in which they would like to make their home. She has retained the most active musical life of the three, teaches both piano and organ.

Actually, there were five McKee girls and they all became musicians, though the two youngest never joined the ensemble. One is a pianist, and as Frances Caster is employed by the Farmers' Home Administration in Las Cruces. Jean McKee Kemp was a flutist, lived in Roswell until her death five years ago. Her son Jack is now a senior at NMSU, while his brother, Dale, attends college at Portales.

Bullets Killed Man And Wife

Slayer Stole Victims' Horse, Escaped

By JAMES TRELOAR
N-P's Paw Paw Bureau

DECATUR — No many Decatur people can remember the famous Morris murder of 1879, but most can still recall hearing their parents tell about it. And nearly the entire community was moved to recollections with the burning last Saturday night of the famous murder house.

The house, located three miles southeast of Decatur on a lonely country road, was built long before the murder by Dolphin and Nancy Morris, Van Buren county's first white settlers.

Dolphin and his wife came here from Ohio in 1829 to homestead a piece of land just across the Cass county line. There they built a rude log cabin wherein were conducted the county's first school lessons and church services, and where the first birth and death were recorded.

PROSPERS

Within a few years, Dolphin had become prosperous enough to acquire 1,100 acres of land, become a stockholder in a new bank at Paw Paw and to build the house in which his son and daughter-in-law were to be murdered.

Until Saturday night, the two-story frame building stood on a rise overlooking the Morris homestead. It had remained vacant 20 years, frequented only by the curious and teenagers seeking a lark.

The historic home, believed the oldest standing in the county, was acquired by Dolphin's youngest son, Charles, upon the father's death in 1870.

And there he lived until the night of Sept. 28, 1879, when an assassin's bullets killed both Charles and his wife, Esther.

According to one family historian, Charles and his wife had retired about 8:30. A little later they were aroused by a caller. Morris got up, without dressing went to the door, and stepped out onto his front porch.

GUNMAN MASKED

A masked gunman, standing there with pistols ready, sent two fatal bullets into the surprised man's body. The first shot struck him in the chest, going through the body and lodging in the siding of the house. As Morris fell, another shot was fired, the slug striking him in the neck and lodging in his back. Either of the shots would have proved fatal. Morris was found where he fell and death was later declared instantaneous.

Hearing the shots, Morris' wife sprang from bed, snatched a little pistol from the bureau drawer, and ran to her husband's assistance. Coming face to face with the masked assailant, Esther turned and fled "passing through one room after room as he fired shot after shot at her retreating form" according to one account.

As she entered the door of her bedroom, another shot missed her, striking the wall across the room. The next shot is believed to have ripped through Esther's left arm, crashing into the open bureau.

Terrified and wounded, the luckless Esther sought the protection of her bedroom closet. But the murderer threw open the door, stood over the fallen woman, and sent two more shots through her chest.

HAD NO CHILDREN

The Morrises left no children. One son had died in infancy, and Mrs. Morris was expecting their second child at the time of the murder.

A Miss Jennie Bull, who worked for the Morrises, had gone to bed about 8 that night, and strange to say, insisted that she was not awakened by the shots. She first discovered the two bodies next morning.

As investigators were later able to piece the evidence together, the murderer went to the Morris barn, saddled the dead man's best horse, and rode away. Two days later, word was received that the horse had been found in South Bend by riders of the Anti-Horse Thief Association.

PRICE ON CAPTURE

The gunman made good his escape on the stolen horse. The Pinkerton Detective agency of Chicago made an investigation and worked on the case several weeks before sending back word that the man could be captured for $1,000. It was felt too exorbitant a price, however, and worried by doubts, members of the family finally dropped the matter.

The only possible motive known to the family was that Charles Morris was disputing a debt he owed a one-man loan agency in Decatur.

The money merchant was believed by some to have hired the gunman. In a final desperate effort to solve the crime, townsmen donned masks and forced the money-lender from his home into a nearby woods.

There, under the supervision of a local doctor, he was stretched from a rope in a vain attempt to make him confess. The doctor saw to it that he was "given all the rope he could stand and live," but no confession was ever made, and the much frightened suspect quickly found new interests in the West.

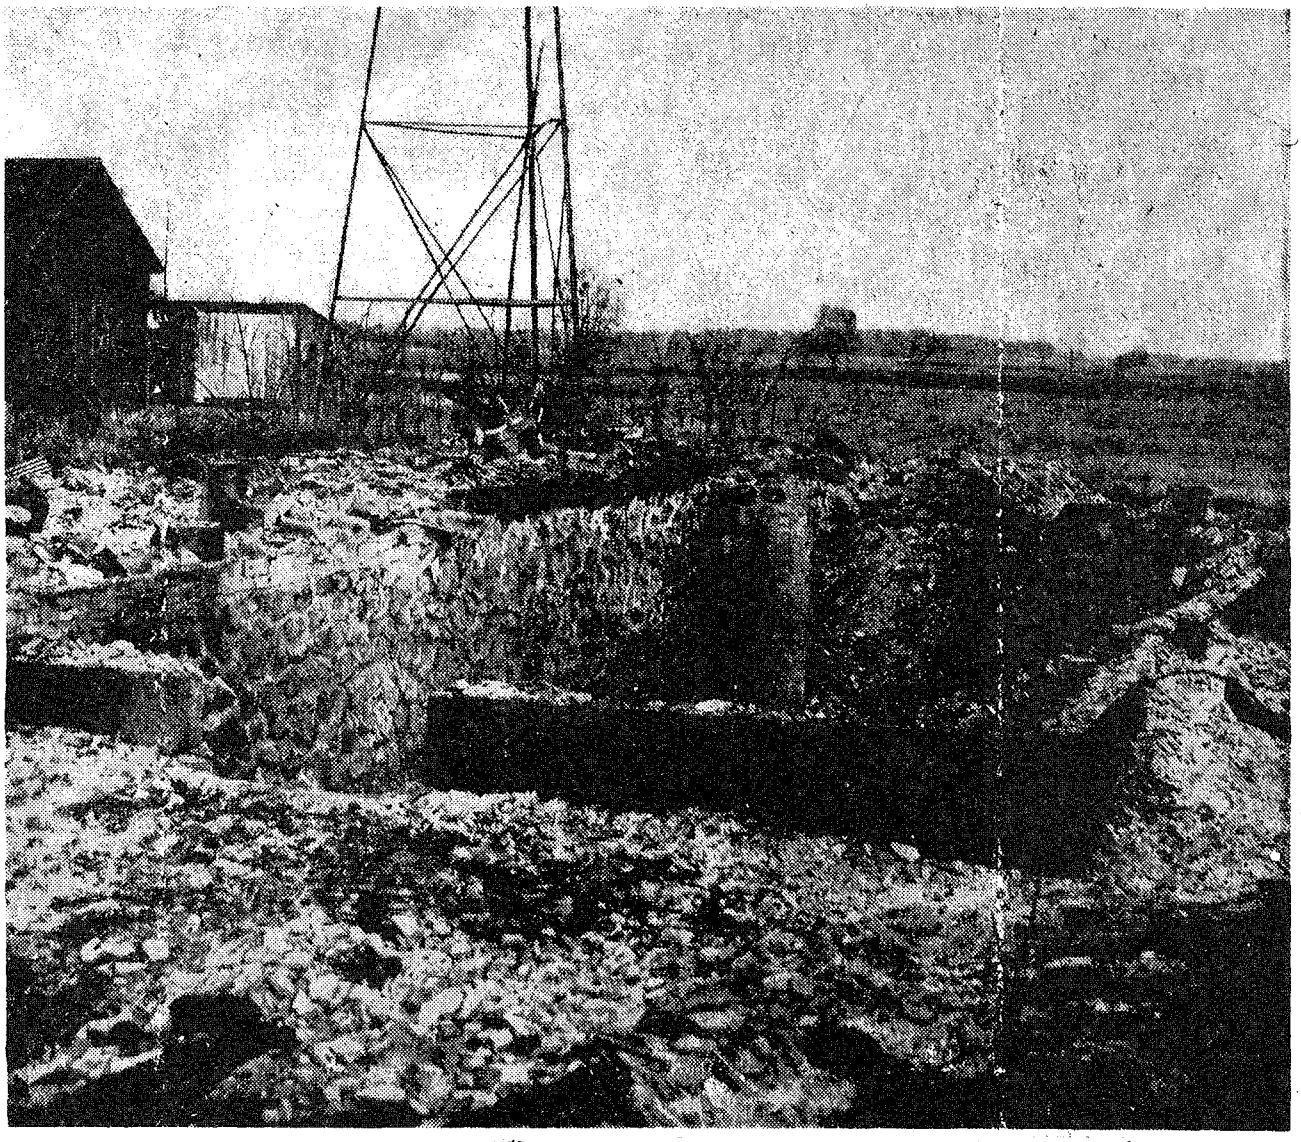
HISTORY OF UNSOLVED CRIME

Fire Razes 'Murder House'



HISTORY DESTROYED: Smoldering piles of brick are all that remain of what was once Van Buren's oldest known building and also the scene of its most celebrated murder mystery. Firemen and police believe someone intentionally set fire to the landmark last Saturday night.

(News-Palladium photo)

Landmark Was also Scene of Double Murder in 1879

A tangible part of Van Buren county's history was consumed by fire Saturday night. The Morris mansion caught fire, or was set afire, and burned, leaving residents with only the memory of the home of the county's first settler, Dolphin Morris, and the scene of the tragic and mysterious murder of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Morris.

The blaze was seen and reported by Mrs. Glenn Snyder about 10:30 p.m. Saturday. The Decatur Fire Department answered immediately but was unable to save the old pioneer home.

The Morris home has stood vacant for recent years, but it was considered a mansion at the time it was built.

The Dolphin Morris log cabin which he erected when he settled on his farm in Van Buren county in April of 1829, not only sheltered the county's first white settlers but also beneath its roof occurred the first birth and first death. Within its walls the first sermon was preached and the first school kept, while it also enjoyed the distinction of serving as the first hotel in the county.

Dolphin Morris continued to be a Decatur resident until his death in 1870. His son Charles lived on in the old place until his death at the hands of a murderer, Sept. 28, 1879.

The murder of Mr. and Mrs. Morris caused such a furor as had never been seen in the county. Charles Morris and his wife, a newly-married couple, were killed on that night in their home by an unknown person and for apparently unknown reasons. A great deal of money was put into the search for the slayer and theories as to motive sprung up like weeds, but the true facts have never been commonly known.

The many descendants of Dolphin Morris have contributed greatly to the development of Van Buren and Cass counties, and are generally well-known and well-respected citizens of the area. The Morris homestead is located on the Cass and Van Buren county line about five miles from Decatur.

After 83 years, the house that was the scene of the tragic double murder, still drew spectators and sight-seers to its gates which have been locked for a number of years to keep out the curious.

First Van Buren Fair Staged 112 Years Ago

(By Mrs. George Tinker, Sec. of the Van Buren Co. Youth Fair Ass'n.)

In the summer of 1850 the Van Buren Agriculture Society was formed with Jay R. Monroe as president. The first fair was held that fall in the court house square, Paw Paw, the stock being tied to the trees and the court room being used as a floral hall. It was held in the same place in 1851. In 1852 it was held in the village of Lawrence, south of where the Methodist church stands. In 1853-55 the people of the western part of the county furnished lumber and built sheds, stalls and stands on the public square at Lawrence, and the Fair was held there that year.

In 1856 the lumber was taken down and removed to Paw Paw and put up on a piece of land leased from Peter Gremps. The fairs of the society were held on this ground until 1870 when they bought 20 acres of land a half mile west of Paw Paw, in 1872 their property was valued at $10,000.

In 1863 on account of a disaffection occasioned by the continuance of the fair at Paw Paw, a Horse Fair association was organized at Lawrence and a 25 acre tract of land was leased from Holland B. Clark for its use. The grounds were fenced, a track was graded, stalls and floral hall were built at a cost of $9,000. Fairs were held there in 1864-66 but receipts were not sufficient to meet the expenses and they were discontinued. In 1871 a large number of citizens met at Chadwick's Hall in Lawrence and formed themselves into an association for the encouragment and advancement of agriculture, manufactures and mechanic arts, under the name of the Paw Paw Valley Agriculture Society. The grounds of the Horse Fair Association were used by the society and the first fair held Oct. 11-13, 1871. In 1877 its scope was extended to include the townships of Watervliet, Pipestone and Bainbridge in Berrien county, and Volinia, Silver Creek and Wayne in Cass county.

Clare Leach of Hartford has stated that the Van Buren Agricultural and Horticultural Society was organized in Hartford in 1912 and the first fair was held there in 1913. During the depression it was closed for a year and it was also closed during the war years. Many people have served on the board through the years, Mr. Leach serving 27 years.

This year's fair will be the fourth fair back at the old Hartford Fair Grounds under the sponsorship of the Van Buren County Youth Fair Association. The dates are Aug. 6 through 11.

CHARLOTTE'S DIARY

The account of an overland trip from Dayton, Ohio to Little Prairie Ronde, Michigan Territory in June 1833.

By Charlotte T. Copley

together with an introduction by Frank W. Copley. A paper read before the Literary Clinic of Buffalo, New York on Oct. 14, 1963.

Charlotte first saw the light of day at a time when the young republic was just beginning to recover from the effects of the War of 1812. The great movement westward had begun, would gain momentum as canals were built and more government land became available. Her father, Alexander Copley, had left the Connecticut Valley in 1805 where there was a family interest in a grist and sawmill, to seek his fortune elsewhere and stopped his westward progress for a time in Jefferson County, New York. There, nine years later, his textile apprenticeship ended, he married Esther Nott who became the mother of Charlotte.

Her pre-school years were spent in Champion near Watertown at the eastern end of Lake Ontario. As the oldest child she early assumed some responsibility for her juniors as, in rather regular course they came along. For her father, as a textile machinist, had occasional calls afield, such as the one in 1817 that took him to Fredonia. From her mother, we must assume, came her lifelong love of flowers, perhaps stimulated and certainly aided by wider observation as the family made frequent moves after leaving Champion in 1822. First it was to New Hartford in Oneida County, then two years at Walden, twelve miles west of Newburg where Alexander and his brother, William, made spindles and looms on their own account. Three years were then spent at Matteawan. There Charlotte found flowers not previously encountered which she would long remember. When this move was made she was eleven and from her father, than a mill superintendent, received the Liturgy and Hymnbook of the New Church, probably marking her embracing of its doctrines. It is a fascinating volume, bound in calf and printed in Philadelphia in the year of our Lord 1822, with the secondary dating of the year 66, i.e. the sixty sixth year from the second coming of Christ, (counting 1757 as year one). On page 62 of the Articles of Faith you may verify the eighteenth century date. Its well worn pages and interlineations bear witness to the reality of the owner's religious convictions. Call it mystical, yet what faith is wholly rational?

To the father, donor of the prayer book, head of a growing family, greener seemed the pastures farther west, and on September 12, 1829 we find the family boarding a sloop at Newburg bound for Albany.

Then came the leisurely trip to Buffalo on the Erie Canal. One wonders whether they rode in one of the more commodious packets and listened at eve to the muted harmonies of the key bugler, bringing an air of enchantment both to passengers and, canal historians assert, to frogs along the bank. Doubtless relief such as this would have been welcome to this family of pioneers headed westward but without definite destination. There is vague reference in the records to the "Indiana country," yet we find them at Buffalo engaging water passage to Sandusky. The ship's captain, for some obscure reason, decided to go no further than Cleveland and there we find them pondering the next move.

It was the year 1829, four years after the opening of the Erie Canal and in Ohio a comprehensive canal system had already been begun but not completed. There were to be three waterways from Lake Erie to the Ohio River, one from Cleveland to Wellsville, one from Sandusky to Portsmouth and, finally, the third from Toledo to Cincinnati. The first was open southward only to Massillon, the second northward to Columbus and the third from Cincinnati to Defiance. Thus if they could get to the Ohio River and then to Cincinnati, they would have ready access either to Indiana or Michigan. Besides, there were mills of various kinds in Dayton, the directory of 1819 listing among them a woolen mill with 1,200 spindles and forty employees on Hales Creek near Woodburn. And hadn't some of the Matteawan looms been designed for Dayton's first cotton mill? Yes, that was the move and so to Massillon by water, overland to Wellsville, by river to Cincinnati and north to a stopping place where the father's talents might be expected to come into play.

It appears that Alexander did find employment at the new cotton mill and settled his family on a fifteen acre tract adjoining the town. The site was well above the valley and they called the district "Delightful Hill." Here in his spare time he raised silkworms and experimented with a new variety of mulberry, the morus multicaulis, a many leaved species thought favorable to a larger output of the silken fibre than came from the commoner white mulberry. This idea he had picked up in the winter of 1817 at Fredonia where, helped by government subsidy, the manufacture of silk fabric was in full swing and would enjoy some prosperity into the 1840's when the subsidy was removed. Charlotte's father thus had his dreams, too, this one involving an integrated spinning and weaving operation. There would be a stream to furnish power for his silk mill in which was a reel of his own design. There would be a grove of morus multicaulis nearby to help provide an abundant supply of the raw material. This particular dream came not true probably as a result of the removal of the bounty of fifty cents a pound and he had to settle for a grist and saw mill and, finally, the manufacture of furniture shooks for assembly elsewhere.

And on her beloved Delightful Hill how did Charlotte busy herself? Here we have benefit of a notebook in her own handwriting covering some of the Spring months of 1832 and 1833 that would do credit to the most avid garden club member of our time. She was seventeen in 1832 with six brothers and sisters ranging in age from fifteen year old Al to baby Euphemia. On one typical day she reports setting out rose bushes, quinces, apricots, fleur de lys, hollyhocks and lilac spicata. She continues, "set some blood roots in a flower pot and planted poppy seeds in the same." This was on Mar. 4, 1832. On the 20th she dug up a half circle and bordered it with little violets. Then she planted cucumber seeds in boxes in the house and, in the same boxes, nasturtiums and convolvulus minor. Three other entries shed light on her character. In the first she reports setting out "some little flower bulbs in a tin cup for Olivia," her four-year-old sister. Four days later she was happy to note one had opened and two days after that there were five. She listed in her little notebook the characteristics and botanical names of certain flowers she wished to remember, such as the tradescantia with its deep blue flowers and leaves like those of the grape. We know it as the Wandering Jew, but this pioneer girl of a century and a half ago properly entered it as tradescantia.

We have come now to the year 1833. During the family's four years residence in Dayton the father had become acquainted with Le Grand Anderson who had come from the Shenandoah Valley to nearby Circleville about 1810. In 1823, after many scouting trips, in search of good government land, he had picked as his future home a tract in Van Buren County, Michigan Territory. Each year he would go there with a hired man or two, put in and harvest his crops and return to Circleville. Meantime, his house finally errected on the shores of Swift Lake adjoining Litte Prairie Ronde, in 1832 he moved there with his family. It appears likely that Alexander Copley's attention was first directed to the prairie as a possible final location by his friend at Circleville. At any rate he in turn went to Michigan to see for himself whether the site was favorable to his plans for a water driven mill of his own. He liked what he saw, sold his holdings at Dayton and was ready to head for Western Michigan on June 9, 1833. Incidentally, this whole Ohio-Michigan trip was not the first by men of his name. For had not John Singleton Copley, Jr., later Lord Lyndhurst, recorded a similar trip in 1797 that took him westward on the Ohio to Cincinnati and then north to Detroit?

Charlotte was a true pioneer but, as noted, she had predecessors and and on her trip encountered many persons engaged in a like adventure. This panoramic impression she manages, perhaps unconsciously, to convey in her Diary. It is silent, however on the make-up of the train that had before it two hundred and thirty four miles of arduous travel. For that we must go to her brother, Alexander Bennett. It comprised, he tells us, two wagons, three yoke of oxen, one span of horses, four Durham cows and several head of meat cattle, poultry etc. In the wagons were castings for Wood's plowshares, cuttings of Isabella grape vines and rhubarb roots, one of which came all the way from New York. When the going proved too rough for horses additional oxen were provided. The family consisted of parents and seven children ranging from one to 18. There were three hired men. And now we turn to the pencilled notes as the heavily loaded wagons wind their way northward from Delightful Hill. The text has been faithfully followed except for the supplying of punctuation marks where missing. Readers will note an error in the day of the month from the fourth Sunday on. It fell on the 23rd. The error continues and the final entry a week later was really made on the 30th. The circumstance is noted because, dated properly, the notes embrace the entire trip save the day of arrival when Charlotte doubtless had other things to worry about than diary keeping. The little hand bound note book is thus inscribed:

Charlotte T. Copley
Delightful Hill, Dayton
Montgomery County in the State of Ohio.

Sunday, June 9. Started 10 o'clock from Delightfull Hill. All well and in high spirits. Found roads quite good for a few miles. Found two new kinds of flowers on the prairie. Stopped at 2 o'clock eight miles from Dayton and got dinner in the woods. Drove through a beautiful country, roads pretty good till evening when went through dismal swamp. Stopped 14 miles from Dayton at Mr. Morrisson an (d) excellent farmer. Camped by the side of the road.

Monday, June 10. Left Mr. Morrisson's at 8 o'clock, roads much better than yesterday. Crossed Miami, passed through Troy which is pleasantly situated on the bank of the Miami. Stopped two miles beyond Troy and got dinner and I saw two rafts go over a dam. The road runs by the river through beautiful country. Found some fine springs. Arrived at Piqua just before sun down. It is handsomer than Troy. Camped on the common. Almost everyone we met would say, "where are you going and where did you come from." Slept much better last night than we did night before.

June 11, Tuesday morning. Left Piqua at 8 o'clock. Found wild strawberries. gooseberries, roses in abundance and logways too, Martin Mount Joy, (one of the hired hands) shot four squirrels while we were kindling the fire and could have got as many more if he had time. In the afternoon went through beautiful woods on both sides of the road. Went through Cynthian on the bank of Cynthian Creek. There were two log houses and two or three log cabins. Crossed the creek on rotten bridge. Camped near a Virginian's house where a fiddling and dancing going on. Children all well. Martin and Henry, (hired hands) went to look for deer in the morning, saw none but found fresh tracks.

Wednesday, June 12. Started half past eight through rough roads, deep mud holes and thick woods. Drove the cows ahead of the teams and stopped at a hoosier's where we found some bark swings in a barn and rested some time. While we were resting Pa killed a wild turkey. Henry killed one and Martin killed one and, to cap all, Henry broke the tongue of the waggon. Stopped and got dinner. Started on again, roads bad and snakes plenty. After sun down got stuck in a mud hole, went half a mile beyond the mud hole and stopped, tired, wet and hungry. It was 12 o'clock before we went to bed, but still I did not regret leaving Delightful Hill, not half so much as I did in losing most all of my flowers out of the box. We passed a great many German settlers just from Germany in the afternoon. We passed the widow (or widower) Flinn(s) in the forenoon where Pa started from the day he got home from Michigan. Thursday, June 13. We all felt rather stupid this morning. Had a small shower and didn't get started until 11 o'clock, roads very bad indeed. I kept close behind the waggon so as not to lose any more flowers. Stopped and ate luncheon at a farmer's. The roads are thronged with travelers all a going to St. Joseph or beyond. This afternoon crossed a logway ¼ of a mile long. We stopped at a farmer's one mile from St. Marys. All well. Flora, (her three year old sister) says, ask Pa why he does not go home. She wants to go to Aunt Olive's (presumably the wife of William Bildad Copley). The farmers say there are deer and turkeys in abundance.

Friday, June 14. Pa tried to get the heaviest part of his load conveyed to Fort Wayne in a keel boat down the St. Marys but the boats were gone and he concluded to get another yoke of oxen, for which purpose we stopped at St. Mary's. We hear the wolves growl like fun in the woods. St. Mary's is considerable of a town compared with Cythian (sic). It has three taverns, two or three houses, blacksmith shop and so on. The worst part of the road is between St. Mary's and Fort Wayne. Pa bought another yoke of oxen for $55 which started from Dayton on Friday, a day before we did. Bought some gingerbread which was made in Dayton. Left St. Mary's at 2 o'clock, went four miles and camped in the woods along with a family that was going to Lake Michigan. Plenty of deer in the woods but we were so busy that we had no time to hunt them.

Saturday, June 15. Started 15 minutes of eight, roads bad, got stuck in a mud hole twice. We camped in the thick woods before sun down. Henry and Bennett went to look for deer but it began to grow dark and they heard snapping, fighting and growling (and) run back. Our reflector is a grand thing. We have to bake every evening.

Sunday, June 16. Awoke this morning and found ourselves all here safe and sound notwithstanding there were plenty of wolves in the woods. Martin went to hunt deer, did not have time to find any. Our horses got loose this morning and started for home. When we found them the oxen and cows had gone; some had gone on and some back. Henry saw a large buck and a number of turkeys when he was looking after the cows. At last we found the cows, oxen and calves and started 10 o'clock. Some bad holes but got along tolerably well. Came to the edge of Shane prairie and ate dinner, two large brown crane flew over and lit. Pa attempted to shoot one of them but missed. Went through the prairie, good improved roads and thickly settled. Stopped at Shanesville, a small town on the St. Marys River.

Monday, June 17. Pa is to have the heaviest part of his load conveyed down the St. Marys river in a keel from Shanesville to Davis Mill, a little this side of Fort Wayne. Mr. Brown is going on the boat to see to the goods. Did not start until ½ past 11 o'clock, arrived at Wilshire, an old town on the St. Mary's.

June 18. The landlord had a beautiful doe which he caught when a fawn two years ago. He let it out to run in the woods every day. It had a little spotted fawn three weeks old, the prettiest creature that I think I ever saw. Left Willshire at 8. Went five miles through thick woods. Roads not cut out and very crooked. Dined in Indiana. Crossed blue creek, a steep bank to go in and out. Henry's wagon came very near upsetting in the creek. One bed fell out and got wet. Camped in the nine mile wood.

Wednesday, June 19. We expected to hear wolves howl last night but were disappointed. Started at our usual hour, 8 o'clock. Went through thick woods, crooked roads, mud holes and steep ditches though there were some beautiful woods. We dined in a shower, got wet. Just before the shower came Pa shot a turkey. They are not very good this time of the year. There are a great many little young turkeys in the woods. Passed one or two homes in the course of the day but still we do not feel lonesome. We have a lively set of us. Camped in the woods away from any house. Built a good hot fire which together with the mosquitoes and gnats made us quite comfortable, I assure you.

Thursday, June 20. We all felt as though we had been stewed but made out to get started at 8 o'clock. We had some tough mud and very steep ditches right up and down. Dined in some beautiful woods. We have had to drink puddle water all along. Back, as we have a great plenty of milk. (i.e. She takes it back in view of good milk supply). The cows have better feed than there are in pastures in Dayton. Took up a stray horse which followed us. We camped on the banks of a beautiful creek which run(s) over stones and gravel. Seven miles from Fort Wayne Martin shot some squirrels and Henry bought some honey at the house on the bank of the creek. There is plenty of wild honey. The whip poor wills sang in the trees over our tent. The new moon cast her silver rays into the water. We had a most delightful evening indeed. It reminded me of a story I had read.

Friday, June 21. Left our Paralise at 8 on bad muddy roads for two miles when we came to the old Indian chiefs. He lives in a large brick house, has a large farm, a great many horses. They dress in the Indian fashion. The owner of that horse lives in Ft. W. We met a boy that was after it who took it and gave us a hind quarter of venison killed last night. After we passed the chief's we came up on the summit. On the bank of the St. Mary's, sandy, no mud. Found spotted lillies as handsome as tulips, a number of flowers and whortleberries, the first I had seen since we had left Fishkill. Indeed it is a delightfull place. Went to Davis Mill, found the boat had not arrived. Camped on a field of 50 acres, a kind of commons covered with low bushes. On the bank of the river Martin shot two turkeys, tender. The boats came about 3 o'clock. We have beautiful spring water. Martin and Henry went to Fort Wayne, saw a canal boat just arrived which came from Buffalo through the lakes and up the Maume river. It was full of French and Germans just come from their native lands. Our goods all arrived there safe. Mr. Brown shot a turkey and left it in the woods. We all feel well and in good spirits.

Saturday, June 22. A delightful morning. We can see the sky all around us far and near which is something we have not done for sometime, the woods were so thick. We are where they say shillings and six pence again. Started half past 8. Hill and plains, now and then a mud hole. We don't mind them. The ground is covered with strawberry vines and some strawberry as large as those we had at Mr. Cathcarts. I wish you could see what a beautiful flower that Pa found this noon. The stalk is from 1 to 2 feet high with leaves something like plantain which grow on the stalk. The flower has 3 white oval petals, hollow petal, shaped like a balloon which is pink, spotted and striped. Some call them the lady slipper. They grow in wet places. We are on the ridge between the waters which flow to the Gulf of Mexico and the St. Lawrence. Came to the St. Joseph road 4 miles from Ft. W. We went around the town on account of the river which was too high to cross with waggons. Camped 6 miles from Ft. Wayne, 2 miles from any house. In this place a man had 12 sheep killed on one night by the wolves last fall.

Sunday, June 23 (the diarist dates it 22d in error). Rained some towards morning but we heard nor saw any wolves. Woods not very thick. Came into Kendallville. The trees are large and scattering. The ground is covered with strawberry vines, day lillies and numerous flowers. Got stuck in a swamp hole. Crossed the Ell river, dined, had a smart shower. After dinner through thick woods, camped 2 miles from the Ell river in the woods. Rain.

Monday, June 23 (sic). We had a good thunder shower towards morning which gave us a good soaking. (Here a phrase in the journal, perfectly legible, has been scratched out — "notwithstanding our tent"). Through thick woods again. It's muddy, some ups and downs. Good road on a hill, sandy with thick strawberry in abundance. Nelly, (one of the horses) hurt her leg yesterday so we cannot use her. Mr. Brown rode Jenny ahead to get another yoke of oxen. Road good, sandy. About noon came to a jumping off place, a very steep hill to get down and a deep muddy swamp hole at the bottom of it. We were near three hours before we got through. It was the worst place we have had or shall have, I hope. Got dinner. The country around is beautiful, hillsand, prairies covered with grapes and spotted lilies. Crossed blue river and camped near a Frenchman. Mr. Brown got a yoke of oxen for us. Evening is dear and beautiful.

Tuesday, June 24(sic). Road not very good. Arrived at Mr. Murphy's Tavern on the edge of the barrens which are 16 miles through delightfull country, sometimes on the edge of a hill or on the top of one. A prairie each side with a stream running through it which looks like a canal running through a rich meadow. Saw a lake off through the prairie, woods and prairies around it. Came to another lake larger than the 1st, called Wolf Lake. The edge was covered with pond lilies just opening. Pa went out in the canoe and got one. They are very beautiful. Bought a fish just caught. Weighed about 2 lbs., very good. Passed several houses and camped in the barrens. It rained some in the afternoon.

Wednesday, June 25(sic). Beautiful morning. Jenny has been foundered or something. She is quite stiff. I ventured to ride her and rode all day. A thing I thought I never could do. Came to the Elkhart bottoms about 11 o'clock, mud and mosquitoes. Dined in the bottoms. Arrived at Sugar Hill 4 miles from Elkhart river. Found a empty cabin, took possession for the night.

Thursday, June 25 (as noted this should read 27). Found the log cabin quite a comfortable thing. Started at 8 o'clock, came to Elkhart river about noon, crossed it. Dined on the edge of Elkhart prairie, found some flowers which used to grow in Matteawan on the banks of the creek. Went across the end of the prairie. It is most all covered with fields of wheat. Don't like old withered fields. About half a mile from Goshen we started a doe from the side of the road. It soon bounded out of sight. Mr. Brown leaves us here in Goshen. He is going come to Mr. Lawrences in 2 weeks. Camped by a log mill on rock run half a mile from Goshen.

Friday June 27 (sic). Went through a beautiful prairie, excellent roads, crossed the Elkhart on a bridge. Went through Elkhart town. Crossed the St. Joseph above the Junction of the Elkhart in a flat. It took some time to cross. The river is deep and wide. Camped on the Christian, a beautiful stream and moonlight evening.

Saturday, June 28(sic). Started late, went 8 miles, barrens pleasant. Arrived Edwardsburg at 12 o'clock, a pleasant village on the edge of beards prairie with a beautiful lake at the side of its sandy shore. Jenny is quite unwell. We dined in Michigan Territory for the first time. Started, crossed the Chicago road, went 4 miles. Jenny is too sick to proceed. Left her and Henry at a house. He is to stay until she gets better. Good roads. Arrived at rock lake (Stone lake, Cassopolis) about 8 o'clock. Camped on the sandy beach. It is a large and beautiful lake.

June 29, (it really was the 30th) Sunday. Very warm. Goo—. This is the final entry. From her brother, Bennett, we learn that they arrived at their destination, Little Prairie Ronde, the following day. Readers are left to speculate as to how she intended to complete the entry. Was it to be another reference to "good roads?" We venture the opinion that she had had her fill of both good and bad roads. And then the thought may have crossed Charlotte's mind that a century and more later others of the clan might be perusing her little journal. Oh no! The very thought gave her pause and all she could think of writing, and never did, was "Good Night."

NIELS PETERSON'S USEFUL LIFE

Born in Denmark four score years ago he came to America at the beginning of the Civil War and to Decatur in 1890

Niels Peterson was born in Denmark in 1835, and died at his home in Decatur in 1916. He was eighty years old.

He came to New York City in 1861 and lived there until 1866. He then moved to Detroit where he conducted a ship-building business until 1890 in which year he moved to Decatur.

Mr. Peterson is survived by four sons and one daughter, John W., Niels C., George M., Edwin H., and Mrs. J.E. Foster. He also leaves thirteen grandchildren and one great grandchild.

His Work in Decatur

Back in 1882 Jurgen Jurgenson and family left their native home in Denmark and landed in New York in August. An uncle in Detroit sent transportation for the father and mother and they succeeded in raising the money to pay the fares of their three children. They went on to Detroit to look for work.

Mr. Jurgenson could not speak a word of English and was not succeeding well when his attention was called to an advertisement for wood choppers made by one of his fellow Danes. He answered the advertisement and found the advertiser to be Niels Peterson, a well-known ship builder of the city who had bought a tract of uncleared swamp land in Decatur. A deal was made and Mr. Jurgenson came to Decatur in 1883 and worked for him ten years, until buying the farm.

Mr. Peterson first bought four hundred acres in Hamilton and Decatur Township in 1882 and soon increased his holdings until he owned about thirteen acres. Six-hundred acres were bought of Thaddeus Hampon. All but a hundred acres was native swamp and timber.

He first tried the experiment of making charcoal. Eight carloads were made and shipped when the coal company failed and the project was abandoned. Mr. Peterson moved to Decatur in 1890 and since then his entire attention has been given to clearing and improving this land. He first began raising onions and one year had out thirty acres of them. He then built a distillery and raised a large acreage of peppermint. He employed many men and spent thousands of dollars in making this land ready for cultivation. It is doubtful if the enterprise was sufficiently profitable to him to pay for the energy he put into it but there is no question but that he accomplished much for the coming generations and for the village of Decatur. He was kind to his employees and prompt in paying them. He was the same in all of his tranactions.

Five or six years ago Mr. Peterson sold the greater part of his land holdings to the Michigan Agriculture and Commission Company of which T.F. Spellman is the manager, but he was too active to retire and was a busy man to the last week of his life.

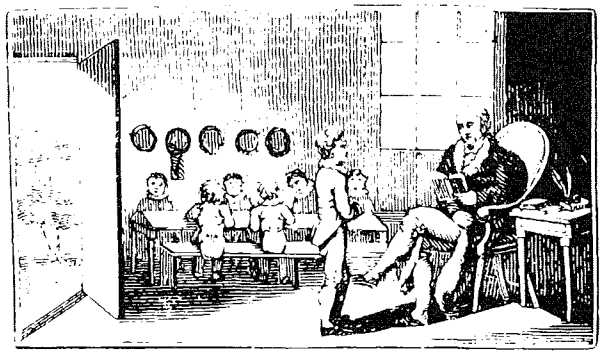
New Law Offices

NEW OFFICE — Warren Grosvenor and his son Warren (Brownie) Grosvenor are on the corner of Phelps and Sherwood streets. Mr. Grosvenor bought the old Brigham building and remodeled the first floor for offices and second floor for apartments. Warren moved his office last week from above the Smith Clothing store where he had been located for more than 26 years. He came to Decatur May 1, 1937, from Detroit where he had practiced law for nine years. His son, Brownie, as he is known in Decatur, is awaiting the results of his Michigan State Bar examination. He is planning to enter practice with his father. Brownie attended Kalamazoo College and received his law degree from Detroit College of Law.

$750,000 Project To Be Ready By Next Fall



Construction on Decatur's new $750,000 junior-senior high school was officially started Monday afternoon with ground-breaking ceremony at the site.

School Board President Paul Graham and Supt. Wayne Hellenga spoke briefly about the school and what it will eventually mean to the community and to the children. Miss Phyllis Adduci, president of the student council, delivered a message from the students concerning the event. The general contractor, Mr. Dave Carlson, was on hand and indicated that barring any material shortage or other unforeseen delays, the building would be completed in September of 1963. The general contractor is the firm of Carlson-Johnson Construction Co. of Otsego.

On hand at the ceremony were the members of the school board, Paul Graham, O. W. Newell, Raymond Gale, Charley Gerkey, Jack Knight, Louise Goodell and Louis Loeser, along with village president Andrew Broekhuizen, Noble Arent and Marion Davis, principals of the schools, Henry Houseman, Rev. Henry Stenner, Miss Phyllis Adduci and Mr. Dave Carlson.

Excavating Begins

Progress on construction was made almost immediately with the staking out of the area on Tuesday. Wednesday morning the subcontractor for the excavating, D. R. Kinney & Son, began the removing of four inches of top-soil.

The site is approximately between the tennis courts and the football field on the property owned by the school near the elementary building. It is the site that 686 resident voters indicated through petitions in approval of the school board's action in selecting the site. The board voted for this site with but one dissenting vote.

By GAR!

Mrs. Bradford, librarian at the Webster Memorial Library, pointed out an article in the South Haven paper recently which would indicate that Decatur is probably the best read community in the world, if what they said were true. The story stated that 75 per cent of the total circulation of the Webster Library was to people of the Village of Decatur. A little hasty figuring shows that this would mean every man, woman and child (including a few who are yet to be born) in the village had to take out 50 books a year. We are proud to be a part of such a community of book-worms, but we feel a little out of place.

Certain real estate transactions have occurred this past week around and including Archie McWilliams' gas station. Archie is ending 23 years as operator of the station. About 10 years back, he was given a sign from a printer at the Republican that he could hang in his window during deer hunting season. Each year as hunting time approached, Archie dug out the sign and hung it on his door.

With the sale of the station, Archie has no more use for it and has returned it to the Republican. The sign is still quite usable and has a lot of hunting seasons left in it. If anyone is interested in taking it over for his use, contact Clayton Howe at the back door of the Republican office.

KNICKERBOCKER LAKE

Fifty years ago, Knickerbocker Lake in Hamilton was a beautiful little sheet of water with several small islands. But during the past thirty years or so it has been ditched and drained and the water lowered, until its beauty is sadly marred and the little islands are a thing of the past.

One Saturday afternoon, in the spring of 1871, Dick Lyon and the writer, walked out to the Riddle farm, now the Em. Smith farm — to stay over Sunday with Thompie. We played cards nearly all night. Mrs. Riddle gave us a bountiful supper about midnight and we were as happy as kings with not a care in the world.

We slept until ten o'clock the next morning and after breakfast Dick proposed that we visit Knickerbocker Lake and see if we could find Knickerbocker's grave. He had been dead only some thirty-five years or so then. We started and about the time we reached the lake we were fortunate enough to meet Robert Sloan, who was one of the earliest settlers in that vicinity, and he told us what he knew about Knickerbocker. I am not quite sure, but I think that Mr. Sloan lived near there as a boy while Knickerbocker was still alive. Anyway he told us that Knickerbocker had come there in the early days, before any other white people and settled on one of the small islands in the lake and lived there as a hermit for a number of years.

Knickerbocker had been a wealthy man in some eastern city. He had been unfortunate both in love and business and becoming disgusted with the world he came to this, then wilderness, to pass his days. He finally died there some thirty years before the date of this yarn and at his urgent request was buried on the island where he had lived so long in solitude. His log cabin was left abandoned to go to ruin.

Knickerbocker's Ghost

Knickerbocker's ghost was also said to haunt the island at certain times, and was said to have been seen by several persons, walking about the old ruined cabin and the island as he had done while alive, ringing his hands and making strange sounds.

Well, us boys found a boat and went to the island pointed out to us by Mr. Sloan as the residence of Knickerbocker and we explored it thoroughly. We found a place where we thought the cabin must have stood and also a sunken spot in the ground nearby that might have been a grave, but nothing certain. We concluded to call it that and let it go and went back home.

The above story is taken partly from an old diary of mine and partly from memory. But this story about Knickerbocker differs radically from the one told in a Van Buren County history — published a good many years later. The latter yarn says that Knickerbocker was not a hermit at all but came there with his family from the East, settled on the banks of the lake, started to build a log house there but was taken sick from hard work and exposure and died only a short time after he came there. His wife took his body east where they came from, so he was not buried at the lake at all.

"You pay your money and take your choice" between the two stories but as for myself, I am inclined to believe Mr. Sloan's account of it. Anyway that's the most romantic version, and I've no doubt "the ghost walks." In any case, Dick, Thompie and I had an enjoyable day.

SAILING SONG
(building of the Soo Canal)

Oh, we didn't tarry-oh,
On the blue Ontario,
We were sailing to get ashore.
So we blew across the lake
With a wiggle and a shake,
Far away from Niagara's roar,
Got the captain's billy-goat
When we jumped his silly boat
At the head of the great St. Lawr.
But it took only a day
To blow in our pay,
So we shipped right back once more.
Oh, we will not tarry-oh,
On the blue Ontario-OH!
We're just sailing to get ashore.
Oh, it's a so-long to Saginaw,
And glad-to-meet-you Mackinaw;
Lake Huron, we're sure onto you.
You blew and swore to beat us,
But we've got the steam to treat us
To a glass and a lass at the Soo!

The Gospel Ship is now a-sailing
Bound for Canaan's happy shore.
All who wish to sail for Glory,
Come and join us, rich and poor.

BILL BEEK SELLS STORE AFTER 35 YEARS ON MAIN STREET

Decatur will be losing one of its most active promoters and longtime businessmen on Friday when Bill Beek sells his 5c to $1 Store to Robert Faulkner of Watervliet.

Mr. Faulkner owns three other 5c to $1 Stores in Watervliet, Coloma and Berrien Springs. He will take over Beek's store here at the close of business on Friday night.

Bill Beek came to Decatur from Toledo, Ohio where had worked at the Willys-Overland Co. where they made the Whippet cars. Nights he had been playing in dance bands.

Prior to getting married and with his wife Madge, for three years after they were married, he trouped on the Chautauqua circuit.

He bought the store in Decatur Feb. 15, 1929 from Marion Sale who had owned it for two or three years. This was located where Fruit Belt Plumbing and Heating Store is now. When the building next door burned in 1937, he moved the store to its present location, enlarging it in 1939.

For about three years Bill had a second store in Dowagiac but gave it up just before WW II.

Bill Beek has been most active in the promotion of business and events in Decatur as well as accepting responsibility as a good citizen. He was chairman of the Decatur School Board in 1950. He was also president of the Agricultural Society and was instrumental in putting on the Celery Festivals that the Decatur area will always remember.

Because of his trouper background, Bill was the guiding light in the production of 10 or 15 Minstrel Shows that were staged in the Decatur Township Hall over the years.

After the sale of the store Friday, Bill stated that his plans are still quite indefinite. Perhaps they will take a trip to Florida, but they haven't yet decided.

The Beeks have a daughter, Mrs. Barbara Fritz of Bloomingdale.

Long-Time Resident Writes of Family History

Miss Bessie Fuhrman, one of the long-time residents of the Decatur area, has compiled a short biography of her father, Levi Fuhrman and his descendants, which she has offered to the Republican for publication. It will be printed in two installments, beginning this week.

The Biography of Levi Fuhrman

Levi Fuhrman, my father, was a descendant of the Hohenzollerns, a German dynasty named for its ancestral castle in Sabia.

His grandfather Fuhrman came to this country to avoid having his sons waste years (as he thought) in the German Army. He settled in Pennsylvania, so he and his descendants became Pennsylvania Dutch. But for all he did not sanction that German law, he loved his homeland, and was proud of his German blood, for he insisted on retaining the German spelling of the name Fuhrman, by leaving the letter "h" in the name.

My father was self-educated, as the community into which the family moved when he was a child did not speak German. He would not go to school where he was laughed at because of his language.

Apparently his parents thought that he would change his mind and go back to school. But he never did. However later he saw his mistake and did all that he could to learn after he was grown up. Then he became an avid reader of the New Testament, other books such as natural history, the Life of Garfield, D. L. Moody, and other books, magazines and newspapers. He liked to have me read my magazine, "The Youth's Companion," on Friday nights after I came home from high school for the weekend.

Nevertheless, he never quite made up for his lack of early years in school. But his common sense came to the rescue when stock buyers (for instance) tried to give short weight, or tried other ways of getting the better of him.

Although he left school too early, he learned to work, and when he came to Van Buren county, Michigan, he came with his young wife and baby son Wilson, and his father and mother-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Flagg — Jesse Flagg, an Oliver plow salesman. They arrived in a Prairie Schooner, as many other pioneers did.

The hills of Lawrence township looked good to him, for they reminded him of Pennsylvania hills which he had left, never to see again. So he bought a 40-acre farm in Lawrence township, three miles from the village of Lawrence.

Later, the second child came, a daughter, Barbra May, and that year the Civil War began. In duty to his country, he enlisted but was rejected because of heart disease, they said. But he did not believe it. "Why, I've never been sick a day in my life," he said. He thought that the examiners had mistaken his excitement and worry over leaving his wife and two babies with the stock to take care of. And although he did not have to leave home then, the draft came and he was called — at the most inopportune time for they had gone on having their family. Then it was that a good friend got him a furlough so that he could return home and sell off the stock.

After attending to that sale made at a sacrifice for whatever he could get, he returned to the barracks at Kalamazoo. Then he learned that his Company had been sent out during his absence, and not long afterward, the news came that Lincoln was killed. Then as he looked out of the barracks' windows, the sad and most solemn occasion was brought home to him, for as far as he could see in the young city of Kalamazoo, every building was draped in black.

Soon after, the War ended, and Levi Fuhrman returned home with that historic memory of Lincoln's death forever in his memory.

Incidentally, the first time that I saw Kalamazoo, the scene had completely reversed. Where my father saw black bunting drapes, I saw red, white and blue ones, flags flying everywhere, and bands playing. It was "Old Soldiers" day, and Grant's son rode horseback in the grand parade, while the still numerous Civil War soldiers in their blue uniforms marched down the street. It was a historic memory, too.

After The War

On returning home, my father-to-be many years later, had to buy back his stock at whatever price charged. Also the big barn that he had begun and had to wait, was then continued and completed. But for all his sacrifice he was not given even his Army overcoat, but he did not complain.

That June his son Jesse was born and five years later, his daughter Cora. And she completed my father's first family of his marriage to Wealthy Jane Flagg.

As he had started out by buying a 40-acre farm, he added to it another 40 acres. Then an 80 and last of all, a 212-acre farm in Allegan County. His aim then was to give each of his four children a farm some day.

However, the last purchase was a nightmare for years. The beginning of the nightmare was forest fires that burned the fine timbers there. The next one was an unexpected drain tax of a hundred dollars (when a hundred dollars was as hard to get as five hundred dollars would be now) and no immediate benefit was ready to offset that extra expense. The farm adjoined Judge Severn's farm which needed draining, and the drain ditch had to continue through my father's farm. And added to the expense of the drain tax, he was paying eight per cent interest on the mortgage that he had given on the 80 acres.

I overheard my father and mother talking about that interest, and I said, "Papa, my arithmetic says six per cent is the legal interest in Michigan. You are paying two per cent above the legal rate." Right after that, my father and I drove to Paw Paw, for then Lawrence had no bank. My father went to the bank there and said to Frank Parks, the banker, "My daughter says that six per cent is the legal rate in Michigan. Haven't I paid eight per cent long enough?" And the banker thought that he had and he did lower the interest. But he did not know that "his daughter" was just a kid in the grades who had put her father up to getting his interest rate lowered.

As soon as he could, my father sold off two fifty-acre farms, and turned the rest over to a realtor. And that was another nightmare, for one man who bought the place went insane, and that sale was lost. Then other sales were attempted, but "no sale." Then one year there was a frost every month that year, and it killed the crops on the lowland or muck, and the first two families sold out and left.

By then Lawrence had a piano dealer, and I wanted a piano.

Having been to a party at the home of Mr. Pritchard, the piano dealer, I had seen the piano that was their demonstrator. It was a beautiful walnut cabinet grand, trimmed with four Acanthus leaves that looked as it they were hand carved. I got my mother to go and look at it. The result was that she had that piano sent out to our home on trial.

But when it came to purchasing that piano, the dealer and his superior, a man from Holland, Mich., came to our house and my father said that he would buy his daughter the piano if he could sell his "North Woods" farm. The man from Holland asked if the farm were in the hands of a realtor. My father said, "Yes, but he isn't doing a thing to sell it, it seems." Then the man from Holland said, "I know Hensel, and I will get him on the job."

However, when the trial period for the piano was up, there came the old dray to take the piano away, for the farm had not been sold. Then my father asked me, "Do you want that piano?" and I said that I did. So, when Mr. Pritchard arrived, my father said that he would buy it, and just as he had done many times before when he wanted farm machinery, he gave his note, and the piano stayed.

We were all very happy, for now I could play. I had previously learned to play on an old reed organ that my aunt left me when she moved to Washington State. The reeds stuck in places and squealed, the bellows leaked and the pedaling had to be done fast to make that organ play. But, by pulling out the squealing reeds with a button hook and with the help of the old organ book, a hymn book and a school song book, I learned to play "Nearer My God To Thee." And after that, other hymns and school songs.

As my piano was so much better than the old organ, I doubly appreciated it. But school began in two weeks after the piano was delivered, so I could not take lessons and go to high school. I was then a senior and had to continue high school. The lessons could wait, and they did for several years, until I took a year off from teaching school to have a very fine music teacher, a student of Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler of Chicago, a teacher who ranked with Padareska, as both were students of the same great piano teacher in Europe.

But for all my father had bought the piano on faith, the realtor did make a sale, and at last my father's worries about that investment were over. But the piano was the last gift my father ever made me, as he died before I graduated the following June.

The Story Of Donnie

Although one would think that a farm producing corn, oats, rye and wheat, two apple orchards, two peach orchards, and small fruits, and several gardens, was quite enough to keep a farmer busy. It wasn't, so my father added hogs, sheep, cows and chickens enough to lay thirty dozen eggs per week, and finding that with all those chores, that there was still more that he could do, he took up the raising of fine horses.

A man named Woodman, near Paw Paw, introduced the splendid French Percheron breed of horses into Van Buren county, and my father, who loved horses better than any other animal, built a horse barn, and took up the raising of Percherons. One of his favorites was Perchie, and she was his pet. She bore three beautiful colts. The third one was a "black beauty" for sure. An admirer of the then four-year-old Donnie advised my father to exhibit him at the Dowagiac Fair. So he did and put Donnie into the hands of a groom who knew how to take care of a horse. The result was when Donnie, shining like black satin, and his dull black mane and tail in contrast, was led forth for the exhibit, Donnie won the blue ribbon. And then a sale was made there on the Fairgrounds. Donnie brought more money than any of the other horses that my father ever raised.

The Period of Job-like Sorrows Of Levi Fuhrman

When Wealthy, my father's first wife was in her early forties, she became ill. The doctors could not tell what was the disease, and she passed away. Then my father-to-be had a post mortum and it was found that she had cancer of the stomach. The summer after her death, my father's wheat crop failed, for it rained too much and the shocks turned green in the field. Then the only thing he could do to save a little from all his hard work of growing that crop, his main one, was to feed it to the hogs.

Meanwhile, his mother-in-law and father-in-law resided with him and his two teenagers, Jesse and Cora, to make a home for them. But dear, sweet grandma Flagg had arthritis in her hands, and the hired girls were inexperienced and hard to manage, so grandma did the best that she could to keep house.

One day a man came from near Decatur to buy a horse, and he saw how very sad and discouraged my father was, and he said, 'You need a wife," and I know of a woman who might make you a good wife. She's a dressmaker and sews for my wife. She's a good cook, too. Come to dinner at my house and my wife will get her to come, too."

And that match-maker succeeded. My father married the dressmaker, a daughter of a Cass county pioneer from Cincinnati, Ohio, and almost two years later, I was born. As my mother lacked only a month and a day of being forty, it was even more of a worry, for beginning to have a family at that age was more dangerous than had she been a younger woman. But that worry was only the beginning of more worries and sorrows, for about then my father's older son lost his wife who left two little boys, Joey, aged five, and Eddie, aged two, and they had to be brought to our home. Then, my older half-sister, May, who had married Chauncey Rice and had borne him three children (losing the first one) moved to Janesville, Wis. There, the little four-year-old Neal jumped and dislocated his hip. The seriousness of the accident was not known until the examination showed that the little hip socket had closed up, and then those parents knew that their only son would be a cripple for the rest of his life. But that was not terrible enough. May fell down stairs and her daughter Nettie was born a month before time. Then childbed fever set in and May became dilirous. Then Chauncey sent a wire to my father to come at once.

Such a request to a man who had never taken a train but once before, when he and his first wife visited my father's sisters, Elizabeth, Sallie and Beckie in Illinois, must have been almost as much of a dread as taking off to the moon might seem to one of today's astronauts, but his darling daughter needed him. He would get there somehow, and he did. But when he arrived she did not know him and would not let him into the house. But he understood, and with Chauncey's help, May was put into the only hospital then in Janesville, an insane asylum.

My father brought home his little two-year-old granddaughter, Wealthy, and grandma Flagg brought Nettie, the infant, and later when May, under the good care of the hospital, recovered fully, both mind and health, came home with Chauncey and little Neal. Later they settled in Lawrence

Probably because of all the sorrow that my father was having, right after my birth my mother had a congestive chill that made her feel worse than she did at my birth.

By then my father's Job-like sorrows were over, and from then on he prospered as he never had before. But Donnie was the financial turning point, and he went on raising horses and selling them for several years.

As I grew older, I begged for a baby sister, but my father settled that by calling Nettie and me his twins. (Nettie Rice was born 25 days after I was.) And to make the role of twins more real, Nettie always spent two weeks with me every summer until she married at the age of twenty-two.

My Father's House — A House Of Refuge

After my father and mother had been married a year, my grandfather Goble came to live with them. He was then 80 years old, and his daughter, Aunt Belle, came too, to help take care of her father. Grandfather lived there until his 87th birthday, and passed away on that day. Aunt Belle continued to make her home with us.

But just before my grandfather died, a homeless boy of ten, Artie Myers, was brought to our house, to find a home for him. He had been shifted around from uncles and aunts for six years and never had a steady home until then, and as much as my mother had to do on a general farm, a child of six and her aged father, she decided that Artie could stay with us. And how glad I was to have a little brother. And, I may add, I could not have had a better own brother than Artie was through the years.

After Artie grew up and went on "his own," he got to be a moulder at the Round Oak foundry in Dowagiac. Then he got married and right away the foundry closed for an indefinite period. Then the young couple could not pay bills with no income, so the only place to go was home. And one winter's day here they came across lots from a neighbor's who had gone to Dowagiac after them. And once again our home was a house of refuge in the storm of life.

The only work on the farm in the winter time besides doing the chores, was cutting firewood. So Artie and wife stayed and Artie helped with the chores and cut wood so that when the shop opened he had money to start over, for of course my father paid him for his work.

But there were nieces and nephews who also found our home a place to live for a short time when they needed a home. One was Dell Goble who stayed there when his family went to Missouri. He did chores and went to school. But my father paid him for his work so that when his family needed money to come back from Missouri, Dell was able to send it to them. Later when a niece of my mother was left with her two younger children she came to our house with the two youngsters and stayed to help my mother until she had earned enough money to go on alone. Still later another niece was there from Decoration Day until in October, until her father could return from his visit to his sons in California. Then there was my mother's nephew, Wilbur Goble, who having lost his mother (and his father had gone to California) came in the fall and stayed during the winter and spring to help do chores. He was through school, and my father paid him for his work. Thus it was that someone always found a house of refuge at my parents' home, and those nieces and nephews loved Uncle Levi as if he had been their own uncle rather than one by marriage, as he was. This summer when Wilbur Goble returned from California for a visit, he came to see me and he had not forgotten Uncle Levi, for he said, "Uncle Levi was a grand man." And I quite agreed.

Levi Fuhrman Always Doing Something For Someone

One instance was when he passed a neighbor's house when bringing up the cows and his old neighbor came out to the road and said, "Levi, Johnnie has gone off somewhere with his girl, and I don't know when he'll be back. I'm out of wood and it's getting colder. Could you let me have some wood?"

"Of course, John. Just as soon as I can lock the cows in the stable, I'll bring you some wood." Then when the cows were stabled, he loaded up a farm push cart with wood and wheeled it to his neighbor, built a fire for him, and made the lonely old man comfortable until Johnnie came home.

Besides being neighborly, he was always being called upon to be a pallbearer for some old settler, as he was one himself. He never was too busy to attend a funeral, no matter how much work he had. It was dropped until after the funeral.

Two Memories Of Historic People

Had it not been for my father I would have missed having the memories of two historic characters who represented a part of Van Buren county's history, as well as that of our nation.

One Sunday my father drove my mother and me to Children's Day at the Prospect Lake school house. I remember a big boy, Jimmie Abrams, spoke a piece, "Nobody Knows But Mother," and I thought that he was going to cry any minute. But after the exercises were over and we were driving home in an open two-seated buggy, a shower overtook us. So we drove into the driveway of a deserted farmhouse. The woodshed door was open so we got out and went inside the shed for shelter, and there we found a stranger. I never had seen a black man before, but there was one sitting there. He was the blackest Negro one could ever see, and so very short that it looked as if his legs had been cut off at the knees. I began to cry. The black man said, "Oh little girl don't be scared of me. Why you ought to see me in watermelon time. How the boys and girls do come to see me and eat watermelons."

The watermelons and all those boys and girls helped some, but I was glad when the shower was over and we got out of there.

When we got back into the buggy my father said, "That man was Darkie Banks. He was a slave freed by the Civil War and Abraham Lincoln."

Although it meant nothing to me then, I remembered about the former slave, an innocent old colored man, that I had had the privilege of seeing and of hearing him talk — a privilege now forever gone to the present generation.

Another character that I would have missed seeing was an Indian who came to get bark for basket weaving. My father offered to give him the bark, but he would not take it unless he could pay for it with baskets. So my mother ordered a market basket and a clothes basket. When they were delivered I saw two ponies hitched near the driveway. Then my father brought the Indian in with the baskets and had him sit down in the living room so that I could see an Indian. And by the way, the baskets were perfect. As to the Indian, I was too young then to realize that I had seen Chief Pokagon, the best educated Indian in America. He read both English and Greek. Later when I found that he had written a book, I got it and read it — a beautiful story entitled "The Queen of the Woods." The Queen was his wife, and the setting was the wild woods of Michigan. It was a very lovely glimpse of Chief Pokagon's romance and his later sorrows.

So once more my father had given me a chance to see one of America's Indians of a bygone age. A man above reproach, despite the firewater that would have wrecked his own life, had he not had the good sense to let it alone after one experience of getting drunk.

Another memory that I had at an early age was that of listening in my high chair to Talmage's sermons.

When the Lawton Leader began publishing Talmage's sermons, my father subscribed for the paper, and as I was too little to take to church, every Sunday morning I was locked in my high chair to keep me quiet while my mother read Talmage's sermons to my father. The only one that I remember was about Daniel in the Lion's Den on a Snowy Day. I was not sure that I knew what lions were, but I knew what a snowy day was. However, I realized that I had been introduced to one of America's greatest ministers of that day, and even if I did not comprehend the sermons then, I was curious to read them later when I could understand them.

How My Father Favored Uncle Jake Flagg

My father's brother-in-law, Jake Flagg, was just a boy when my future father married his sister, Wealthy Flagg, and it seems that Uncle Jake became attached to Levi Fuhrman as if he were an only brother. And when Jake grew up and married he had become accustomed to roving over Indiana and Illinois as he traveled with his father on his Oliver plow sales trips. Consequently it was hard for Jake Flagg to stop roving after he married. He would sojourn a while in Illinois, then back to Van Buren county and Levi's for a new start. As Uncle Jake had learned the carpenter trade he was always sure of a carpentery job at Levi's, and that roving back to Illinois or Indiana continued so that some building for my father became a monument to each return to Michigan. Once it was a kitchen with two bedrooms and two porches; another time it was a granery with a tool shed attached. Later a chicken house, and still later a wood house. But the last of Uncle Jake's carpenter work was when he made a large kitchen cupboard just like the little one that he made for me when he build the barn (granery). I still have that cupboard as a remembrance of dear Uncle Jake.

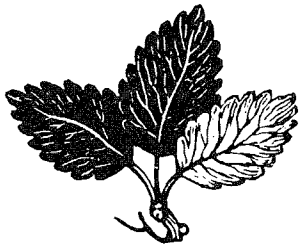
The Last Days Of My Father Levi Fuhrman

He had looked forward to seeing "his twins" (Nettie and me) graduate, but six weeks before we finished high school he was taken by a stroke. He lived just from Tuesday a.m. until Thursday a.m.

Having been born on Christmas and dying so near Easter that his funeral was the day before Easter, it was as if his life had paralleled that of the Lord, to that extent. However he was a Christian, and before he came to Michigan he joined the Church of Christ. As there was no Church of Christ in Lawrence, my mother's minister and mine, Rev. Walker of the Lawrence M. E. church preached his funeral sermon. The church choir from the Baptist church to which Chauncey and May belonged came from Lawrence and sang his favorite hymn, "When the Roll is Called Up Yonder, I'll Be There."

The family flowers, a large sheaf of Easter lilies, covered the top of the casket.

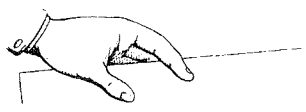
And while it seemed impossible to give up my father, when I looked on his face for the last time it was as if he had just closed his eyes on a heavenly vision. No words could then or ever have consoled me as seeing that radiant expression on his face. And now I still remember Levi Fuhrman, my father, as the kindest man that I ever knew.



The Gold Mine Under The Decatur Swamp Discovered And Utilized

A man who had been brought up near Decatur, but on the south side of that swamp, was the man who started, not from "scratch" but from the ideas of Albert M. Todd (later a Congressman), and his name was J. P. Warner. Somehow he got people to buy the land, drain it, and grow peppermint, and as a distillery was necessary to get the oil out of the plants, he built a distillery and distilled the peppermint oil.

Quite a number of people bought the swamp lands and grew the peppermint that on the rich, black muck produced more oil than any other land could.



75th Anniversary Of First Church Of God Oct. 23

Rev. Paul Aurand, pastor of the First Church of God, announces that the ministers who will assist the church in the observance of its 75th anniversary service will be Rev. Henry Houseman, local pastor and teacher; Rev. Robert Hurt of Marion, Ohio, pastor there and a former pastor of the local congregation; and Dr. Walter Doty president of Gulf Coast Bible College, and the tenth pastor of the local church.

The open house will be held at 7:30 o'clock Saturday evening, Oct. 23, followed by services. There will also be special services Sunday at 11:00 o'clock, followed by a basket lunch.

The public is invited to attend these services.

A brief history of the church is as follows:

In the autumn of 1889, the first meeting of the Church of God of Decatur, was held in the East Decatur school. The first meetings were held in private homes, and at times grove meetings were held in what was then known as Simmons Grove near the East Decatur school house.

In 1906, a building was donated by Uriah Rumbaugh for services. This building was at 408 George street. By 1928 a larger building was needed so the Free Methodist church at the corner of St. Mary's and George streets was purchased. The dedication of the building was on June 10, 1928.

During the pastorate of Rev. Swecker, the parsonage at the corner of George and Prospect streets was purchased. It is today's present parsonage.

In January, 1952, it was decided to build an addition to the church. In this sixteen-foot addition was an enlarged pulpit area, pastor's enlarged pulpit area, a pastor's study, choir dressing room, choir loft, and additional classrooms.

The present pastor is Rev. Paul Aurand, and he has served the congregation for seven years. Fourteen pastors have preceded him.

Mrs. Mettie Beardsley, 304 W. St. Mary's street, is the oldest member of the present congregation. Her father was Uriah Rumbaugh who gave the first building to the church. Her great great granddaughter, Debrah McBride, is the youngest member of the congregation.

Decatur Physician

Dr. Bope Still Practicing at 94

By VERNE BERRY
Gazette Staff Writer

DECATUR — Dr. William P. Bope of Decatur modestly admits he may be the oldest practicing physician in the state of Michigan.

He will be 94 years old April 22 and has been practicing medicine since graduation from medical school 68 years ago.

"I guess everything has happened to me that could happen to a doctor. It's been a good life and a full one. I wouldn't change a thing if I had it to do over," he says.

Dr. Bope accepts office calls each afternoon from 1 to 5 in his office on Decatur's main street. Visitors usually find him sitting in a rocker in front of the romanesque windows reading the latest medical journals.

Or callers may find him at his desk typing poetry, an interest that ranks only second to medicine. "I have a file drawer full of these things," he says pointing to a couple typewritten pages of poetry.

He is still able to read without glasses, although he uses them most of the time. A hearing aid dangles forgotten over one ear. His movements are sure and his step is confident as he moves about his office. His face reflects a full life but wears the years well. His hands are smooth and strong, but the doctor says they are no longer steady enough for surgery or making sutures.

Stepping into the office is like stepping back half a century. High glass-front bookcases along one wall hold medical volumes of today and yesteryear. A black divan lurks in one corner, and a sturdy desk commands the center of the room.

On the desk are the doctor's worn leather bag, four or five medical journals and a small slate on which "In Soon" is chalked in a spencerian script.

Facing Dr. Bope's chair is a companion rocker. Here generations of Decatur patients have sat as they described their symptoms and heard the doctor's words of assurance and counsel. To the rear of the reception office is the doctor's treatment room, and in back of that is a small laboratory where bottles of chemicals and medicine line the shelves.

Dr. Bope was born in 1871 in Shelby County, Ill., and when he was six years old his parents bought a farm and the boy attended a country school, and later a Normal Academy in a nearby village.

Securing a teaching certificate, he taught in country schools including his home district for three winters, leaving teaching, he enrolled in the Starling Loving Medical School in Columbus, which was later absorbed by the Ohio State University.

He was graduated in 1897, an era, he says, when "doctors were a drug on the market. They should have plowed some of us new graduates under.

"There were no requirements of internship or state board examinations in those days. The state gave medical graduates a certificate which stated, 'You are now qualified to practice medicine and surgery in all of it's branches.' "

"That was not true," Dr. Bope says. "It was a crime to turn us loose on the public."

He says young graduates soon learned cities had all the doctors they needed, and the villages were in about the same situation.

Dr. Bope selected a village with the charming name of Lilly Chapel, Ohio, to try his hand at this new profession. The community was in a prosperous farming area with a population of 300.

One of his first patients was a maternity case. Dr. Bope says he never delivered a baby, and when trouble developed he sent for a Dr. Quinn in a neighboring village.

Dr. Quinn arrived and asked, "What's the matter young fellow, having trouble?" Dr. Bope admitted he was. Dr. Quinn told the young medic to take care of the delivery while he administered the chloroform, the only anesthetic available in that day.

Dr. Bope paused, then suggested they switch ends. The older man gave him a knowing look, agreed to the change and all proceeded well. "It was a breech presentation, but the baby and mother did fine," Dr. Bope says. The doctor doesn't know how many babies he has delivered, "I just didn't keep score. That was one of my weaknesses, keeping of records."

At the end of his first year he found that after paying his board bill at a small hotel, his livery stable bill and rent for a "less than ordinary office" his net profit was not much better than he realized in teaching country school. He decided to seek greener pastures to practice his profession.

He relocated in Lawrence, Mich., where he established an office and became interested in community affairs. He served as a member of the school board, was physician for the county infirmary and was county coroner.

"In January of 1902 I married the queen of the village down, Mayme Rockwell," Dr. Bope says. Two daughters were born to the couple, Louise and Lynwood.

In 1907, Dr. Bope moved to Decatur where he has been actively engaged in practice ever since. He occupied the office of the late Dr. G. L. Rose. Within a year he had a home built at 112 W. St. Mary's where he and his wife and Louise still live.

With the advent of the automobile, Dr. Bope bought a car to make his calls in the village and countryside. He kept his horse and buggy and also a sleigh for emergencies. He recounts several races with the stork through blizzards and towering drifts to snowbound farm homes.

Two years ago, he realized that he had not seen traffic signals at a couple of points and he mailed his driver license to Secretary of State James Hare. Hare responded with a letter

Dr. Bope's poetry often has a whimsical touch. One is an ode to his Dodge written at the time he traded it in after using it 12 years. Another is about Eve in the Garden of Eden which remarks "her attire left much of Eve to admire."

Among Dr. Bope's prized items are photographs of himself with his friend Edgar Bergen and Charlie McCarthy, a certificate of commendation from President Eisenhower and pictures of his celery farm.

After settling in Decatur, Dr. Bope acquired a tract of muck land and became engaged in growing peppermint and celery, boom crops in Decatur at the time. The doctor says that he marketed his celery by the carload, and some years shipped out a dozen carloads, "a small part of the local crop at that time."

Dr. Bope says that in 10 more weeks he will have been in practice a full 63 years. When does he plan to close shop? "I'll be here as long as my patients need me," he says.

MICHIGAN'S ONE FOREIGN COUNTRY'S WORLD'S FAIR EXHIBIT

By Bessie Fuhrman

Michigan's only foreign World's Fair exhibit came from Holland, or The Netherlands, many years ago, and not expecting to be a World's Fair exhibit in Michigan. Nevertheless, the growth and progress of Holland, Mich., has resulted in a three-day tulip festival that appears to be of World's Fair stature. This is because it seconds Holland country in its national tulip celebration, when the tulips of Queen Juliana's most beautiful tulip garden (given her as a wedding present by her countrymen) is exhibited. So if that does not make Holland, Michigan's tulip three-day presentation a World's Fair exhibit, what else can it be?

This year our only foreign country World's Fair exhibit had added emphasis for two reasons: the shipping here of the Swan, and the placing of it on Windmill Island, and the centennial of Hope college. Still further consideration from Holland country came when Prince Bernhard of The Netherlands took time out of his extremely busy life to dedicate the 200-year-old Windmill, and to give the centennial speech at Hope college. And each of the two events took place right on schedule. If the tulip festival had occurred then, it is likely that Prince Bernhard would have taken it in his stride, all on that same day. However, he found time while he was here to give a speech at an honorary convocation at the University of Michigan and to receive an honorary doctor of civil laws degree from the U. of M. Later, he returned home, right on schedule.

It seems that all the reporters on the Prince had the same reaction, "The Prince is a likable man, and down to earth."

What Further Is There About Prince Bernhard?

As someone may ask, "Who is Prince Bernhard?" I am reminded of a little girl whom her mother took to see President McKinley. When the child looked up at the President, she exclaimed, "Why mama, he's just a man."

Yes, President McKinley was just a man, but such a very good one that his country gave him its highest position — the Presidency of the U. S. A. Thus God blessed McKinley exceedingly.

And has God blessed Prince Bernhard exceedingly?

Judge for yourself. He married the only daughter of Queen Wilhelmena, one of the best loved queens in Europe, and when that daughter, Princess Juliana, became queen, Prince Bernhard became the husband of a queen, and later, when the first child was born, he became the father of the future queen of Holland, now Princess Beatrix, and three other queenly daughters. Besides, Prince Bernhard has been most helpful to his country, both in war and since. His great adaptability to the task in hand appears almost miraculous, but everything he does lies in the line of duty to his family and to his country.

Anyone desiring to read a book on the life of Prince Bernhard should get Alden Hatch's work, "Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands," (1962).

Holland, Michigan's 1965 World's Fair Exhibit

This year, the great tulip display and Dutch events opened with 50,000 people rushing in to see the unique event. Governor George Romney was there helping to clean the streets Dutch fashion as in the old days. In the Cloppen Dance all the dancers were girls because the boys were not in the mood to put on wooden shoes and dance. But since half the girls dressed like boys, it was all the same in appearance to the audience.

There is no question about it that the old Windmill drew its share of visitors during the three-day festival which is said to have had an attendance of 300,000 people, and 1,500 more arrived afterward on Sunday.

While Michigan is proud of her great tulip center, it is seen that the tulips are but another case of the great hand of Michigan, handing out benefits. This time it is sheer beauty through the distribution of the tulip.

Now that we have seen something of the wonder of that ancient Windmill in connection with the tulips, I wonder if the age of that 200-year-old building is not a great item of interest to all of our country.

Being 200 years old, it was 11 years old when the Declaration of Independence was signed. Hence, it is older than our country, and about a lifetime older than Michigan as a state. Thus we can see from it how very young our nation is, and how amazing is the growth of both the United States and Michigan, the latter from under 22,000 people when it became a state to its present 7,866,000, which is expected to reach 10,000,000 by 1970.

Letter to the editor

Dear Editor:

I want to thank the Webster Memorial Library of Decatur through the Republican for the gift of a very rare book. The title of it is "Atlantis: The Antidiluvian World" and it was copyrighted in 1882 by Harper and Brothers of New York.

Apparently it was written at the cost of a very long research period. It claims that the Atlantis was described in Genesis.

Of course Atlantis and its tragedy is the main part of the story but there are other very interesting stories, too, such as the mystery of the Mound Builders who built their mound and pyramid shaped homes in the Mississippi River Valley as far north as the banks of Lake Superior where they discovered copper and turned it to account; also where they built great earthen ramparts, and then after a considerable population had become established, those Mound Builders suddenly and mysteriously disappeared to some unknown location.

Another very interesting story is that of the invention of bronze, and of the bronze age in Europe as well as after it became worldwide. Besides much, much more on other subjects such as ancient pottery, the gold of Peru, and the discovery of tin and zinc that made the invention of bronze possible.

Thus Mr. Ignatius Donnelly, the author, painted on the mind of the reader a world that now seems strange enough to have been on another planet than ours.

The gift of this rare book resulted because of my several loans of it by the library, loans which undoubtedly helped to put it into the discard, as a book no longer repairable.

Nevertheless, this book should never be discarded, for its vast view of the earliest civilization makes it invaluable as a chance to see how civilization, as of today, has advanced since then.

I am, therefore, very grateful to have had the gift of this great book.

Bessie B. Fuhrman.

APPRECIATION

We have received from Mrs. Lydia Bartholomew of Kalamazoo, and a former resident of Decatur.

Just a word of appreciation in memory of Arou Moulton.

His daily life is spoken of a man of sterling qualities.

He would not print an article that might hurt his business associates. Once upon a time, many years ago — 1902. An account came thru "The Republican" criticizing those who patronize Sears Roebuck mail order houses. We had often found it convenient to write mail orders, receiving good service and some courtesies. I answered it. He returned the item with apologies stating it was a good article. He would not publish it as it might hurt the business men. We felt it was not giving the country people an equal voice. However, we could see his position in the case and have been a regular subscriber for many years.

The letter which follows was written by Clyde Herrick of El Cajon, California in tribute to Mr. Moulton.

Your last edition brought me very much sadness, for Decatur and all who knew him, lost one of its and their greatest friends for Arby Moulton was one of the best men Decatur ever had or will ever have. He was always true blue and always ready and willing to help. He never wandered away from the old sod like many of the rest of us.

He spent his whole life in the one place, the place of his birth. I knew his father and Arby was an exact picture of him. I can not find words to express my sympathy of or for him.

His last editorial was of a request I asked of him. He did it for me and got results. I had promised a letter telling him about the Morris Murder and who committed that terrible deed but I just put it off too long. That shows we should not put things off as we may be sorry.

Since I have subscribed for the paper, I have lost several old friends. Arthur Marks, Calvin Millard, Beulah Hemenway and now, Arby.

Well, when God is ready, we must go and He sure has been kind to us all for to let us live so long. The old farmers and mechanics, masons and builders and publishers have hued and paved the way for the young in heart. Now let's see if they too can be as great as those who have answered the last call.

Vice-president of the American Radiator Company

Max Donald Rose was born in Decatur in 1885 and was a member of the 1903 graduating class of the local high school.

Following his graduation he attended the University of Chicago and later became associated with the American Radiator company, its affiliates and Successor Company, for more than 40 years.

Mr. Rose is now retired and lives at the Carlton House in New York City, where he has resided for 30 years. Mr. Rose likes to travel and spends a portion of each year in Europe.

He has no family, except for his brother, Dr. Dalton Rose, whom he visits frequently and Dr. Rose's daughter and family, the Joseph McLain Stewarts, who live in suburban New York. He greatly enjoys the children, Alice and Molly.

Mr. Rose has always been a devoted Republican and he feels that we badly need the "continuing guidance of President Eisenhower's able hand."

Mott Fellowships To Ted Vliek, Phillip Clark

★ ○ ○ ○

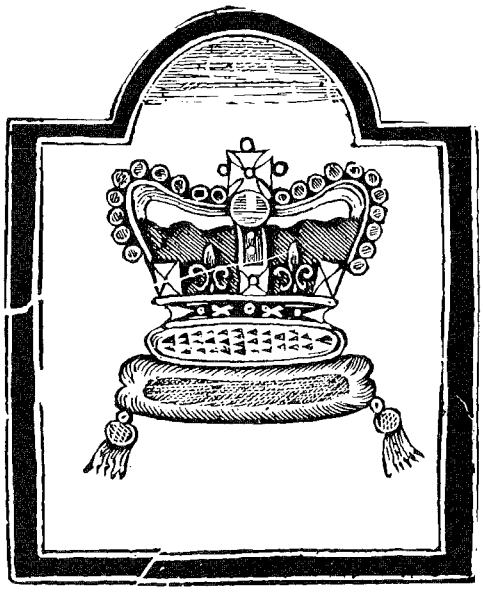
Two former Decaturites have received notable honors this past week by being awarded one-year $8,000 Mott Foundation Fellowships. They are Ted Vliek, who is presently the assistant principal at Portage Northern high school, and Phillip Clark, assistant principal at Gull Lake high school.

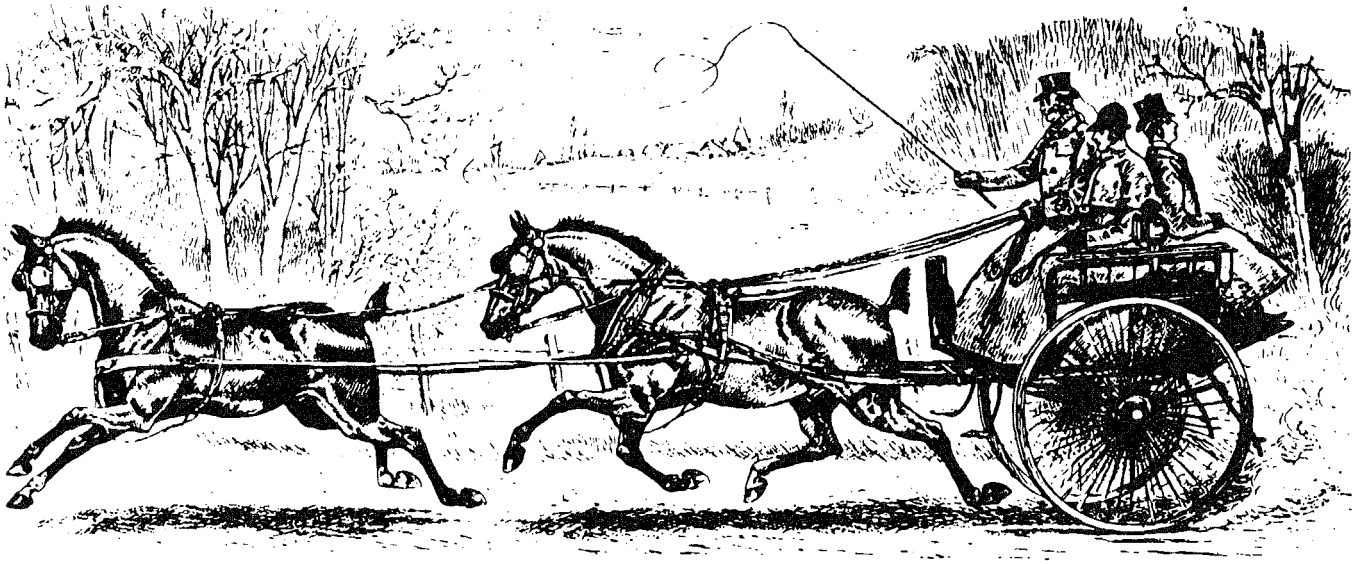
The fellowships are the largest of their kind. They were awarded this year to 50 educators, selected from about 2,000 who applied, representing every state and some foreign countries. The educators who have received the fellowships will participate in the Mott Inter-University Clinical Preparation Program for Education, Flint, for nine months. They will complete their degrees at one of the state universities.

Ted Vliek is the son of Mr. and Mrs. George Vliek. He was a 1948 graduate of Decatur high school and is a graduate of Western Michigan University. He received his Masters degree Apr. 16 from Western.

He will take a leave of absence from Portage Northern for a year to study at Eastern Michigan University. He will reside with his family in Flint.

Phillip Clark is the son of Mrs. Mildred Clark and the late Truman Clark. He was a 1957 graduate of Decatur high school, and a 1961 graduate of Western Michigan University. He will receive his Masters degree from Western this summer. He has been with the Gull Lake community school system for five years. Besides being the assistant principal there, he is also director of community education for the system. He is in his fifth year as director of the Van Buren Youth Camp.





Fancy Rig Gets Around

CHUCK ELLIOTT, pony team enthusiast and harness-maker, has one of the slickest and fanciest rigs in the area. He showed his matched ponies and wagon at the Allegan Fair this week and later this month will provide a service for the Bloodmobile. He will take kids for rides during the day while their mothers (hopefully) are donating blood. Chuck's rig is sponsored by C. W. Krum & Son Chevrolet agency.

Tom Mathias Only American To Place In Sled Dog Races at Inlet, N. Y.

The setting for the All American Sled Dog Race could not be any more beautiful or perfect than in the Smoky Mountains by Inlet, New York. The race drivers found themselves accommodated in a $600,000 lodge set in a valley with a chain of four lakes running the length of the valley. The scenery and excitement of the weekend race will not easily be surpassed by any other event.

The 31 rugged miles of the race trail were practically melted away under the dog paws and sled runners of Eddie Sylvain of Canada in 1 hr., 55 min., .01 sec. in total elapsed time. This means his team ran each mile in less than three and one-half minutes per mile. Mr. Sylvain is this year's champion of Ottawa City, Canada.

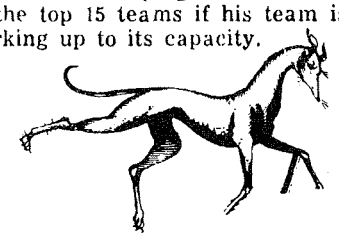
In second place was Guy Charconneu from Quebec City, in 2 hrs., 57 min. He is this year's champion of Quebec City, Canada.

In third place was Gene Bastian of Quebec City in 2 hrs., 1 min., 38 sec.

Twelve seconds behind him, and the only American to place in the race was Tom Mathias of Decatur in 2 hrs., 1 min., 50 sec. Tom lost time when he made the decision to grab the lead dog of the runaway team of Bill Bogenrieder of Niles after his team flipped him off the runners on the icy lake trail.

In fifth place was a former North American champion from Cedar Rapids, Iowa, Art Allen, in 2 hrs., .02 min., 33 sec.

On Feb. 24, 25 and 26 in Laconia, New Hampshire, will be the world's championship race. There will be 45 top teams from all over North America. There will be many former world championship teams entered. Competition will really be keen during the three days of the endurance runs for a total of 60 miles on drivers and dogs. Tom is hoping at least to be in the top 15 teams if his team is working up to its capacity.



A Musical Family

The 500 Club owes a debt of gratitude to Frank Smith of Chicago, for the rare musical treat at the last two evening parties. Musicians are born, not made and Mr. Smith is of the real type. The pleasure was not all ours, for he enjoyed it equally well. He isn't engaged in concert playing now, however; his business is piano tuning and he is very incessantly busy and in Decatur once in a while when his business calls him.

Frank's father was one of the o.' renowned violinists of his day, the well remembered Homer Smith, who tapped the back of his violin with the bow to call attention to the proper execution of the dance calls, until there was a groove worn in the back of his violin. His family of two children, Frank and Florence, were musical progenies and Frank's family has inherited the same gift.

We hope to still be having 500 parties when he returns again to Decatur. Mr. Smith was very pleasantly entertained at the Fassett home.

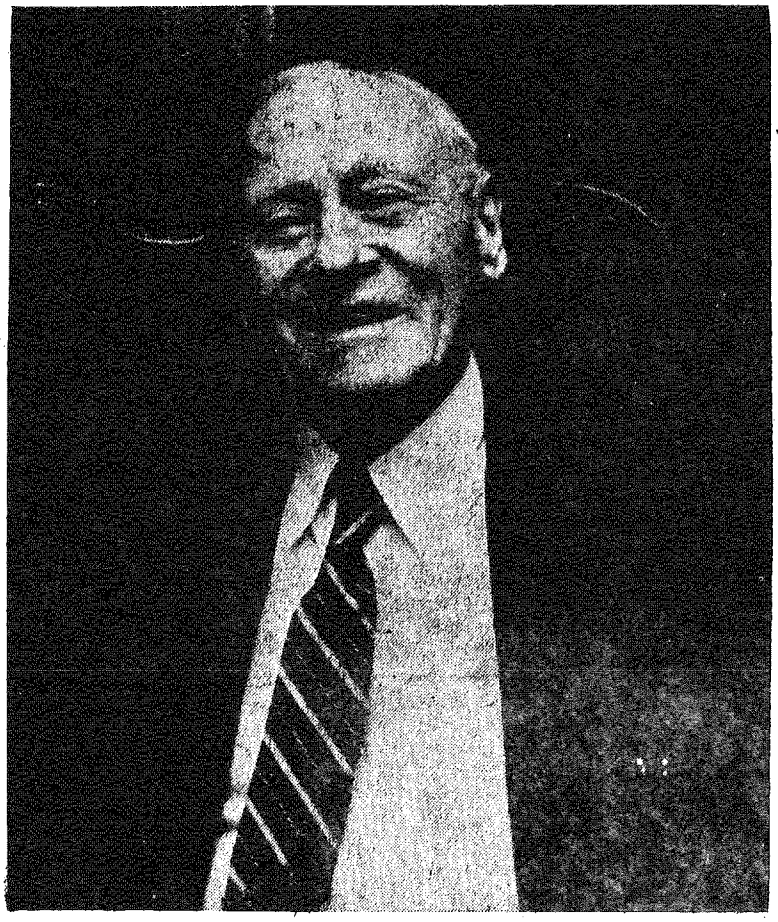
An Englishman, a Scotchman, and an Irishman were indulging in reminiscences of sporting occasions.

"The closest race I ever saw was a yacht race," said the Englishman, "in which one of the boats that had been recently painted won by the breadth of the coat of paint."

"The closest race I ever saw," declared the Scotchman, "was one in which a horse, stung by a bee, won by the height of the swelling on his nose."

"The closest race I ever saw," said the Irishman, "is the Scotch."

Death Takes Dr. Bope Monday at 96



Dr. Bope in 1959

Dr. William Perry Bope, 95, long-time Decatur resident and probably Michigan's oldest practicing physician, died Monday at 10:00 a.m. at his home on St. Mary's street.

Dr. Bope, named Michigan's Doctor of the Year in 1957, practiced medicine for 70 years, 60 years in Decatur. He had continued to see his patients on a part-time basis until about three weeks ago.

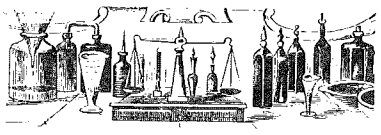
He was born Apr. 22, 1871, in Shelby county, Ill., the son of Perry and Elizabeth Bope. He attended Starling Loving Medical College in Columbus, Ohio, which was later affiliated with Ohio State University. Following his graduation in 1897, he began his practice in Lilly Chapel, Ohio. The following year he moved to Lawrence, Mich., where he remained until 1907 when he moved to Decatur with his wife and two daughters.

He served at one time as village president, was a member and physician for the Decatur Fire Department, and was a life member of the Decatur Masonic Lodge No. 99. The Decatur medical center built last year was named the William P. Bope Medical Building in his honor.

Dr. Bope is survived by his wife, Mary Rockwell Bope; two daughters, Miss Louise Bope, at home, and Mrs. Lynwood Cudlip of Detroit; five grandchildren, and one great grandchild.

Funeral services were held at 2 p.m. Wednesday in the First Presbyterian church. The Rev. John Osborn officiated and burial was in Oakwood cemetery. The members of the Decatur Masonic Lodge conducted Masonic rites at the grave. Sevrel funeral home was in charge of arrangements.

PRESCRIPTIONS



The Chavileer House At The Foot of The Big Hill

Pictured here is the large house at the foot of the hill South of town, as it looked probably at the turn of the century. The house was built by the Chavileer family and later owned by the Fifields. The photo was provided to the Republican by Ransom Kinney, who once lived in the house.

Aye Strain

We made a Great Discovery this week.

For years we have listened to old-timers tell about the trials and troubles (and sometimes fun) connected with "Fifield Hill, and we just couldn't believe some of the stories. But the hill they talked about isn't the same hill as we see it today.

In 1914 the hill was cut down and flattened out considerably. The buttes overlooking the Decatur marsh (muck land) were cut down and the dirt was used to gently slope the road at the foot of the hill. The incline, nearly a mile long, was tamed to a grade of six feet to the 100, from a "hill so steep that even a foot passenger found it difficult to travel it," as was reported in the Dowagiac Daily News in 1914.

The work back in 1914 was done with 10 or 12 teams. One cut five feet deep for 200 feet was made and at one point 25 feet of fill was put in. A sizable task for horses and men.

Much of the work of lowering the butte was done with dynamite, the papers at the time reported, "the terrific detonations following the explosions swell across the marsh into Decatur township on the north and surrounding townships on the south."

Picturing the hill as it was before 1914, we can believe the stories told of teams slipping on the ice and rolling to the foot of the hill, suffering broken legs and general serious abuse. One fellow told us of his father who would stop his carriage at the top of the hill and stick a rail through the wheels of the carriage so it would slide down the hill rather than roll and could be controlled.

The name of the hill is generally pronounced by strangers and newcomers

(In regard to "so-called" Fifield Hill.)

A story in the Republican of Feb. 8, 1945, begins as follows:

"The big hill two and one-half miles south of Decatur, over which the New Swamp Road takes the traveler into Volinia township and Cass county, is commonly called Fifield Hill after the man who lived at the foot of it in the 80's and 90's.

"Before it was known as the Fifield Hill, it was Chavileer Hill, named for the equally prominent farmer who lived in the same place a generation before him."

The family name in its French form "Chavalier" is not uncommon in this country. It may be found in many city directories. There is a family tradition that the father of farmer Chavileer was a Chevalier when he came here from France, but his Pennsylvania Dutch neighbors changed his name.

The hill was known as "Chavileer Hill" for years before Fifield moved into the neighborhood.

Norman Webster, who was a direct descendant of the Chavileer family, deeply resented the transition in names regarding the big hill.

Following the printing of an article in the Republican last week about the big hill south of town, we have been informed that our information was scanty at best, and some facts were in error.

We are grateful to some longtime residents, Ransom Kinney and Catherine Howland in particular, for straightening us out on some facts about the hill, the house and the names.

We have been referring to the hill as "Fifield" hill and we still see nothing wrong with that, but we hasten to add that the house was built by the Chavileer family and later owned by the Fifields and also by the Lannings and the Masuras.

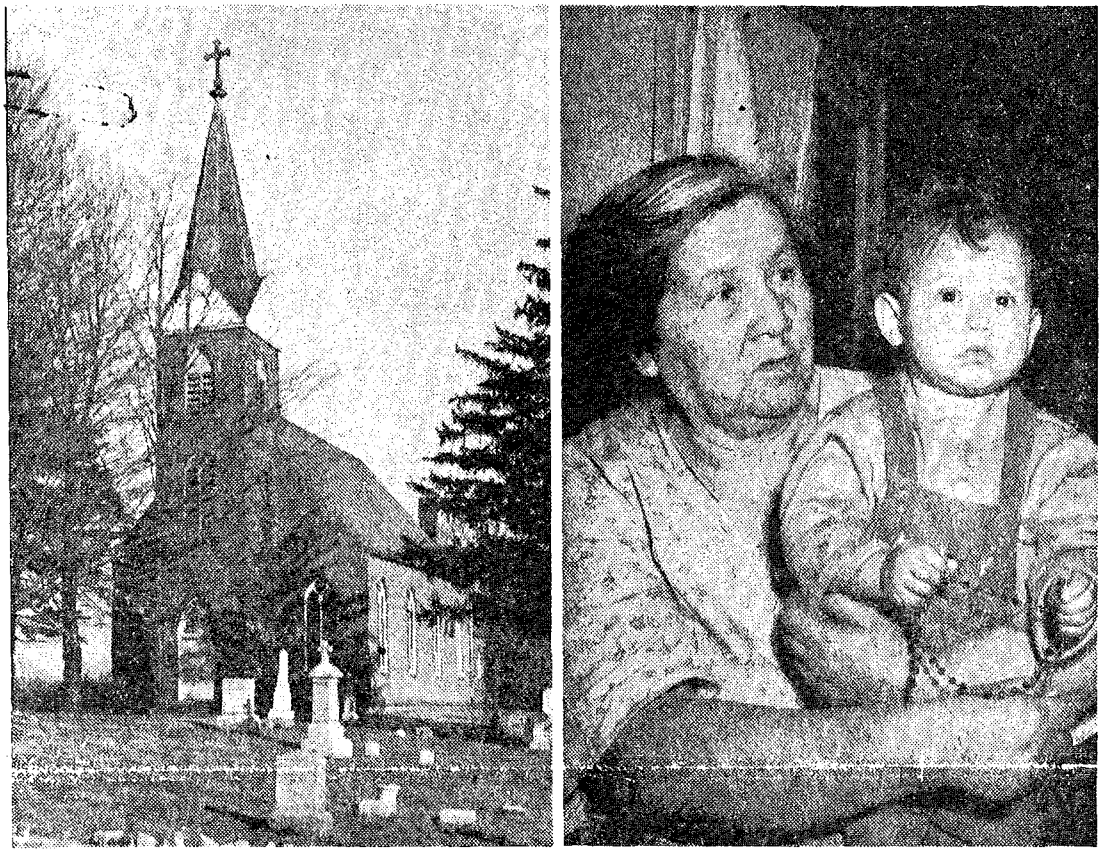
Why the name "Fifield" seems to have stuck on the hill, we don't know . . . it could just as well be called Chavileer Hill, or Lanning, or Masura or Loeser Hill for that matter.

Ransom Kinney in speaking of the hill, mentioned that about the turn of the century he lived in the house and he has many recollections of the house and the hill and incidents surrounding it. Among other things, he mentioned that he and Freddie Smith were the only two boys who were able to ride their bicycles all the way up the hill without stopping . . . apparently an enviable feat in those days.

The history of the house, as well as the families that lived in it, is fascinating, particularly the story of Francis or Frank Fifield. Before moving to this area, he was a state representative and big in the mercantile business, at one time having four schooners on Lake Huron.

For strangers to Decatur, like ourselves, these facts of history surrounding the area are extremely interesting and if errors arise they are the result of enthusiasm more than anything else.

Church Endures as Memorial to Pokagon.



The Sacred Heart of Mary Catholic church, Silver Creek township, Cass county, Michigan, stands on 40 acres of land given to the church by Chief Pokagon of the Pottawatomies. The right corner of the edifice was built over Pokagon's grave. The cemetery, largely Indian, is still in use. At right are the oldest and youngest direct descendants of the chief living in the Silver Creek area. Mrs. Libbie Alexis, great-granddaughter of Pokagon, holds her 18-month-old granddaughter, Karen Wesaw.

Indians Still Worship on Historic Site

BY BEATRICE BROWN.

DOWAGIAC, Mich., Jan. 3.

Those who use the term "Indian giver" slightingly have never heard of Pokagon, wise leader and beloved chieftain of the Pottawatomies.

North of Dowagiac, the people in Silver Creek township know that the red man could be generous as well as brave. For here in their midst, on a rise of land overlooking the countryside's jeweled lakes, is the Sacred Heart of Mary Catholic church, behind which is a long history of Indian devotion.

On Original Site.

It stands on the site of Pokagon's log chapel, built in 1835 as a mission for his people. The golden spire of the present edifice bears aloft the cross of the red brick church, a corner of which was built over the great chief's grave. The church stands protectingly on the rim of a saucer-like cemetery where rest side by side the Indians and the white settlers, who later came to live and worship in the Silver Creek community.

The church was built on 40 acres of ground given by Pokagon to the bishop, the chief of the Black Robes, as the priests were called. Pokagon journeyed to Detroit, then at the edge of Michigan territory, to ask the bishop for a priest to lead his people to the Great Spirit. Two years elapsed. The chief made a second journey. This time his request was granted. A young Belgian, Father Deseille, came to instruct the people.

Snow Covered Altar.

The Indians built a crude log chapel, one end of which was open to the winds. Here the missionary took up his priestly duties. Oftimes during the winter the altar was covered with snow.

The youthful Black Robe was truly an ambassador of the Great Spirit. Pokagon was pleased.

Priest Stricken.

In 1837, after two years of strenuous service, the young priest was stricken with a fatal sickness. He drew himself to the foot of his crude altar to pray for his beloved "children of the forest," and then turning to bless them, he died.

The next day when the news reached South Bend, people came out to find the Indians sorrowing and praying, but Father Deseille was not touched, for they were afraid to touch the body of the priest.

Later, a new missionary, a Father Petit, came to Silver Creek, and Pokagon took heart again, setting about the building of a bigger log church. This was accomplished in 1838 with the aid of a white man named Barney and two helpers, who provided the tools and technical skill which the Indians lacked.

Calamity Hits Tribe.

A year later, calamity struck the Pottawatomies. The government demanded that they give up their lands and migrate to Missouri, according to the terms of the treaty of 1833 which their chiefs had signed in Chicago. Pokagon, however, had signed only with the provision that he and his tribe be exempted from the exile.

In 1839, he was to see the four other Pottawatomie tribes driven by soldiers with bayonets on the long migration. He was to learn that his own Father Petit, who had accompanied these hapless tribesmen, had died with scores of others as a result of the frightful marches. He found himself and his exempted people persecuted by government agents who offered $50 to any person who could "persuade" an Indian to migrate to Missouri.

Pokagon Dies.

Bowed by woes that had befallen his race, Pokagon lived only to be united with the Great Spirit. He died in 1872 at the age of 62. Could he have foreseen the sequence of events, his heart would have been lighter.

In 1846, Rev. Louis Baroux assumed the pastorate and with the exception of seven years spent in Bertrand, devoted his life until 1870 in the service of the mission. Only one year after Pokagon's death a school was started by priests of Notre Dame, and from 1874 to 1879 taught for five years supported by funds which the government had stipulated should remain with the government for that purpose.

One of Pokagon's sons, Simon, was educated at Notre Dame, and succeeded in collecting for the tribe a claim of $150,000 against the United States for sales of Indian lands.

Church Is Crowded.

Pokagon's descendants, with their white neighbors, still attend the present Silver Creek church, erected in 1886 after Father Baroux's church burned. In the summer their attendance is swelled by resorters from the surrounding lakes. So crowded is Pokagon's church then that many must kneel on the steps outside.

Because of Chief Pokagon, there is a corner in Cass county that will remain forever Indian, 40 acres hallowed by his labors and his devotion, and dedicated throughout time to the Great Spirit of all mankind.

ANNUAL TRIP TO SUGAR BUSH

Indian Chief Weesaw Had King Sized Sweet Tooth

By BEATRICE BROWN

CASSOPOLIS, Mich. - Weesaw, Potawatami chieftain, like the rest of his Indians had a sweet tooth. Perhaps on account of his position in the tribe, he had a king sized hankering for sweets.

In his day, A. D. 1825, only a few white men had set foot in his domain, and things were still in the produce-it-yourself stage. So of course, Weesaw had his own sugar-making industry.

In his village on the banks of the Dowagiac creek, near Volinia, Weesaw and his tribe passed the winter moons. Then came March, Onambini, the moon of the crust on the snow. Onambini was also the moon of sugar making. Did not the loud cawing of the first crow announce the fact?

Breaking Camp

Weesaw called his band together and gave the order to break camp. The bark wigwams, and the winter shacks would be abandoned. The tribe would gather up its small supplies of clothing and skins, its assorted tools, its meager possessions of cooking pots, together with the remnants of their food supplies, and move a day's journey northward to the maple groves.

Weesaw, proud warrior, led the march, followed by his three wives in order of their preference. The favorite of the great chief Topiatoa was his favorite. She, forsooth, scorned him nor would her pillow be to carry heavy packs as did the other squaws.

Weesaw walked erect and statelily as befitted his station. His six foot stature was clad according to the true Indian concept of grandeur. Over his deerskin tunic he wore a silvered breastplate, highly polished, and his leggings were trimmed with small bells that tinkled with his every step.

His moccasins were fine, made, adorned with brightly dyed porcupine quills. Around his waist he wore a bright sash, and on his head a turban of matching color. From his nose and ears depended large silver rings.

[illegible] in March

[illegible] the chief and his [illegible] the lodges and then [illegible] and children, about [illegible] all. Upon reaching the [illegible] wigwams were hastily patched. As the leaves crowded shelters [illegible] were built [illegible] and provisioned.

The [illegible] while day the trees were tapped. Weesaw had learned the process from his forebears. Now he had but to give the orders. Men of the tribe chopped the trees with an axe. Elderberry branches, with their pithy centers pushed out, were sharpened and driven into the tree. These conveyed the dripping sap into troughs hewed out of logs.

When these filled, the squaws collected the sap and emptied it into a large iron kettle that swung on a pole over a continuous fire. As the scum formed, they skimmed it off, watching in happy anticipation as the syrup boiled and thickened. At first the tribe would have their fill of the syrup. Then they would cook down the rest until at last it crystallized into sugar, enough to last many days.

Sugar-making time was the happy interlude between the cold monotony of winter, and the busy work days of later spring when the tribe would move to their summer village on Little Prairie Ronde where the squaws made gardens and planted corn, beans, melons and pumpkins.

No Claims to Fame

Unlike his great contemporary Pokagon, Weesaw laid no claim to fame. Records tell only of his sugar making and give him credit for befriending the white men who came to his encampment seeking food and provisions. Beyond this there are few facts, except his tragic death.

In 1832 he had removed his band from Cass County to Berrien. Not long afterwards, Weesaw's son, crazed by alcohol, shot his father. But perhaps Providence was not entirely unkind, for thus the proud chieftain was spared the calamity that was to befall his tribe a few years later when they lost their lands and were exiled to the [illegible] stretches beyond the Mississippi. For an Indian king who loved to make maple sugar, such a fate would indeed have been unbearable.

A kiss is the only really agreeable two-faced action under the sun—or the moon, either.

WHAT WEESAW WROUGHT

CASS COMMUNITY OF VOLINIA — NEVER VERY LARGE, ITS REMARKABLE SETTLERS WERE ITS LONGEST SUIT

By: B.C. Hibbard, Gazette Correspondent, Kalamazoo, Mich.

An Indian chief who liked white men's whiskey.

A family who preferred letting trees rot into the ground rather than make a fortune by cutting them.

A miller who built his mill more than a half mile from the dam.

And a group of farmers who organized a society which almost eliminated horse stealing at a time when such thieves were hard to catch.

These were some of the remarkable people who have lived in and near the small village of Volinia since 1825.

The village itself is remarkable. It was never platted nor incorporated. It just grew and took the name of another community named Volinia five miles away. The people who lived in the original Volinia insisted on calling it "Huycktown".

The new Volinia didn't grow very large. It now totals a dozen houses or so, two stores, a church and a school. It is set in one of the most beautiful spots in southwestern Michigan; a flat, park-like expanse, ringed by glacial hills, about half-way between Marcellus and Dowagiac in Cass County.

The Indian chief was Weesaw, a Potawatomi, whose village of about 20 families was situated on the north side of the Dowagiac Creek just northwest of present Volinia.

Although Weesaw, like all Indians, was nomadic in nature and moved around in several counties, he seemed to regard the Volinia area as really his home. He is known to have resided there in 1825, and possibly years before that.

Weesaw was consistently friendly to the white men even though they were taking over his ancestral lands. In 1827 a party of government surveyors working about 10 miles north ran out of food.

Knowing Weesaw's friendliness, they sent a couple of men to his village for a supply. He not only furnished the food but helped carry the provisions back to their camp.

Weesaw tried to get a patent from the government for himself for three square miles that included the present site of Volinia. Not succeeding he moved into western Berrien County where he died in 1834, reportedly murdered by his own men in a drunken brawl.

The family who loved trees were the Newtons. The first of this line was James Newton, who arrived by wagon through the woods in 1832. His deeded land included Weesaw's old village and he slept his first night on his new tract in an abandoned wigwam belonging to one of Weesaw's braves.

James Newton was a member of the Constitutional Convention that framed the first document for the State of Michigan, and later served in the legislature. His son, George, held various local offices and also served in the legislature.

The Newtons had a patent on 660 acres of land, of which they only cleared 260, leaving 400 acres of virgin timber, untouched by axe or plow.

Major Newton, son of George Newton and a bachelor, continued the family tradition and refused all offers for the timber which, as the years went on, became extremely valuable.

In 1896 he was tricked into selling 40 huge walnut trees. The selling price was $10,000, an enormous sum for forty trees then. But Major Newton was heartbroken to see axemen working in Newton's woods, as the tract was called at that time.

The buyer was a German firm that imported woodsmen from Germany, cut the trees close to the ground and then afterwards dug out the stumps. All the wood went to Germany where it was made into gunstocks for the German army.

Major Newton never sold any more trees. Some time after his death, the property came into possession of Fred Russ who presented it to Michigan State University for a forestry school. The university has done some cutting and has cleaned up the fallen trees, but otherwise the land is just as Weesaw left it.

Russ Forest, as the woods are now called, snuggles up to the west side of the village of Volinia. The old Newton home is now the area headquarters of the Forestry Department of Michigan State University.

The miller who built his mill so far away from the dam was named Amos Green. Some time in the 1860's, he built a mill on the creek just north of the village and dug a mill race from a dam upstream.

The mill race was a deep ditch about 10 feet wide at the bottom and 3,000 feet long. The labor to dig the trench through the trees must have been tremendous.

Why Green the miller chose to locate his mill at this point on a rapidly running stream which had dozens of better mill sites is a mystery to the modern generation.

The mill, however, prospered for many years. In 1889, after Green's death, it was sold to Irvin M. Skinner, who installed new machinery for making flour and also a cider press.

Skinner operated the flour and cider mills for about 20 years until his accidental death on October 7, 1909. He accidentally backed into the revolving main shaft and a cog caught his clothing, pitching him against a beam. He died a few hours later.

The mill never ran again as changing conditions made operations unprofitable. Hardly a trace is left of the old mill. The long mill race, which once was the best fishing spot in the township, has been used as a dump and much of it is filled up. Some of it has escaped the dumping but the fish are gone.

The Volinia Anti-Horsethief Society was organized in 1852 at a time when thieves were causing great losses to the farmers of the township. It was so successful in catching the thieves and recovering the horses that horse stealing died out in the area. The society was continued as a social organization for many years.

Today, Volinia does not appear on most maps and it no longer has a postoffice. Residents get mail from Decatur, telephone service from Dowagiac, and send their children to Marcellus schools.

Nevertheless, it has a very vigorous life on its own. The people still show the independent spirit that animated their ancestors, the early settlers.

First Local Serviceman Killed in Vietnam

Word was received Tuesday morning of the death of Army Specialist Clarence Gipson, 21, son of Mr. and Mrs. Sam Gipson, Route 1. Clarence was killed Monday in Vietnam while on patrol as a member of the Airborne Infantry, Co. A, 25th Division.

Clarence had served in the Army for 14 months and was sent to Vietnam in August 1966. The report stated that he was hit by small arms fire while on night ambush patrol and was admitted to a field hospital where he died Monday.

He was a 1965 graduate of DHS and was quite active in sports. In 1964 he was named the most valuable player in DHS athletics for the year.

Clarence was one of 13 children. The youngest is a daughter, born Tuesday, Apr. 4, at the Gipson home. She has been named Maxine Rose.

Funeral services are incomplete at this time, but it is expected that the body will arrive in Decatur in about 10 days for burial here.

Funeral services were held Tuesday for Specialist 4, Clarence F. Gipson who was killed in action in Vietnam on Apr. 3. The services held at the First Presbyterian church were conducted by the U. S. Army, American Legion and V. F. W. Burial was in Harrison cemetery. Rev. Henry Houseman officiated and Newell funeral home was in charge of arrangements.

Word was received here after notification of his death, that he had been awarded the Silver Star in Cu Chi, Vietnam, on Mar. 19. Spec. Gipson earned the medal on Feb. 26, when his unit, Co. A of the 9th Infantry's 4th battalion, was attacked by numerically superior Viet Cong force. The 21 - year - old specialist constantly checked with his men and encouraged them as they tried to hold the company perimeter. As they were forced to withdraw, Gipson remained behind to cover them.

Gipson was awarded the Silver Star by Major General Fred C. Weyland, commanding general of the division.

Spec. Gipson was a 1965 graduate of Decatur high school. He entered the Army in January, 1966, and was stationed at Ft. Benning, Ga., before going overseas in July, 1966.

He is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Gipson, Route 1.

DEATH OF CARL SQUIER

Bad news travels fast, and I am sure that many of you already have heard that one of our most respected and, indeed, beloved associates, Carl Browne Squier, died yesterday. He was 74 and had been a pivotal figure in the growth of Lockheed for nearly four decades.

The passing of a member of the family is always a shock, and it is particularly so in Carl's case. It is no exaggeration to say that had there been no Carl Squier, there quite conceivably would have been no Lockheed today.

It was he, you will recall, who came to Burbank in 1929 as general manager of the Lockheed Aircraft Company division of Detroit Aircraft Corporation, and who struggled so valiantly — but futilely — to prevent its being dragged into bankruptcy, along with its parent firm, in the depression year of 1931.

It was Carl who depleted his own savings and mortgaged his car and home to meet payroll demands in 1932. It was Carl who, believing that "the Lockheed name is too good to die," refused to sell the Burbank plant itself on a piecemeal basis. It was Carl who took the late Robert E. Gross on his first tour of the factory, a tour that led to purchase of the assets of the company by Gross and a group of associates for $40,000 in June 1932. Out of that purchase came formation of the present corporation.

In those years, Carl became the world's best known airplane salesman — a title richly earned in a period when his wide acquaintance with sportsmen aviators, private operators, and airline people, as well as his ability to sell unknown and untried Lockheed products, kept the hopes of the struggling new company alive.

But salesmanship was not his only talent. Carl was a good administrator, both in the pre-1932 days and later. He demonstrated a broad capacity during World War II years when, as Lockheed Overseas Corporation's executive vice president, he oversaw the building and operation of our military aircraftre assembly and modification base at Langford Lodge, 20 miles west of Belfast, Ireland. Within four months Lockheed employees under Carl's supervision had built a modern industrial city that reassembled and modified 3250 airplanes, serviced 11,000 more, and overhauled 450,000 components — a tremendous contribution to ultimate allied victory. And it was only one link in a Lockheed service empire that ranged also to Africa, China, and remote island outposts in the Pacific, all under Carl's stewardship.

Vice president-sales from 1932 to 1956, Carl in the latter year became assistant to the president. He retired from that position in 1958. He was a member of the board of directors from 1934 until 1963, when he was elected an honorary director and continued to be available for consultation.

Carl was the 13th licensed pilot in the U.S. In World War I he was a combat pilot with the 90th U.S. Aero Squadron, formed a friendship with Eddie Rickenbacker that continued through the years, and earned the Croix de Guerre — which, typically, he never discussed. He counted among his friends many flying greats — among them Lindbergh, Amelia Earhart, Wiley Post. But most important to him, always, was Lockheed — its people, its plans, its prospects.

Carl's memory and spirit will live with us always. We all extend our deep sympathy to Mrs. Squier and to his two daughters, Mrs. Robert L. Henry of Mexico City and Mrs. Gilbert Jones Jr. of Los Angeles.

Funeral services are scheduled at noon Wednesday at All Saints' Episcopal Church in Beverly Hills. Burial will be at Valhalla Memorial Park close to the Lockheed airport and location of the Portal of the Folded Wings. The family asks that no flowers be sent, but contributions may be made in his memory to the Cancer Research program at the UCLA Medical Center.

Researching Centennial Farms In Hamilton Township

LETTER TO EDITOR

Dear Editor:

I was asked to research the centennial farms in Hamilton township because I live here and have had so many relatives who took up land in the township. In inquiring for the number of centennial farms, I learned several interesting things about the 1800's, as everybody was so helpful.

The Howard's great grandparents came from Buffalo in 1837, and took up land near Hamilton township. They first built near a spring. They thought the good road would go past their new house, but it didn't. It was the Territorial Road and it went through where there was a streak of oak trees with very little underbrush. Many have called it an Indian trail, and perhaps it was. They knew where there was less work to making a trail or a road for wagons or the stagecoaches.

In about 1861, the Celery Center Road was made ahead of the two teams of oxen and two of horses when Aunt Jane Brooks and Silas Mumaugh came from Ohio with four little children and her brother Nelson. They came to Decatur and six Indians came ahead of them and cut the stumps off even with the ground to make a road for them out to their new farm. While men were working at the railroad track about a half-mile from the house, Aunt Jane used the handcar to go to town for groceries on the railroad track.

After a couple of years, Nelson went home and great grandma said to Ruthie, "Janie needs you. You had best go to Michigan and help her." So she did, and when then Civil War soldiers came home she undoubtedly met grandpa at the Grange dances as she spoke of them many times and named over many people she was acquainted with in Hamilton — Bullards, Byers, Broadhurst, Comley, Haydon, Hager, Guntles, Osborns, Rosevelt, Gwilt, Roth, Mead and Sturr, just to mention a few that probably gratefully enjoyed the dances and fairs here.

Then great grandma sent her youngest, Sophia, to help Janie, and after a while, she married Jim Comley, a widower. His daughter Hattie married George Tisdale, a resident of Hamilton.

Several cousins came and took up farms nearby. One was John Brooks and others were Mary and Orin Maxon.

Most farmers in the 1800's did general farming to raise a year's supply of food. When they had nice things, they enjoyed showing them at the Grange Free Fair. One told me she remembered seeing the fruits and vegetables in one end of the hall and flowers in the other. I understand the last Fair was about 50 years ago, and that the hall was built in '76. Before that, the dances were held over the tavern.

Selling logs was not only the way they cleared the land, but also the way they paid for their places. The Nesbett saw mill in this township sent lumber by train to New York, then by boat around to California.

Mr. and Mrs. Calvin Millard purchased their place in 1837 and came from Connecticut with a baby girl. Not long afterward Calvin passed away, but even though Lucy had been raised in the city, she stayed, and it was in her house the first Sabbath school and day school were taught in this township, and by her.

Frederick Knickerbocker took up ground near the lake that has been named for him. He was buried on the island. The estate appraisers in September, 1841, valued 160 acres of his land at $400. This is now owned by Ward Cady and Millard Phillips, our township supervisor. He also owns the most of what was called the Waldo Phillips place. Waldo's wife inherited it. It had changed hands three times in York State before her grandfather bought it in 1854 and settled on it.

The Charles Byers farm is a centennial farm near the Field school and the Reason and Sarah (Sloan) Comley place now owned by Mr. and Mrs. Raymond Mead was purchased in 1841 by Mr. Mead's great grandparents. This is another of the few centennial farms in this township.

The Haydon farm near this township was noted for fancy horses. This township was noted for peppermint and the best flavored celery. They are also of the past now.

One of the letters loaned for the Hamilton Grange centennial display was quite interesting. "1845, This letter will enclose $3 for my taxes. You will please pay them and if there is any money left, keep it as your own. I hope you will have an eye to my lot that no depreciations are committed. I understand your Central Railroad will be completed to Kalamazoo this winter. When it is completed to St. Joseph, it will be a noble thing for Michigan.

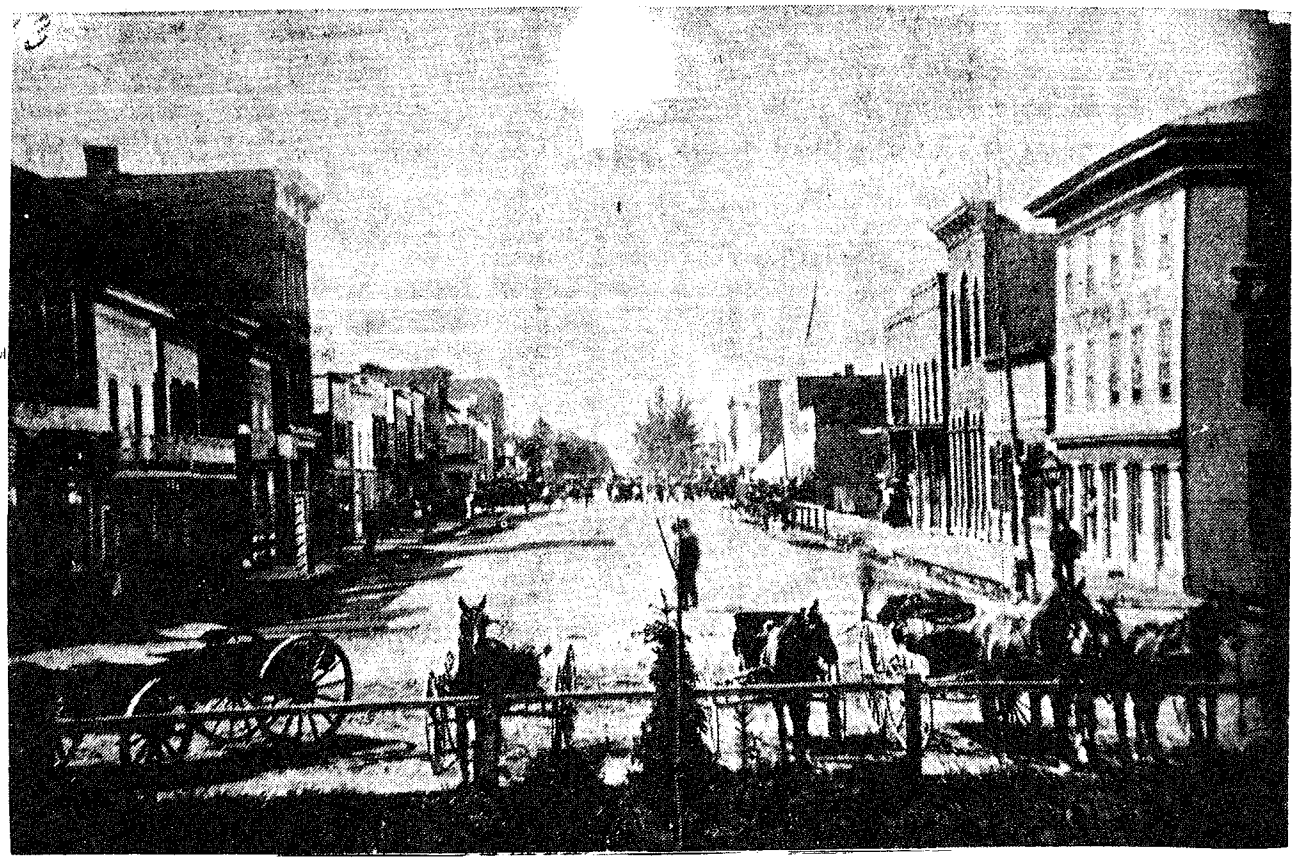
"First Things In Decatur"



PHELPS ST. DECATUR 1893 — The photo above is from the collection of Miss Grace Weeks. This was taken from the village park looking north up Phelps St. The large building on the right is the Duncombe House which is now a vacant lot next to the News Stand. The other buildings can all be identified by Miss Weeks.

(Because of the unusual interest in the early days of Decatur by many of the students of the local school, the following article is being reprinted from the Republican files of March and April, 1916, written by William H. Tuttle.)

Who Named Decatur?

Until the year 1847, the village of Decatur was not, and its site was simply a fine hunting and fishing ground.

In that year Beers and Sherwood of New York City obtained a government grant of 5,000 acres of land hereabouts, and when the Michigan Central Railroad was completed through to Niles, they donated the present ground used by the Railroad to get a station established here.

I have never been able to find out who it was that named the place, but all accounts agree that it was called Decatur after the celebrated Naval officer of that name.

The village was first platted and named in the year 1849, and the first store was opened in the same year by Col. T. E. Phelps, on the corner of Sherwood and Phelps streets, where the Brigham building now stands, and for a year this was the only store in the village.

First Excursion On The M. C.

The first train over the Michigan Central railway passed through Decatur some time in the fall of 1848, probably in October, but I can find no definite date, and the first excursion train was run over the road on Oct. 7 of this year, from Detroit to Niles, and this was probably the first passenger train over the road and it carried excursionists from all way stations. Probably not many from Decatur went on this first excursion, for there were very few people here then.

The first station agent for the M. C. Ry., was a Mr. Goddard, and the first telegraph operator I think was Billy Weed.

The First Buildings

The first building in Decatur, that I can find any record of was a shanty put up by C. T. Tucker in 1347. It stood south of the railroad, and was used by Tucker as a boarding house for the railway hands.

Decatur was first incorporated in 1859. E. P. Hill was the first president, and Orrin T. Welch was the first recorder. But the village had been platted for a number of years before this time. Hiram Lee bought the first lot in 1848, even before the ground had been platted. This lot was designated as the third lot west of the village square.

The first school house was the "Old Red School House," built in 1848, on the north end of what is now Wally Greenman's lot, and the first teacher was Miss Sarah Cook, with twelve pupils, and the first school was opened in the winter of 1848-49. Probably not one of those first scholars are now alive.

The first postoffice here was established in 1852, and George Sherwood was the first postmaster.

The First Newspaper

The first real newspaper in Decatur was "The Van Buren County Tribune" published by Chas. P. Sweet. I can find nothing to show the date when the Tribune was born, but from my own recollections I think that it was some time in 1860. It was discontinued in the summer of 1864. It was never much of a newspaper.

But there had been before this a few numbers of a supposedly Decatur paper — printed in Paw Paw by Rufe Nash — and brought over here for distribution, but it only lasted a few weeks. It never had any printing office of its own in our village. Does any old inhabitant remember anything about that short-lived paper, and what it was called?

The Oldest Swamp Road

The first road across the big swamp south was built by Beers and Sherwood in 1849 and was completed in the fall of that year. It was estimated to cost $2,000, of which the Railroad company contributed $500, and the village $300. The records do not say who paid the balance, but probably it was Beers and Sherwood.

A small section of this road was planked but the greater part was made of split logs laid on stringers. It was a rough road to travel over and for years after it was built, whenever a team passed over it, one could see it weaving up and down, ahead of and behind the load.

The first passenger to pass over the new road was a Miss Hathaway (afterwards Mrs. A. B. Copley) who was taken across by Mr. Goddard, the station agent, on Nov. 6, 1849, only three days after the road was completed.

Beginning Of The Churches

The first church society in our village was the Presbyterian organized Feb. 1, 1852, by the Rev. Marcus Harrison with only three members besides himself. There had been before this time traveling Methodist ministers through here and they probably preached in the village.

A Methodist organization was effected in 1834, but the records do not say where, and it was probably somewhere in the country, as the first Quarterly Meeting was held in July of that year at George Tittle's.

About 1853 or 1854, Mr. Harrison bought a lot and presented it to the Presbyterian society and a building was begun, and completed in 1856, and Sept. 18 of that year it was dedicated, the sermon being preached by the Rev. A. C. Tuttle of Paw Paw and that was the first church building in Decatur.

The first church bell in town was bought by subscription and was hung in the Presbyterian steeple about 1858 or 1859. I was going to school here at that time, and I remember that after the bell was put up, it was rung almost constantly all day long, every person that had helped to buy the bell being entitled to ring it so many minutes, according to the size of his subscription. Everyone rang it every moment of his allotted time and it was kept going all day long. This is the same bell that is in use today.

The first regular pastor after the completion of the church edifice was Rev. Samuel Fleming, who succeeded Mr. Harrison in August, 1855.

The first Methodist church building was erected in 1860. I can find no record of the first minister's name but from my own recollection, I think that it was the Rev. Mr. Jones.

The first Catholic church service in Decatur was held at the residence of Henry Brown by Father Koopman of Marshall. He preached there four or five times, about 1855 and then Father LaBelle took charge and the meetings were held at the home of Dennis Jordan during the next ten years.

The first Catholic church building was started at the west end of Delaware street about 1867. The walls for the building to rest upon were put up and dedicated with considerable ceremony, but for some reason, unknown to me, it was given up and not completed. The society afterward purchased the Universalist church building, which they still use.

Decatur's Only Distillery

The first mill of any kind, inside or near the village limits, was a saw mill put up by Beers and Sherwood in 1850, near the western limits of the village and the railroad.

The saw mill did not last long, but was converted into Decatur's first, and it is hoped the last, distillery. I can remember being in this distillery, when I was a child. They made what was called high wines, which I suppose is the same as alcohol. They also kept a large number of cattle and hogs and fed them the distillery slops.

I have seen that low ground just west of the village fairly covered with cattle. The hogs ran loose, and were as wild and savage as wolves and had to be shot to catch them.

I was at the distillery with my father one day when a fight broke out among a drove of hogs feeding there and you may believe me it was a fight to the death. Some of the swine got hurt so they bled freely, and as soon as one would begin to bleed the rest would pitch onto him and literally tear him all in pieces and devour the remnants. Several of them were eaten in that way.

Father said that they were all crazy drunk from eating the distillery slops. Anyway, it was a bloody battle and scared me nearly into fits.

They had a good many accidents in the distillery, too. The first one that I remember hearing about, was when Will Harris — afterward a resident of Hamilton for many years — undertook to explore one of the vats with a lighted lantern, causing an explosion and burning him badly. He had to be kept swathed in cotton, for quite a long time, but finally recovered. There was said to have been some very high times around that old whiskey mill amongst the young men working there with the town boys to help them. But the old distillery was finally given up about 1859 or 1860, and the building was torn down and carried off piecemeal, leaving nothing but a hole in the ground and the ruins of a trench, leading under the railway track, to Mud lake, where the pipes were laid to obtain water for making the high wines.

In 1862 I saw the bare frame still standing, but that was gradually carried away for fuel.

The First Business Places

The first drug store was kept by Harry Canall at the corner of Phelps and Delaware streets, — where Mosier's store now stands. The building was erected by Dr. Bartholemew some time before 1854, but what it was used for before Canall occupied it I do not know.

A. H. Dixon & Co., were a close second, after Col. Phelps in having the first store in town, as their store building was put up in 1850. It was considered very fine in those days.

Ira Nash and W. C. Tucker were also among the very first business men in town in those early days.

The first lawyers in town were George Sherwood and William N. Pardee. Sherwood is said to have been the first Justice of the Peace in town but the town records of these years are very imperfect and are not to be relied upon wholly.

The first hotel in town was put up by L. R. Barker on the old Duncombe House lot at the corner of Phelps and Sherwood streets. It was called the Decatur House. I can find nothing to show in what year it was built, but I feel sure that part of the building at least, was put up by Charles Tucker as early as 1850, and used as a boarding house for railroad hands.

Barker added to the building later and made it into a hotel. This hotel burned down about 1860.

Dr. Bartholemew was our first physician and in 1848 he put up a small building on Sherwood street, about where the Paddock Hotel now stands, and some say that he had a small stock of drugs there, but he only remained in town a short time, going to California during the early gold excitement there.

Occasionally physicians from other towns visited Decatur in those days, but our first permanent resident doctor was J. T. Keables, who settled here in 1851.

School And Bank Opened

Our first high school building was erected in 1863-64, and was dedicated in the fall of 1864, and school began on the 25th day of November of the same year. The first principal was Prof. C. F. R. Bellows.

The first town hall was built in 1870 at a cost of $11,000.

Our first saloon was kept by Bob Willis in 1851. Willis was said to have been at one time the wealthiest man in the village. He built quite a number of houses to rent and made money fast by buying and selling real estate, but whiskey, bad speculations and false friends got the better of him at last and he finally died in great poverty in his old age.

The first bank in town was a private concern owned by John Tarbell, but I can find nothing to show when it was first started or how long it lasted.

I can remember being in this bank with my father when I was a child and I think it must have been about 1856 or '57.

Tarbell's bank was in a small wooden building located somewhere near where Charlie Rawson's store is now.

Our first regular bank was our present "Old Bank" and that was organized as a National Bank Oct. 15, 1870.

The First Fire

The first passenger depot was completed in 1848 and was used as such until Sept. 8, 1886, when the present depot was completed. The old depot was moved away at that time and is now used by Sol Schpok as a warehouse. A whole lot of people must have passed through that old depot during the thirty-eight years that it was in use by the railroad.

The first fire in Decatur, so far as I can find out, was in a log or part log store that stood on the corner where Brooks' store is located, but I do not know who occupied the store or what kind of a store it was. It must have burned in 1849 or 1850.

When the water pipes were put in along Phelps street, over 20 years ago, the workmen said that they struck some of those old half-burned logs buried in the ground, but I cannot find out anything certain about the fire.

The First Brick Buildings

The first brick building in Decatur was the one occupied by the Racket store, and for a few years it was the only brick building in the village.

It was put up about the year 1860, by Chas. N. Poore, and used by him as a hardware store and post office on the north side and by Chadwick Bros., as a dry goods and clothing store on the south side.

The "Tribune's" printing office and Poore's tin shop occupied the second story, with Decatur's first billiard hall in the third story.

The other two brick buildings in this block were put up by Poore a few years later.

The first brick residence in town was built and occupied for a time by Tom Brownbridge at the corner of Delaware and William streets and is now occupied by Thomas Graham.

The first hardware store in town was started by Chas. N. Poore in a low wooden building where "Van the Harness Man" is now located. I cannot get the date this store was put in, but it was somewhere about 1855-56. Poore also had the post office in the same building after he was appointed postmaster and the store and Post Office remained there until he completed his first brick store when they were both removed there.

The First Wedding

The first carpenter and joiner to locate in Decatur was L. T. Olds, who came here in July, 1849, and who, with one other carpenter, were the only mechanics in town during the following five years.

The first couple to be married in the village was this same Mr. Olds and Mary Elliott, who were married by Esquire George Sherwood May 18, 1850.

The Old Stave Factory

The old stave factory was first started by Uncle George Bennett as a saw mill in 1854, but in 1858, it was turned into a stave factory, by Jones & Chapin and from this time on until it was finally destroyed by fire almost every young man in our town worked there more or less.

When the war broke out some of the factory boys went into the army, while those who stayed at home, to show their patriotism, put up a high pole at the factory with an imitation musket on top of it — full cocked and pointed south and that pole with the musket on the top of it, stayed up there for many a year after the war closed.

Masonic Lodge Organized

The first secret society organized in Decatur seems to have been either the Good Templars or the Masons.

There was a Good Templars lodge here at some time before the war but I can find no date when it was started.

The Masonic lodge was organized Jan. 14, 1855, with nine members and Henry Canall was the first master.

Before 1855

Our first — and last — brewery, was conducted by Wm. Griffin in a building on the Brownbridge farm just outside the village limits on the north. Griffin must have established the business about the year 1866 and ran it for several years.

In 1851 the business center of the village was made up of the following stores: Col. Phelps on the Brigham lot at the corner of Phelps and Sherwood streets; A. H. Dixon & Co., on the corner of Phelps and Delaware streets, — where the Brooks store is now; E. Ingalls located on the Fletcher lot; Bobby Willis' saloon and Tucker's store where the hardware store of W. A. Wood is now, and soon afterward H. Canall established his drug store, and Ira Nash a dry goods store, on the corner now occupied by the Durkee store. These with Barker's hotel and about 75 dwellings constituted the whole of Decatur, until after 1855.

In 1849 the whole village was made up of Col. Phelps' store, the passenger depot, the kitchen of what was afterwards Barker's hotel and three dwelling houses.

I cannot find out where Willis' saloon was located, but I think it was near where Hamilton's furniture store is now. Neither can I say certainly where E. Ingall's business was but I used to see him draw beer with an old fashioned beer pump, that worked something like a cross cut saw. I also think that he had a meat market.

I have heard Ed Carney say that before the war, he used to sell beefsteak for three cents per pound and I think that he worked for Ingalls.

George Nesbitt tells me that when he first began to drive his father's team to the village he had to hitch the horses to the oak grubs on Main street, as there was not a hitching place in town, and one day when he started for the village his father put a post in the wagon and told him to ask someone to set it at the corner of Phelps and Sherwood streets at Col. Phelps' store. That was the first artificial hitching post in Decatur.

This is a rambling and disconnected account of very early Decatur, but it is the best that I can pick out of the rubbish heap.

Most of it has been taken from old histories, old papers, etc.

Some of it from the talk of old inhabitants and some from my own recollections, although I was too young to remember much about things until after about 1856-57.

The different histories and papers do not all agree as to the dates of certain things, and even the old inhabitants do not always agree in their recollections of the happenings in early Decatur.

There are some other "first things" that I can get no sure information about at all, so I have had to leave them out entirely.

If I have made mistakes in my dates or in any other way, I shall be very glad to have anyone that can, correct me.

I do not know of a single person living here now who was living here from 1849 to 1954. We have two citizens, Geo. W. Nesbitt and myself who were living in Hamilton in those days and who live in the village now and that is the nearest I can get to it.

If there are any others whose residence goes back that far, I wish they would speak up and tell us about it.

Decatur's Newest Industry

ED SMOLA is well on his way toward establishing Decatur's newest industry. It is organized under the name of Decatur Quality Glass, Inc. Ed has been making custom aluminum doors and windows for commercial buildings for some time while he was working for Cupples Corp. in Dowagiac. Now that Cupples has been purchased by another company and left Dowagiac, Ed is making his part-time work a full-time business. In addition to this, he has gone into the making of custom doors and windows in a large-scale way. He has at present a contract to provide 45 doors for a new savings bank in Buffalo, N.Y. He is pictured here with the doors ready for shipment.

The old Lapekas garage on M-40 is the location of the shop, which was started up last month.

These custom fabricating jobs are obtained by Ed thru Cupples and are jobs they can't do. Ed gets the extreme-hard-finished aluminum stock from Cupples and using some of his own designs and special tools, provides the finished doors.

Landmark Falls in Friday's Wind

FOR 300 YEARS, according to Wilhelm Vondrak on whose property the tree stood, this giant oak was a landmark for the Indian trail, then later the stage line from Chicago to Detroit. There are actually two trees, between which the trail passed, one on the other side of the road by Charles Guy's home. The trees are located at the intersection of Co. roads 215 and 352, across from Watson's Grocery.

Observes 101st Birthday

Mrs. Henry Gish

Mrs. Henry Gish observed the 101st anniversary of her birth on Feb. 3. She lives in Huntington Park, Calif., with two of her daughters.

Another daughter, Mrs. Florence Paul of Volinia township, spent three and one-half months this winter with her mother and sisters, and with her daughter Harriet and family in Redlands, Calif.

Former Glenwood Teacher Honored

Miss Pearl Drumb was the guest of honor last Thursday in the Glenwood Union Seventh-day Adventist school where she taught during the years 1918-1922 and 1944-1948.

Some former students who attended during those years were: Janet Scribner, now Mrs. David Larimer of Berrien Springs; Jennie Mullard, now Mrs. Phillip Crawford of Dowagiac; Harold Sibley of Hartford; Beverly Hill, now Mrs. Arnold Velting of Benton Harbor; and her mother, Mrs. Earl Hill, formerly Violet Springsteen of Dowagiac. These former pupils told recollections from school days under Miss Drumb, and cards and letters came from others unable to attend.

Miss Drumb, a long-time resident of Decatur, plans to make her home with a niece in Texas. She will move there during the holiday season.

LIVERY STABLES

In the late 1800's when "Old Dobbin" was at his best, there were two livery stables in Decatur. One was located east of the Duncombe House on Sherwood Street and was operated by Henry Creagan. The other was a large building which stood where the Royal Blue Grocery store now stands. Tom Brownbridge, Bill Graham, and Bert Hinckley were three of the proprietors. Charlie Tase, who had assumed management of the Duncombe House for a number of years, was also proprietor of the livery barn at one time. Livery rigs were as common as taxis are today. Business was brisk as fares were set at a nominal price. Many of the townspeople were without transportation and this service was appreciated by those who had business in the country or in the neighboring towns.

The horse stalls were in the back part of the building, while the buggies and the surries "with the fringe on top" were kept along the sides of the building. The harnesses were neatly hung on the wall back of the horses' stall. Sway-back cutters and sleighs were used in the winter-time. Hay was sotred in the hayloft and was lowered to the stalls through chutes.

One livery rig, rented by a stranger, was never returned to the Hinckley Stables. No trace of the horse, buggy nor man were ever found.

The livery man enjoyed life. In the summer time he had several chairs in the front part of the barn, and his cronies would "stop by" to chat. Many of the village problems were settled in this forum.

Lime Rawson owned a frame building south of the livery stable (where the Broekhuizen Storage now stands). He bought and sold wheat; also coal. His son, Ed, ran the business after his father's death.

The young men of the village hired livery rigs to squire their ladies fair, and to take them on such outings as picnics, house parties, ball games, sleigh rides, etc. It cost little to hire a rig, so it didn't put too much financial strain on the pocket books of the young men. Then, too, there was Dad's old gray mare and buggy which could be borrowed in an emergency.

Sometimes as many as six or seven livery rigs would be seen on Sunday morning, with as many young couples, on their way to a near-by lake, for a day's outing. A great deal of fun and hilarity was enjoyed on the way, and much clowning took place on the part of the fellows. At times they would jump in and out of the buggy, while it was in motion, to impress their dates with their dexterity. Quite often they were left behind to walk a half-mile or so as their friends had "whipped up" their horses to a lively trot!

Theirs was a life, marked with a leisurely way of living, and I daresay they enjoyed themselves more than do the young people of today. With less tension, nervousness and speed — life was enjoyed to capacity.

A Tribute of Recognition

There comes a time in the life of an individual, or the togetherness experience of a community, when the pause should be made to pay recognition for outstanding accomplishment. Especially for the worthwhile contributions made by persons, whose lives at one time may have been intimately associated with the scenes of the quiet pathways of Decatur.

In this sense of saying and doing something to tell to ourselves, and to the world beyond Main Street, we are aware of the distinguished achievement of former Decatur persons and the existence of community pride of a background identification with lives of such unusual worth.

The selection of the ones thus to honor, apart from the many of very genuine achievement, lies in the final determination of those who have distinguished themselves apart from the majority of their contemporaries. Their particular greatness lies in their own contribution in shaping laudable developments in their chosen area of life's endeavor.

This is a special tribute, therefore, to four persons, who have directed their lives and accomplishments to that ultimate of success that has merited the attention and honor of national recognition.

Norman E. Webster: headed an accountant firm in New York City. Mr. and Mrs. Webster received country-wide eminence through the gift and endowment of a fine library for the community of Decatur.

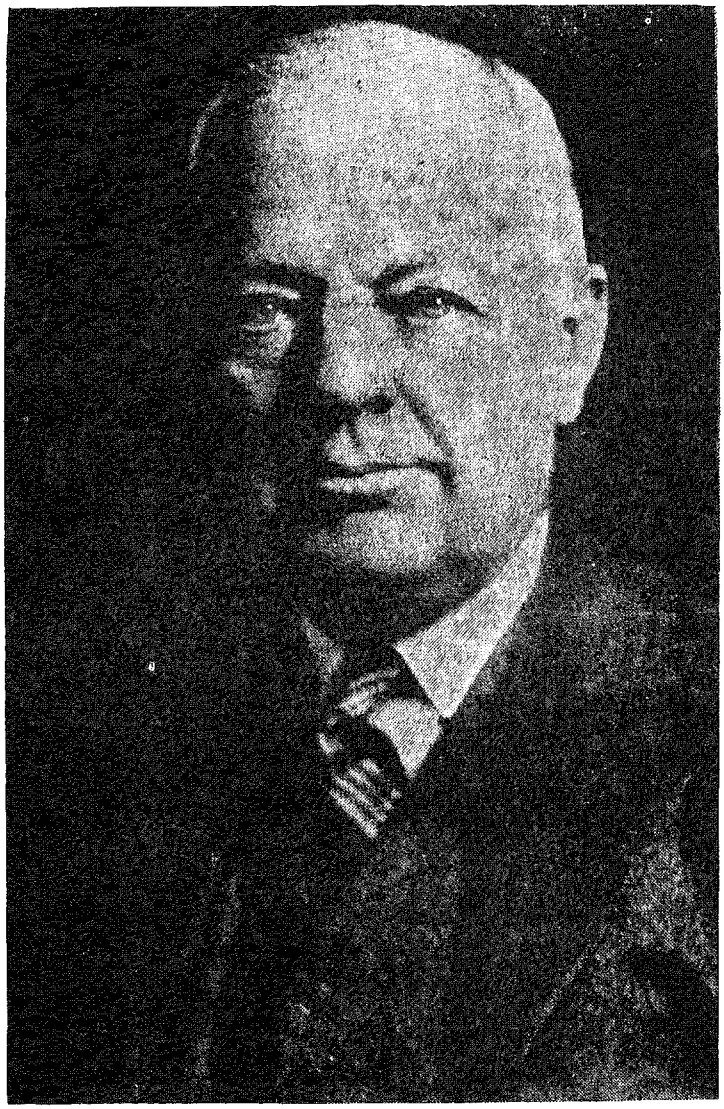
Carl B. Squier: was a pioneering personality in aviation and aircraft manufacturing. He was co-organizer and executive officer of Lockheed Aircraft Corporation.

Edgar Bergen: is outstanding in the entertainment world. He is a famed ventriloquist and creator of the inimitable personality, Charlie McCarthy.

Charles H. Mahoney: was a lawyer and civic leader in Detroit. He was founder of a life insurance company, and the first Negro appointed to the United Nations from the United States.

Decatur has reason to remember these men who have reflected an impressive record of accomplishment, together with a worthy example of character.

In order that this recognition may have lasting significance for our tomorrows, as well as a contemplation for a today, framed portraits of these men are being placed in the Memorial Room of Webster Memorial Library.



Norman E. Webster

The event that brought the spotlight of national [illegible] to Norman E. Webster was unique, from the ordinary conception of [illegible] from the accumulation of things and [illegible].

The fame that came to Mr. and Mrs. Webster was conceived during the later years of their useful lifetime, when the arrangements were completed for an impressive library to be their bequest to the community of Decatur. Following their death came the wide recognition of the scope of their gift and the endowment that was destined to bring lasting good to this community. A gift from a benefactor who never lost sight of the inherent worth of a small home town. An environment where neighborly good will and fundamental value seems to be the enduring basis for the traditional characteristic of the worthwhile citizen of a great country . . . America.

Norman Webster was born in Decatur on March 27th, 1859. His early life and education was in this village that had its own beginning less than twenty-five years earlier. He was ever appreciative, it would seem, for the opportunity of betterment through education. An outstanding influence in this part of his [illegible] years was the support of a Decatur educator and [illegible] of the school, Mr. [illegible] Norman Webster graduated from the local high school in 1896. A year later he was married to a Decatur classmate, Rose Rezeau. His further education was in the field of Accounting, marked by graduation from Union College, Class of 1896.

He was admitted to the bar and worked with the Treasury Dept. at Washington, D. C. While in the nation's capitol, he was instrumental in the formation of the University Club of that city. It may be noted that Mr. Webster was an honored participant in the 45th Anniversary of the distinguished club in February, 1949.

The successful accountant partnership that was headed by Norman Webster was located on Broadway, New York City; the firm name: Webster, Horne, and Elsdon. In the later years of this gentleman's lifetime, he was keenly interested in developing history background for the progress and position of the profession of Accounting. He was chairman of this phase of American Accounting Association. A luncheon hour celebration honored his 85th birthday at the Recess Club, New York City. A worthy demonstration of the affection, esteem, and appreciation of his contemporaries. Throughout his busy career he allotted occasion for relaxation. He was on the membership roster of the Higby Club, Big Moose Lake, New York. He belonged to the Sleepy Hollow Country Club, Scarsborough On The Hudson.

Throughout his lifetime Mr. Webster maintained an interest in the home-town of Decatur through visits and a mutual friendship with Arba Moulton, publisher of the local newspaper. Mr. and Mrs. Webster had no children. The material product of Norman Webster's work and investments were impressive and the community of Decatur became the beneficiary. Mr. Webster passed away in 1956. Mrs. Webster preceded him in death two years earlier. The terms of the Webster will were implemented by the appointed trustees and the construction and equipping of the Webster Memorial Library became a reality.

National recognition came to the memory of Mr. and Mrs. Webster through their generous gift to a community that held endearing memory for a most remarkable man and woman. This home town, DECATUR! The community that should never lose sight of the qualifications of an image, an image worth remembering.

CHAS. H. MAHONEY

The great valedictory in the very name of Chas. H. Mahoney was an appointment to service, based on a particular quality of leadership and a demonstrated concern for his fellowman. As his widow suggested to this writer, "It was a long and upward climb from weeding in the fields of Decatur, to a presidential selection as the first Negro representing the United States at the United Nations, there to have a voice in the deliberations for peace and world betterment."

So many years ago Chas. Mahoney demonstrated with simple determination, the fundamental recipe for advancement that can reach beyond the bounds of color, financial aid, or ethnic sense of heritage.

It may have been Mr. Mahoney's good fortune to have experienced his childhood on the land of Decatur and to be among friends and neighbors of those days, and today, where one is measured by his own contribution to a neighborly way of living. Adequate schools here never have used any measure of entrance or advancement beyond a growing mind's ability to learn.

Graduation from High School in Decatur, Class of 1911, enabled Chas. Mahoney for entrance into Civil College, where application and determination marked his rule and guidance. During his three years at this college he was the only Negro student. The next year he enrolled at Fisk University in Nashville, Tenn., and studied there one year. There he received his degree and taught in the University's elementary school to finance his education.

He received his law degree from the University of Michigan in 1911. In later years he was awarded honorary degrees by Wayne State University, Great Lakes College, Olivet College, Virginia Union University of Richmond, and Central State College in Wilberforce, Ohio.

Mr. Mahoney entered the practice of law in Detroit where he established a highly esteemed reputation. Other business interests, over the years, were a developing part of his ambitious career. He was president of Great Lakes Mutual Life Insurance Co., one of Michigan's oldest life companies. He organized the Great Lakes subdivision at Holly, Michigan. In 1955 Mr. Mahoney became one of the organizers and member of the Board of Directors of the Public Bank of Detroit. The Urban League of Detroit was a devoted interest.

His public career was especially notable and the field of public service was an area where he established a most exemplary record. He was the first American Negro appointed to the Detroit Planning Commission. He was a member of Wayne County Board of Supervisors for ten years and the Michigan Labor Commission for seven years.

What was considered by Mr. Mahoney to be the highlight of his remarkable career, was the appointment by Pres. Eisenhower as the first American Negro delegate to the General Assembly of the United Nations in 1954. In this responsibility he served on numerous committees with intense interest and effort.

The people of Michigan, through the State Legislature and Memorial resolution, held deep appreciation for the honorable contribution this distinguished public servant, business man, and esteemed gentleman made in his service of humanitarian principles. The Hon. Chas. H. Mahoney was born in Decatur, Mich., May 29, 1886, and reached the end of his earthly career Jan. 29, 1966.

Somehow the thought continues to prevail, "that the stars may illuminate the dreams and ambition points the way from any humble origin."

CARL B. SQUIER

"This is the place where I grew
This is the place that I knew."

Thus in initial simplicity, there is nothing more fundamental in the earthy background of one exceptional man, Carl B. Squier. His climb of the exacting stairway to national fame in his chosen field of the skyways and their exceptional vehicles, bore a particular magnitude in concept and unfolded rewarding service in the full accomplishment.

As a youth, Carl Squier saw no promise in the dairy farm of his father. Indeed a family interest in local politics may have kindled a subconscious attraction to people and person relations. From Decatur schools the upward trail led to a page boy stint in the Michigan Legislature, and there a deepened insight into the horizons of individuals of special know-how developed. Carl possessed the endowment of a magnetic personality, which in turn forged a salesmanship potentiality. Detroit was an initiating arena for his beginning work.

World War One found United States seeking personnel for a "borning" military use of the airplane. Carl enlisted into this employment of specially minded young men, where a daring skill not only was the key to survival, but also provided advancement of this type armed weaponry.

Over the skies of France and Germany he shared in the drama that brought fame to an associate named Rickenbacker. The experience was the opening door to the vocation attuned to his particular imagination. The close of this war brought Carl Squier back to Michigan. groomed by officer advancement. Number 13 pilot license was civilian recognition in the pioneering industry of aviation. For an interval of time he became assocated with a firm, the Detroit Aircraft Company, that was building and selling airplanes. This company acquired a California based concern known by its founder, whose name — "Loughead" — was altered to LOCKHEED.

Carl was sent to Burbank, California, to manage this struggling aircraft activity. He was accompanied by his wife and two young daughters. The Lockheed plane was sleek in appearance and proving a pioneering leader in performance. Flying friends of Carl Squier selected the craft to bring eminence in aviation to United States and progress in faster transportation. Amelia Earhart and Wiley Post opened the way around the world in a Lockheed Vega, and a Lockheed Orion carried Col. Lindberg and his wife on trans-Pacific trails. The famed slogan "Look to Lockheed for Leadership" came into being and was truly prophetic.

These were the formative years in Carl Squier's identification with the pioneering aircraft industry. He was the Lockheed Company and truly there was the ecstasy and the agony. It was the hour of history when the Depression brought about the survival of the fittest. It was also near to a time when a crash of a commercial passenger plane claimed the life of Mrs. Squier.

A deserved memorial tribute to Carl Squier was best written by the Chairman of the Board of the present day great Lockheed Corporation. Simply this was his reminder, "It is no exaggeration to say that had there been no Carl Squier, there quite conceivably would have been no Lockheed today."

Personal sacrifice, faith in flying and his particular plane, and persuasive sales skill brought men and money to Carl Squier's side for the reorganization of the Lockheed Corporation in 1932. The world's best known airplane salesman of the time was being readied for the unbelievable demand for specialized aircraft as a consequence of World War Two. The famed "Hudson Bomber" and the fast twin-tailed P-38's from the Lockheed factories of California became a contributing factor in gaining air supremacy for the Allied cause.

In addition to selling, Carl Squier's administrative skill was demonstrated at this war time. He headed Lockheed Overseas operation, entailing reassembly and modification of planes numbering into the thousands, this in Europe, Africa, and the Orient.

The subsequent growth of the Lockheed Corporation was noteworthy. Expansion into bigger jet aircraft building and development of the fantastic missile system arming Polaris nuclear submarines are a part of the Lockheed hall of fame. Such a company of great importance reached its impressive eminence through a shared guidance of Carl Squier, administrative officer and Board Director. He retired from executive participation in 1963 to an honorary post of advisory capacity.

In his private life a remarriage had brought again a sharing of his interesting activities and family. In California, high above the hurries and demands was his home, overlooking both San Fernando Valley and Hollywood. Here was restful hospitality, for a while. His death came in October 1967.

Perhaps a single picture, that hung on the progressive wall of Carl's Lockheed office, was symbolic of the upward reach of this unusual man and his mission. It was an impressive photograph of the tower of a New York City skyscraper, reaching through and above the endless blanket of billowy clouds.

The earthly remains of this famed Decatur personage lie just beyond the massive gateway and portal of Valhalla. A chosen resting place contiguous to his beloved Lockheed enterprise. Overhead soar ever great and pioneering aircraft from Lockheed . . . symbolic but remindful

"This is the place where I grew
This is the place that I knew."

wood carver, who made ventriloquist figures, produced Charlie McCarthy, who was to share in an international fame. Together they played theatres in the United States, Canada, and Europe. In Sweden, Bergen did an entire performance in the Swedish language.

In 1936, Elsa Maxwell arranged a guest spot on the Rudy Vallee radio show, after Edgar had made repeated efforts to reach this special audience. His act was a hit and after three months he had his own program. It proved to be a most popular show with the biggest rating of all time. For twenty years the Edgar Bergen-Charlie McCarthy hour was synonymous with the best of national radio entertainment, and appeared at the prime listening time of Sunday evenings.

Without mention of television shows and appearances in twenty motion picture features the eminence of Edgar Bergen as an entertainer ranks with the gifted great. His fine sense of humor and comedy writing skill found a popularity in the universal audience, who seem to yearn for a laugh from wholesome everyday American situations. Through the years he has received the merited respect of his entertainment and business contemporaries.

Decatur has remained his "home town." In 1948 this community observed its one-hundredth centennial. Edgar Bergen returned to Decatur to share his talents to make the centennial event a memorable success. Special Decatur friendships have endured over passing time and Edgar has found the time on occasion, to maintain a thoughtfulness by a returning visit with them.

In private life Edgar Bergen has his Hollywood, California, home in a on a mountain-side. In 1945 he married Frances Westerman, a former Powers model. Their daughter Candice has a promising career as an actress and recently appeared in leading role in the motion picture "Sand Pebbles." The Bergens have a son, Kris Edgar.

Many worthwhile interests have supplemented a busy Bergen career. Little known facets of Edgar Bergen's life deserve mention. He is a really veteran flyer for nearly 30 years, owning private aircraft and flying them about the country. He is a skilled amateur magician and collector of steam propelled machines. A farming operation near to Indio, Calif., is a part of his diversified interests. A scholarship at the Northwestern University School of Speech bears Bergen's name. Nearly 25 years ago he established the Bergen Foundation for Student Nurses, opening the way for many hundred girls to become R.N.'s

'Tis said "that a light heart lives long." A man cannot leave a greater legacy to the world than the much needed laughter to lightenone's heart. Thus Edgar Bergen will be best remembered in the millions of memories that have shared their moment of laughter lift, provided by an entertainment great . . . and a wooden dummy.

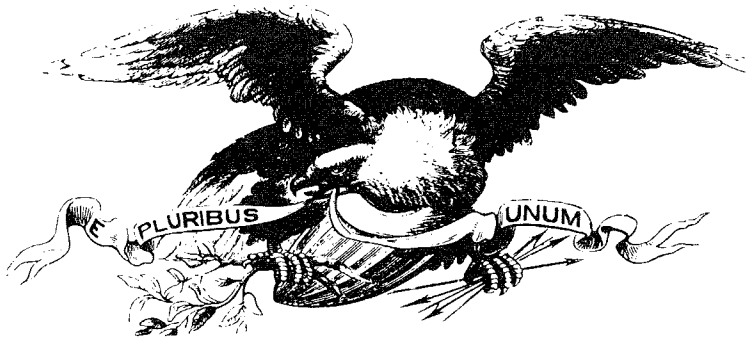
DECATUR LIBRARY BOARD



FINANCIER'S GIFT TO DECATUR ' SPARKED BY TEACHER'S INTEREST

Norman E. Webster started school in Decatur in 1875 and completed the elementary grades there. After he moved to Sturgis, he returned to Decatur where he finished school in 1884 at the age of 16.

Influenced by two local teachers, Webster left his home town to seek his fortune.

Following a six - year stop in Kalamazoo and a job with the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago, he worked in the office of the auditor for the U.S. Post Office in Washington.

He married Rose Rezeau, a former Decatur schoolmate in 1895, and the newlyweds moved to New York City where they remained for the rest of their lives.

Webster entered Union College in Schenectady, N.Y., and graduated in 1896 with a degree in accountancy. He added a law degree 10 years later.

Although he never practiced law, he was admitted to the Bar of the Supreme Court and wrote numerous articles on various phases of law.

After graduating from law school, he returned to New York City for his interest was still in the world of accounting. He founded his own business and expanded to several other eastern cities. His CPA firm still bears his name.

Webster maintained an interest in Decatur and the school from which he graduated. He secured and entered chronologically in scrapbooks scores of graduation programs and other items connected with his home town.

He corresponded regularly with a few close friends, among them Earl E. Copley and Arba Moulton, publisher of the Decatur Republican. With frequent visits, he kept close ties with Decatur.

As he and his wife were facing their declining years, they began to think about what they could do with the modest fortune they had accumulated. The Websters were childless.

Firmly believing that it was the community of Decatur that gave Webster his impetus toward success, they began to think of something to do for the village. A public library was the perfect gift.

Webster selected Moulton, Copley and Marvin McWilliams to start the wheels moving locally. When the veteran newspaperman died, Lyle Parker replaced him. Webster died in 1958 and the library opened four years later.

KALAMAZOO GAZETTE SUNDAY, OCT. 20, 1968 DECATUR'S WEBSTER LIBRARY A MAN' LEGACY TO HIS HOME TOWN

DECATUR—This small comfortable Van Buren County Village has a big-town institution . . . Webster Memorial Library.

Dedicated on Oct. 30, 1960, the library is nearing the end of its first decade of service to Van Buren County. The dream of its benefactor is being realized.

The library, costing $250,000, is part of a half-million dollar memorial gift to the community of Decatur from Mr. and Mrs. Norman Webster.

Webster, a native of Decatur, attended the local school system and was influenced in his career by two Decatur teachers, Henry Upton and Abigail Pearce. Encouraged to leave Decatur for larger enterprises, Webster became a prominent and wealthy New York financier.

He never forgot what his two former teachers did for him. Both educators left Decatur many years ago but their faith in a boy who seemed above average to them, returned to benefit Decatur in the form of an educational tool whose value today and tomorrow is unlimited.

Today, Webster Library has 81,000 volumes to serve its 50,000 potential customers around the county.

Under the direction of its librarian, Curt Bohling, it is regarded as a strong rural library. For example, few similar institutions around the state can match its collection of volumes on Michigan and area history. Even larger libraries are a little green-eyed.

Decatur itself has a population of only 1,827, but Webster draws its readers from all over the county. Branches are located in Bangor, Bloomingdale, Covert, Gobles, Lawrence and Mattawan. A bookmobile also distributes Webster volumes.

Even if books are not your cup of tea, the building is still a valuable asset to the community. Its community room offers spacious room for important meetings and organizational gatherings.

The library also features films and records that can be borrowed. The record collection spans the classic to true jazz to the Beatles.

A library is a diary of the human race. It mirrors the past, the present, and offers a key to the future.

"The duty of a public library is to preserve pictures, books and reports about an area," Bohling said. "If a library didn't do it, no one else would."

And knowledge would go the way of the dinosaur.

FORMER RESIDENTS RETURN TO MICHIGAN AFTER YEAR'S STUDY IN NEW GUINEA

by Mildred Howe Pritchard

A former Decatur resident and her husband have recently returned to Michigan after more than a year of study of a primitive New Guinea people.

Patricia Woods Townsend, a 1958 graduate of Decatur high school, and her husband, William, went to New Guinea in January, 1966. Mrs. Townsend was awarded a fellowship from the National Institute of Health and a National Science Foundation research grant for the study.

Pat is a Ph.D. student in Anthropology at the University of Michigan, where she was awarded the B. A. in 1962 and the M. A. in 1963, both in Anthropology.

Cultural Anthropology, she explains, is the study of the way of life of the peoples outside the Western world.

The Sanio people which she selected for her project, who live in the Sepik River district of New Guinea, had not previously been studied. Learning the local language, which is spoken by only the approximately 500 Sanio people, and which also has never been studied, was a major task for the Townsends.

"At first I could just point and learn a word like 'house,' " said Pat, "but later when I heard a word like 'opanaria'i,' I really had to puzzle out that it meant 'stingy.' "

Bill, a Ph.D. student in Civil Engineering at the University of Michigan, assisted Pat in the project with "the more practical side of the research," she stated. He was responsible for photography, surveying, mapping, building and repairing, operation of an outboard canoe, and measuring rainfall, which amounted to more than 200 inches a year.

He also undertook some specific projects of his own. One was a study comparing the effectiveness of stone adzes with the steel axe, which has been in use by these people for only about five years. This involved counting the number of strokes needed to chop down trees of various sizes.

The native diet was one of Pat's prime considerations in her investigation. The staple food is sago, which is produced from the sago palm. Bill's job was to measure and count all the sago which came into the village for a time to determine land yield.

Pat accompanied the native women as they worked the sago, which is found in swampy areas requiring them to walk in deep mud at times. To derive the starchy substance from the pithy part of the tree, the women pound the fiber with a stone-headed hammer and then rinse it in troughs which they have constructed. The starch is allowed to settle and later is prepared for eating as a pudding or by baking it in leaves over coals. This bland diet is supplemented by wild game and other foods which are gathered in the area.

In addition to subsistence and language, family and community life were a focus of the study. Pat made long lists of the visitors to the community, relatives taking part in weddings and funerals, and the number of children that had been born to the women she met. The people discussed with her their beliefs in spirits and sorcerers who caused illness and death. They also told stories, which they called "dream talk," including the tale of how man originally emerged from a sago log.

During the major part of the 22 months the Townsends were away, they lived in a hamlet, Yareno, on the Wogamus River. There were 14 permanent residents there along with constant native visitors in the community house which made its average population about 30. A separate house was built by the village people for the Townsends of sago stems and leaves, logs tied with rattan, and palm-bark flooring.

To reach this community, it was necessary to fly from Sydney, Australia, to Lae, New Guinea, and then on by single-engine plane to the Australian government post of Ambunti. From there it was a two-day trip up-river in a 40-foot dugout canoe powered by an outboard motor. The canoe also carried all their supplies, including canned food and kerosene for lighting and cooking.

While in New Guinea, the Townsends also visited other areas of the territory to discover cultural and language differences. Some of these trips were by houseboat or canoe. They also spent time at the Summer Institute of Linguistics (Wycliffe) base at Ukarumpa.

Pat states that they were received in New Guinea with great enthusiasm and friendliness. Since most of the natives are small in stature, they were amused to learn that they were being called "the big people."

The medicine they took along "has assured the welcome of the white man," she stated. They gave 214 doses of penicillin for treatment of yaws, a disfiguring tropical skin disease which is prevalent. The penicillin offers a dramatic cure, and the people greatly appreciate it, she said.

On their return trip in November, the Townsends visited Thailand, Switzerland, France and the Netherlands. They now reside at 1101 Maiden Lane Court, Apartment 105, Ann Arbor 48105.

The information gleaned during their New Guinea stay is now being worked into Pat's doctoral thesis and several articles for publication. Upon completion of the Ph.D, she hopes to enter college teaching and undertake further anthropological research.

General's Wife Conceives Memorial Day in 1868

By MURRAY SINCLAIR

TUCSON, Ariz. — Memorial Day may mean more to a retired Tucson cavalry officer than anyone else in the nation — his grandmother conceived it.

John A. Logan still has General Order No. 11 issued by his grandfather on May 5, 1868, which designated May 30 as Decoration Day for "the purpose of strewing with flowers or otherwise decorating the graves of comrades who died in the defense of their country during the late rebellion."

Logan's grandfather was John A. Logan, commander-in-chief of the Grand Army of the Republic. But the inspiration for the order originated with the general's wife, a small, compassionate lady with a will of iron.

May 30 was chosen because the wildflowers would be blooming. Children and their parents could go into the fields and woods to gather the flowers, and then place them on the graves.

"In the early spring of 1868, Gen. William T. Sherman took a party of friends on a tour of Southern battlefields," Logan explained. "My grandfather was invited, but he had recently been elected a senator from Illinois and felt that he could not take the time away from these duties. His wife — my grandmother — went in his place.

"She was impressed by the fact that the graves of the Confederate soldiers were decorated with flowers. Most of them had been placed there by children.

"When she returned to Washington, she told my grandfather that it would be nice, and fitting, if the graves of the men from the North also had flowers placed upon them.

"My grandfather agreed at once.lHis order designated May 30 as Decoration Day for all G.A.R. members.

"The idea took hold at once. The day was celebrated all over the North. Then, in 1871, I believe, my grandfather introduced the bill in Congress that made it a holiday. When the bill was signed, the name was changed to Memorial Day, although many continued to use the name Decoration Day."

REASON FOR LIFE

I don't know how to say it but sometimes it seems to me
That maybe we are stationed where God wanted us to be;
That the little place I'm filling is the reason for my birth
And just to do the work I do
He sent me down to earth.

If God had wanted otherwise,
I reckon He'd have made
Me just a little different, of a worse of better grade,
And since God knows and understands all things of land and sea
I fancy that He placed me here just where He wanted me.

Sometimes I get to thinking, as my labors I review,
That I should like a higher place with greater tasks to do
But I come to the conclusion, when the evening is stilled
That the post to which God sent me is the post He wanted filled.

So I plod along and struggle in the hope when day is through
That I'm really necessary to the things God wants to do.
And there isn't any service I can give which I should scorn
For it may be just the reason God allowed me to be born.

COUNTY MIGRANT AFFAIRS COUNCIL SEEKS FUNDS FOR RETURNING MIGRANTS

The Van Buren County Migrant Affairs Council composed of agencies, growers and migrants sent the following telegram Aug. 13, to the following:

Donald Rumsfeld, Director, — O.E.O., Washington; William Milliken, Governor, Lansing; Wendell Verduin, Regional Director, O.E.O. Lansing; J. C. Kasper, Regional Office, Dept. of Labor, Chicago.

The telegram said:

"Be it resolved that the Migrant Affairs Council of Van Buren county, Michigan is very concerned with the impending crisis of migrants returning home. We, therefore, strongly request that the Office of Economic Opportunity allocate immediate emergency funds to make it possible for destitute migrant farm laborers to return to their homes. The funds allocated to be distributed by the local CAA Financial office upon request of an agency representative of the Area Migrants Affairs Council, with a minimum amount of paper work (red tape)."

Governor Milliken asked that Migrant Affairs Councils be formed where there was a concentration of migrant farm laborers and said that he would listen to the councils. This is the first council to make demands of the Governor. The Governor responded that he had referred the matter to a member of his staff on Aug. 18.

The Council had not received a reply by their Aug. 18 meeting and ordered chairman Rev. Meredith Rupe to pursue the issue by calling all parties receiving the telegram. The response from the Governor's office was that there were no funds to help destitute migrants home. M.E.O.O. reported that there was no money available. The Regional Office Dept. of Labor in Chicago, said they had no resources. The Regional O.E.O. office said in response to our request that they were releasing emergency funds to U.M.O.I. in Michigan for emergency food and medical help for migrants, but they had nothing to help with transportation.

At this point the only possible help lies with Tri-Cap, which voted to submit an emergency proposal to shift $5,000 from other grants to go into transportation for destitute migrants. This has to be approved by the Regional O.E.O. office in Chicago.

Many may ask why some migrants do not have money to return home if they made $600 or $700 in a month. Much of their money goes to pay off debts they had for the winter back home. They have had to repay loans to get up here, besides maintaining themselves while here. There are other reasons, but these seem to be the most common areas where the money is spent. Others say they should go to Social Services, but the laws governing this department are very rigid on when they can help the migrant for transportation back to their home. The farm labor office points out that because of the lack of work for workers in other areas, there has developed an underemployment situation for migrants.

The Council feels that the problem is urgent and the need for help is now. The number who are asking agencies for help was 45 in this area during one week alone, but there was no help available.

100 YEARS FOR FIRST STATE BANK

Decatur, Michigan

— Introduction —

September 20, 1970 marks the 100th anniversary of the organization of the First State Bank in Decatur, Michigan.

Originally chartered as the First National Bank of Decatur, the bank took out a charter from the State of Michigan when the original charter expired on September 20, 1890.

The 100th anniversary is unique, not only because it is one of the oldest banks in the State but it has remained in the hands of the Copley family since its organization. This continuity of ownership has gained the First State Bank an outstanding record as a conservative and sound institution serving the people of the community and is known as one of the best banks in southwestern Michigan.

At the organization of the First National Bank of Decatur, September 20, 1870, the capital was $75,000. From the group of original subscribers, A. B. Copley was named president, E. P. Hill was cashier and directors were C. W. Fisk, Charles Duncombe, L. B. Lawrence, O. S. Abbott and A. S. Hathaway.

Following the taking out of a state charter in 1890, A. B. Copley was again named president and A. H. Huyck was cashier. The capital at that time was reduced to $50,000. In the published statement of December 19, 1890, the deposits were $68,000.

An early morning fire on March 25, 1895 destroyed the bank building along with other adjacent structures. A notation in the minutes of the directors' meeting of that day stated that "banking operations were resumed at 2:00 p.m. in the Browning Drug Store," located across the street.

A. B. Copley died in 1899 and was succeeded by his son, Edwin B. Copley as the president.

After the death of A. H. Huyck in 1900, L. D. Hill was made cashier. He continued in this capacity until 1913 when he was succeeded by L. E. VanAntwerp who served as cashier until he resigned in 1939 after 33 years.

Following the sudden death of Edwin B. Copley in 1916, his son, Earl E. Copley was elected president and has served in that capacity ever since.

On February 3, 1954, a lone bandit held a gun on cashier Marvin McWilliams and demanded the money from the drawer, amounting to $243.00. Fortunately the safe was still on time lock or it would have been more. He made good his escape.

In 1955 Alfred E. Osmick, son-in-law of E. E. Copley, joined the bank and is presently vice president and cashier, representing the fourth generation of ownership and management of the bank in Decatur.

The First State Bank in its 100th year has combined capital accounts, including undivided profits, of over $400,000, with additional reserves and non-book assets of another $100,000 which do not show in the published statements.

The bank has never entered into the bank card business and has confined its operation to that of a strictly commercial bank, not joining the intense competition of bidding for savings accounts and certificates.

Sound business practices and a conservative outlook which is even reflected in the bank building and fixtures, have enabled the First State Bank to weather the highs and lows of the business depressions that have occured many times in the past 100 years.

During the week following the 100th anniversary on September 20, there will be many items of interest on display, and anniversary mementoes for those who visit the bank.

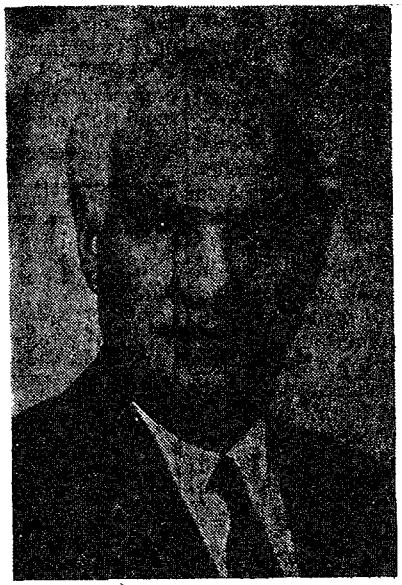
Leader with Vision



Dr. Charles H. Mahoney

Full time U. S. Delegate to the United Nations.

The name of Charles H. Mahoney is familiar to most Decaturites as the name of one of our most notable citizens. Mr. Mahoney, born and raised in Decatur, is the subject of an extensive article in the Detroit Historical Society's February bulletin. The article is written by Gail Artner, and is reprinted here in two parts, the first appearing this week.

Faces — flushed in caucus debate; celery farms — mucky, mosquito infested; a desperate loneliness; a cherished wife — molders of a man — a true leader: Charles Mahoney.

The second of three children, born in 1856, Charles became a side-line politician at an early age. As a small lad, trying desperately to keep apace of his father, the town's Justice of the Peace, Charles strode down the dusty main road of Decatur, Michigan. The two had a mind of one accord: Barney to join the discussions at the party caucuses; young Charles to listen intently from the sidelines. Politics of the 1890's fascinated Charles. He grew up with it, witnessed all the foibles and mistakes of various administrations, the animosities of campaigns, and the frigid politeness of vanquished oppositions.

Politics, however, was not to be the forte' of Charles Mahoney. In the political arena, he met defeat. His national prominence came via law, business and government positions.

Education paved the way for Charles at a time when few parents could afford to provide this opportunity. In rural America farmers needed their sons; high school to them usually meant residence in a distant town. However, Barney Mahoney was an established independent entrepreneur — a skilled carpenter and construction contractor. Decatur had a local high school. Thus, Barney could afford to give his son a chance to change — and Charles took it.

Charles' mother, Viora, was the daughter of Jacob Simpson, a Decatur farmer since the 1830's. All four Simpson children had grown up on the present Orr farm, north of Decatur Village. Yet Charles detested farming. His periodic exposure to that of the worst type — weeding and thinning local onion and celery swamps, mosquito infested and damp — continually restored his determination to study, to achieve, if possible, a different life.

Olivet College opened the door to knowledge but also to the bitter life of social loneliness. The comradeship of college life — especially in the first decade of the 20th century — was closed to Mahoney, the only Negro student. Volney R. Hungerford, principal of Decatur High School and th eschool superintendent, made it feasible for Charles to enter Olivet College in 1904. In gratitude Charles later established the annual Hungerford Award at Decatur high school honoring forensic ability.

"Shoe - string" finances forced Charles to work as part-time campus janitor. Summers, he pitched hay and weeded celery and onion swamps. His economy "dorm" was the attic of the Adelphic Society's activity building. Unheated and unfurnished, Charles finally did get a bed his second year, but it was hard going.

Yet Mahoney achieved, scholastically and athletically. His oratorical ability won him the College's most coveted award, the Drury Prize, in 1907. Competing against five other contenders, Mahoney captured the audience with his speech, "The Negro, A Man." The peculiar social condition in which Charles found himself, as Olivet's only Negro student, was for the first time fully appreciated by his fellow students. A news reporter commented that he had "seldom heard or read a more exhaustive, correct statement." Charles discussed the often proposed solutions such as education and moral development then showing the treatment the Negro was receiving from trade unions, railroads and other industrial groups, he declared that, "The Negro might be physically perfect, intellectually a giant, and morally a saint; and if these groups did not change their attitude toward him, the problem would not be solved." By pure and simple logic, he drove home his solution — "Give him a man's chance. It is all he asks."

After the program, Charles sold his speech to purchase books. With it, the buyer took the national prize in oratory the following year.

As Decatur's "Diamond Dandy" Charles held down first base on the Olivet College team. "Few people played it with such fascinating ease and grace," was the Olivet Optic's report. His third year — 1906-7 — the team elected him captain, despite the fact that only one other team in their league had a Negro player.

Charles transferred to Fisk University Nashville, Tenn., for his senior year (1907-8). The offer of a post at the preparatory school, teaching English, coupled with the social opportunities of a Negro student body, prompted the move.

Music interested Charles; he was given free voice lessons at the Fisk Conservatory, and was accepted into the glee club and became an enthusiastic member.

At the University of Michigan Law School (1908-11), only one other Negro student was in his class. They sat together. An island of empty seats separated them from their fellow students. Charles graduated and passed the Bar examination in 1911.

Faculty and honored guests awaited his arrival some 40 years later to confer the first of his five honorary Doctoral degrees, awarded him: Great Lakes College (1944); Olivet College (1949); Virginia Union College, Richmond, Virginia (1952); Central State College, Wilberforce, Ohio (1955); and Wayne University (1955).

Throughout his career Mahoney helped scores of students through college. He was an active member of the Southern Education Foundation and was elected to the Board to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Father J. W. Daniels. As the Detroit chairman of the United Negro College Fund Drive which supports 33 accredited Negro colleges with an enrollment of 30,000 or more, Mahoney won unique honor by carrying Detroit 37 per cent above its goal. Of the $1,018,000 national 1947 total, $44,265 was subscribed in Detroit — the highest achievement at that time.

Poor as a church mouse, Charles Mahoney came to Detroit in 1911, with $12 in his pocket. Beginning his law practice as a full partner of Francis H. Warren, an established lawyer on Randolph Street, his thrifty and thorough transactions before the various courts soon attracted the attention of Detroit's legal lights. After only six months in the city, he was appointed Secretary of the Fraternal Insurance Company by the executive committee.

During the Sweet case, Charles served as associate counsel to the renowned attorney, Clarence Darrow. In 1919, desegregation was achieved in Ypsilanti public schools through the free counsel of Mr. Mahoney, its prime mover. One of the earliest school segregation cases before the Michigan courts, the suit was started in October, closed in May. Thereafter, Charles took up the question of employment of black teachers.

Mahoney's law career proved to be anything but lucrative. Hard times prevailed and his clients often considered his services to be free for the defense of a minority cause of mutual concern. Mahoney saw the need of insurance for Negros since local companies considered them as "too much of a risk." Thus he formed the Great Lakes Mutual Life Insurance Company in 1923.

The 22 charter members were not men of wealth; and, for a time, officers dipped into their own pockets to pay the claims on their "nickel" policies.

An astute businessman with a social conscience, Mahoney built his nationally famous financial institution with a single objective. "We have to decide," he constantly reminded his associates, "that the thing we want is to make a company as strong, solvent and efficient as it is possible to do." But Great Lakes was not to be entirely a sales venture. "You help out," he urged, "you take part, you encourage because that makes a community great. Unless a business does something else besides make money, there is no justification for its existence."

Guided by this philosophy Mahoney initiated a training program including classroom work and field training to build competent people, to build a foundation "upon which generations yet unborn can build." Mahoney provided the impetus for his staff to become sports minded, forming basketball, track and bowling teams. His advice to young business graduates was double barreled and practical: "Play active parts in sports — concentrate on one phase of business."

The board members of G.L.M. branched into two other fields: the Great Lakes Land and Investment Company, owners of two apartment buildings; and the Great Lakes Agency which developed extensive acreage in Holly, Michigan, as a resort area. Virgin land on three spring-fed lakes was subdivided for cottages. Elegant dining and dancing facilities and extensive athletic equipment were but a "stone's throw" from the cottage lots at the Agency's clubhouse. At a time when few recreation establishments welcomed Negro patrons this happy nook offered a welcome retreat from the industrial center, suffering the crucial problems of cramped, inadequate housing!

In 1918 Detroit revised its 1908 charter, replacing among other things a council of 42 aldermen with a non-partisan nine member body. While the new charter eliminated "vote swapping" and provided for civil service reforms, it also meant that minority groups had little or no chance to be elected or included in the new city government structure. In 1918 Mahoney became a candidate but lost. For all practical purposes, the election of a minority representative to a city office was closed.

Defeat at the polls — 1918, 1932, 1940 — by no means silenced him. A grass-roots Republican, Mahoney won the confidence of his district, the backing of his party, and by 1940, the leadership of Michigan's Republican Negro vote. However, it was a bleak era for Negro Republican leaders and rewards were few.

Dead — or almost — was the 1940 Michigan Republican Party. In 1932 the Democrats ushered in the greatest and most fruitful era of political opportunities in the city's history. Hundreds of Negroes had found positions under the new regime, only compounding the difficulties facing Republican Negro politicians.

In 1932 and again in 1940, Mahoney's hat was twice thrown into the political arena as a Republican Congressional candidate from the First District. Both times he lost. The great boom of the 20's had collapsed; hard times and unemployment replaced the roaring twenties.

Yet within Detroit's Negro Republican ranks a fierce, factional contest was coming to a head. Mahoney, Roxborough, Toodle, and Rowlette — there was even rivalry between these men. The factional showdown between Mahoney and Roxborough came with the September, 1940, bid for leadership of the official Wayne County Republican delegates to the national convention. Charles H. Roxborough, the established leader for eight years, held a tremendous advantage by winning the majority of candidates in the past four elections. In the 125 precincts in which Negroes were running, Roxborough's delegates were personally known to the voters. Seventy delegates had been re-elected more than once. This meant that only 55 precincts remained with Mahoney forces having an equal chance of victory. Yet with the backing of Attorney Paul P. Colombo, Fred M. Alger, and Don Marshall of Ford Motor Company, Mahoney's delegates were elected; and he, their leader.

The September victory was doubled by October unification — in an all-out effort to rebuild and to carry forward the Republican Party; to hold incumbent Michigan offices and to put Wendell Wilkie in the White House.

At a dinner given by Mahoney at Great Lakes Mutual in honor of Republican national committeeman, Perry W. Howard, the machinery to unite the Negro vote in the Midwest took form: the Midwest Republican League with Mahoney as chairman.

The contemporary scene of 1940 was sobering the minds of the people confronted with a war threat, a defense budget, a gigantic world crisis almost beyond comprehension or imagination. "The situation," Chairman Mahoney declared, "is too big for any man or any set of men to control." His leadership stressed unification and cooperation. His continued political commitment, together with countless other Republicans who weathered the Democratic era, kept the opposition party viable and effective.

Ford's five dollar day started Negro immigration from the South in 1915. The auto industry went to war in 1917 and for the first time in history it became a major factor in the production of munitions and supplies. Even the tin hats of the doughboys were produced in huge quantities. Detroit had jobs, high pay, a chance for improvement for members of a minority group. Laborers by the thousands from the South were met at the trains and rushed out to jobs before they even had time to rent a room. The Armistice, of course, marked a change, but it did not keep people from streaming into Detroit.

From the start, John C. Dancy, executive director of the Detroit Urban League, tackled their problems by earnest cooperation with voluntary groups and city officials. It was due to his recommendation that, in 1918 Mayor Couzins appointed Mr. Mahoney to the City Planning Commission as the only Negro member and the youngest.

During the next decade, 1922 — 1932, Mr. Mahoney's civic service focused on a broader area, Wayne county. Appointed to the Board by Governor Groesbeck and reappointed by two subsequent governors. He worked strenuously to help settle and establish Negroes still arriving from the South. From 1916 to 1920 the colored population had increased seven-fold but numerically this was only an increase of 15,000. Between 1920 and 1930, however, the rate accelerated to total 50,000. Most were from rural areas accustomed to agricultural work. Most had scant education or factory work experience. Few had any means for support except the promised job in the big city of Detroit. During World War I, and in the booming 20's, employers advertised and sent agents to rural areas workers. One most important accomplishment, that of persuading Governor Groesbeck to establish a State Department of Negro Welfare, resulted in Mr. Mahoney being its first director.

Traveling became Mr. Mahoney's address from Monday to Thursday in 1926. That year Governor Fitzgerald appointed him to the Compensation Commission of the State Committee on Labor and Industry. The commission, employing some 45 people, shouldered a monumental task. As Michigan's employment figures had soared to record peaks with the demands of war production, thousands of inexperienced men and women suddenly found themselves part of a fast-moving production line. Consequently, compensable injuries increased, creating a mountain of red tape. For the fiscal period, 1943-4, compensable injuries numbered 23,117, a record for Michigan.

For eight years Mr. Mahoney spent his week in Lansing on this work — this was not a nominal office — a major personal commitment. His resignation in February, 1947, was prompted [illegible] state regarding full-time [illegible] boards, necessitating the [illegible] the salaries, the [illegible] and his own private [illegible], he resigned.

It was a time for his many [illegible] never [illegible] expressed this mind. He merely wanted to do his best and to "leave the door open" for his successors.

His grasp of world affairs, his congeniality, and his infinite patience served him well. As the head of the 59 nation Legal Commission, Mahoney shouldered the tremendous responsibility of directing the U. N. redefinition of aggression. Difficulties developed when powers narrowed the definition to purely mechanical terms of armed invasion, air attacks, and bombs. The U. S. position insisted that infiltration and subversive propaganda be included. His diplomacy here won the unstinted praise of his colleagues and both official and unofficial observers.

Most important among his numerous addresses before the General Assembly were his statements on the evacuation of foreign troops in Burma, on high seas problems, on disarmament and on collective security.

Now at long last, Mahoney could [illegible] "Stock [illegible] by this." [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Vandals Destroy Grave Markers At Anderson Cemetery

DESTRUCTION of many 100-year-old grave markers at Anderson has occurred twice in the past few months. Last week the Morris monument was desecrated again by some free-wheeling beer-drinkers who also smashed a number of pre-Civil War markers. One group of the vandals has been identified and the damage of last week is still under investigation.

MRS. RAYMOND GALE

Anita Evelyn Youells Gale, 79, died Sunday in Lake View hospital.

She was born Dec. 4, 1892, the only daughter of Churchill Eugene and Edith Wise Youells, pioneers of this community. She was graduated from Decatur high school, Eastern University and the University of Michigan, specializing in dramatics and child welfare. She taught in the city schools of St. Johns, Detroit, Niles and Ann Arbor, and for ten years was the kindergarten teacher in her home town. In 1926 she was awarded a scholarship to the Merill-Palmer Nursery School in Detroit, in view of her work in the university and teaching experience, to do research there along the line of child welfare.

She gave this up in order to marry her friend of many years, Raymond Gale, on June 30, 1926, who this same year started his career as an International Harvester dealer and hardware merchant. One son, Randolph Churchill Gale, one daughter, Evelyn Morris of Highland Park, Ind., one foster daughter, Nina Jean (Edie Lou) Powers of Sewickley, Pa., along with her husband, survive. There are also 11 grandchildren, Kenneth Gale, Anita Evelyn, Colleen Marie and Harschel Edwin Morris of Highland Park, Ind., Eugene, Debby, David and Christy Powers of Sewickley, Pa., and Mark Raymond, Candace Marie, and Scott Randolph Gale of Decatur, and two great grandchildren, Scott Raymond Morris and Brent Michael Van Prooyen who were the joy of her later life.

In her younger days, Mrs. Gale was well-known as a dramatic reader and appeared many times on the stage of the old Opera House in plays, Red Cross benefits and church programs. She first met her husband at a Red Cross benefit program on which he served as one of the judges.

Early in life she was baptized into the fold of the Presbyterian church and was an active member over 60 years. In recent years her activities were necessarily much curtailed, but with the backing of her husband she lent what aid she could in any church project. She was a charter member of the Mothers club, Study club, Brush and Palette Guild, past president of the P. T. A. and was elected as a library trustee for six years.

She, with two other Decatur women, was chosen to represent Decatur at the University of Chicago in December, 1938, at a two week conference sponsored by the Kellogg Foundation in the interest of child welfare.

Never too strong after a major operation and serious illness, she rejoiced to see her son grow into manhood, and was thrilled with every day of life with her family as a gift from God.

Funeral services were held in the Newell funeral home at 2 p.m. Wednesday. The Rev. Henry Houseman and the Rev. Theodore Neely officiated, and burial was in Lakeside cemetery. The pallbearers were Robert Dillenbeck, Verne Daniels, Willis Vlick, James Hall, Max Graham and Edward Schreuder.

ANECDOTE OF CIVIL WAR

Two Confederate soldiers, by the names of Worrix and Cotton were involved in this tale.

On the night before a battle, young Cotton came back to his room, to find his room mate, Worrix, busily engaged in reading his bible.

With a little inquiry Cotton learned that Worrix was worried about the fighting which would take place the next day. Cotton, trying to cheer him up, said — jokingly, "If you are killed in the battle tomorrow — I'll go home and marry your widow!"

And — that's exactly what he did!!

Lewis Goens (deceased), of Decatur, Michigan, married one of the Cotton daughters (DeLora). They reared eleven children. Several of them and their descendants still live in and around Decatur.

Landmark Being Razed

DECATUR IS LOSING another landmark with the razing of the old blacksmith shop on Sherwood street. The building built by Nels Rasmussen, expert buggy maker, probably in the late 80's. The front part was the blacksmith shop. Back of that the woodworking room, then the paint shop. In addition to buggies, Mr. Rasmussen worked on all sorts of farm machinery and general repair work. Lon Secord was the painter of the finished work. Hans Christensen was also a helper in the business. Later occupants of the building included Bert Kidman, Ed Schuler and Lyle Congdon.

Winery stakes claim to fame

Let's learn about wines

By Ruth Ellen Church

HISTORICALLY, Bronte Champagne and Wines Company of Keeler, Mich., has several unique claims to fame. The Michigan chapter of the Women's Christian Temperance Union was chartered in a building that is now a part of the winery facilities.

The vineyards are spread over the site of a famous annual harness race of the early days of this century, known as the Keeler Donnybrook. Racing fans from all over the Midwest gathered for the fashionable event which heaped fame and fortune [all of $25 to $50 per race!] on participants.

The owner of the racetrack site was Dr. Ray Morris, who planted the first vineyards in the area, 100 acres of concords. Bronte has replaced the concords with French-American grapes which make much better wines.

Another interesting bit of history is this: German prisoners of war planted Bronte's present vineyards in 1944 and 1945.

STILL ANOTHER claim to fame: Robert Wozniak, president of Bronte and son of the founder, Dr. T. W. Wozniak [who is retired but still on the board of directors], bottled the first cold duck. This last achievement may not go down in the annals of the winery as the company's greatest achievement; cold duck has been outgrown by today's more discerning wine drinker, but in its day it was very, very big, as everyone knows.

Of Bronte's 230 acres, 150 now are planted to hybrids. Forty acres of niagara, an eastern grape, are grown for the company's white port and there are 22 acres of catawba, another eastern grape which Angelo Spinazze, vice president in charge of vineyards and winery, believes adds a pleasant taste to champagnes. Catawba, a popular Ohio grape, hasn't been grown much in Michigan. But Bronte has some vines that are 18 and 19 years old. Delaware grapes also are used in Bronte champagnes. Delaware is queen of eastern varieties.

Credit for planting the first baco noir grapes in Michigan goes to Angelo Spinazze, who was doing it 20 years ago, in 1954. This is one of the best hybrids for the Michigan climate. Lake Michigan and the cluster of small lakes known as Sister Lakes temper the climate in this southwestern Michigan grape-growing area, but young vines still may need winter protection from cold. Young vines are protected from winter freezes by painting them with latex, Spinazze says.

Spinazze learned his viticulture and winemaking in his native Italy where his family had vineyards, but overlaid that basic training with professional training as an enologist. Now in his sixties, he can boast a good many years of experience. He is ably assisted by Curtis Frick, chemist.

SPINAZZE AND FRICK have experimented with vinifera grapes, but believe the land in this fruit belt is too level for the more delicate vines and that the future of midwestern wines is in the hybrids. In addition to red and white table wines and champagnes, they make ports and sherries of which they are proud. Bronte Hartford Cream Sherry, always a popular wine, now is given more age in bourbon barrels, which has improved its flavor, Spinazze believes.

"In a couple of years we are going to have beautiful wines," he declares, "particularly if we have mild winters like the last one."

Bronte wines under their Sister Lakes label are sold mainly in Michigan, Illinois, Indiana, Wisconsin, and Ohio, but gradual expansion is anticipated.

Travelers eastward and westward on Interstate 94 will be welcomed at this modern midwestern winery if they drop off at the Hartford exit No. 46 between 10 a. m. and 4 p. m. weekdays, year around. From June thru October, tours are available also on Saturdays. The trip from Chicago takes about two hours.

WEDDING COMING UP? The Taylor Wine Company, Hammondsport, N. Y. 14840, has a handy free booklet, "Here Comes the Bride." All pink and pretty, it tells how to plan, who pays for what, suggests a "vice" shower for the bridegroom [bar fixings, wines, garden tools], offers recipes for punches and reception food.

MOGEN DAVID Wine Corporation, now a subsidiary of The Coca-Cola Bottling Company, Inc., started life six months before the end of Prohibition as The California Wine Company, bottling medicinal and sacramental wines in $45-a-month rented quarters in Chicago, with $5,000 borrowed as a deposit on 50 barrels of wine.

Now celebrating its 40th year, Mogen David has only a little more than a million dollars to go to rack up a 1974 sales record of $40 million. Last year this third largest of the country's wineries sold nearly $39 million worth of wines from its two plants in Chicago and one in Westfield, N. Y. Only about 3 per cent of the wines sold by Mogen David today are sacramental wines.

J. Myron Bay, president of the company, believes there are no limits on the growth of the wine industry. He says that Mogen David's 40th year celebration commemorates such important steps in the company's development as when Mogen David actually became Mogen David. The company, on Sept. 23, 1917, then operating as Wine Corporation of America, dumped 40,000 gallons of its unpopular "Barloma" wine down the drain and took the name of the new wine just introduced, which was "sizzling in the marketplace." Prior to that time the company had been bottling private label wines. Salesmen took orders during the day on a store by store basis, the labels were printed overnight, glued to the bottles and the wine delivered next morning.

Yes, you've come a long way, Mogen David!

An Era Ends

Decatur's Henry Houseman Retires After 47 Years As A School Leader

News Palladium

By ETHEL PAUL
Decatur Correspondent

DECATUR — Henry Houseman ended 47 years of dedication to Decatur public schools this summer, but he plans to continue to serve.

A spry, studious 74, Houseman says he "still gets a thrill walking into the classroom and facing the challenge of teaching students so that they understand."

A native of Decatur, Houseman started his working life as a bookkeeper in the local bank where his father worked.

Two years later, he entered Valparaiso College to study law, but soon changed majors and colleges, transferring to what is now Western Michigan University. He received "graded" and then "life" teaching certificates and taught a year at Augusta before returning to Western to get his bachelors degree.

In the fall of 1965 Houseman started teaching at Decatur, and has since taught more subjects offered in the high school. He majored in English (his native language is Dutch) speech and social science.

He was named principal of the high school in 1927 in addition to his teaching duties, and continued as principal until 1962. At an age when most people retire, Houseman was appointed assistant superintendent and entered graduate school at Michigan State University to study sociology.

He also found time to study at Winona College in Indiana, where he received a master of religious education degree.

The last degree was the natural result of another longtime interest. An ordained minister, he served the Pokagon Methodist Chapel for eight years, Harmony Chapel (south of Lawton) for eight years and spent a year as minister of the Oronoko Church at Berrien Springs. For the last 10 years he has been minister of Trowbridge Methodist Church near Otsego.

He has written two books: one, entitled "Orientalism" which he describes as a key to understanding the Bible, and the second, "Our Templed Back Pastures," which is a study of rural churches.

Houseman's devotion to education carried over to other members of his family. His wife, Beth taught at Hamilton, Decatur and Lawton schools before her death a few years ago. His son, Henry F., is adult education coordinator at Portage; Elsie teaches at Paw Paw, Louis is a teacher and assistant athletic director at Decatur, and Dorothy just received her bachelor of arts degree from WMU in June. Son Henry's wife Patricia will teach at Decatur starting this fall.

He isn't having any trouble finding things to keep himself occupied these days. "Being a minister has a way of becoming a full time job, don't you know," he told a visitor one day last week between house and hospital calls.

He's also looking forward to writing another book, and this fall he'll be back to Decatur high now and then as a substitute with the title of "teacher emeritus."

Supt. Wayne Hellenga says of Houseman's teaching career, "Certainly a greater devotion to any cause could not be given."

But perhaps Glenn Hayes, local newspaper publisher describes best the feelings of Decaturites (more than two generations of whom have been taught by Houseman),

"He's a tremendous guy . . . really an institution here. It's hard to know where to begin to tell his story."

Henry Houseman Receives Doctorate

Reverend Henry Houseman has recently been awarded the degree of Doctor of Divinity by Tennessee Biblical. His field of study was practical theology, and his dissertation title was "The Role of the Church in Today's Society."

Dr. Houseman's undergraduate work was at Valparaiso University and Western Michigan University, and his graduate work was at Michigan State University, Garrett Biblical, and Winona Lake School of Theology. He had previously earned the A.B., M.A., and M.R.E. degrees.

Reunited as State Champs '42

MEMBERS of the 1942 DHS State Champion class C basketball team were honored Saturday night at the Raider-Watervliet game, and at a dinner following the game. HISTORY OF VANDALIA, MICHIGAN

The first white people who came to make their home in the vicinity of Vandalia were mainly from Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, Virginia and the Carolinas. Many of these were Quakers, the fundamental principles of whose faith made the system of human slavery one of great repugnance. For this reason, more than any other, they left their native state and sought homes in the great Northwest Territory where slavery had been forever prohibited.

In loving memory of the great "Apostle of Peace" (William Penn) whose religious teachings they so earnestly endeavored to follow, they named the region Penn.

Scattered bands of Pottawattomi Indians partially occupied the territory at that time. These Indians had been influenced, to a greater or less extent, by coming in contact with Christianity, and gave the settlers no serious trouble.

Among the first of these sturdy pioneers were a Mr. McIntosh, George Jones, John Price, John Rhinehart. Martin Shields who, in 1829 made the first land entry, Joseph Frake, reputed to be the first settler in the township and Stephen Bogue, the latter being, more than any other one person, instrumental in the founding of the Village of Vandalia.

At that time the land was mostly forest covered, the only roads being the old Indian Trails. For several years the settlement grew slowly owing to rumors of Indian troubles, the most serious of these being that caused by the Blackhawk War in 1832. Another cause which affected immigration was a very severe frost which occurred about June 19, 1835.

In the period between 1836 and 1840 the county filled up rapidly with settlers. Better houses were built and new industries and new methods were introduced. The first grist mill in the county was built on Christiana Creek in 1828 by a man named Daniel Carpenter. It was a very crude affair, not a foot of lumber being used in its construction, except for the bolting chest which, together with the buhrs and irons, were brought from Ohio in wagons drawn by oxen. This mill was later purchased and operated by John W. O'Dell.

Later settlers who made their home nearby were: Amos Smith, James E. Bonine, James O'Dell, (who later represented his district in the State Legislature) Reason Pemberton, Thomas Kirk, George Longsduff, George Green, John Hollister and George Townsend.

At the time of the Kentucky raid in 1847, one of the families of fugitive slaves was living on the west side of the Mill pond in a log house owned by a Mr. Shugart, who lived nearby, who together with Stephen Bogue and a number of other kindly disposed Quakers, had assisted many of the slaves fleeing in their journey to freedom. The little Quaker settlement being one of the stations of the Underground Railraod.

The O'Dell Mill figured quite prominently in the Kentucky Raid of 1847 — an attempt by a group of Kentucky slave owners to regain their runaway slaves. The Raid was made at night in Calvin and Penn Townships, where many Quakers lived. Three slaves were kidnapped at Josiah Osbornes in Calvin Township. The slave owners had divided into two groups. One group was to get the fugitive slaves in Calvin Township, and the other group to get the fugitive slaves in Penn Township. Then they were to meet and return to Indiana. The slave owners who had gone to Calvin were quickly surrounded by a group of angry men who decided to go and meet the slave owners who had gone to Penn. The slave owners had captured three men, a woman and a child at the William East home, then went to Vandalia and captured a slave living in the log cabin. Owned by Mr. Shugart, who quickly went on horseback to the home of Stephen Bogue and on to Cassopolis to give the alarm and have the raiders arrested. The Raiders had captured one slave in the Stephen Bogue home, and they then turned back to join the group in Calvin. They were followed by a group of angry citizens. The two groups met at the O'Dell Mill near Vandalia. By that time a large number of people from Cassopolis had joined the group of people at the Mill.

The Raiders were given to understand they could not leave unless the fugitive slaves were set free. The Raiders were armed with pistols and knives. The Abolitionists were armed with clubs and possibly other weapons.

A battle was imminent but the Quakers (Bogue, Osborne, and Shugart) finally persuaded the Raiders to go to the county seat and submit their case to a Justice of the Peace. At nine o'clock the next morning they reached Cassopolis where they were met by a large crowd of excited citizens. Here the Raiders were told that even if a Court would give an order it would be impossible to take their slaves out of the county. Three days elapsed before the Court Commissioners decided against the nine Kentucky slave owners and the slaves were set free. The slaves were taken to the home of Ishmael Lee near Cassopolis and a few days later, with more than 40 other fugitives left for Canada. They were escorted by Zackariah Shugart, a Quaker, by means of the "Underground Railroad."

When the Kentucky slave owners left Cassopolis to return to their home, they were preceded by a Mr. Osborne, who surprised three Negroes waiting in a cornfield with shot guns to kill the slave owners.

At the O'Dell, a group of people waited to escort the slave owners to the Indiana State line for fear they would be attacked by angry citizens.

The Mr. Shugart mentioned here had a store in Vandalia. He kept an Account Book. In this book are the names of a large group of refugee slaves. At the Library in Niles, Michigan, there is a Photostatic Copy of the contents of this book, owned by a grandson (Mr. Smith of Iowa).

The little Mill built during the early days of settlement soon proved inadequate to the task of supplying the rapidly increasing population with material for the staff of life. Stephen Bogue was urged by his neighbors to build a larger mill. Owing to numerous other responsibilities, twelve years elapsed before he finally yielded to the wishes of his neighbors and the mill was completed in 1848-1849. It was built by Stephen Bogue and C.P. Ball. David Ward was the millwright. Gideon Osborne was the first miller, assisted by Jesse East. This was the real beginning of the Village which was laid out January 3, 1851.

In 1849, the town was surveyed by a Mr. Ward. In 1851, the plot of the Village was filed, the name "Vandalia" being chosen by Mr. Stephen Bogue, Sr.

The original site extended east from the Creek to the street just west of the Quaker Church. The northern limit was the alley north of what was later the Town Hall. The southern boundary was the street now known as Mill Street. The first two houses in the Village were built for the men who operated the Mill. They stood at the west entrance to the Village on the north side of the street next to the Mill race (M-60). The first Post Office was in one of these houses and the first Postmaster was a Mr. Monroe.

About the time the Mill was built a blacksmith shop was built between these houses and the Mill race. A Mr. Sigerfoose was the first blacksmith. The first merchant was Asa Kingsbury, and the first physician was Dr. Evan Bonine.

Mr. Bogue gave ten acres of land to Mr. Wiley Wilson on the condition that he would build a sawmill. This was located on the east bank of the Mill race near the flour mill. For many years a cooper shop operated by Barnum and Honeyman, employing about thirty (30) men, was located at the west end of Wood Street.

Eight additions were made to the Village. Many lots were donated by Mr. Bogue from his farm to residents. The only condition being the promise to build a house thereon. Another donation of eight (8) acres was made to a Mr. Boarts for the building of a handle factory in the east part of town. This factory was destroyed by fire shortly after.

Two hotels were built: The Vandalia Town House in 1852, located at the west entrance to the Village and another one built by George T. Townsend in 1871. Also, a bank was built by Mr. Townsend the following year, 1872. The first store was located on what is now Water Street, near the flour mill. Years later a Creamery was built on this location. As the population increased the business section was extended to Main Street and the Village was incorporated in 1875. Some of the early merchants were: J.M. Bonine, John Lutes, Peter Kiblinger, Mr. Oppenheim, H.R. Shilling, William Merritt, M.B. Lewis and William Green.

The construction of the Railroad in 1871 gave an important impetus to the growth of the Village.

Three (3) churches were built: The Christian Church in 1854; The Methodist Church in 1877; and the Quaker Church in 1879.

The first school was built in 1835 by John O'Dell and Thomas J. Kirk. It was located on the corner of White Temple Road and Black Street. Later it was moved to the Village of Vandalia and used for some time for the lower grades. The lady who taught lived in part of the house. A school for older pupils was built on the lot east of the Quaker Church. When the new brick school was built (1873) a Mr. Ed Ely bought this building (near the Quaker Church) and moved it to the west block using part for a residence and part for a barn.

In plotting the Village, Mr. Bogue gave to the town the entire block where the brick school stood for a Public Square and it served that purpose for some time. When the School Board decided to build a graded school, they took the Public Square as the best place and the new school was built in 1873. They had to get permission from the State Legislature to build the school. Amos Smith was one of the board members and he sent away for the clock which was used many years. Jesse Borton was the first Superintendent in the new school and did much to raise the school to a better standard. A regular course of study was established in 1879 by Mike Pemberton. This high school was in opeeration until 1945, when the high school students were taken to Cassopolis, and Vandalia High School became an eighth (8) grade school.

In 1958, a new school was built about ½ mile east of town. In 1958, the Vandalia School District, which had been organized in 1865, became a part of the Cassopolis School District.

Vandalia has been particularly unfortunate in sustaining loss by fire, two grist mills, a depot, a livery barn, a hotel, a bank, five store buildings and a number of residences being destroyed in this way.

The first newspaper was published in 1881 by William DeGroot. Later editors were: Joseph Sturr, C.L. Pemberton, Cross Brothers and F.M. Vail.

At one time the population numbered about 850, and Vandalia was a busy little town. After so many places were destroyed by fire, and later the railroad was taken away, the town ceased to grow and now the population is less than 450.

I once read in an old History, that William Penn was planning to make a new settlement in Pennsylvania when the Revolutionary War broke out he gave it up. He intended to name the new settlement "Vandalia."

It is possible that is how Mr. Bogue got his name for the town of Vandalia.

Contributed by Marion Davis who attended Vandalia High School and later taught 4-5-6 grades 1932-38.

HELEN A. HATHAWAY

Helen A. Hathaway, 91, was born in Volinia township, Cass county, Dec. 6, 1881, the daughter of Benjamin and Amelia John Hathaway. She died in Laguna Beach, Calif., Feb. 21 and burial was in Ann Arbor.

Helen's mother passed away less than a month following her birth. Her father married Katherine Richmond who was known far and wide as "Aunt Kittie," and she did a fine job raising Helen, whose father died, too, when she was only 15 years old. Helen was graduated from Decatur high school and also from the University of Michigan. She took employment in the upper peninsular copper country working in the office of the Quincy mine. She made a trip to Europe and saw the Passion Play at Oberammergau.

Later she returned to Marcellus where she worked in Lowry's State Bank, until it closed. During this period she lived with the Frank B. Curtis family, and with Mr. and Mrs. Clemens on West Dibble street, and attended the Methodist church.

The residence on the farm in Volinia where Aunt Kittie still lived was destroyed by fire in about 1923 which was a tragic loss of the original antique furniture and a library of valuable volumes. At this time, both of the Hathaway women moved to Ann Arbor where they lived for many years, renting rooms to students, sometimes Japanese and Chinese young people. She became secretary to a Mr. Stevenson of Ann Arbor who spent time in China. She took care of his office and mailed daily reports and clippings to him. Later she became legal secretary to Judge Pray, Probate Court, Washtenaw county.

She worked at the Courthouse in Ann Arbor until her retirement in the late 1940's.

She always felt that she was the daughter of a famous father so it is fitting that some explanatory and biographical remarks be made about the late Benjamin Hathaway, nurseryman, farmer and poet. He was born in Cayuga county, New York State, Sept. 30, 1822, and died Mar. 21, 1896 and was buried in Nicholsville cemetery.

He was the eldest of eight children and was taken from school and put to work at an early age. But he was one who always made the most of opportunities for culture. He wrote poems with chalk on barrellheads while employed as a cooper, later copying them on paper, mostly done after 9 p.m. when his work day ended.

He spent ten years in intellectual pursuits in Ann Arbor, several more years in Chicago, and 30 years as a nurseryman and farmer. He developed the "Hathaway grape." He planted a chestnut grove in rows of which some trees still stand. He loved Bunker Lake which bordered his farm.

According to the biography by Mrs. Esther Laughlin, he published "Art Life and Other Poems," "Researches of the Iroquis," and "The Finished Creation."

Helen's cousin Roy Hathaway and his wife Ruth live in Marcellus on Reid street. She came there to see them in later years, also was a frequent guest of Jay and Maud Lyle of Decatur. She frequently furnished articles about her travels to the Decatur Republican when Arba Moulton wa editor. He and Oscar Newell, Sr., and Hans Christensen and wife were lifelong friends of the Hathaways.

Grace Weeks Marks 50 Years In Business On Main Street

Grace Weeks began her second half-century of business on main street this month in her G. W. Photo & Gift Shop.

Almost an institution over the years, Grace is a familiar figure to those who want excellent and specialized photographic work and school children with a sweet tooth.

Over the years she has kept her prices realistic and maintains a stock of items for sale that strains the imagination.

As a 14-year-old school girl in Chicago, Grace Weeks was given her first Brownie camera and developing outfit by her grandfather. Then other people began to ask her to do their pictures.

Upon the death of her grandfather in 1911, she came to live with her grandmother, and went to school in Decatur for one year.

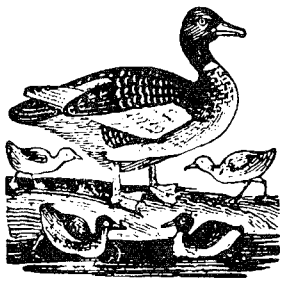
After a few years of chicken farming and gardening, she decided to open a photo shop. It was located in the basement of the present Gale Farm Store. It was in the front part of the G. A. R. hall, for which she paid the whole sum of $5 a month and the light bill for the hall.

Several years later, Grace and her father, George Weeks, bought the building where she is now located. To the photo line she added gifts, cards and novelty items, and candy.

Grace's mother was a great help to her in the early years. And Nettie Halsted has been a faithful helper and friend for many years.

Grace has seen lots of children and their children and their children grow up over her candy counter.

A remarkable thing is reported this week in the news columns. Grace Weeks who has been in business for 50 years in a proprietorship of a small store in a small town is noteworthy. The small business fatalities in the country are high and the ridiculous regulations, taxes and difficulty of small businesses to get supplies any more make her tenacity to be independent, a remarkable thing. She is to be congratulated and admired.



ENTERTAINMENT

Decatur has always been a great entertainment center. The school house was the nucleus, with its lyceums, plays, and spelling bees. Many home talent plays were produced by the Dramatic Club and other organizations, and these were presented in the old town hallan i te opea oue. h town was fortunate in having the great actor and impersonator, Howard Hall, who played once in Decatur in "The Michado." Frank Tucker, who performed at Medicine shows, was a great entertainer too!

Dancing and partying were favorite pastimes among the country people. For the most part, the parties were held in the homes, where groups of neighbors congregated. Many times the men "took down" the kitchen range and set it outside, while the women were busy pulling the tacks out of the rag carpet which was layed over a layer of straw.

Another group would sweep up the straw and the floor would be ready in no time for a square dance. Sometimes the young people rode horseback to the dancing parties — returning home at three or four o'clock in the morning. Nobody seemed to mind the inconveniences, in fact, it was all considered a part of the fun!

Earl E. Copley

Earl E. Copley Succumbs at 85

First State Bank President for 66 Years

EARL E. COPLEY

Earl E. Copley, 85, passed away Thursday morning, June 1, in Lake View Community Hospital, after a short illness. He was born Dec. 1, 1886, on the family farm in Volinia township, Cass county, the youngest child and only son of Edwin and Esther McKain Copley.

He had been president of the First State Bank since the death of his father in 1916. The bank was established by his grandfather, Alexander Bennett Copley, and celebrated its one hundredth anniversary two years ago.

In May of 1912, he was married to Loretta Hughes of Chicago, who passed away Nov. 7, 1925. In September, 1927, he married Miss Margaret Conway, daughter of William and Ella Conway.

Mr. Copley opened one of the pioneer Ford automobile dealerships in Decatur in 1916, and in 1931 he changed to the Chevrolet agency, which he continued until 1949. He was also active in the Michigan oil explorations in the 1920's and '30's.

He is survived by his wife, Margeret; one son, Allan of Dearborn; two daughters, Mrs. Alfred (Virginia) Osmick of Decatur and Mrs. Robert (Mary Lou) O'Connell of Jackson; also by 11 grandchildren and two great grandchildren; and one sister, Miss Lotta Copley of Ann Arbor.

Funeral services were held Sunday, June 4, at the Newell funeral home, with the Rev. LeRoy Cabbage, former pastor of the First United Presbyterian church officiating, and assisted by the Rev. Theodore Neely and Father Leo Taubitz. Burial was in Lakeside cemetery.

KAPLAN'S STORE

1922 – 1972

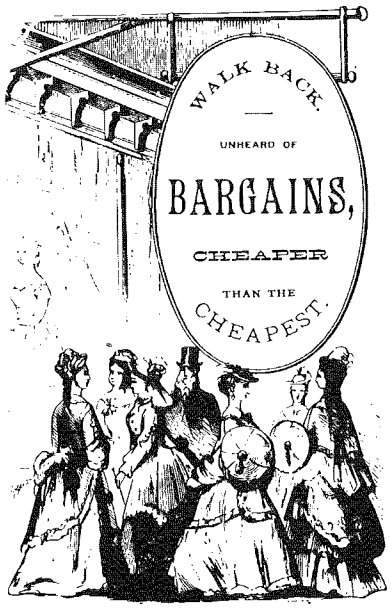
For me the fiftieth anniversary of Kaplan's store is the old story of the American dream. Corny? Out-dated sentiment? Not to me. Here is a store started by pioneers in 1863... they had faith in the town and in the American way of life.

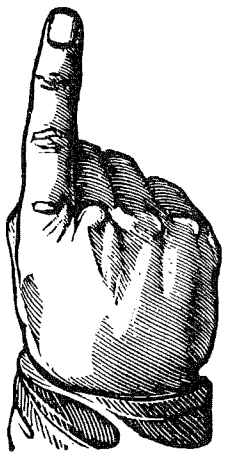
Near the turn of the century a young man fled the wretched life of Czarist Russia (not the romantic Russia of Nicholas and Alexandra, but the very real misery of famine. The threat of pogroms, and constant overwhelming poverty). He joined his father in the promised land of America, and they started out selling brooms door to door. The Jewish Agricultural Society helped him to buy a farm, and from there his path led in 1922 from another continent and another culture to the store in Decatur.

I remember the late twenties when every evening train brought another family from central Europe, many of them speaking no English. They were met at the train by Red Woolfe who brought them to the store where my father translated their destination and my mother gave them supper, and sent them on their way in the new land.

We've come a long way from the cracker barrel, the open bags of sugar, salt, and beans to the rows of refrigerators and freezers, the NCR cash register that sometimes spits out more information than we know what to do with, the digital computer scale that works most of the time. Some things have changed... and some haven't. We have always believed in honest values with a minimum of frills, but we have not accepted the current warehouse concept that expects customers to do our work including their own bagging and carrying. Service is still a part of our store.

We have in the little gallery an exhibit of photographs through the years, together with other memorabilia including ledgers and invoices and other treasures from the early years of the store.





TEACHER RETIRING

'Marion Davis Day' Planned In Decatur

DECATUR — Sunday will be "Marion Davis" day in Decatur.

A program will be held at 3 p.m. in the high school cafetorium honoring Davis on his retirement after 50 years in education. He has taught at Decatur 28 years.

Residents in the Decatur area and other friends are invited to attend. A guest book will be presented to the guest of honor at close of the program.

Marion Davis Honored for 50 Years of Service

In recognition of the work accomplished by Marion Davis during his fifty years in education, the Parent Teacher Organization of Decatur Public Schools sponsored a "Mr. Davis Day" on Sunday, May 21, honoring Mr. and Mrs. Marion Davis.

Included in the activities was a program "This is Your Life, Marion Davis." Mrs. Wendell MacKellar gave the welcome for the P. T. O. and Keith Leighton gave the welcome for the community. Wayne Hellenga gave the welcome for the school and acted as narrator.

Mrs. Jan Pollock served as the pianist during the program, playing appropriate selections to typify various events in the life of Mr. Davis.

Many people were present to recall various events of the past. Included were Mrs. Sherman Cropsey, a classmate at the Newton Woods school; Lloyd Keesler, a brother-in-law and friend; Lela Sheline and Ina Hollenbeck, his sisters-in-law; Pearse Hollenbeck, a brother-in-law; Nellie O'Dell, a friend from Vandalia; Iola Holtz, a student of Mr. Davis at Newton Woods; Mrs. Otto Springsteen, a high school classmate.

Vere Hodges, a student at the White Temple school; Harold Gebhard, a former neighbor; Howard Jessup, former student; Vivian Bartack, former student at Vandalia; Lamar Davis, a nephew; Beverly Marks, a Decatur teacher; Ervin Krenn, a former teacher at Decatur; Martin Mang, superintendent of the schools at Pelston; Joe Gossler, elementary custodian; Janice Schonbok, a former student; Arlene VanderGeest, former student and now Decatur teacher; Mrs. Florence Houtman, former secretary to Mr. Davis.

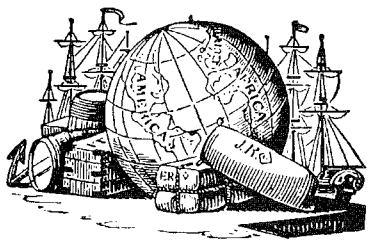
Mack Jones, a teacher in Decatur; Mary Lou Shroyer, library aide in Decatur schools; Jim DeGraaf, a former student; Noble Arent, principal of Ludington high school; Marion Snell, a retired teacher; and Jane Schleeter, a teacher in Decatur schools.

Tom Gibson, basketball coach, presented a plaque named in honor of Mr. Davis on which the most valuable player in basketball is recognized yearly. Mr. Davis then made the 1971-72 most valuable player award to John Overley.

Other participants in the program included his wife, Faye; children, Mrs. Fred Pogue (Miriam), Mrs. Donald Adams (Beryl), and Mrs. George Bradeen (Joyce), daughter-in-law, Mrs. Ryan Davis (Debbie), and his grandchildren and his two great grandchildren. Ryan Davis, son of Mr. and Mrs. Davis, was unable to attend as he is serving in the U. S. Air Force overseas.

Credit for the research and coordination of the program go to Mrs. Walter Curran and Mrs. Wendell MacKellar. Frank Popp video-taped the program.

Refreshments were served following the program.



HUGE LAKES WIPED OUT OVERNIGHT

Ancient Area Indian Tribes Once Faced Reverse of High Water Problem Today

Editor's note: The following account of a little-known Indian legend was made possible by the late Joseph Chigno of Paw Paw, who, before his recent death, gave the writer permission to use the personal records of his great-great-grandfather, Potowatomi Chief Simon Pokagon.

By LOUISE ENGLE

HARTFORD, Mich.-Rising waters in the Great Lakes and Michigan's inland waterways is causing no end of concern because of the huge toll it is taking in lakeshore property and buildings.

But, according to an ancient Indian legend recorded by the famed Chief Simon Pokagon, the Potowatomi tribe which inhabitated this area a thousand years ago, encountered just the reverse of the high water problem.

QUIRK OF NATURE

The Indians, according to the legend, witnessed a huge quirk of nature which overnight removed much of the expanses of water which provided them with their livelihood.

Pokagon told in his legend, that Paw Paw river was once a noted river called "Si-bi-gan" or River of Lakes. In fact, it appears that the river was a succession of small and great lakes, from its source to its mouth.

Chief Pokagon described a great inland lake, called "Nib-i-wa" (Lake of Plenty), which covered all the lands where the city of Paw Paw now stands, except for the higher rolling hills, extending as far as the village of Lawton and westward near the village of Decatur.

To the west of Lake of Plenty, was another and larger lake, called "Ki - tchi - git - a - gan" (Earthly Paradise), which covered the valley of the Paw Paw river, including the area where Watervliet and Coloma, are located, extending from the foothills south of Hartford, covering the lands of Lawrence, on the east, to the foothills north of Bangor.

At this time, Rush and VanAuken lakes, north of here, were bays connected with this great body of water on the [illegible] Paw Paw lake a large [illegible] on the extreme west.

The village of "O-de-na," on the shores of Lake of Plenty, and the village of "Waw-kwin," at the lake of Earthly Paradise, were inhabitated by a race of Indians who manufactured flint arrow points. They have been designated by the whites as the "Mound Builders."

The great trail of all the northern and western tribes passed these villages, to and from the great prairie, beyond Lake Michigan.

It was indeed an abundant place, according to Pokagon's records. Moose, buffalo, bear and deer in their autumn and spring migrations passed around these great bodies of water.

WATER FOWL PLENTIFUL

Swans, geese, and ducks moved like clouds over their surface, while myriads of fish swarmed in waters close to the shore. The tribes also came from the east, south and west, to exchange corn and tobacco, for flint work and maple sugar, of which large quantities were always kept in store. Sugar was generally used by many tribes in place of salt.

This ancient tribe of Indians lived in luxury and ease. The chase was abandoned, for they could procure all their food within bow shot of their wigwams.

All was calm and serene, until one night in early spring, the wealthy inhabitants of the two large villages, were aroused from their slumbers at midnight by a strange terrifying roar.

Starting in the direction of the sound, men, women, and children, followed by a multitude of dogs, moved cautiously, southward until they finally reached the headlands north of where Watervliet now stands. Gazing into the valley beneath, they saw by the feeble light of the moon that the shore at the outlet of their beautiful lake, which for ages had held it fast, had given away. A deluge of water, roaring like a windwind, was sweeping down great trees and rocks towards Lake Michigan.

The next morning the people were confronted with a slimy mass of mud alive with struggling, dying fish. The canoes that were left unanchored the night before were swept away, and those that were tied to the shore, were on dry land, far from the water's edge.

TOTAL UP DAMAGE

Runners were sent out by the chiefs of the two large villages, to report on the damage done to other lakes downstream.

When the runners returned they reported that all the lakes in the Paw Paw river valley below had been swept into Lake Michigan, and only the lakes such as Paw Paw, Rush, VanAukens, Christy, Prospect, Merrimen, Scott, Brownwood, and numerous other lakes, found in Van Buren and Berrien Counties, were remaining, much as they are today.

GLENWOOD STORY

Have had a number of phone calls and comments on the article about Glenwood, so decided to write a later one. Have had some fine help from Mrs. Ransom Kinney, who, while she enjoyed the article, mentioned that I forgot to say that in Glenwood now, there is a very nice Adventist church and school, also a three-room parochial school that includes pupils from Decatur and Glenwood.

These places in Glenwood were there around 80 years ago. A Mr. Taylor owned a cheese factory. E. E. Mott raised bees and was known as the bee king of the U. S. He shipped queen bees everywhere.

Also there was a large ice house in Glenwood, owned by H. M. Hampton, who also owned a large general store, which burned in later years. The ice for the ice house was cut from Twin Lakes. A huge amount of it was loaded in freight cars and shipped to places where needed.

A sorghum and cider mill occupied an important place there, too.

Hampton Brothers also maintained a large lumber yard, and it could be that the saw dust from the lumber yard furnished the insulation for the blocks of ice in the ice house.

James Gordon had a blacksmith shop and also made barrel staves and hoops. In later years, Sim Hodge and Son owned the blacksmith shop and also made hoops.

Charlie Mott raised ginseng, and Ed Hitchcock gathered holly berries and ferns which were shipped to Detroit, often employing six or eight men to work for him through the winter. In later years, Harry Mott gathered berries and ferns.

Glenwood was then a quiet, peaceful little village, with well kept homes and lawns, and we sincerely wish these hopes and ideals will continue down thru the coming years.

How About That?

By Marcella

I've been here in Colorado only two days and am already in love with the region. I've known mountains (growing up in Pennsylvania) and I think one never forgets his love of them. The people here are wonderfully friendly. I arrived Saturday afternoon and at one o'clock Sunday was having dinner with friends of Lyla's and Bill's. They make you feel like a long-time friend — beautiful hosts. They're from the west, here. Norm is from California, and his lovely wife, Julie, is from Utah. They're the natural kind of out-of-door folks. Norm was telling of an overnight trip he'd taken, back in Utah with his Scouts. They stayed overnight at a camp where "Jeremiah Johnson" was filmed. Jeremiah was played by Robert Redford, you know. Redford's own home is right there — an unbelievably beautiful (and costly) home on the side of the mountain.

Norm and Julie told about a news release that had gone out about Redford. We all know that publicity releases are exaggerated. In this one, Redford's home was described at being eighty miles from the nearest town. Actually, it's twenty miles from Provo and Provo is no squaw village. The article said that you could gain access to the place only by snow-shoeing in. In reality there is a road that goes right past his door. Bus loads of tourists pass by all the time trying to get just one look at their hero. One wonders how such statements enhance. For instance, "there is no going to some nearby stand for a hamburger." Sundance, Redford's own fabulous resort, is only two minutes from his home. Now does it make you love Redford any the less to know these truths?

I could foretell it all when I settled into my seat in the plane. The woman sitting next to me emitted clouds of perfume, but above the perfume was the fog of whisky. I could only hope it wasn't talkie-whisky. I was wrong. As we fastened our seat belts she released her jaw. She paid no heed to the fact that I was reading, or had hoped she'd think I was reading. She had been visiting her sister for two weeks. She numbered the rooms she'd papered and painted, the colors she'd used and how sore her knees were. She always "saved her sister a lot of money by doing these things for her," and a more thankless job you couldn't imagine. I didn't even try. I kept on looking at my magazine, but the voice chattered on. All of a sudden I found that I was really listening, for she'd said, "This is my sixth marriage." Now we've all read about these women, but here was one in the flesh. I gave her my undivided attention.

She was on her way to Cheyenne, Wyoming to be married, and hoped everything was going to turn out all right. She'd met the gentleman on her way to Honolulu three months ago and he'd asked her to stop off in his home town, Cheyenne on the way home. She did — for seven hours and they decided then that they were meant for each other. I didn't ask her if she had told him how many others she'd been meant for. She did tell me that the others were all losers. I decided from appearance she'd had a few marginal losses herself.

"Billie" told me that she is just crazy about negligees. She's got dozens of them. She had never owned an apron, for "men don't like aprons." I tried to picture Billie in some of the negligees she had described, frying the morning eggs and bacon. I couldn't picture her frying them at any hour of the day. She did say that "Curly" likes plenty of whisky in his coffee in the morning. Who's going to worry about the bacon? She told me, too, that she is going to wear a blue outfit this time. Heretofore she has always worn white. I can appreciate that it's a tough habit to break, but I'm with her — maybe the change will bring luck. I truly hope it brings good lqck, for Billie can't stand too many more dress rehearsals for the real thing. She's fifty-two now, and as she says, "Romance is all kind of up-hill now." I just hope that the morning brew is strong enough that Curly thinks all the wrinkles are laugh lines and the wrinkles in the negligees are due to having been packed for the trip.

Youth did abound in the airport terminal. Everywhere you looked there were young people with skis and poles. All had flown in for a weekend of skiing. When it was announced that the skiing was perfect, a yell went up that could have deafened you. There's a great bunch of young people coming on — not the least of which is Bill's and Lyla's baby, which is what brought me to Colorado. We're waiting —

As I started to write, I pictured you all and our main street back home. It's such a nice place. The memories are all good, so I send my love.

I've been reading "I Ain't Much, but I'm All I've Got." The author was a most successful business man, but gave it all up when the rat race got him down. I fully appreciate his writing of the philosophical bent his life took, but I always hold the thought in the back of my mind that he couldn't be so fully philosophical if he hadn't made his bundle first. It's a good book he's written, though a little sticky at times. One bit of advice he gives is to tell five people each day that you love them. These are to be five people who don't expect it. I'm agreeable, so I thought I'd give it a whirl. I was having my second cup of coffee with the book at my side. The front doorbell rang. When I opened it a very nice young man told me he was selling books. I never did get the title, but that wasn't my fault. I wanted desperately to try my author's suggestion. The salesman asked if he might come into the house. I said as how it was such a beautiful morning, we'd sit on the porch. He was a lovely young man, and agreed readily. I couldn't concentrate on what he was saying, for I was having a running battle, mentally. Should I, or should I not make this young man my first test? He had his paraphernalia all spread out around him on chairs and the porch floor. I was sitting exactly opposite him as he started to give his sales pitch. I leaned over at his first hesitation for breath and in what I hoped was a sincere voice whispered, "I love you." Well! Let me tell you that author doesn't know what he's talking about. The world just isn't ready for instant love. The young man not only tore some of his material as he made wild movements to gather it all up and run, he left a very nice pen behind. If you happen to read this, young man, the pen is on the front porch by the left-hand flower pot. I promise I won't take one step out onto the porch. I don't love you anyway. You're too scary. Nobody's perfect, but you've got to give Life more of a whirl than that. One thing is for sure, you're not selling the same books I'm reading. I'll wager I can guarantee some smiles because of this book. Don't say "I love you" aloud, but just picture what would happen if you did say it to the first five people you meet down town some morning — the first five people in the restaurant, for instance. Let me know if you try it. I want a photographer close by.

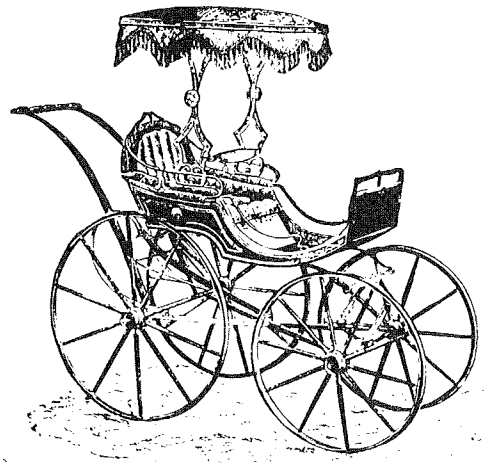
The world is definitely on the up-grade. Can you imagine that Mr. Ford said right out loud that "Yes, he is going to be a candidate in '76?" No intrigue, no hesitation — just "Yes." Mrs. Ford spoke right up, when asked her age, and told it. I've confused my age so many times that my birth certificate is known among my friends as my "swindle sheet." But not Mrs. Ford. I love to think how above board and truly honest our new White House couple is, then I am aware that the truth can't be hidden so they might as well ante up. It sort of takes some of the gospel trust out of their speeches. Telling all of the truth to people who misunderstand is only promoting frustration, anyway.

Truth or Falsehood — thank heaven we no longer march to that tune that once was so very popular — "Be Yourself." That is, in some instances, the worst cause for chaos and calamity that could befall the populace. We'd all like to think that if we would just be ourselves that we'd dance in divinity. Such is not the case. The only thing that holds the predicament together is that most of us assume attitudes and manners that are a whole lot better than our basic instincts dictate. We need not go abroad calling out "I Love You" to all whom we encounter, but better that than the asp-like venon that seeps from some.

The ideal situation would be, of course, when being one's self would be preferable to any sham we might assume. I guess that is what most of us are trying for, and what makes living and learning the excitement it is. I want no part of a deity that deals in dullness and dark. I'm the first in the class of "Let's Be Cheerful." If there is one of the Bible's teachings to which I am a solid convert, it's that one. I think that only by the cheerful and pleasant are lessons really successfully taught. I've never met a person who didn't love lightness and laughter, and it's rather scarce.



ROCKING CHAIR MEMORIES

I love it, I love it and who shall dare
To chide me for loving my old rockin' chair
I have treasured it long as a real prize
It's been covered with tears and lots of sighs.

I remember so well that my mother sat there
So it's a sacred thing, that old rockin' chair
I sat and watched her many a day
While her eyes grew dim and her locks grew grey.

She often told me that shame would never betide
With truth for my creed and God for my guide
She taught me to whisper my very first prayer
As I knelt by her in that old rockin' chair.

HISTORY FADES AWAY AS VAN BUREN COUNTY'S BRIDGES GO

By RAY McCLURE
Tribune Staff Writer

DECATUR — One by one, old and ramshackle bridges in Van Buren County are being replaced and, with each change, a little bit of history is lost.

So it is with an old concrete bridge over a branch of Dowagiac Creek that is scheduled for reconstruction this spring.

Known to older Decatur residents as Red Bridge, the one-lane structure long ago outlived its usefulness, even though the concrete that went into it seems to be as strong as it ever was.

Primary reason for the reconstruction is the width of the bridge, which is one-lane and means someone has to stop when meeting oncoming traffic.

50 Years Old

Estimated to have been built about 50 years ago, according to Deron Paul, who has lived many years in the Decatur area, the bridge is located in the middle of a low-lying area that residents still remember as a swamp, but now is farmland.

"That concrete bridge replaced an old wooden structure that could hardly be called a bridge," Paul said. "The old one always was dangerous, but it was the main road into Cass County, Niles and eventually South Bend. It finally wore out and became even more dangerous. Some of the wooden floor stuck up and you had to be very careful when crossing it. When cars and trucks came along later a newer span was needed, so they built the present bridge."

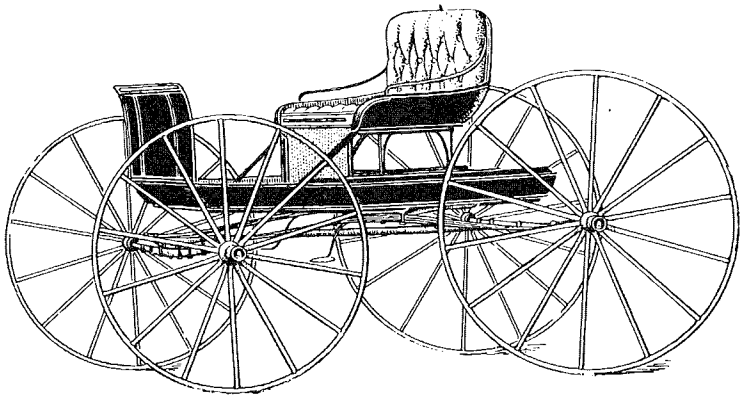
Large Trees Recalled

Paul recalled that the swamp area at the time had large trees that overhung the road, and in the trees millions of mosquitoes hid to plague travelers as they went by.

"They would cover you very quickly and you had to either run or be eaten," he remembered.

Located about a mile from the village limits, the bridge is in Decatur Twp. and crosses the north branch of Dowagiac Creek. Some residents know the stream as Pickrel Lake Creek.

Believed to have cost a few hundred dollars when built, a new bridge with twin tube arches has been estimated to cost about $22,000, more or less, depending on when the construction gets under way. With each passing day construction costs rise.



Reconstruction Planned

Planned eventually, and as soon as money is available, is reconstruction of 2½ miles of Old Swamp Road., which includes the area in which the bridge is located. The township planned to do both the bridge and road last year but decided only on the bridge because of the cost factor. Last estimate for the bridge and road project was about $60,000, more than the township believed it could afford at the time.

The bridge will be constructed by the Van Buren County Road Commission, probably with a private contractor doing the actual construction. The project has been approved by the Michigan Department of Natural Resources.

The road commission recently completed a bridge over the Paw Paw River on 59½ St. near Hartford at a cost of $78,000.

Former Bottleneck

The bridge replaced an aging span that was a bottleneck for motorists. Built on a sharp curve, the bridge was considered dangerous and had load limits for several months. Because of its age and ramshackle appearance, school buses were unable to use it.

The older span was about 75 years old and had been condemned by the township and state.

Not many motorists who use the Red Bridge on Swamp Road will be too concerned about keeping the old bridge because of its historical value.

Said one driver who stopped momentarily to watch and question the photographer taking pictures of the bridge: "Personally, I hope they rebuild it. But I have heard this many times before. So I guess I'll just have to see it to believe it."

102, AND COUNTING — There was a big cake, and an even bigger family gathering at the Hope Nursing Home in Lawton Wednesday as Mrs. Frances Conway observed her 102nd birthday. The spry and talkative centenarian was born Aug. 20, 1873, in Hamilton Township and has lived most of her life in the Decatur area. Numerous congratulatory letters included a note from Gov. William Milliken. — Gazette photo

Frances Conway Observes 100th Birthday

AUGUST 20, 1973

Mrs. Frances Conway will celebrate her 100th birthday on Monday, Aug. 20, and an open house will be held for her on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 19 from 2:30 to 5 p.m. at the home of her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Richard Conway with whom she makes her home. All friends are invited to call as no written invitations are being sent.

Mrs. Conway was born in Hamilton township, the daughter of Jacob and Cecelia Maxwell Knoll on the farm now owned by her granddaughter, Mrs. James Postello and her husband. She was married to Austin D. Conway who died in 1937.

She is the mother of two sons, Richard M., deceased, and Thomas J. of Crossville, Tenn. She has seven grandchildren, 12 great grandchildren and two great great grandchildren.

Mrs. Conway enjoys reading and can still thread a needle. She remembers her father using a team of oxen to plow. She spent 10 years in Tampa, Fla., before coming back here to make her home 10 years ago.

Centennial Lady

It was an unseasonably warm November morning. Mist lay in thick patches on County Road 352. Pieces of smashed pumpkins lay scattered from Halloween.

I was travelling through Hamilton township, flat farm country that's changed little in a century. I was there to interview its oldest resident, Mrs. Franceis Conway.

The area was unfamiliar to me and I watched carefully for the landmarks mentioned in my directions. Finally, I spotted Hamilton cemetery with its weathered tombstones and crooked iron fence. Across from it is the gray frame house in which Mrs. Conway resides. She was born less than a mile from here a hundred and one years ago. A post card cost a penny then, Ulysses S. Grant was beginning his second term as President, San Francisco was installing a fleet of cable cars, and a plague of grasshoppers threatened the Western frontier.

As I pulled into the driveway, I spotted her. She was seated, peering out at me through a picture window. I was the one under the microscope.

Mrs. Conway's daughter-in-law ushered me into the dining room where Mrs. Conway sat, back to window, in a straight oaken chair. Her skin was pale, her face and hands deeply furrowed, her hair all white curls. She looked as if she had more years on her than pounds.

She was surrounded by an accumulation. Lace doilies and painted porcelain. A chime clock that sounded the quarter-hour. A flowered tablecloth. And upon it shoeboxes filled with photographs and newspaper clippings. Tintypes and Polaroids.

"I love pictures. You enjoy looking at yourself years from the time you had it taken." She spoke in a weak but steady voice. "Here's one of me ironing. Not bad for ninety-five, eh?"

She grasped a large tintype mounted on stiff cardboard with both hands and held it in the light. "These are my relatives." They posed straight and grim in the tradition of the day. All high-collars, brooches, and watch-fobs.

"This is my mother, here," she said, pointing her out. "People say I'm a lot like her." She studied the picture a long while.

"Much of my family went to the university. I believe in education. I believe in college. I never got to finish high school. I took sick in my Senior year."

I asked her the obvious question. "Is there a secret to being a hundred and one?"

She, unhesitatingly replied, "Well, I have no habits. That's the one thing I'm most thankful for. I don't smoke or drink or lie or steal. Women today have so many habits. I didn't color my hair. I had a notion to, but I'm so glad I didn't. I don't know if that has anything to do with my age or not. But I've been careful. I eat everything and like everything and like everybody and God is good to me."

"My room is upstairs," she motioned as she spoke, "Up a long open stairway, a lovely stairway. But I can make it because there's a rail I can hang onto."

"I have a real nice, pleasant room," she continued. "I have beautiful flowers in my room, full of blossoms, and I enjoy them."

"There are a lot of things about life that I enjoy. I've had everything. I attended four grand operas in my lifetime and I lived in Florida ten years!"

"Do you prefer this area?"

"Well, this is my home. I was raised here and I think I'm very fortunate."

She lifted a yellowed clipping out of a box and smoothed out its wrinkles. The caption read: "Oldest Voter at the Polls."

"I've always voted Republican, but I've liked all our Presidents. I think Mr. Ford is doing a fine job. But when you're a hundred and one you're not interested in world affairs."

"I'm interested in business yet. I don't think I'll ever get over it. I was very active in real estate, the chicken business, and gardening. Seems strange, now I'm kind of helpless."

"I read a lot. So many women my age can't see, but I read a lot. My age has affected me physically but not mentally."

"I was a good cook. But I can't cook anymore. I don't do anything. I'm helpless, pretty near. But I can shop yet. The Social Security check comes today and I have to go to Decatur to cash it. My credit is good. I've been able to cash it so far, and I hope to go to Decatur this time, but I don't know how long I'll be able to shop."

She looked down and chuckled, "I've always had homely hands, big homely hands. I've done a lot of work, but I don't do anything now. I don't do a thing."

"I'd like to have a palmist read my hand," she leaned forward and confided. "That there's the life line. Looks as if its full of money, It better hurry up and get here."

Then she asked, "How old are you?"

"Twenty," I replied.

"When I was twenty I loved to dance. One time they had Beckworth Memorial Orchestra, a beautiful orchestra, in Dowagiac. And a man came down from the orchestra and said to the proprietor, 'Introduce me to the best waltzer in the hall!' Well, who do you spose he introduced him to? Yes, it was me."

"They used to have real nice parties in Decatur, too. Balls they called them, the Knights of Pithius Ball. Very formal. People came to these parties from Paw Paw."

"Oh, and I had a horse run away with me once. It was on a farm about a mile from us. I was in a road cart with my brother Max, who was three years old, and a friend of mine, Ella. We had gone to get a bushel of apples and a line on the cart came unhooked. The horse was a frisky horse and it ran off the road into a bean field. I managed to get out of the cart, but Max and Ella were still in it. 'Throw Max out!' I yelled to Ella. I was so worried. But the horses came to a fence and just stopped. I've outlived everyone I used to know." Her voice trailed off and a tear left a path down her freckled cheek. "My eyes water a lot," she apologized, and reached for a handkerchief.

"Have you noticed a change in people?" I asked.

"Yes, people are more afraid nowadays."

"Do you think the kind of rapid changes that have occurred in your lifetime will continue?"

"I don't think it will ever be the same."

"What do you think of being over a hundred?"

"It's no fun being a hundred and one. I don't know how I happen to be. I never expected it. I may live for years yet because I have a good appetite."

The fog had lifted as I headed back to town. The sun was shining brightly. The temperature was at least in the sixties. It could have been mistaken for early Spring. But the shattered bits of pumpkins thumping beneath my tires and the withered cornstalks waving to me from the roadside reminded me that it wouldn't last.

Patriotic Woman Proud To Mark 100th Birthday

By LYLE SUMERIX
Tribune Niles Bureau

NILES — A Niles woman is especially proud to be celebrating her centennial birthday anniversary at a time when this country is celebrating its bicentennial.

The unusual occasion is being observed by Mrs. J. L. Slaughter of 1610 N. 11th, who will be 100 years old Aug. 9.

That date will be marked by a centennial birthday party in her honor from 3 to 6 p.m. in the social room of the Mt. Calvary Baptist Church, 601 Ferry, of which she is a member. A second party will be held Aug. 10 at the Masonic Hall in Decatur, where she lived before moving to Niles.

Born Aug. 9, 1875, on a farm in Yazoo County near Benton, Miss., Mrs. Slaughter was the third of 12 children of John and Ellen Johnson. She is now the only one living, after the death of a sister last year in California at the age of 104.

She left the family farm at the age of 15 to marry her fifth grade teacher, Hiram Slaughter. Ten children were born of that marriage, and she now boasts 22 grandchildren, 25 great-grandchildren, and six great-great-grandchildren.

She and her husband never really got very far from the land, moving to Michigan in 1930 to manage a farm at Decatur, owned by their son, Arthur. At Decatur they were active in the First Baptist Church, of which he was a pastor at one time prior to his death in 1958 at the age of 94.

She remained in Decatur busily tending her garden, until moving here in 1968 to live with her daughter, Mrs. Julia Clark, with whom she still resides.

Her unusually active life was slowed partially in 1968, when she suffered a fracture of the hip. She now requires the aid of a walker or a wheel chair to get around.

The accident did not, however, diminish her health generally. Mrs. Slaughter enjoys reading, and does so without glasses. She also enjoys reasonably good hearing and is the envy of her friends in being able to eat any foods she desires.

Synonymous with her work in the church, her favorite past-time is reading the Bible. She also enjoys cooking, and fondly remembers baking the holy bread served at communion at the Decatur church.

Mrs. Slaughter has a fondness for beads, especially white pearls and is seldom seen without a string around her neck.

Her formula for attaining the century mark is hard work and clean living, plus faith in God. In addition to her church, she is a member of the Church United Women of Niles.

Celebrating her 100th birthday anniversary with Mrs. Slaughter will be her six living children — Arthur of Decatur, Theodore of Dowagiac, Harvey of Detroit, William and Mrs. Clark of Niles, and Leonard of Momence, Ill.

Luther Celebrates 98th

Over 125 people attended the birthday dinner for Luther Lundy celebrating his 98th birthday at the Decatur Frie Hall, Monday. This year marks Luther's 66th year in the Decatur Fire Department.

At the head table with Luther, were eight of his friends all over 70. Their ages average out to a mere 85. They included: Burt Kidman, Red Wolff, Ted Eckart, Ray Bowers, Fred McWilliams, Al Stepaitz, Howard Graham and Art Creagan.

After the fine wild game dinner, Luther was presented with many gifts and other surprises. He received a card and a letter from President Gerald Ford. Also letters from Senator P. Hart and Congressman Ed Hutchinson. He received resolutions from the Decatur Fire Dept., Decatur Village and Decatur Township.

Joe Miller was chairman and organizer of the banquet.

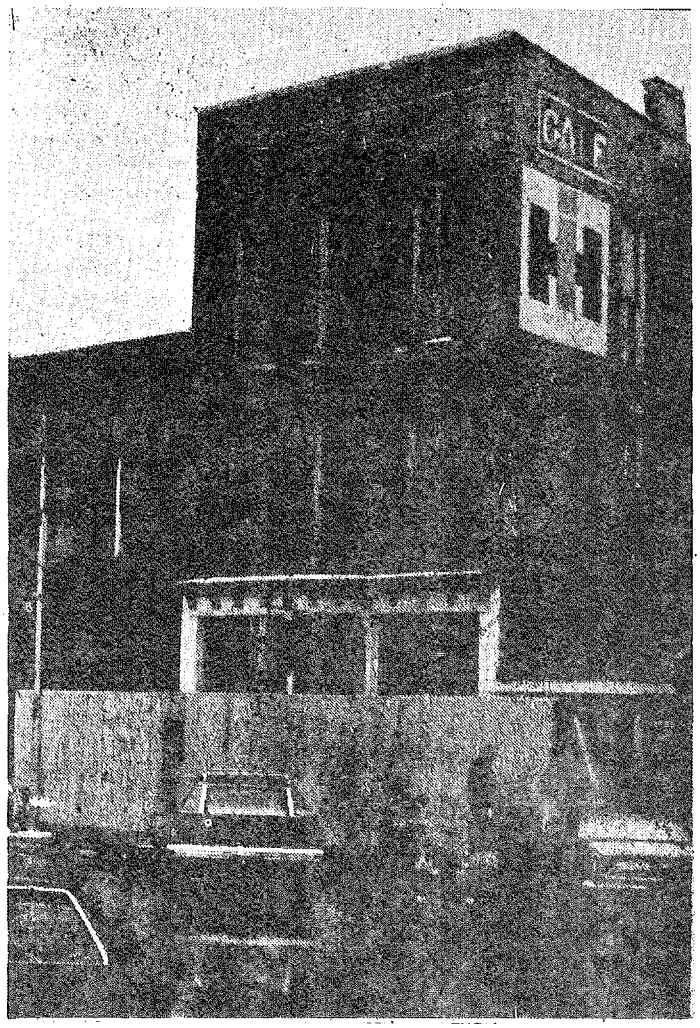
Bank Expansion Begins With Trimming Decatur's Tallest Building



Decatur's tallest building is having its top floor cut off in an extensive remodeling program by the First State Bank.

The Gale Farm store building was purchased by the bank in order for them to enlarge their facilities. The third floor of the structure will be removed and the front will be faced. The lobby of the bank will be enlarged. The farm store will be moved to the rear of the Gale Hardware store on the same side of the street which will soon include the old post office building as soon as a new building for the post office can be built.

At the present time an addition is being built behind the post office building and a connecting doorway is being made between the Gale Hardware and the post office which is causing much noise and dust.

The bank and Gale Hardware hope that the dusty inconvenience caused to their customers will be worth the improvement once the remodeling and moving is completed.

The U.S. Department of the Interior has the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) charged with administering Michigan's four Federal Indian reservations. The Great Lakes Agency with headquarters in Ashland, Wisconsin, has administrative jurisdiction over the following Indian reservations.

MICHIGAN

The Bay Mills Indian Community — Brimley
The Hannahville Indian Community — Wilson
The Keweenaw Bay Indian Community — L'Anse
The Saginaw Chippewa Tribe (Isabella) — Mt. Pleasant

All of these reservations for Indians were organized under the Act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. L. 984), known as the Indian Reorganization Act.

Michigan has a field office under the Great Lakes Agency, located in Gladstone, Michigan, serving the Michigan Indian.

There is also a Forester who operates out of Wabeno, Wisconsin as well as Housing Construction Superintendents located at Lac du Flambeau and Oneida, Wisconsin, both of whom are under Agency jurisdiction.

The Great Lakes Agency occupies a part of the second and all of the third floors of the U.S. Post Office located in Ashland with the Branch of Roads Office on the lake front one block from the Post Office. Ashland is a harbor town situated on the South Shore of Lake Superior on Chequamegon Bay near the Apostle Islands.

The activities of the Agency radiate to all Field Offices and reservations in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin. This work includes not only technical advice and assistance to individual Indians and Indian organizations but liaison and coordination of programs with other local, State, and Federal organizations and individuals involved in services to Indians. The Agency activities are the continuing services authorized by Federal Statute. The Congress of the United States provided for early dealings with Indians by setting up an Indian Affairs branch in the War Department in 1834. In 1849, the Bureau of Indian Affairs became a branch of the Department of the Interior and has remained in this Department.

Some of the activities carried on are in relation to the land held in trust for individual Indians, the tribe or band, and U.S. Government-owned land. This involves the administration of land and its resources. This includes the supervised sale of timber, sales and acquisitions of land and the leasing programs of the various tribes.

Education and welfare programs are carried out in cooperation with the States, counties, and private groups and individuals. Other activities include forestry, roads, employment assistance, housing and credit programs. The U.S. Public Health Service provides contract hospitalization and health assistance to reservation Indians by Act of Congress.

In the operation of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the following are its long range objectives:
1. Maximum Indian economic self-sufficiency.
2. Full participation of the Indian in American life.
3. Equal citizenship privileges and responsibilities for Indians.

MICHIGAN'S FOUR FEDERAL RESERVATIONS

BAY MILLS INDIAN COMMUNITY: BRIMLEY

The Bay Mills Indian Community is located on the extreme northeastern side of the Upper Peninsula in Michigan and may be reached by traveling on State Highway 221. The village of Bay Mills is five miles west and north of Brimley, Michigan and 20 miles west of Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan. Under the Act of Congress of June 19, 1860, this property was purchased by the U.S. Government to be held in trust for the Bay Mills' Indians. There remains today a total of 2,189 acres of tribal land and the forest cover of this community consists of 1,600 acres. There is considerable amount of lake frontage within this community. The population is estimated at 249. The general standard of living of most families is considerably below the average of the surrounding communities and many families are receiving general assistance. Income for Bay Mills is fishing and woods work and off reservation employment is in the urban area of Sault Ste. Marie on the Great Lakes ship lines.

HANNAHVILLE INDIAN COMMUNITY: WILSON

The Hannahville Indian Community is located just off State Highway 2, 17 miles west of Escanaba, Michigan. These lands were purchased in 1913 by an Act of Congress except 39 acres purchased in 1942. There is today a total of 3,408 acres of tribal land and 2,846 acres of forest land. The area is generally comprised of creeks and second growth timber. It is estimated that the population of the Hannahville Indian Community is 134. This community is located in a depressed area and the rate of unemployment is high. Many of the families, therefore, receive assistance from the State or county. Preferring woods work as their source of employment they sometimes travel as far as 100 miles to obtain it.

KEWEENAW BAY
INDIAN COMMUNITY: L'ANSE

The L'Anse Reservation is located in northern Michigan, 70 miles west of Marquette. It was established in 1854 by a treaty between the Lake Superior Chippewas and the United States. The reservation is made up of two districts Baraga and L'Anse. The Baraga and the L'Anse Communites are located on State Highway 41 on the shores of Keweenaw Bay. The Keweenaw Bay Community also has a small amount of land located in Ontonagon, Michigan. There remains today a total of 13,749 acres under the supervision of the Bureau of Indian Affairs. Of this total 1,609 acres are tribal land, 8,124 acres are allotted land and 4,016 acres are U.S. Title land. Forest cover is approximately 11,440 acres. The village of Baraga is located on the west side of Keweenaw Bay and the village of L'Anse is located on the east side. There are two rivers that flow through the reservation and these rivers are nationally known for trout fishing. At the present time, there are 281 Indians living on the reservation. General employment is quite stable in the L'Anse and Baraga areas except for recreational connected businesses. The standard of living is low due to poor or inadequate housing on restricted acreage and lack of personal funds to build homes many, therefore, have moved to the villages of L'Anse and Baraga.

SAGINAW CHIPPEWA TRIBE
(ISABELLA): MT. PLEASANT

The Saginaw Chippewa Community is located at Mt. Pleasant on U.S. Highway 27. The Isabella Reservation is located in Isabella County in the north central part of the lower peninsula of the State of Michigan and approximately three miles east of the city of Mt. Pleasant, Michigan. The Isabella Reservation was established by the Treaties of 1885 and 1864. Today there is a total of 1,223 acres of Indian land of which 506 acres are tribal land and 717 acres are allotted land. 373 acres are classified as woodland. The locale is predominantly a flat plain area best suited for agricultural uses. It is estimated that the current Indian population is 345. The majority of the Indian population is employed in neighboring industrial communities, but seasonal agricultural work seems to be the main source of income of semi-skilled and unskilled Indian workers. The skilled workers find little difficulty in obtaining adequate employment throughout the year. Compared to other Indian reservations in the State of Michigan, the general condition of Indian housing is considered good. However, when compared to non-Indian communities, the homes are in poor condition — repairs to most homes are needed immediately.

Potawatomi Nation (Land Areas)

Governor Cass, Treaty Commissioner of the 1821 Treaty defined the location and land areas of the Potawatomi Nation as follows: (Plf. Exh. 20, p. 7, Treaty Journal).

"THEIR (Potawatomi Nation) COUNTRY ON THE SOUTH EM-BRACES BOTH BANKS ON THE ILLINOIS INCLUDING ALL ITS RICH TRIBUTARIES — ON THE NORTH IT REACHES ALONG THE WESTERN SHORE OF LAKE MICHIGAN TO THE LANDS OF THE MENOMONIES OF MILWACKY AND THOSE OF THE WINNEBAGOES OF GREEN BAY — ON THE EAST THEY HAVE ALL OF THE COUNTRY SOUTH OF THE GRAND RIVER TO THE HEAD-WATERS OF THE MAUMEE AND THE WABASH: AND ON THE WEST, THEIR TERRITORIES EXTEND TO THE BANKS OF THE MISSISSIPPI. Gone from the Business Scene

JIM ADDUCI is shown here on his last day in business last Saturday at the Citgo Service Station after 22 years in the same location. He started with a Cities Service station after he had been with Standard Oil in Paw Paw for eight years. Jim said when he began business the price of gas was 22 cents a gallon. The station has been taken over by Ed Vliek who had operated the Ed's Arco station on Phelps st. for many years. Jim plans to travel a lot and otherwise do nothing.

SIMON POKAGON: MAN OF MANY TALENTS

BY BERENICE VANDERBURG

Simon Pokagon, who was in his day, considered the nation's best educated, most outstanding Indian, was born in the spring of 1830 in Pokagon Township, between Pokagon and Sumnerville and north of the largest mound in that vicinity. He was the youngest child of Leopold Pokagon.

The Indians had come to Pokagon Township from their village in what is now Bertrand, to set up their sugar camp and to plant corn. Simon's birthplace was about a mile from that of Uzziel Putnam Jr., the first white child born in what is now Cass County.

He could only speak the Potawatomi language until he was 12 years of age. He studied for four or five years at Notre Dame, spent one year at Oberlin College and two years in school at Twinsburg, Ohio.

The balance of his life was devoted to his people and he often visited Washington, D.C. in the interests of his tribe and was devoted to his church.

He was deeply religious as were many others of his tribe, and also being gifted musically, played the organ in the old Catholic Church, St. Dominick's at Rush Lake in Van Buren County.

His accomplishments were many, he could read Greek and Latin. He taught the Indians to sing the Latin Masses which he had translated into their own language.

He wrote many magazine articles and his book, "Queen of the Woods," tells of his romance with Lonidaw Sinagaw, who became his wife. They had four children, Cecelia, William, Charles and Jerome. Their mother died in 1871 and Pokagon married second, Victoria, described as a "refined, educated woman who proved to be real helpmate, making a kind stepmother and devoted wife."

Numerous stories have been written about Simon Pokagon and his accomplishments. Because the Potawatomi Indians had no written language, he used the Algonquin langauge, from which the Potawatomi tongue stems, and created a written language for his people.

He died January 28, 1899 in a desolate cabin in the woods in Allegan County, and was buried in the Rush Lake Cemetery beside his first wife. Their four children are also buried there. His second wife died 19 months later and is also buried in the same cemetery.

The late Abner Moon of Dowagiac, who spent his boyhood among the Indians in Porter Township, Van Buren County, at one time served as their agent. He could speak their language fluently and knew the names of every Indian for miles around.

Abner Moon accompanied Simon Pokagon on his last visit to his birthplace in Pokagon Township. Moon wrote that the old chieftain sadly surveyed the scene, saying that if the Indians had killed Columbus and his men when they landed, how much trouble could have been avoided.

This statement was not in character as Pokagon was in no way bloodthirsty but a kindly, gentle man, eager to help his tribesmen adjust to the ways of the white man and make good lives for themselves.

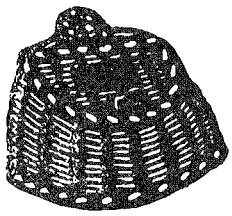
Animosity was felt toward the Pokagons and some of it still lingers today but that is another story and due to Leopold Pokagon's lack of understanding of the white man's ownership of property.

Here is the Potawatomi calendar as devised by Simon Pokagon:

January — Manito-gisiss — Moon of the Spirit; February — Mamehini-gisiss — Moon of the Suckers; March — Onabini-gisiss — Moon of the Crust on the Snow.

April — Bebokwedagiming-gisiss — Moon of the Breaking of Snowshoes; May Wabigon-gisiss — The Moon of Flowers and Bloom; June — Odeimini-gisiss — The Moon of the Heart Berries (Strawberries).

July — Miskwimini-gisiss — The Moon of Redberries (raspberries); September — Manominike-gisiss — The Moon of Gathering of Wild Rice, October — Binakwi-gisiss — The Moon of Falling Leaves: November — Cashkadino-gisiss — The Moon of Freezing; and December — Manito-gisissons — The Little Moon of the Spirit.



INDIANS' GOAL: EDUCATION

By ARLYS DERRICK
Women's Editor

Though the problems of the American Indian are many, the main concern of the Michigan Indian is education.

This is what Joseph R. Winchester, tribal chairman of the Potawatomi Indians of Indiana and Michigan, Inc., told members of Algonquin chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, at the November meeting held at Berrien Hills country club.

A full-blooded Indian who feels his place is in the dominant society and not on a reservation, Chief Winchester was born and raised and graduated from high school in Dowagiac. In addition to being tribal chairman he is currently president of Sister Lakes Lions club, is a former president of Sister Lakes PTA, and a former president of Sister Lakes Athletic association.

He and his wife, Joyce (who is a non-Indian) have three children, Paula, a sophomore at Central Michigan university at Mt. Pleasant under a scholarship from the Bureau of Indian Affairs; Scott, a junior at Dowagiac Union high school where he is class president, a member of the National Honor society, Varsity club, and of the varsity football team, and holder of a 3.6 grade point average, and Judy, a seventh grader in Dowagiac.

Winchester has been employed at Benton Harbor Engineering in the cost department for 16 years. His wife works parttime at the Sister Lakes branch of the Van Burén State bank.

Chief Winchester has become familiar with the problems of Indian education in his contact with Indians from all over the United States through the National Indian Education conference in Minneapolis, a similar one at Michigan State university, and one at Notre Dame.

In the West, he said, especially among the 60,000 Navahos, transportation and teachers are the main problems. Some youngsters are bussed 50 to 70 miles to a BIA boarding school where they stay for a week at a time. Unfortunately, most of the teachers do not speak the language and the children do not speak English.

He also noted that jumping from high school to college in areas like Michigan where high school is available to the Indian, is a more difficult adjustment for the Indian young man or woman. They may speak English but they are afraid to speak up. However, the chief said, once they make the adjustment, they usually make the grade.

He said the Bureau of Indian Affairs is doing a lot of good but there are still many areas in which they could do more. He feels that a lack of communication in the past between the BIA and the Indian, has slowed the whole process of Indian education considerably.

Chief Winchester emphasized that a lack of pride in his heritage holds back many Indians. He says that he is proud of his Indian blood and is bringing up his children to feel that same pride. His daughter, Paula, works with the Big Brother group helping the Chippewas on reservation near Mount Pleasant while she is attending college.

There are four federally recognized reservations in Michigan, he said. The Chippewa one near Mount Pleasant, where 205 Indians live; one near Sault Ste. Marie, also Chippewa, where there are 270 Indians who are employed around the Locks area, at L'Anse in Baraga county where four years ago the government built up an resort as a main source of income on the 5,700-acre reservation and a Pottawata-

OLD GLORY

ITS 158TH BIRTHDAY

What flower is this that greets the morn,
Its hues from Heaven so freshly born?
With burning star and flaming band
It kindles all the sunset land.
O tell us what its name may be
Is this the flower of liberty?
It is the banner of the free
The starry flower of liberty
– Oliver Wendell Holmes

BETSY ROSS

A dainty seamstress Betsy was—
Her work was of the best,
And folks were sure her loyalty
Would stand the hardest test,
So she was chosen as the one
To make from a design,
The Flag that long has symbolized
This land of yours and mine.

'Twas Betsy and George Washington
Who had the most to do,
With fashioning the Stars and Stripes
That flies for me and you;
For Betsy, true to womanhood,
By talking got her way,
And made not six but five-point stars
That grace the Flag today.

On field of blue she sewed the stars,
And red to white cloth stitched,
And soon rare magic was performed
By one who seemed bewitched;
But beauty so superb, sublime,
Our own Red, White and Blue,
Could only have been so designed
By patriots most true.

The artist's sketch showed a square flag,
But Betsy said oblong
Would prove much more symmetrical
And Betsy wasn't wrong;
And when she finished making it,
'Twas beautiful to see,
And may Old Glory ever wave
O'er people who are free!

Letter To The Editor

LETTER TO ED

Knowing how difficult it would be to try to get in touch with Edgar Bergen and being sure of only a few names of those responsible for Decatur Week, I am hoping this letter reaches all those who worked so diligently on last week's festivities. Coming back home for the celebration was a moving and worthwhile experience. It helped remind me of all that is good about small town living.

Only a man as big as Edgar Bergen could come home proudly to the small town where he began and so selflessly thank that town for leaving its mark on him. When he stated that there should be more small towns for kids to grow up in, it stirred in me those memories of my own years in Decatur and the strength and stability which I drew from it.

Sadly, so many small towns are dying. People are convinced that the city is the place to be. For a long time, I, too partially subscribed to this philosophy. Now, having lived and taught in larger areas, I believe that Decatur's school system is as good as any, no matter what the size, and surpasses many. Its students are more enthusiastic and honest and its parents more involved and truly concerned. Unlike the larger cities, its streets are safe and its people friendly.

Last week was a triumph and a large thank you is due people like the tireless May Kaplan, the responsible Chief Barney Ives, and Mayor Blaine Rex. They helped remind everyone how wonderfully unique Decatur is. All those raised in Decatur don't always remain, but, as Bergen illustrated, a part of Decatur remains with us. The friends made there are lasting friends and the security gained there helps us go forth to achieve new goals and realize our potential.

Saturday, watching the parade, I was so proud to be from Decatur. I thank Edgar Bergen for being part of the reason so many of us returned home for a visit. Most of all, I thank Decatur for remaining constant in an ever changing society.

Odlum: Crippled himself, he spurred research

Floyd Odlum dies at 84; turned Depression to gold

CHICAGO TRIBUNE

PALM SPRINGS, Cal. (UPI)—Financier Floyd Odlum, 84, whose talent for reviving failing businesses made him a multimillionaire during the Depression, died [illegible] ranch.

Odlum was the husband of Jacqueline Cochran, woman aviator of the 1930s and head of the WASPS, women pilots who flew noncombat planes in World War II.

He was best known as the driving force behind the giant Atlas Corp., a conglomerate embracing scores of investment companies, Hollywood movie studios, railroad and aviation companies, public utilities, manufacturing, and real estate.

Bedridden with arthritis for many years, Odlum went into seclusion in 1972 when the huge Cochran-Odlum fruit ranch was sold for conversion to a real-estate development.

THE FIFTH AND youngest child of a Union City, Mich., minister, he worked his way through the University of Colorado Law School.

In his first job, for a Salt Lake City utility company, he made $50 a month. His second year out of school he made $8,000, a considerable sum in the 1920s. The following year he made $125,000.

He started an investment company—which grew into Atlas Corp.—with a partner in 1923, each of them putting up $10,000, a stake that grew into more than $100 million.

His special talent, which came to the fore in the economic collapse of the 1930s, was the ability to detect firms which had "bottomed out," their value sunk to its low point, but which could be revived. For decades he bought such firms, revived them with infusions of capital and management talent, and sold them at a profit when they were money makers again.

HE TOOK OVER the bankrupt RKO Studio in 1935 and sold it in 1947 to Howard Hughes for a $17 million profit. He bought Convair in 1947, put $10 million into it and sold it to General Dynamics for $20 million. He invested that in a uranium mine in Utah and five years later had five uranium firms that he merged into a single nuclear energy concern.

He had two sons by his first marriage, Bruce and Stanley. Stanley committed suicide in 1974.

Floyd Odlum Dies In California

Floyd Bostwick Odlum, self-made multi-millionaire, who at one time attended the Decatur schools, died recently in California.

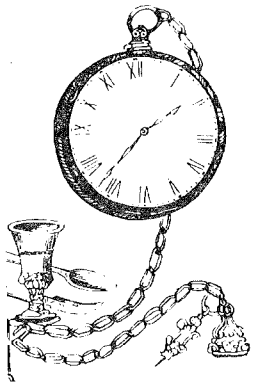
He was born in Union City, Michigan, and his father was pastor of the Methodist Church here, while they resided in Decatur. He was married to aviatrix Jacqueline Cochran, who survives.

Odlum was known for his success in converting various troubled companies into profit makers. He helped reorganize Paramount Studios in 1935 and took over the bankrupt RKO, rebuilding the studio and selling it 12 years later to Howard Hughes for a high profit.

He parlayed his first $50 a month job for a Salt Lake City utility company into ownership of the investment firm, Atlas Corporation, which held such varied enterprises as hotel companies, oil and gas firms and uranium holdings.

He bought the ailing Convair aircraft plant in 1947, pumped $10 million into the firm and sold it to General Dynamics for $20 million seven years later.

Odlum worked with Presidents Hoover, Roosevelt and Truman and was a special adviser to the War Production Board during World War II.



MOTHER MINE

Gone — it cannot be
For it was but yesterday it seemed to me,
She held me in her arms so tight
And pressed my lips in fond good night.

But still the vacant chair
In memory I can see her there.
Where oft' she sat by the fireplace
While sunbeams played about her face.

The open Bible on her knee
So often would she read to me,
In tones so sweet, so soft and low
Those wondrous tales of long ago.

Her voice no longer now I hear,
But still I feel her presence near.
Though many years have come and gone
Those memories sweet still linger on.

Her guardian angel hovers near
And whispers softly in my ear,
Your Mother dear has gone before
To welcome you on yonder shore.

Then when my task on earth is done
And when for me the summons come,
What joy it will be her face to see
For she will be there to welcome me.

THE PASSENGER PIGEON BECOMES EXTINCT

The short history of the passenger pigeon, a wild pigeon approximately fifteen inches in length with pinkish-tinted dark gray feathers and a long tail, is brief and due mainly to the foolish waste and greed of the hunters of the 1800's.

The records of people who saw, as did Alexander Wilson, 225 billion passenger pigeons pass in a single flock in Kentucky in 1808, was astounding! also, John James Audubon, who watched a flock of passenger pigeons pass over his place of view, in a continuous stream for three days, was equally astounding! The flock was so thick it all but blotted out the sun, and the sound of their wings was thunderous. They destroyed almost all other forms of life in their nesting areas. They were a threat to crops and somewhat of a pest in general.

In this atmosphere of bird abundance, hunters came to the large nesting trees, in which were dozens of nests and in the dark of night, knocked birds off branches with long poles by lantern light, which hypnotized or blinded the pigeons. Some were caught by burning sulphur which choked them; also, large nets were used to snare or trap them. Some pigeons were eaten, but most were preserved in barrels for shipment to Chicago or New York. During the height of the hunting season whole rail carloads went daily to these terminals.

The market price paid for the pigeons was one or two cents each, which hardly seems enough to incite wholesale slaughter, yet it accomplished total extinction by the year 1914 when what is believed to be the last passenger pigeon died in the zoological gardens of Cincinnati, Ohio.

The diary of Mrs. John Bennett indicates the common practice of hunting or snaring the passenger pigeon for profit and pest control, was alive and thriving, here in the Decatur, Michigan area, in the early 1800's. It shows how individual hunters, like her husband John and some of the neighbors and thousands like them, when added to the larger commercial efforts accomplished the sad end for these birds.

John Bennett and his thousands of fellow hunters were unwitting participants in the eventual extinction of the species.

The following accounts were taken directly from Lucy Millard Bennett's diary:

"He (John) has got his pigeon net nearly done. It is 16 × 32 feet."

Wed. Feb. 12, 1873

"Pigeons are flying today in considerable numbers. John and Andrew have caught 16 dozen since daylight."

Wed. Feb. 19, 1873

"John went to the net this morning but came back to breakfast. No pigeons flying today."

Fri. Mar. 21, 1873

"John has been off pigeon hunting all day. Willie Corwin brought me 7 that his father shot."

Mon. Mar. 31, 1873

"Yesterday Andrew and John caught about 40 dozen pigeons... We have been picking pigeons today — 28 dozen — will ship them tomorrow."

Tues. April 8, 1873

"We shipped our first BBl. of pigeons today."

Wed. April 9, 1873

"John and Andrew picked 6 dozen pigeons yesterday."

Fri. Dec. 19, 1873

"John and Andrew went off early this morning for the north to catch pigeons. Mr. Skinner took them to Hartford."

Fri. April 10, 1874

"John went pigeoning today and caught 9, he is fixing his net now."

Mon. Sept. 21, 1874

"John did not catch any pigeons today."

Tues. Sept. 22, 1874

"Saturday: John brought in his pigeons (8 in all) and put them in the cellar to keep them from freezing. He picketted off one corner and it makes them a nice place."

Tues. Jan. 12, 1875

"John is knitting another pigeon net."

Thursday Jan. 14, 1875

"Austin (Barney) came over early this morning to see if he could put his pigeons in the cellar with ours. They were nearly frozen when he brought them over."

Thursday Feb. 4, 1875

"John was in the house all day working on his net."

Monday Feb. 8, 1875

"John and I are alone for a rarity. He is working on his net."

Sat. Mar. 20, 1875

"We arose at ½ past 3 o'clock, got breakfast, then John and Peter took the horses and went pigeon hunting. Hope they will catch some... John caught several dozen pigeons today."

Wed. Mar. 31, 1875

"John caught some pigeons this morning, but not many. The wind bothers."

Thurs. April 1, 1875

"John and Austin have gone to hunt a good place to catch pigeons. They have caught 8 dozen."

Tues. April 6, 1875

"Today John caught 5 dozen pigeons. He goes to Abbots to get them."

Thursday, April 8, 1875

"John sent off 1 Bbl. of pigeons today... (10 P.M.) John came home just as I did. He caught 27½ Doz. pigeons today, Austin 7 dozen the first he has caught this season. I think all the money they will bring is dearly earned."

EDGAR BERGEN COMES HOME

EDGAR BERGEN WAS GRAND MARSHAL of the fantastic Decatur Week parade, which gave everyone the opportunity to see the guest of honor. Barney Ives drove the Grand Marshals' car, as he was the one most responsible for getting Mr. Bergen to come back to Decatur. Also in the car were his Decatur hosts, Mr. and Mrs. Rolland Haefner.

Decatur welcomes Edgar Bergen

By GENE WALDEN
Tribune Cass County Bureau

DECATUR — Like any homecoming, the Decatur towns folk proudly came out Friday night and Saturday to greet their local "boy-made-good" with cameras, autograph books and warm hospitality.

And when the aspiring young ventriloquists in town brought their manikins down to meet him, you knew the man they came to see could be none other than Charley McCarthy's own Edgar Bergen.

Saturday was designated as "Edgar Bergen Day" in Decatur as the ventriloquist-comedian returned to hometown Decatur for his first public appearance since 1948.

"I came in here quietly for just a short time about five years ago," recalled Bergen, "but I haven't been to anything like this since 1948."

He arrived here Friday night, attended an open house at the Veterans of Foreign Wars Hall Saturday morning and acted as parade marshal in the "Decatur Week" parade Saturday afternoon followed by a performance with some of his dummies.

Bergen stayed at the home of Rolland Haefner during his stay here.

The years showed in Bergen's gray, thinning hair, but his sense of humor and love for children appeared timeless as he joked with the youngsters and took the time to pose with them while their parents caught some quick snapshots.

As he passed one young boy who was holding a manikin, Bergen smiled and said, "Good luck to you on that."

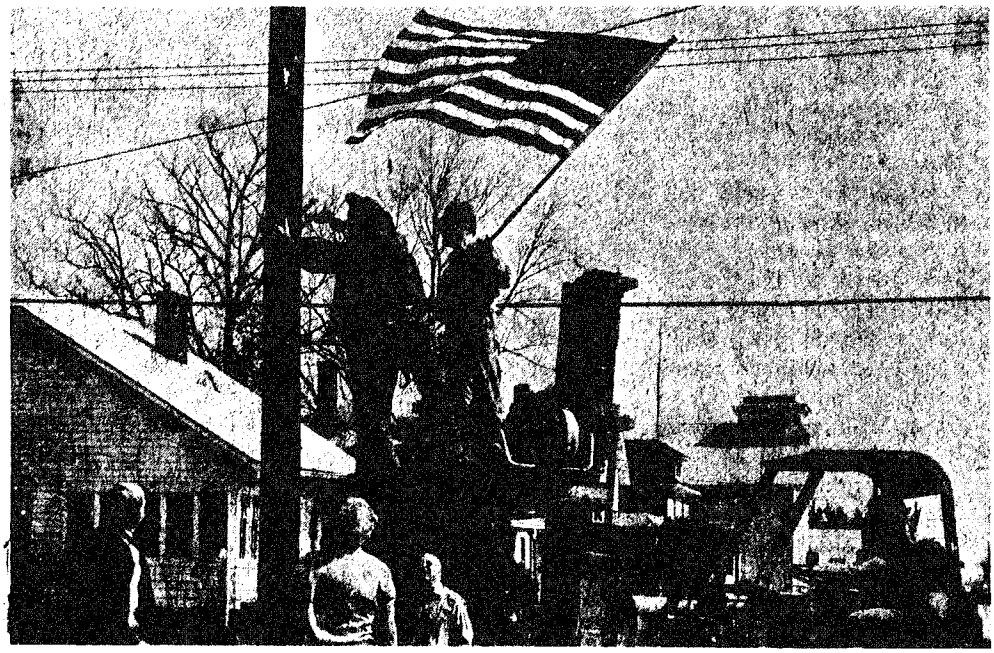
Class of '51 Reunion

The Decatur high school class of 1951 held its 25th year reunion at Stone Inn Dockside in Cassopolis on July 23.

The entire class of forty was contacted by mail across the U. S. A. and to Hong Kong. A group of fifty, including the husbands and wives, attended the gala evening.

Honored guests of the evening were Miss Catherine Howland and Mr. and Mrs. Wayne Hellenga, their former teachers and class sponsor.

VFW Places Flags On Delaware Street



Anyone coming into Decatur from the east last Saturday must have been jolted into a patriotic fervor when they came upon a display of American flags flying on Delaware Street.

The eighty flags were placed there by V. F. W. Post 6248, Veterans of Foreign Wars, in observance and celebration of the bicentennial year. The display of flags went all the way from High's Marine on the east, to the Laundromat on the west edge of town. And to prolong the beauty and spirit, they will be flown on all holidays.

Post V. F. W. members who were out working on this project last Saturday were Max Laskovy, Charlie Tunis, Don Wiese, Bill Hoekstra, Byron Ives, George Kusmack, John Gaborik, Clarence Oatman, Bill Oatman, Myron Southworth, Joe Bajo, Bruno Dragan and Ireel Slack.

Mrs. Daniels Celebrates 99th Birthday

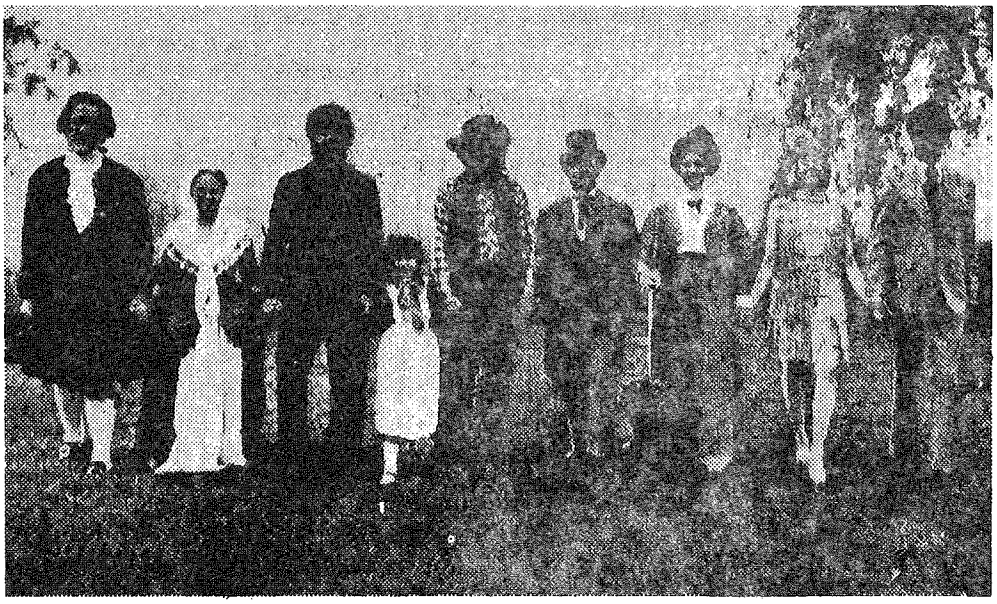
The celebration was held in the home of her son and daughter-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Verne Daniels, Lake of the Woods, with whom she makes her home. Local friends called on her in the afternoon, with the family party in the evening.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter Pickavet and family of Walkerton, Ind., brought the birthday cake, and Mr. and Mrs. Jerry Hellinga and son of LaPorte and Mrs. Katherine Bolenbaugh were also there to help her celebrate.

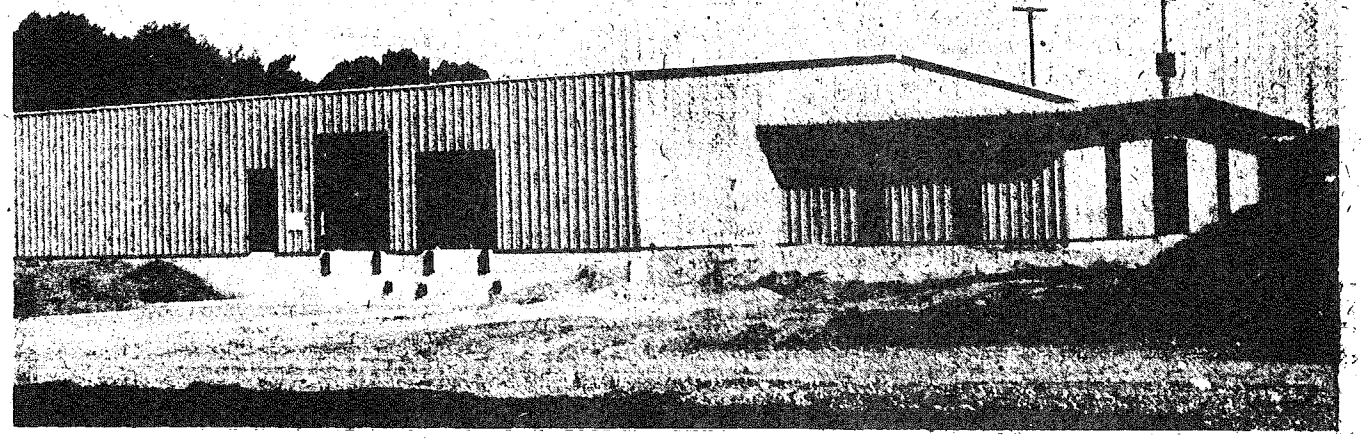
The Republican joins her friends in wishing her continued health and happiness.

Let's keep it growing for 200 more years.



Welcome God to America's bicentennial... practice what you pray.

New Special Lite Inc. Facility To Be Finished In October



Above is the new home of Special Lite Inc., of Decatur, manufacturers of aluminum doors and frames. Special Lite Inc., has been located on Beers Street for the past five years, and will move into its new facility on the Decatur-Cassopolis Road in October.

Edmund I. Smola, president of Special Lite, Inc., began his business in his garage back in 1964 as Decatur Quality Glass. He worked alone for a few years and in 1971 founded the corporation and named it Special Lite.

Special Lite custom builds heavy duty doors and frames including rail and tubular. They furnish their product to Kawneer, Amarlite, PPG Industries and Texas Aluminum, for resale.

Special Lite doors can be found all over the world, including Saudi Arabia, Belgium, Hawaii and the JFK Space Center.

Many of its doors are hung in the busiest places where abuse is greatest, including countless schools. The firm also does glass work and makes special panels. The installation done by the company is mostly in Michigan, Indiana, Ohio and Illinois, where it is practical to travel.

Special Lite doors will be found at Detroit Metropolitan Airport, O'Hare Field in Chicago, University of Michigan, Notre Dame, Western Michigan University and many high schools throughout Michigan.

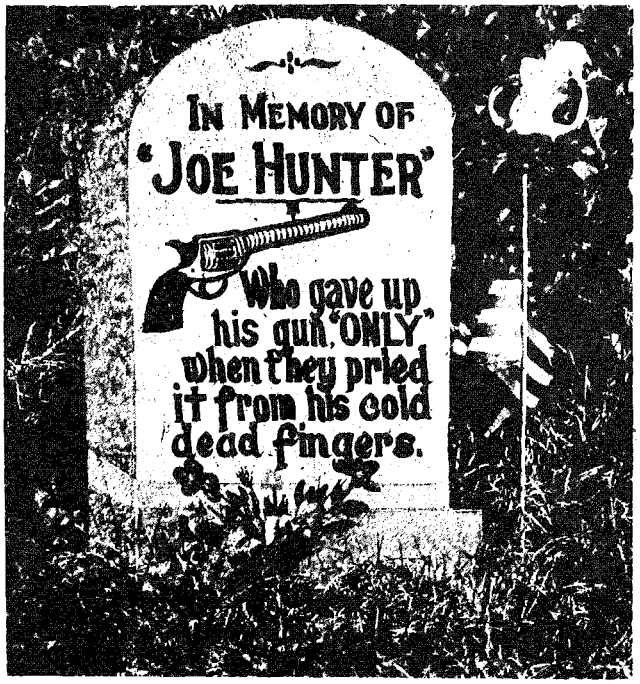
Several of Decatur businesses have store fronts and doors from Special Lite. They make regular size doors as well as jumbo sizes, all the way up to the largest they have ever made which is 12 feet wide by 24 feet high. It is located on the Federal Building at Grand Rapids.

The firm now has 13 employes, an engineer and stockholder, Donald Leets, and a vice president and production manager, George Deming. The company averages 200 to 250 flush doors a month, and around a hundred rail doors.

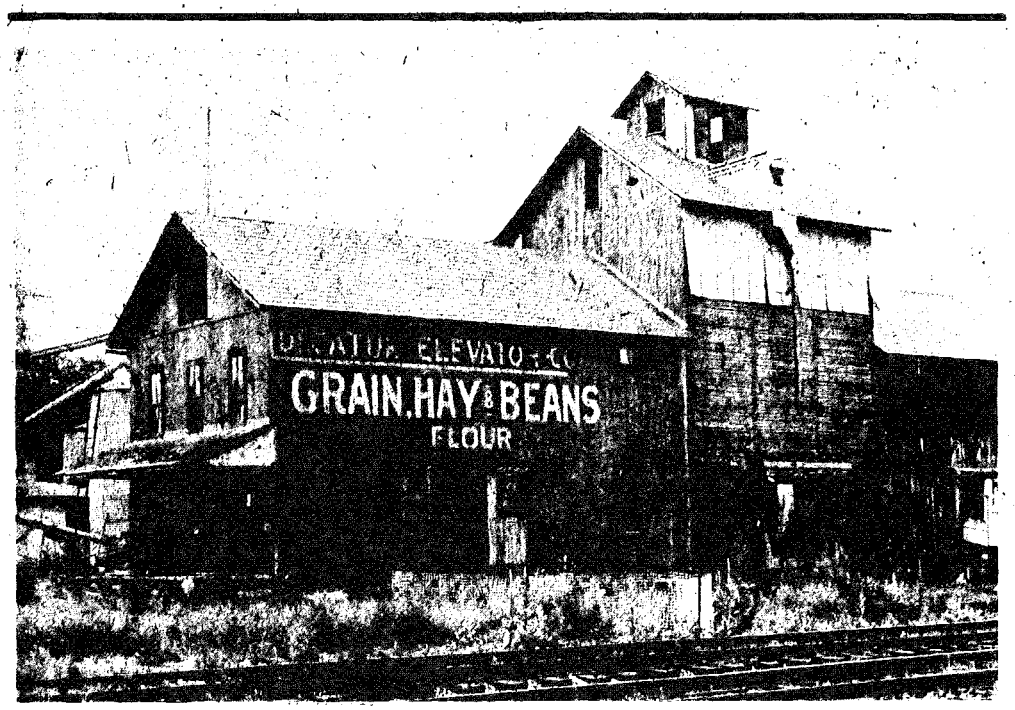
Occupation of the new facility should take place in October, according to Smola. The new building will have an 80 foot by 200 foot working shop area with a 30 foot by 40 foot section for office space.

The new facility is located on the former Bernard Kammeraad farm. Upon purchase of the property, it was necessary for Special Lite to get the 20 acres rezoned to commercial usage by Decatur township.

Because of the increase in sales, it was necessary for Special Lite Inc., to build a more modern and less crowded facility, according to Smola. The expansion will help increase both productivity and efficiency in handling the increasing market for their doors.



J. HOWARD GRAHAM of 306 Wheeler Street, Decatur, painted and erected this tombstone during the summer, along Old Swamp Road, near the business signs. According to Graham, he feels this reflects what will happen if the anti-gun movement continues. He said that he feels the outlaws will be the only people with guns and that this is no answer to the increasing crime problem.



The old Decatur Elevator Company building was erected before the turn of the century, probably about 1895 by the Lawrence brothers. It has been in continuous use until four or five years ago.

The Lawrence brothers owned what are now the Pollock and Westphal farms, southeast of Decatur, and the main timbers for the building came from there.

There were several owners before it was incorporated as Decatur Elevator company in 1928. Prior to that, it was known as Decatur Co-op. It was operated by Guy Curtiss from 1928 to 1940, by Howe and Oatman from 1946 to 1949, and by Harold Hutchins from 1949 to 1958, when Bernard Sherburn became the owner. These are approximate dates.

The front building which has now been torn down, was used for office space, grinding, cleaning seed, sacking and storage of supplies.

The tall part, still standing, was the storage area for grain, holding about 4,000 bushels.

No plans are in the offing for rebuilding or use of the space.

8th Grade Exam Was Something In 1910!

TOUGH EXAM: Harvey Hough of Grand Junction, now 82 and retired, says he doubts many [illegible] students could pass the eighth grade exam[illegible] he took to complete his formal schooling in 1[illegible]

By JIM DeLAND
Assistant City Editor

Write a promissory note. How is a note endorsed?

Use a participle three different ways in sentences.

How is food changed in digestion? Describe quite fully the process.

Indicate by words and diacritical marks all the sounds of (the letters) o, c, s, g.

Those are just a few of the questions on the two-day examination Harvey Hough took more than 66 years ago in Grand Junction to complete his formal education.

The examination was for the eighth grade.

"When I look at it now, I wonder how I ever passed it," says Hough, now 82 and retired in Grand Junction. "Nowadays, I don't think a high school guy could pass them, could he?"

That thought was exactly what prompted Hough's son, Dale, to bring the examination to the attention of The Herald-Palladium after reading the recently-completed series of articles in this paper entitled "Johnny Still Can't Read."

"After reading those, I thought how much our educational system has gone to the dogs," Dale says. "We pass kids just because they attend classes. We give them attendance certificates called diplomas."

Dale, who works at the Michigan Employment Securities Commission WIN program office in Benton Harbor, says he daily sees applicants who "can't express themselves in written words — it seems to overwhelm them — and writing and reading go hand in hand.

"I know my parents weren't foolish — they both went through the eighth grade — but when I saw my father's exam, it really floored me."

The examination was given on May 5 and 6, 1910, in the Grand Junction school. The teacher who gave it was Harvey Hough's older brother, Harry, who later served as high school principal at Hartford and as Van Buren county school superintendent.

"It was easy for me then," Hough recalls. "I was supposed to take it the year before, but those were the horse and buggy days and the exam was given in Bangor that year. I didn't have the transportation, so I didn't take it.

"Because I wasn't 16 yet, I had to go back to school the next year and my brother was teaching then. He saw I wasn't idle. He gave me a lot of ninth grade work."

The examination was divided into nine sections — orthography, penmanship, physiology, grammar, spelling, geography, reading, arithmetic and civil government.

The reading section was based on the poem "The Lady of the Lake" and asked the student, among other questions, to write a sketch on the author's life and write a brief character sketch of the two main characters in Canto V.

Geography questions included "Of what is the atmosphere composed? What causes winds?" and asked the student to describe Michigan, giving size, latitude, longitude, drainage and soil.

Arithmetic questions included "What is the capacity in gallons of a cistern 10 feet wide and seven feet deep?" How many horses at $180 each can be bought for the money received for a quarter section of land sold at $90 per acre?"

"If I remember right, my score was in the 80's," Hough says, "but that was a long time ago. I do know I didn't have any trouble with it."

After finishing school, Hough worked for a paper mill in Kalamazoo and a steel mill in Gary, Ind., before enlisting in the Army during World War I. He served in France as a line engineer with the First Division and suffered poison gas burns that prevented him from continuing steel mill work.

He later did work in the Black River Foundry at South Haven during World War II and retired in 1969 from the Everett Piano Company there.

Looking back, he can find little fault with his education, which would seem limited in grade level by today's standards.

"When you had an eighth grade education back then, it was about like a high school education today," he says.

'When I saw my father's exam, it really floored me.'

'When you had an 8th grade education then it was like a high school education today.'

DESIGNING DECATUR'S BICENTENNIAL SYMBOLS

In November of 1974, the Decatur Bicentennial Committee announced a contest for a symbol which could be used on any Bicentennial material. The winner of this contest was Robert Creagan, age thirteen, who submitted a design in the form of a seal for Decatur which reflected our agricultural heritage, containing mint, celery, onions ad grapes.

Designer Robert Traverse, using Creagan's winning design, created the necessary commercial drawings for the official seal.

Also a Bicentennial design was later developed and commercial drawings were made for use in news releases, programs, booklets, bumper stickers and other commercial uses.

The library hopes that many people in the community will take this opportunity to stop in on Sunday to wish Mrs. Swihart well in her retirement.

Dr. Dalton K.Rose dies; Washington University professor emeritus

Dr. Dalton K. Rose, 89, professor emeritus of clinical urology of Washington University School of Medicine, died of infirmities Friday, Oct. 8, 1976, at his home in Clayton.

Funeral services will be private, with burial in Decatur, Mich., his birthplace.

Dr. Rose came to St. Louis in 1911 and graduated from Washington University School of Medicine in 1915, engaging in private practice until 1920, when he joined the medical school faculty.

He headed the urology department from 1938 until 1952, when he retired, but continued in private practice for several years.

Dr. Rose was an ardent conservationist. At 65, on retiring from the medical school faculty, he planted a 120-acre grove of walnut trees on property he owned at Pond, in West St. Louis County.

"The walnut grove was his pride and joy for the remaining 25 years of his life," a family spokesman said.

Dr. Rose would have been 90 on Oct. 28.

He is survived by his wife, Mrs. Cora Lee King Rose; a daughter, Mrs. Anna Lee Rose Stewart, New York City; Three grandchildren and two great-grandchildren.

The family suggests contributions in Dr. Rose's memory be made to Barnes Hospital or Washington University School of Medicine.

The "Dr. G. L. Rose and Mary E. Rose Scholarship Fund" was set up by Dr. Rose, and this fund provides two weeks attendance at Camp Miniwanca for two young people from Decatur for an indefinite time. Two students (a boy and a girl) are chosen annually by the Decatur high school faculty to receive this scholarship from the Dr. G. L. Rose and Mary E. Rose Scholarship Fund.

Camp Miniwanca is owned and operated by the American Youth Foundation, a non-profit, non-denominational Christian organization dedicated to the purpose of assisting young people of capacity in life planning, leadership training and balanced four-fold living.

Dr. Rose is survived by his wife; one daughter, Mrs. Anna Stewart of New York City; three grandchildren and two great grandchildren.

In 1927, he developed the cystometer, an instrument for studying the bladder's pressure and capacity.

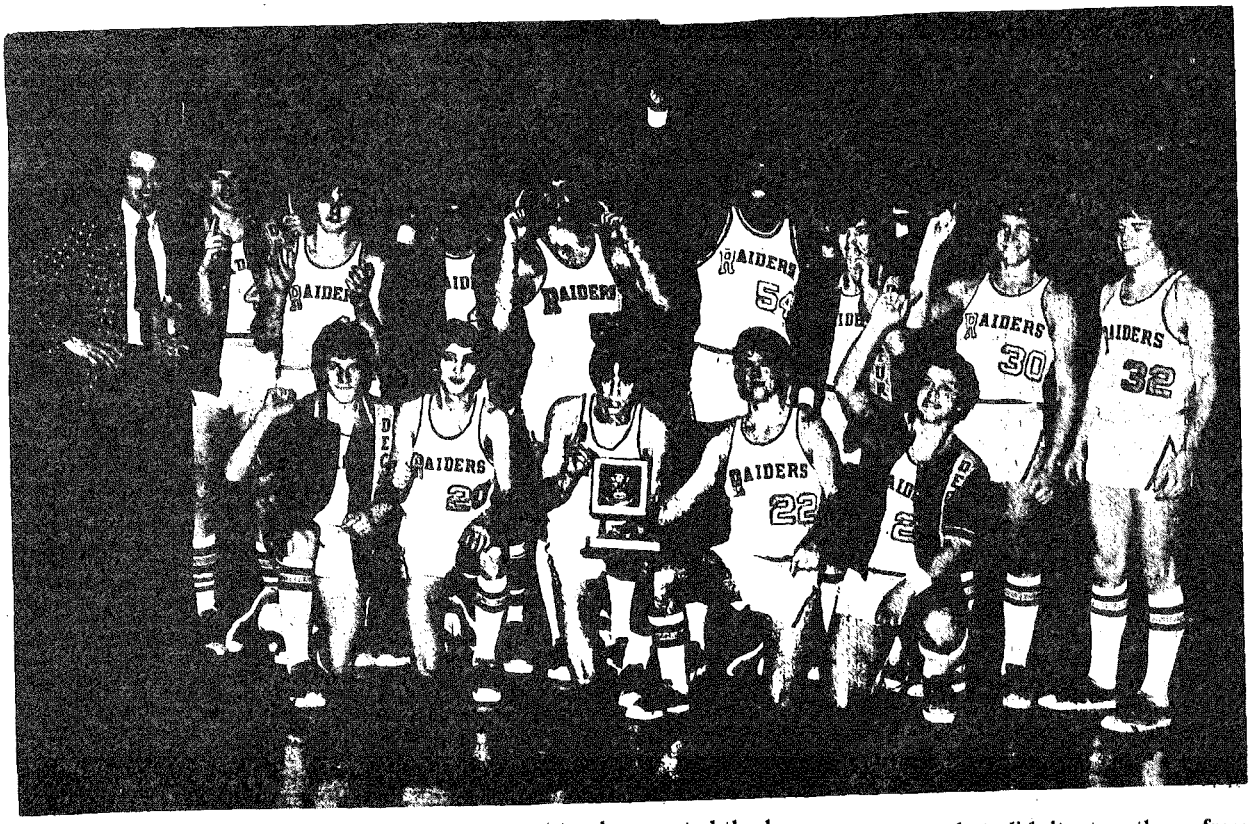
DECATUR WINS DISTRICT



Not since 1962 has any Decatur varsity basketball squad won a district tourney crown. Well, our 1975-76 Raiders did it last Saturday night with a tremendous victory over Lake Michigan Catholic.

It took three tough victories last week over Watervliet, Hartford and L.M.C. for the Raiders to win the Class C District 60 Tourney at Watervliet.

When the team arrived home, carloads of rooters, village police and fire department trucks escorted the bus through town, honking their horns, blowing the sirens, and whooping it up. Decatur had a huge following at the game, as the Watervliet gym was stuffed with basketball fans.

Decatur had all they could do to fight their way to the final game. Watervliet gave them a good fight last Monday and Hartford proved on Wednesday to be an even bigger thorn in the Raiders' side.

Hartford may have had only a 5 and 15 record but that didn't stop them from nearly upsetting the Raiders. The Indians jumped off to a huge 16-4 first quarter lead and seemed to be unstopable. Decatur had its worst quarter of the year, making only four points. Cold shooting and turnovers contributed to that factor.

The scoring machine got going in the second quarter as Decatur made 16, but Hartford sped up and hit 20 more. They held an unbelieveable halftime lead of 36-20.

Coach Tom Gibson must have wakened the stunned Raiders up at halftime because they came out hustling and closed the gap slightly. Decatur outscored the Indians 14-12 and trailed going into the final quarter 48-34.

The Raiders came out in the fourth period and pressed Hartford. They made up eight points in less than two minutes, as they forced many Indian turnovers. At 6:13 the score was 50-44 and the Raiders were closing the gap.

With 4:46 left, a Hartford cager fouled out against Dave Mroczek. Mroczek hit both free throws and tied the score at 52-52. From here on out, Decatur held the lead, but only by as much as six points.

Kurt Wiese poured in 16 points and led the Decatur comeback in the final quarter. Wiese ended up the game with 29 points.

Decatur shot 25 of 63 for 40 percent from the floor. Hartford shot at a 39 percent clip, hitting 24 of 62. At the free throw line, Decatur made 12 of 16 for 75 percent. The Indians made only 10 of 20 for 50 percent.

Steve Groendyk was the only other Raider to hit double figures with 11 points. Dave Cerven had eight points and played a good defensive game.

Where Hartford had the big edge was on the backboards. They outrebounded Decatur 40-29. Groendyk hauled down 10 rebounds. Wiese and Jim Overley each had six.

Decatur committed 25 turnovers and 20 personal fouls.

On Saturday night, Decatur faced and conquered one of the area's better Class C basketball teams, Lake Michigan Catholic, 58-47 in the championship game.

The Raider defense was magnificant as they held LMC to only 47 points. It was a great performance on the part of the entire team and coaches.

Decatur opened the game with a strong first quarter effort hitting 19 points. The Raiders shot well with a good balance of scoring. The Lakers managed only 10 points, falling nine behind.

In the second period, Decatur again outhit their opponents 15-11. By the end of the first half they held a 34-21 lead.

After the halftime break, LMC came out hustling and began to put on a slight rally. They got within six points, but Decatur held their attackers off and kept a 47-37 lead going into the final stanza. Kurt Wiese had a 10 point quarter and controlled the Raider offense.

LMC did outscore Decatur in the third as they hit 16 points to our cagers' 13.

The Lakers were in serious foul trouble in the final period, as a result of their pressing man to man defense. They lost one starter early in the period, hurting their comeback hopes.

Decatur kept up its strong defense effort, despite having slight foul troubles of their own. The Raiders outhit LMC 11-10 in the lowest scoring quarter of the game.

Wiese led all scorers again with 29 points. He hit 48 percent from the floor and made five of six free throws.

Steve Groendyk did a fine defensive job as well as scoring 12 points. He hauled in seven rebounds.

Jim Overley tallied nine points and grabbed seven rebounds.

Decatur made more field goals than the Lakers, but shot a lower percentage. Decatur made 23 of 53 for 43 percent. LMC shot 20 of 43 for 47 percent.

At the charity line, Decatur shot 12 of 20 for 60 percent. The Lakers only made seven of 14 for 50 percent.

The Lakers outrebounded Decatur 29 to 23.

Decatur committed only 14 turnovers, a big factor in their success.

It was one of the finest (if not the finest) performance of the year for the Decatur team.

An extensive building addition and remodeling project has been going on at the Christian Reformed Church, 708 S. George Street. Work began last October and will be completed the latter part of this month.

The upper level of the church will have a new all purpose room, an enlarged narthex, a relocated entrance, an enlarged sanctuary, new carpeting and new pews. The lower level will have seven new classrooms from the new addition and from the installation of folding doors on a track system, an enlarged kitchen, a complete new hot water heating system to replace the old heating system, and new restrooms.

The congregation has been having church services and other church activities at the Decatur town hall, but they expect to be back at the old location for services and all other church life in the last week of March.

All are invited to attend services at 9:30 a.m. and 6:00 p.m.

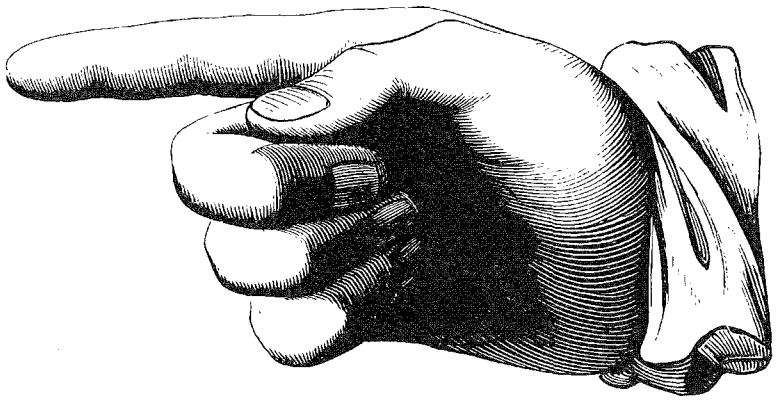
HERE & THERE



REMEMBER . . .?

I remember Dr. Rose fairly well. When I had typhoid fever he visited me every day, making the trip out to the farm in the winter. I remember his sitting beside my bed, trying to get me to eat — holding a spoonful of soup, or whatever, and saying, "Now we'll eat like aa little sip . . . down the hatch it goes!" And then he would laugh. His negro driver, Grant Mabry, sent me oranges by the Doctor. Grandma and Grandpa would not allow Grant to wait in the buggy in the cold but would insist on his coming in to the kitchen. The Doctor told m3 a little story about a boy and his sister who were visiting their aunt. She offered them some apples. The little boy took the largest one. His sister complained that he was ill-mannered; that if she had been offered the plate first, she would have taken the smaller apple and left the other. Her brother said, "Well, you've got the smallest one so what are you kicking about?" After I had recovered from my illness and happened to encounter the Doctor anywhere, he would ask me to tell him that story and I can still, in memory, hear him laugh.

I REMEMBER:

Main Street, sans pavement?

The iron boot over Shaad's Shoe Store — and how it swayed and creaked in the wind?

The watering trough on East Delaware Street?

And the pump at Main and Delaware, with the tin drinking cup dangling on its chain?

The hitching rail on Delaware Street, on either side of Main?

And that occasionally an unwary pedestrian was nipped by a tethered horse?

Dr. Rose's high-stepping team?

And the Doctor's delighted and delightful laughter when something amused him?

And his faithful driver, Grant Mabry?

The hand-drawn fire fighting equipment?

And the spine-chilling wail of the fire siren?

The three-cornered pile of cannon balls in the park?

The band concerts on long ago Summer evenings?

The indescribable odor of water on hot dusty streets as the sprinkling wagon rumbled along its way?

The tantalizing aroma when you passed Treat's Ice Cream Parlor on a torrid summer day?

"Van the Harness Man" seated in front of his store, chair tilted comfortably back against the wall?

And his quips and sallies for all passers-by?

His Chihuahua dog?

The summer afternoon a runaway horse dashed across Main Street at Delaware, dragging a buggy which crashed into the traffic signal, causing the terrified woman driver and an assortment of fruits and vegetables to fly through the air?

Th3 Racket Store?

And the "Bull Durham" tobacco advertisement on its north wall?

The Nickelodium — forerunner of the LaPearl Theatre — located on the east side of Main Street?

The (in retrospect) sweet music of the school bell on old DHS?

Here's one, which Esther Creagan called "Your most embarassing moment." A bit of explanation is necessary. When I was in school at Nazareth, the Chapel was not finished so we used the future auditorium. The floor slanted, as in a theatre, the altar was up on the future stage and regular theatre seats had been installed instead of pews. We'd march into Chapel two and two, the Barbour Hall boys on the right, Nazareth girls on the left. Well, one time, the first night I was home from school on vacation I went to a show at the old LaPearl Theatre with Pat Carney. The back of the theatre was full; we had to go way down in front. I walked down the aisle at Pat's left and from force of habit, genuflected before going into the seat. Pat laughed so loudly everyone in the theatre turned to look at us, and brought Gertie Metzger out from backstage to see what was going on as the picture being shown was NOT a comedy.

When Nelson Thomas was a small boy, and Nellie Murphy was caring for him, they were out walking one day.passed a home which had a Crepe on the door. Nelson asked what it was and Nellie explained i5 to him.time later, a pet kitten of Nelson's died. Shortly afterward, people passing the Thomas house were shocked to see a Crepe on the front door. They wondered who had died as there had been no report of illness or accident. The identity of the deceased is easily imagined.

Edgar Bergen's recent visit to Decatur recalled to my mind some of his boyhood pranks. One was throwing his voice so that students in the opposite side of the school room from him were accused by the teacher of talking, and then were chastised when they deni3- it.

The Arnold family, who lived on the N.W. corner of Delaware and Williams Streets, had a very talkative parrot. In warm weather its cage hung on the front porch. Vines grew up over the porch so thickly that its interior was not visible from the sidewalk.

Passers-by were often greeted by a voice coming seemingly out of nowhere . . . "Good morning!! How are you today?" Or, "Hello; where you going?" Or perhaps, "Good-bye, come again." The bewildered individual would go on down the street shaking his or her head and mumbling "Was that Arnold's parrot or Edgar Berggren??" (that was before he shortened his name to Bergen.) I recall one incident in which I was going down that street . . . enroute to the Jones home, no doubt . . . when a voice called out, "Hello Margaret!" I looked all around but no one was in sight. For a brief moment I wondered, then decided the parrot would not know my name, so it must have been Edgar.

Chrystal Jones and I used to walk each other back and forth from school. One time we were standing on the corner by the Berggren house, talking, when Edgar came out with a camera. Said he wanted to take our picture. There was something special about that camera but I've forgotten what . . . either he built it, or else sent away for the parts and assembled it. Anyway, the picture turned out beautifully . . . flattered us; me, anyway. Ed. gave it to his brother whom I dated when Chrystal was "going with" Norman Michiner. Norman and Clarence were great friends. Worked together in the St. Germaine drugstore after school and week-ends. Chrystal and I wanted that picture but the boys did not want to give it up. We finally conned them out of it by promising to return it, tho' we did not intend to if we could help it. They asked for it several times, becoming more insistent until we tired of the subject. Decided that if they wanted it so bad we'd really give it to them. We wrapped it in jewelers' cotton, put it in a small box; wrapped and tied it, put it in a slightly larger box, wrapping and tying that, etc., etc., until we had a large package. Took it to the Postoffice. Mr. Carney was Postmaster and he waited on us. We told him we wanted it registered, insured, special delivery, with signatures of the addressees. Imagine all that, to be sent just across the street!! Mr. Carney looked at us suspiciously over the top of his glasses and asked, "What are you two up to now?" We expected a torrent words from Clarence and Norman and were quite deflated when they never mentioned it! I often wished I had that picture when Edgar's fame was at its height.

The James Howlands and the John Graham family were close friends and neighbors in East Decatur. The children of the two families attended school together. As Aunt Nell and Jennie Graham were walking home from school one Spring afternoon they saw three little kittens tumbling over each other along the edge of the woods which bordered the road. The girls were enchanted. "Oh" said Jennie, "Let's take them home!" "They probably belong to the Robertses," objected Aunt Nell. "No," Jennie said. "They're too far away for that." So the kittens were scooped up and carried to the Graham home. Mr. Graham was in the yard. "Pa, see the cute kittens we found!" exulted Jennie. Her father, trying to conceal an involuntary start of alarm said quietly, "Put the kittens down gently, girls. Put them down gently." The cute kittens were young skunks!

Grandfather always had an eye for a fine horse and in later, more prosperous years he owned several of them. He had a team named Sugar and Spice which, according to Aunt Nell, could outrun any horses in the County. They "just loved to race" Aunt Nell related. As a matter of fact, she said, Grandpa himself could not hold them behind another team on the road. Lyman Hinckley, who lived near Eagle Lake, had a pair which he claimed were tops, but Grandfather's were better. Aunt Nell recalled a trip home from town with him one day when Mr. Hinckley pulled up beside them with his team on the run. "All Father had to do was loosen the reins and we were off" she said. There was no end board on the wagon-box, and soon groceries and hardware items began to bounce out so Grandpa tried to pull his horses up but they were determined to outrun the Hinckley team. When they had done so and Grandfather had regained control of them, the wagon-box was empty. Grandfather and Aunt Nell had to retrace their route, hopping out to pick up packages and grocery sacks for a mile back along what is now M-51.

His horses ran away with him a f3w times. One memorable occasion was when a circus was moving from Decatur, where it had performed the day before, to show in Paw Paw. In those days many of the circus animals were driven or lead from town to town. Grandfather was going to Decatur after a load of lumber when he met this weird procession. Some huge elephants, several camels and giraffes crossed the road in front of him and the terrified horses took off at break-neck speed. Grandfather had no way to brace himself to hold them and they ran as if pursued by demons as no doubt they believed themselves to be. They ripped slats from fences and broke down small trees in their frenzied flight. Grandfather had hung grimly onto the reins all through this frantic race. How he ever managed to stay in the wagon is a mystery. By the time two men had managed to halt the frightened team at the curve in the road at Brown's, Grandfather had sustained two bad cuts on his head, severely lacerated palms and painful bruises. He w3nt to the Doctor to have his wounds sewed up, got his load of lumber and drove home. Aunt Nell ended her recital of this exciting episode with a laconic "We got word at school that he was nearly killed."

OUR CHANGING TIMES

Lois Pritchard was coming to spend a few days with me, but writes that she is afraid to drive on th3 freeways because of the danger of assaults and robberies, if one has any sort of car trouble. She dares not drive to Ida's any more . . . only 40 miles from her, and Ida is afraid to drive to Detroit. The crime situation is awful here and getting worse. Big trouble at the Prison, too. Inmate nurse stabbed to death in Infirmary the other day. A prison doctor slain by 3scaped inmate . . . only two examples . . . many more!

NOT TODAY BUT YESTERDAY

Going west to seek your fortune came with discovery of gold in California in 1848 — 1849.

Everyone wanted to take a chance but not everyone had transportation. My grandfather, Patrick Conway, of Decatur, Michigan was one of those. A little problem like that did not stop him. He bid my grandmother "Good Bye" and set out on foot. He reached California on foot.

He spent nearly two years prospecting; then returned — No gold!

He was one of many who tried and lost that gold.

THE WAY IT WAS

Let's go back to 1902 and be a member of a rural school as I was then. This particular school was the "East Valley School" which was located on a valley road running from Glenwood to Lawton. It was called the valley road because it ran between the hills or upland and the swamp.

This school was the usual rural school of that period; double seats, teacher's desk on a raised platform in front of room, blackboards on sides of room, with troughs filled with chalk and erasers and two long rescitation benches in front of teacher's desk.

There was a large pot-bellied stove in center of room which burned wood. It roasted you on one side while you remained cool on the other. On a bench there was a good sized water bucket filled with fresh water from a hand operated pump outside. In this bucket was a long handled dipper which served all in turn. And oh yes, we had out door plumbing located in two office size buildings, air-cooled, one for the boys one for the girls. They set a nice distance back from school building. In winter time or rainy days one must dress completely to make the trip. Let's not forget the lighting in school room. Small windows on sides of room provided the light. They were set with no thought of whether the light mught shine in teacher's or pupil's eyes. The print in books of that time was small and close together, so please tell me how those children and teacher after eight years were able to see at all.

Getting to school was each child's own problem. Many walked two miles to school and back each day through all kinds of weather. Winter months were hard. A father with a team of horses and sleigh sometimes helped out.

During that winter, Ida Crippen, one of the eighth grade girls died with diphtheria. It happened like this; girls in those days wore long skirts, ankle length, which trailed in the snow. She had a sore throat but walked to school in winter snow, her skirts were damp. She sat in them all day. The next day she was worse. Her father walked to town a distance of five miles to see a doctor. He brought home the medicine but it did not help. She was beyond help. She died, a casket was made, the body in a casket was set up inside a window so the neighbors could see her. During the night with a neighbor's help the father took the body to a local cemetery and buried it. In the spring her funeral was held in the school house. The teacher's desk had a black drape over it, a minister said a few words for the neighbors, the school mates and the family and it was over.

You must think now of how our children are cared for today. In the first place they have the necessary precautions of modern science to prevent spread of diseases. They ride in warm buses, traveling on snow plowed roads, they have modern school buildings with proper lighting, heat, and every convenience to make them comfortable.

But listen folks don't be sorry for those children back then, without roads, buses, telephones, electric lights, automobiles and T. V's. They are the ones who made this country what it is now. They lived for a purpose, they studied such subjects as reading, writing, spelling, arithmetic. Sorry — no sex education and as for physical education they got that, walking to school, helping with chores and helping their mother in the home. They learned respect for elders. They learned to be busy. They did not know about dope, breaking and entering, etc.

I'm talking from experience. I attended this East Valley School until I entered Decatur High School and four years later graduated. I taught over thirty-five years in Rural Schools of Van Buren County. These schools improved, but there came a time when they were closed. Sorry to say. Those were the good old days. Parents lived in the home and knew their children.

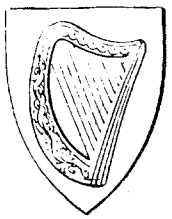
THE OLD MUSICIAN AND HIS HARP

Years have come and passed away,
Golden locks have turned to gray,
Golden ringlets, once so fair
Time has changed to silvery hair;
Yes, I've neared the riverside,
Soon, I'll launch upon its tide,
Soon my boat, with noiseless oar,
Safe will pass to yonder shore.

Bring my harp to me again,
Let me sing a gentle strain,
Let me hear its chords once more
Ere I pass to yonder shore.

Oh, those chords with magic power
Take me back to childhood's hour,
To that cot beside the sea,
Where I knelt at mother's knee;
But that mother — she has gone;
Calm she sleeps beneath the stone,
While I wander here alone,
Sighing for a brighter home.

Soon I'll be among the blest,
Where the weary are at rest —
Soon I'll tread the golden shore
Singing praises evermore.
Now my boat is on the stream,
I can see its waters gleam,
Soon I'll be where angels roam —
Dear old harp, I'm going home.



THE ANGELUS (Poem)

Over the fields its silvery tones
Come floating soft and clear,
And the workers pause in their weary toil
And list the call to prayer.
And labor lightens with every thought,
Which comes from the world above.

Oh bell which calleth the mind away,
From the things of earth below,
How sweet to lay our burdens down,
In the shine of the sunset's glow,
And list the lessons of love and faith,
Which clear soft echoes teach.

We are never too far from the hand of God,
Or the love of his heart to reach.

In the fall of 1936 I came to Decatur from Marcellus to work for O.S. Chubbuck who had the Ford Agency here where Jim Adduci is now. We came to live here in 1937. In 1939 I came over to the John Sandberg building on Sherwood Street where I had my own garage. It was east of Bert Kidman's blacksmith shop. I worked there until the summer of 1940. I was away from Decatur for several years working for the United States Government. I came back to Decatur in June, 1943 and started working for Frank Cole.

The Sandberg building, Bert Kidman's Blacksmith Shop, Higrade Oil Station, and Frank Cole's Garage have all been torn down.

Way back about 1910 or 1911, when I was a small boy, I rode to Decatur with my grandfather, Clarence A. Wright, who was a hide and wool dealer in Marcellus. We came to Decatur with two horses and a buck-board. He came here to pick up furs which were collected by Orlando Ball, Tom Culverhouse, Pete Vroegendewey and Luther Lundy.

In the early twenties when Gerty Metzger owned the theatre in Decatur, Ronald Steininger operated the projector. He lived between Marcellus and Decatur. He prevailed upon me to ride over to Decatur on his motorcycle. The roads were plugged with snow across the swamp and we had to go to Newton's Woods and come down over Chevelier Hill. The hill was icy and much higher than it is today. As we started down he shut off the gas and the car started to skid so he had to feed it gas to keep it straight. When we reached the bottom we were going pretty fast. We got to Decatur and I got off the machine, turned right around, and walked back to my uncle's situated west of Marcellus.

Wonder why we were born,

When the days are dark and dreary
Our old bones get mighty weary.

WEE BITS

Dr. Rose, the great philanthropist and humorist wrote in his ledger — "Gone to h..." — if the person who was indebted to him, died before the debt was resolved.

Dozens of unpaid bills were marked "Paid" in his ledger, particularly if the debtor was in poor financial condition and couldn't pay his bill.

Many people, today, in Decatur will remark, "Dr. Rose brought me into the world."

One winter night he was called to deliver a baby (Harold) at the William Lyle home. He tied his horses to a young oak tree at the edge of the grove near the house and it was observed the next morning that the horses had chewed the bark off one half of the tree. The oak tree grew — but with a crook in one side — a little reminder of the gentle country doctor's visit on a cold night in the horse and cutter days. There was ample snow for sleighing as he started out to the farm, but during the night, a thaw occurred and he returned to the village the next morning with cutter runners on bare ground.

LeGrande (Red) Anderson, one of the prairie pioneers, gave land for the Anderson Cemetery in Decatur Township. Unlike most cemeteries, the soil was rich, and the Andersons, like other pioneer families, were conservative; so they pastured their cows in the grave yard. The Lawrence, Thomas and Copley families were buried in the Nicholsville cemetery rather than the Anderson, because they disliked the idea of cows grazing over their final resting places.

Paul Lohroff, a few years ago, had a flat tire on a country road about five miles out from Decatur. By using common sense and good old Yankee ingenuity, he figured out a way to solve his problem. He removed the inner tube, stuffed it with marsh grass, and continued on his way to the village.

The Dexter Brigham house on the southwest corner of Williams and Sherwood streets, was the first house in the village to have modern plumbing.

ANOTHER MORRIS MURDER LEGEND

On a cold winter's day, several years after Mr. and Mrs. Henry Morris met their fate, an old white-haired man, walking along the road, stopped at the home of a former neighbor of the murdered couple. He acted peculiar, but the family, with genuine pioneer hospitality, invited him to dinner. After the meal was finished they offered to take him in the sleigh to his destination. He refused their offer by saying that he preferred to walk.

The family became suspicious and decided to hitch up the horses to the sleigh and follow him. After they had gone a short distance they realized that he had vanished, apparently, in "mid-air." The family resolved the mystery with the old saying — "A murderer returned to the scene of the murder!"

RESOURCEFULNESS

One of the ingenious, conservative, old timers who lived on a farm, typified the proverb — "Necessity is the mother of invention." One day the bushy part of his cow's tail fell off into the gutter, so he retrieved it and made a shaving brush for himself. He was quoted as saying, "It was the best d... shaving brush I ever had!"

Charlie Dine's father-in-law drove a horse and buggy — with no reins on the horse — directed the animal with verbal commands.

Charlie Criffield, Decatur Dry Good's Merchant, in the building now called (Smith & Sons), was one of the first owners in Decatur of that new contraption — the automobile. The make of the car was a "Michigan," now, no longer manufactured. It had a collapsible top and genuine red leather upholstering. The year was about 1910. A few years later an enterprising young teen-ager, by the name of Harley Smith, started working in the Dry Goods Store as a clerk and eventually, with ambition and perseverance, became the genial and successful owner and manager of the store.

Susan Van Duzer had a bulldog named "Dammit." The neighbors were accustomed to her calling — Here Dammit! Here Dammit! She lived in the Parshall Van Duzer home on west Delaware Street — recently occupied by the late Isadore Mazur.

In the late 1880's, a partially deaf Decatur woman started to walk across the railroad track by the depot. A fast train was approaching and the ticket agent yelled at her to hurry! She stopped to hear what he was saying and was killed instantly.

Before the days of the telephone, Ivan Keyes, who lived on a farm north of Decatur, yelled across the fields (about a mile's distance) to his buddy, Carl Squier, who received the message with clarity!

Mrs. Hobart Millard (Melissa Fulgum), who lived on the old farm north of Decatur, related to her children how she often had to pause from her sewing in the early afternoon because of the huge flocks of passenger pigeons. They darkened the sky sometimes for three to four hours, making it impossible for her to do fine needlework. Another old timer told how he stood under a tree in 1877, which was loaded with passenger pigeons. The birds were quite tame and it was easy for anyone to knock them out of the branches. That was another reason for their demise.

THE COUNTRY DOCTOR

There's a gathering in the village that has never been outdone,
Since soldiers took their muskets to war of sixty one.
And a lot of lumber wagons near the church upon the hill and a crowd of country people, Sunday dressed and very still.
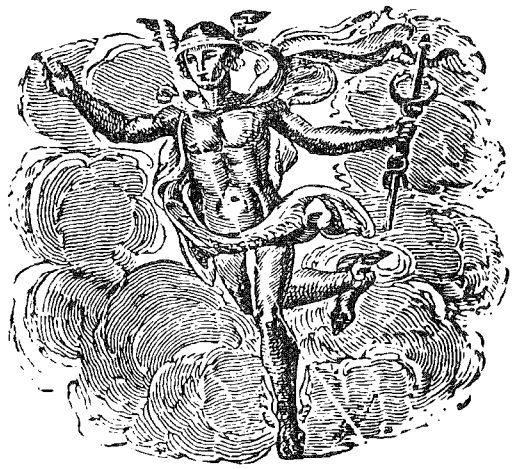
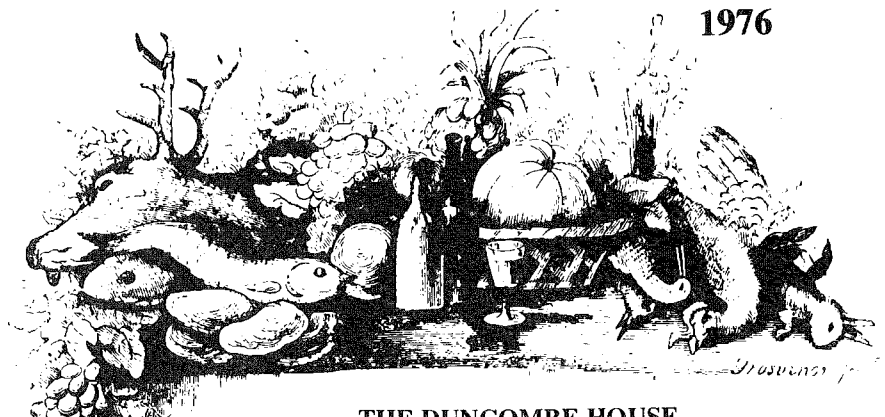
Now each window is preempted by a dozen heads or more,
Now the spacious pews are crowded from the pulpit to the door.
For the coverlet of blackness on his portly figure spread,
Lies the fierce old country doctor,
Lies the kind old country doctor
Whom the populace considered with a mingled love and dread.
Maybe half the congregation now of great or little worth
Found this watcher waiting for them when they came upon the earth.
This undecorated soldier of a hard unequal strife,
Fought in many stubborn battles with the foes that sought their life.
In the night time or the daytime he would rally brave and well
Though the summer lack was fifing or the frozen lances fell
Knowing if he won the battle they would praise their Maker's name,
Knowing if he lost the battle then the doctor was to blame.
T'was the good old faulty doctor,
T'was the faithful country doctor fighting stoutly all the same.
When so many pined in sickness he had stood so strongly by,
Half the people felt a notion that the doctor couldn't die;
They must slowly learn the lesson how to live from day to day,
And have somehow lost their bearings now this landmark is away.
But perhaps it still is better that his busy life is done.
He has seen old views and patients disappearing one by one,
He has learned that Death is master both of science and of art.
He has done his duty bravely and has acted out his part,
And the strong, old country doctor,
And the weak, old country doctor
Is entitled to a furlough for his brain and for his heart.





THE DUNCOMBE HOUSE

About the time of the Civil War a hotel was built on the corner of Sherwood and Phelps Street, which was to serve Decatur for a number of years. It occupied the vacant lot directly across from the present Charles Brigham building, corner of Sherwood and Phelps. A very pretty view from the south windows was Decatur's "once beautiful" railroad park.

The building was painted white and had the words "DUNCOMBE HOUSE" printed in big letters on the south side, possibly to attract the attention of the passengers who stopped at Decatur. Charlie Duncombe built and owned the hotel. He was a prominent citizen of Keeler and had a family background of affluence and distinction. Our late townsman, Hart Welcher, married one of the Duncombe descendants.

The Teed House and the Shelter's House stood directly behind the hotel, the Shelter's House being replaced, after it burned, by the Hotel Paddock.

The hotel building was two-stories high. On the first floor and to the right of the front entrance, was a spacious room with many shelves. This was called the Salesmens' room because at that time the salesmen traveled on trains and brought big trunks containing samples of their merchandise. These goods were displayed in that room and arranged on the shelves for inspection by the merchants who made their selections and gave their orders for the merchandise.

A man by the name of Marsh Merwin operated the hotel for a time and there were several others and then Charlie Tase assumed management for a number of years. Previous to that he operated the Teed House, becoming proprietor after the owner, Mrs. Teed, was killed on the railroad crossing.

It was a standing joke among the villagers about Henry Shelters and Charlie Tase. They were accustomed to make a dash for every passenger train that stopped here. Then they would make a "ploy" for the transients with the argument that their hotel offered the best facilities. At times the terms of their friendship became "strained" when they got into heated arguments in the presence of the bewildered passengers. Their "friendly" competition was a source of amusement for the townspeople.

The office and a men's lounge were located on the left of the front entrance. The lounge was furnished with comfortable chairs and it was a popular place. Much discussion of politics took place there.

On the left-hand side, behind the office, there was a door which opened into a bar. Joe Rogers, son of "Banker" Rogers, owned it. The latter was a proud, dignified man and it irked him to know that his son was the owner of a saloon. In the early days a banker was held in high esteem and his was an exalted position. In a sarcastic manner he told his son that he would buy him a $1,000 coffin when he died. The son was tough and at one time he put a man out of the saloon by taking him by the shoulders and holding a revolver under his ear. He forced him into the street.

No women and no young boys were allowed to sell beer or whiskey, the former costing five cents a glass. There were plenty of fights in the saloon. These were considered as part of the entertainment of the establishment. Gene Labadie and John Ray nearly killed Barney Mahoney once, in a brawl. Barney was constable and was trying to arrest them. In the end, someone went their bail and when the affair was settled, Barney got a lot of money out of the fracas.

There were pool and billiard tables in the saloon and the air was blue with smoke from kerosene lamps and "roll your own" cigarettes.

Banker Rogers lived in the house which stands west of the Presbyterian church, formerly known as the Catholic Church hall. His second wife was Franc Casstro and she was one of the best telegraphers of the time. She worked in the telegraph office in the old depot for years. She and her sister, Mrs. Burlingame, lived in the old square house years after Mr. Rogers died. They were aunts of the Dodge Brothers (manufacturers of the Dodge car in Detroit).

The dining room was spacious and was located back of the office and the salesmens' room. There were two long tables and four smaller ones in it. They were always covered with white linen table cloths, that being the custom of the day. The chairs were black and had old-fashioned flared seats. The dishes were white and thick (iron-stone), and the coffee cups were designed to hold the heat. The silver was similar to today's service, with the exception of the knives, which had black handles. The meals that they served were good, but not fancy. On the menu was beef, pork, chicken and wild game (when it was in season). Wild duck and rabbit were favorite game dishes. Oysters were served in season and quite often real home-made sausage and old-fashioned buckwheat pancakes were served for breakfast.

The butter was purchased from the local grocery stores and it was genuine home-made butter. It was purchased in rolls and the top of it usually carried a pretty design, such as the interesting pattern of the Indian mallow. The flat tops of the seed pod were used by the early settlers and their descendants for printing butter. Other designs were made with the edge of the butter ladle.

The bread was purchased from Charles Rawson's bakery, the business having been established by his father, Silas Rawson, after the latter's return from the Civil War. Sometimes the cook made biscuits or old-fashioned "gems" (mufis)

The thick "pan" cream for coffee was supplied by a local farmer. (No cow palaces in those days).

The desserts were typical of the day — pies, custards, and brad an r ce puddings. The latter were served with cream or hard sauce.

For special occasions they served home-made ice cream, the cook preparing the rich custard and the choreman cranking out the finished product. Several gallons were made and then they were packed in ice. A Mr. Shoeman and his son worked in the capacity of "chore boys" for several years.

Stella Huff and Lucy Howland worked as waitresses one smmer.THE WREABUTFITEN EAS OF AGE AND WERE GLAD TO HAVE THE OPPORTUNITY OF MAKING A LITTLE MONEY FOR SCHOOL CLOTHES. Mrs. Esther Taylor was the cook at the Duncombe House and she was an unusually good one.

The kitchen was big and it contained a large cook stove, huge ice box and long, wooden tables. (There was no porcelain at that time.) Nearly everything was made of iron or wood. An old-fashioned wooden sink stood at one end of the tables with a drain pipe for waste water disposal.

The ice man brought huge blocks of ice twice a week from the local ice houses. There were two houses; one located on Beers St. and the other on the shore of Lake of the Woods — the latter being ownedbyIke Bagley. The swampy area around Lake of the Woods was considered worthless seventy or eighty years ago. No one ever thought of buying lake frontage — much less, building on it, so, if you wanted to build an ice, fish or boat house on the shore of the lake, no one objected.

The second floor of the Duncombe House was used for guest rooms and the front part was made into a public living room or lounge. The guests could use this room for reading or for relaxation. It was furnished with big, comfortable chairs.

There was no plumbing, but in the back part of the second floor, divided, chemical toilets were installed.

The guest rooms were simply but comfortably furnished. They had good beds and mattresses and each room had a small stand (which is a collector's item today), with rungs on either side for wash cloth and towel. A big china pitcher and wash bowl stood on each stand, each pitcher containing water for the morning ablutions. If any of the guests desired a "sponge" bath, it was necessary to make arrangements with the chore boy for hot water. It had to be heated in several large, copper teakettles and it was the choreboy's duty each day to bring water for the pitchers from an old-fashioned iron pump which stood on Sherwood Street south of the building. It was somewhat of a task to carry it every day to the second floor. The waste water was collected each day from the rooms and carried to the first floor for disposal. A long back porch which extended the full length of the building was an added convenience.

Kerosene lamps were filled every day and used in all of the rooms. On the main floor elaborate chandeliers were hung and they gave ample illumination.

The Alumni banquets and other school dinners, etc. were held at the Duncombe House.

The year before the class of 1894 graduated, the Juniors honored them with a supper which was served in the Duncombe House. The table was set for thirteen and one of the boys, Roy Morlan, (son of Lou and Minnie Morlan), was superstitious and didn't like the idea of a table set for thirteen; so he picked up his table service and moved to a side table. That summer he contracted typhoid fever and died. His mother had a life-size oil painting made of him and it was placed in the center of the stage, surrounded by flowers, the night of graduation.

Probably the most exciting time that the Duncombe House ever had was the night when Richmond surrendered, marking the probable end of the Civil War. The whole town celebrated and men rode their horses into the hotel and straight to Joe Roger's bar. They not only drank themsleves; they also poured the fiery liquid down the gullets of their confused mounts. Every town and city in the North celebrated that night.

Unfortunately, and like so many other wooden buildings of its day, the hotel "caught" fire one night in the early 1900's and burned to the ground. Perhaps it had served its time, because with the changes in the mode of transportation in the automotive age, there would be little demand for the accommodations which the old hotel had to offer. It is said that John Ray set it afire. The proprietor of Duncombe House owed money to John and wouldn't pay him. Joe Rogers, the saloon keeper in the building, was implicated too. The old hotel remains a pleasant memory in the minds of those who knew it in its "heyday."

Information contributed by Lucy Howland who worked at the Duncombe House when she was a girl.

I REMEMBER

I remember — as a young boy, the quiet summer mornings between the hours 6:00 A.M. and 6:30 A.M. downtown Decatur, where the local children met to board trucks, headed for the nearby muck fields to hoe and weed the onions, peppermint and celery crops. Those were ten-hour days and most of the time was spent on the knees. To break the monotony each one was given a turn to fetch a jug of drinking water which was passed from one to the other, each one taking a turn to drink from the jug. (No individual cups). The jug was usually ornamented with a corn cob stuck in the neck.

I remember — my first job, which paid 7½¢ per hour (10-hour day — 75¢). I might mention here that most of this money went into the family budget.

I remember — the winter time, when the farmers came into town on Saturdays with their horses and sleighs to have their feed ground at the local mills. Each sleigh, entering or leaving town, had several sleds trailing behind, with the town kids enjoying a free ride. Even though the sleighs were loaded, and the boys were sneaking a free ride, making a heavier burden for the horses, the farmers never seemed to complain. Somehow they understood the need for us kids to have some fun! "God bless them!"

I remember — Charlie Rawson's Candy Kitchen — the tables of 1¢ candy exposed to the dust and to the kids — the empty pop cases — behind his store. Many of the empty bottles were taken from the alley by the boys, brought into the store through the front entrance, and the bottle deposit redeemed and used for candy. (Somehow I felt that Charlie Rawson knew that this was happening!)

I remember — how celery was planted! A rope (probably binder twine) was stretched across the field and then, with your foot, you slid over the rope to make a straight mark for the row. Then — down on your hands and knees, using a wooden peg, or your finger, to poke a hole in the ground for the delicate celery plant. It was necessary to press the soil firmly around the roots of the plant. This was a slow process, but the results were rewarding, as it produced some fine celery. Then along came "Progress' — in the shape of a machine called a celery setter! It was guided across the field by a small front wheel which followed a pre-cut groove in the ground. Two people rode backwards feeding plants into the chamber of the machine. Occasionally the wheel, guiding the planter, would leave the guide groove, and consequently it wandered out of its course. The machine moved quite slowly, and often travelled some distance out of control before being noticed as I remember. This was quite a contrast to the long, straight rows of celery using the old method. I recall another instance when a young man visited his father's fields one evening, after supper, to try out his Dad's new celery setter. He started the machine, and his efforts at planting celery were so successful that he decided to continue planting beyond daylight hours — even into the shades of evening.

Lo and behold! When his father went into the field the next morning, he found two rows of celery with their "feet" facing the morning sun. Oh well! I guess those things had to happen in the face of progress!

I remember — muck shoes on horses to keep them from sinking into the black soil.

I remember — street or pavement dancing in Decatur.

I remember — People rolling back the rugs in their homes, putting records on the victrola, and everyone's dancing!

I remember — Blueberry picking in the Hamilton Grange marsh!

I remember — Riding to Paw Paw for Catechism class in a Model T Ford, driven by Florence Creagan Knight.

I remember — The Decatur Standpipe overflowing periodically and the boys running under the downpour in their bathing suits in summer, and in winter, sliding on the smooth ice. That was fun for us kids!

Early recollections of Decatur (1876)

By Lucy Howland

As a child, I remember that we had no electricity, no telephone, no bathroom, no city water, no cement pavements etc., but we had fun and "a heap of freedom."

There were kerosene street lamps on every corner and the street man filled them in the morning and lighted them every night.

We never heard of such a thing as city water, but every home had an old-fashioned pump in the backyard which furnished water for the drinking pail. There was always an ample supply left for the Saturday night "wash tub" bath.

In the spring there was plenty of mud as there were no paved streets. The road on Main street was deeply cut with wagon and buggy wheels. Likewise in the winter time we had ample snow on Main street for sleighing — as there were no snow plows. Sleighs and cutters were hitched on the south end of main street and all around the park.

The post office was a brick building on East Delaware St. just off Main St. The first floor was used for mail and the second floor was used for public meetings etc. The city jail was in the back part of the building. There were no postmen and everyone went to the Post Office for his mail.

An old frame building stood on the southwest corner of Main St. It was known as the "Down's House" and had been a hotel in its day. Hathaway's Dry Good's Store occupied it for a time.

An old gray building which was used as an apple depot stood where the present Railroad Depot now stands.

The Duncomb House stood on the corner of Phelps and Sherwood Sts. While the Shelten's House and the Teed House stood directly behind it on Sherwood St. Mrs. Teed kept the Teed Rooming House and one night as she was walking across the railroad crossing near the depot she was killed in a train accident. Tommy Maxon called to her just as she had reached the middle of the track and she stopped to look back. She never knew what hit her.

Neal Rasmussen had a Blacksmith and Buggy Repair Shop also — on East Sherwood Street.

The west end of Delaware, Saint Mary's and Pine Streets was covered with oak shrubs down to Lake of the Woods. There were no houses on Pine St. except two cottages on the south side of the street.

As I recall, there were four churches, four dry good's stores, three grocery stores (the most prominent being Robert's and Stewart), two meat markets, two drug stores (Browning's and Carney's), one shoe store, two saloons, one hardware store, one jewelry store and the Peter Pardnette Harness Shop.

The industries were: Two grist mills, one Cooper Shop, one Tannery, five blacksmith shops, one buggy shop, two livery stables, and one foundry.

There were four doctors in 1876 — Doctors Baker, Dillon, Broderick and Keebles.

Jerome Colman and William Tucker were the lawyers at the time.

A few words pertaining to the foundry:

It was located on the south side of town and all kinds of iron castings were made there. Plow shares were made for the farmers and they had plough shares for all of the different kinds of plows in this area. Castings, grates and iron kettles were made also; the latter being used to scald the water for hog-butchering. They were also used for soft soap making.

The iron fence around the Earl Copley home was made in the foundry.

The iron columns (which looked like rope) on either side of the door of the Brigham building (Corner of Phelps and Sherwood Sts.) were made there too. The entrance has since been remodeled.

Recreation

For the most part we made our own fun in those days. Home made toys and sleds delighted us and an orange once a year in our stocking at Christmas time was a real treat.

In the summer time there was the Red Bridge on the Old Swamp Road. Many an hour of sheer joy and happiness was whiled away with home made fishing poles and baits.

As soon as the season opened the boys would "make" for the old swimmin' hole at Lake of the Woods. It was special fun to swim over to the second sand bar. Sometimes they looked around and gathered clams there and then roasted them on the beach. Barbeques as such, were unknown then.

One day, Freddie Smith was drowned while swimming with Leo Howland in Lake of the Woods. They were pals and the latter was so scared that he ran home and said nothing about the drowning to his mother. When he didn't eat his supper she questioned him and he finally told her about the accident. The boy's father called at the house shortly thereafter and he and another man went to the lake and found the body in ten feet of water.

Most of the boys were good swimmers and they thought nothing of swimming across the lake. The girls didn't swim in those days as it was thought to be unladylike.

Two other memorable events were the Donny Brook Fair and the Circus. The former was held at the present Grange Hall in Hamilton. A horse racing track near-by was an added attraction. We would arise at an early hour, do our chores, and then walk five or six miles or better — to the fair grounds.

The circus, of course, was a big attraction and the boys always got in free after carrying gallons and gallons of water for the elephants.

Decatur also had a roller skating rink on the corner of St. Mary's and Phelps Sts. — across from the Webster library. At a later date it was used for various purposes. At one time it housed a blacksmith shop which was operated by Charlie Upfield.

In spite of our simple way of life and our "horse and buggy pace" — I believe we lived in the best of times.

"THE STAVE FACTORY"

The stave factory, which was built for a saw mill in 1843, was located on East Sherwood Street a short distance from the corner of Sherwood and George Streets. Marvin Hinckley & Co. operated it with about twenty men employed.

The green wood out of which the staves were made was put into a box and steamed for about ten hours. The worker could make about ten of those boxes in a day. After the steaming, they were taken from the boxes and wheeled in wheelbarrows to the stave cutter. They were then sent to the equilizer who cut them into equal lengths. A two-wheeled cart drawn by a horse transported them to the drying sheds. It was quite a "trick" to stack them just right. They had to be over lapped to allow for air space.

In approximately three months the staves were dry, after which they were jointed and packed. The jointer passed them on to the packer who put them in a rack, then held them down secured with a lever and tied them at each end. They were placed in piles of thirty or fifty in the sheds and later were shipped to Chicago or Detroit or some other large city.

It took about a year to learn the trade of a stave cutter. It was dangerous work and one man did it. He cut the stave down to the core and then discarded the core. Elmer Labadie attempted to learn the trade but cut his finger off at the first joint and quit the job. Tom Burke was another worker who had some of his fingers cut off at the first joint. Homer Hinckley was one of the stave cutters. Patrick Howland, who was an apprentice at the age of fourteen as a stave passer, worked ten hours a day and received 30 cents for his day's work. His father died when he was nine years old and he had to discontinue school in order to help his mother support a family of six. No coffee breaks in those days and no paid vacations — in fact, no vacations at all!!

A cutter shop which made swell-back cutters was located opposite the stave factory on Paw Paw Street. It didn't operate for long when the stave factory absorbed it, at which time the factory started making butter tubs. This concern lasted for one or two years and then a big butter company bought them out.

The office of the Stave Company was west of the Cooper Shop on Sherwood Street. It was a small building of very simple design. Harley Squier worked there as bookkeeper for a time; also, Martha Van Duzer worked there for years in the same capacity.

The tramps or hoboes — as they were called at that time — were apt to wander in at any time of the night. The factory was on a twenty-four hour schedule and no one paid any attention to them as they were harmless fellows who were looking only for a warm place to sleep. A ledge along the side of the boiler was cozy and warm so they would quite often stretch out for a snooze.

One night one of the humorous workmen, with a stick, lifted the safety valve which controlled the steam in the boiler, and it let out steam that sounded like a cannon. The hobo was so frightened that he jumped off the ledge, ran out of the building and never came back.

The stave factory was in operation long before the Civil War. It burned to the ground once but was rebuilt. It operated again for many years and finally disintegrated as the timber in this part of the County became scarce.

MEASURE FACTORY

In 1890 with L.D. Roberts as partner, the Hinckley and Roberts Measure Factory was started.

It was located on the site of the old White Mill which had been burned some years before. The townspeople believed that someone set it afire. An imposing brick chimney stood among the ruins for several years. This is the corner of George and Sherwood Streets, where the Huron Farms Plant now stands.

It was quite a large building and the factory employed about eight or ten men.

The first step was to cut the logs and put them in a steam box for about ten or twelve hours. Next they were taken out and the bark was taken off. Then came the veneering machine which peeled off great long strips. These strips were cut in the desired length, then taken to a planer and each end was leveled off to fit the other side. They were then steamed again to make them pliable so they would curve around to make the measures.

The measures which they made were used by various manufacturing companies such as tobacco, cheese, coffee, tea, etc. They were made in different sizes to fit the measures and were planed again after they were glued to make them smooth.

The body of the measure was put into a steam box so it would be pliable and bend to shape. They were then put into a machine in order that they would be round and would fit the heads. Next they were dried in sheds and then brought in and bottomed. The bottoms were cut out round to fit the measure, after which they were smoothed off and reinforced with iron straps. A hoop was fastened around the top and the finished product was crated and ready for distribution.

One bad accident occurred in the Measure Factory — Winnie Taylor, brother of Harve Taylor, was badly mangled when he became entangled in the belts of the machinery while it was moving. He died of the injuries a few days later.

YE OLD TANNERY

The old Tannery was located about halfway between the present Harm Prak home and the old Darling homestead. The latter stood on the corner of George and Beers streets. Coop's Cold Storage now stands across the road not far from the Tannery's location. Horatio J. Hendryx owned the building which was built about 1856 or 1857. (Later Captain H.J. Hendryx, through fraud and misrepresentation, lost everything he owned, and he and his family were compelled to go West to the Dakotas in a covered wagon in 1880, to make a new start.) James Ellis was the foreman of the Tannery and the industry provided a great many jobs for the men of Decatur.

In 1859 Isaac Taylor, who was a tanner, moved to Decatur from Porter Township and worked in the Tannery during the period when it was operated by Ransom & Nutting (later owners). Isaac Taylor enlisted in the First Michigan Cavalry and the family never saw him again. He died in an Army hospital during the Civil War.

The building was a large, three-story construction, painted a gloomy, dark red, and it was a dreary, drab, spooky place. A lean-to was built on the south side which was used for storing hides. In the front part of the building on the first floor, a ramp track was installed and a car, operated by a windlass, was used to haul hides to the vats.

Also, on the first floor, logs were steamed, and the bark was peeled off and ground for use in the tanning process. A steam engine, fired by wood, was used to steam the logs. Instead of wasting the rest of the log, often the bark was removed. It was then taken to another part of the building and there it was peeled into thin sheets of veneer. Those sheets, sometimes many feet long, were then bundled and shipped to another company where some of them were made into berry boxes.

The vats that were used for soaking hides in a ground hemlock or white oak bark mixture, were installed on the first floor. The tanic acid in the bark of those logs, softened the hair on the hides and then it could be more easily removed. Much water was used in the process, and the used ground bark was carried on the car to the dumping place. The office was located in the northwest corner of the first floor.

After the hides were soaked, they were removed to the second floor by means of a pulley, and then scraped by hand to remove the hair and also to smooth the surface.

In 1877, many years after its closing, the town's children played in the old, deserted building. The ramp provided a good place for sliding in the winter time. The empty building was also used by the Hinckley Stave Factory for storing pork barrels. Following that, for about a year, it was used by a veneering company for turning out very thin veneer.

Patrick Howland, who is now ninety-one years old, remembers much about the building because he lived near it and used to play in it with other neighborhood children. He relates that it was closed because the supply of logs had greatly diminished, and in order to keep the Tannery in operation, a large supply of wood was needed. At that period there was an enormous demand for wood.

The following is a remembrance as related by the late Arba Moulton of Decatur, who knew something about the Old Tannery. "I remember very well the night of the old Tannery fire, which occurred in 1880, as I was right there to see it! I have often wondered about the history of that old landmark — why it was built, by whom, and when and why so big? I never dared to go through it and all I ever knew about it was that Grant Mabry, a colorful old darky of an early day, once lived in it and I feared for his safety."

The old Tannery was one of the ancient evidences of Decatur's wealth and prosperity, but its wealth faded away and its end, as related above, was disastrous.

OLD RAILROAD DEPOT IN 1876 (Decatur)

The original passenger station was a large building on the south side of the railroad track. The telegraph office was in the east end of the building and an apartment for the Station Agent and his family was located in the west end. The passenger waiting room was in the center of the building. At that time a Mr. Gibbs and his family occupied the apartment, and he served as Station Agent.

There were round, red brick buildings on each side of the depot which housed the well for water and the tread-mill engines. The baggage room was separate from this well house. The water was pumped by a big bay horse (John). The west red brick building was used to pump the water for the engines and the tread mill w$s attached to the machinery that ran the pump. The stall was elevated and the horse kept moving on cletes in the floor which were revolving while he walked. A blind horse was used at one time. Occasionally he would stop and had to be prodded into action.

Tommy Maxon was the over-seer and placed the cars on the side tracks with the aid of the big bay horse. In order to get the car moving, he used a lever which started the wheels rolling. The horse took over from there (hitched to one side) and kept the car in motion. The cars were placed in front of the freight house or the stave factory or wherever they were to be loaded or unloaded.

The freight house stood north of the railroad. It was two stories high and had a bridge running up the west side and down the east side. This enabled the horses to draw the grain up to the second floor.

Decatur was an enterprising little town at that time. It had more industries than it has at the present time.

CEDAR-COOPER.

COOPER SHOP

This shop was a part of the Stave Factory and was owned by Marvin Hinckley, Dave Squire, and Parcel Van Duzer. It was located on the opposite side of the road from the Stave factory on East Sherwood Street. Austin Dwight, Sr. was the head of it. He was an inspector also. There were four or five men in the shop and they made barrels of all kinds, including pork, apple, and flour barrels. In the fall they made more apple barrels but pork barrels were made the year around.

In very early times the men split the barrel heads and the staves out of rough logs. The cooper would then dress them down and shape them, or refine them for use.

The hoop poles were cut in the woods (about as big as a man's arm). The cooper took the hoop off either side of the pole and left only the heart of the pole. The latter was waste wood and the employees took loads of it home for firewood at no cost.

To make the hoops for flour barrels the men used black ash because it had a course grain and it was easy to split. They had a special implement for the work of splitting the hoops out of wood. The resulting hoops were just the right thickness for flour and apple barrels.

They were put in bundles of about one foot square then soaked in tanks of water and when the cooper was ready to use them, he took them out of the tanks and shaped them. This had to be done while they were wet — because if they dried, they would break. He put a "lock" on each hoop and this secured them around the barrel.

They sawed the heading bolts out with a heading saw. (Circle Saw.) They could saw about twenty cords in ten hours. Next they stored them in a shed to dry (about three months in the summertime). If they needed them in a hurry they put them in a dry kiln. Next they were planed and circled to fit the head of the barrel. The barrels were ready then for shipment or for sale to the local farmers.

ROBERT BRIGHAM

His Ancestors

This letter was sent to my great-great-grandmother by her husband, John G. Sparks, at the height of the gold rush to California, having been written in 1853 it is over 100 years old. The family at that time lived in Marion, Illinois, where my great-grandfather, Francis M. Sparks, Sparks, son of John G. Sparks was first child born in that town. Mary E. Sparks, daughter of Frances M. was my grandmother. She married Corwin H. Walbridge who was the son of another Illinois pioneer family. They moved to Michigan in 1911 and it was there that my mother, Mary L. Walbridge Brigham was raised. The letter has passed down through the family these several generations and is in the possession of my family at this time. The letter was written and sent back to Illinois by Steamship.

"Panama South America March 6th, 1852"

Dear Rebeckah,

I take the last opportunity. I shall have until I arrive at the mining Region of writing to you, you perhaps have received a letter I wrote on my arrival at this place in which I informed you that I had not got with Dr. Johnson since the writing of which, he has arrived here and we are now together and have both taken passage to San Francisco on the Sail Ship, Bark Emerly and we will probably get there in about 6 or 8 weeks at which time I will write if I am spared to get there. Dr. Johnson sends you his best wishes and requests you to let his wife know where he is and that his health is good, he has also wrote to Mary this day if she receives it. My health has been here and hope it may continue if so you will hear from me, though don't be uneasy for letters are very uncertain, do the best you can and be assured as soon as possible. I will assist you and if I have good luck will send Mary money to pay for sending her off to school in your letter to me know whether her and Francis are going to school or not and whether there is any at Murphysboro, and all the other information you can, tell Nelson not to be uneasy that he shall not suffer that I will make up any loss he may sustain by my not paying him his money and that I will send it as soon as I can make it, the prospects in the mines are very flattering we have met a great many persons from there and they all seem to have a plenty of the gold dust, and say any man can do well if they will save it. I was so hurried I did not write to neither of the Schartzes if they came to see you tell them not to foreclose the mortgages, that I will send the interest due as soon as I can, I will also send Brush his money as soon as I can get it and for them not to be uneasy, I will send money to pay all my debts as quick as possible, we will be off from here today. Don't fail to write once in every two weeks whether you receive mine or not.

With the greatest Respect
I remain your effectionate husband,
John G. Sparks

THE BLUE AND THE GRAY

A mother's gift to her Country's cause is a story yet untold,
She had three sons, three only ones, each worth his weight in gold,
She gave them up for the sake of war, while her heart was filled with pain,
As each went away, she was heard to say, he will never return again.

Chorus —
One lies down near Appomatox,
Many miles away,
Another sleeps at Chickamauga,
And they both wore suits of gray,
'Mid the strains of "Down in Dixie,"
The third was laid away,
In a trench at Santiago,
The Blue and the Gray.
She's alone tonight while the stars shine bright
With a heart full of despair
On the last great day I hear her say,
My three boys will be there.
Perhaps they'll watch at the heav'nly gates
On guard beside their guns,
Then the mother true, to the gray and blue
May enter, with their sons.

THE OLD SWAMP ROAD

O the swaying trees and branches and charm of the old Swamp Road,
As we waited at the turnouts, for the farmer and his load.

The little thicket dwellers,
Swiftly sped across the way
When the measured tread of horses,
Broke the stillness of the day.

Back among the weaving shadows,
Booming half-hidden herbs and flowers.
Luring us to pleasant dreaming
Heeding not the passing hours.

'Till some sudden chance remembrance
Spoke to us of our delay
Along the cross-roads,
Warned us to be on our way.

Lovers driving through the twilight,
In the horse and buggy days,
Or gaily riding to mass meetings
With their patriotic ways.

Not thinking of a horseless age,
With tractor to the plow,
Were quite content with what they had,
And happy then as now.

Yes they have improved the roadway,
And drained the wet swamp land,
Now — 'tis known from coast to coast,
To the wandering tourists' band.

Madly rushing o'er the pavement,
The next town to quickly reach,
And beyond it hurry forward
To the sandy ocean beach.

So now our simple blessings,
We have managed to outmode,
But in our hearts and memories,
Of the old Swamp Road.

CHEVELIER HILL

(Erroneously Known as Fifield Hill)

At the turn of the century Chevelier Hill, south of town, was very steep — much steeper than it is today. Because of its great height, it was necessary to build two roads spanning the hill. The ascending road was graveled, making a hard surface. The descending road was made of sand and it was used chiefly for wagons and teams. The sand prevented the wagon from rolling too fast down the hill.

Bernice Creagan and Florence Creagan Knight remember riding with their father in a buggy, climbing the hill on the gravel road. On the return trip they descended on the sandy raod. Their father, Dr. Henry Creagan, was a veterinarian and made frequent trips to the farm homes to care for sick animals.

GRADING CHEVALIER HILL

Because of the obvious advantage of having a "possible" road over the big hill — leading to points south of Decatur, the decision was made to grade the hill. A 10% grade was decided upon as adequate and this meant a one foot rise in every ten feet of distance.

The cut was initiated at the top — and the teams used, were called wheel scrapers, pulled by two horses. The workers probably had eight-ten scoops, which looked like buckets mounted on an axle with wheels. Two men would pull a lever on the axle to raise the bucket. It was filled with earth, raised up, and then sent on wheels to the bottom of the hill. The bucket was tripped and turned and the load was deposited on the fill. This was repeated until the desired grade was attained.

Even with the ten percent grade, the hill was dangerous for logging wagons or any other heavy load. A device called "slip shoes" and fitted to one rear wheel prevented the load from sliding down the hill. The shoes were made of heavy forged metal by a blacksmith; then secured to a "log bank" so it would not turn. (The latter was fastened to the side of the wagon). The first back wheel formed a brake, so the wagon went down gradually. Our townsman and veteran blacksmith, Bert Kidman, has forged many a slip-shoe for logging wagons. And so — the big hill became a connecting link with the vast areas south of Decatur.

MALLORY SISTERS

Samuel and Ermina Mallory came to southern Michigan from Vermont. They had two daughters, Jennie and Della who never married, and lived on the farm long years after their parents were gone.

The father was a stern man, sometimes to the point of being mean. Needless to say, he was a great disciplinarian in the home; nevertheless, his daughters loved him. Because of his disposition, he and his neighbor, Milo Youells, were continually engaged in arguments.

Jennie was a brilliant girl and was also talented in drawing animals and birds, mostly in pen and ink. Both of the girls did a man's work on the farm. Della did most of it. They ploughed, dragged, and also pitched bundles in threshing time. They always wore overalls under their skirts and both of them wore night caps at all times.

The father believed in light lunches for the evening meal, and, as the girls were hungry after a heavy day's work — they set up a stove in their room upstairs where they sneaked food from the kitchen. As their father slept downstairs, they had no problem.

At one time one of the girls visited in a nearby town. She came home on the train at a late hour, walked home, and slept in the haymow the remainer of the night.

In their declining years they lived in a brown-shingled house on West St. Mary's Street, which their aunt had given them.

The Mallory homestead and farm are now owned by Donald Drenth.

WASSMAN'S GRIST MILL BURNS

The grist mill built by Robert Nesbitt in 1857 and one of the oldest landmarks in Hamilton Township was destroyed by fire last Saturday night.

Mr. Nesbitt sold the mill to Charles Wassman and eleven years ago it was purchased by his son, John Wassman, who has gradually improved by installing new machinery until it became one of the best of its kind in the state. Only last spring its flour won second prize in a national competition.

The cause of the fire is not definitely known but the building was undoubtedly struck by lightning. Mr. and Mrs. Wassman, whose home was nearby, were awakened by the bright light caused by the flames, at 3:30 Sunday morning. The building was then enveloped in flames and nothing could be saved.

The building and its contents are insured in the Millers Mutual of Lansing for $2,500.00. The machinery alone invoiced $2,600.00 and there was also a loss of eight hundred bushels of grain.

The total loss to Mr. Wassman is $6,000.00. Neighbors and customers from that vicinity in large numbers have offered their services to help in rebuilding the mill and construction of a new mill will begin immediately.

GRIDLEY TOOF

He came to Decatur in an early day and his first work here was in the capacity of horse trainer. Breaking colts was part of his work. Later, he studied to be a lawyer, and practiced law, in our town several years, starting about 1909. His wife, Adelaide, was one of the better teachers in both rural and town schools. They had one daughter, Frances, who was exceptionally talented in music.

Gridley Toof became blind in later years, and in his loneliness, penned the following poem concerning his affliction.

ON MY BLINDNESS

The saddest word that ever was said,
And goes to one's heart with awful dread,
Is when the oculist speaks his mind and says
Dear man you are going blind.

How long, how long dear Father in Heaven
Must I stay here and wait for sight to come
To help me out; or is it far too late.

If I am doomed to sightless be and Blind the balance of my life,
Dear Father grant me grace and strength to Battle through this life.
When one has lived a long life thru,
And has done for others what he can do,
And his eyes go blind and his ears go deaf,
The only comfort is in death's relief.

I sit in my chair day after day,
And the weeks, the months and the years go by,
And I pray to my God — I wonder why I am still on earth only waiting to die.

I have read the promise God has made
To all the blind now living here.
When we enter our heavenly house,
We shall see all things bright and clear,
God has said in His holy word —
"Eye hast not seen, nor ear hast not heard
Of the wonderful things that God has made
For those who love His Blessed Name."

The Legend And Lore Of Our Indian Trees

Legends tell of these strange trees as signs and symbols with which the Indians could express their unique way of life.

These trees were formed by bending a tree, when it was still a tiny sapling, and bowing it toward the ground tying it securely with a strip of leather or a piece of reed. The Indians then allowed the tree to grow a little while longer. The part which had grown was then again forced to bend so it was pointing upward. At the bend of this step the tree was reinforced so it would grow erect.

Legend and lore tell us that these trees were used as a means of indicating the power and being of the Great Master above.

The age is seen by means of the diameter of these trees. Another way to tell the age of an Indian tree is to see how it grows parallel to the ground with no support and then turns upward again with no support at all.

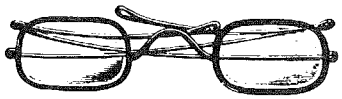
One of these Indian Trees is located on the Wooster Farm in Hamilton township. This farm is today owned by Mrs. Phelps, Mr. Wooster's daughter.

Another of these trees is found just a short ways from M-40 going from Decatur to Tea Pot Dome. It is on the George Lindsley farm.

Others are located near Buchanan, Benton Harbor, the outskirts of South Haven, and one is found near Bridgman. The tree near Buchanan has a Marker that tells about it.

Near the old "Doc." Mark's Farm by the Lee School is still another of these old trees. One other is found on the old Territorial Road going to Keeler. As you can see there are many of these marvelous works of Nature to be found in our own town.

These trees are living Monuments to Our Michigan Legend And Lore.



I KNOW SOMETHING GOOD ABOUT YOU

Wouldn't this old word be better
If the folks we meet would say,
"I know something good about you!"
And then treat us just that way?

Wouldn't it be fine and dandy
If each handclasp warm and true
Carried with it the assurance,
"I know something good about you!"

Wouldn't life be lots more happy
If the good that's in us all
Were the only things about us
That folks bothered to recall?

Wouldn't life be lots more happy
If we praised the good we see? —
For there's such a lot of goodness
In the worst of you and me.

Wouldn't it be nice to practice
That fine way of thinking, too? /
You know something good about me!
"I know something good about you!"

THE PENCIL — KING OF EVERYDAY THINGS . . .

The common lead pencil is said to be king of everyday things. It is used by every member of the family—father at his work, mother in the home, children at school, and even baby to decorate the walls and furniture.

The pencil was called "the most used and least appreciated five-cent merchandise in the world." Even though the price has gone up a bit the statement still holds. An illustration is given to defend the statement. During a baseball game the average number of balls used is 48. Yet the dollar value of the baseballs per game is far less than the pencils used by the fans in scoring the game. The pencil is the most necessary accessory at the race tracks. Many times the horse players are seen desperately searching for a pencil and then madly dashing toward the pencil concessionaire.

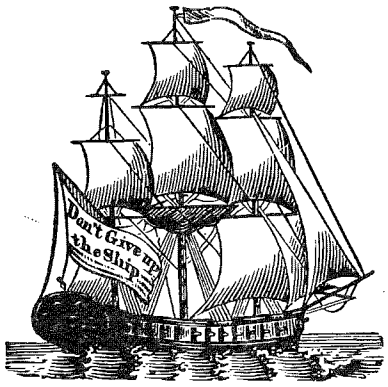
Strange as it may seem many social changes have increased the use of pencils. The telephone which was expected to decrease the use of the pencil only tended to increase it — not only for taking down messages but for "doodling" while talking. With the coming of bridge, canasta, crossword puzzles and other brain teasers, the use of the pencil was again increased. Golf, the famous outdoor sport, was another boost for this industry. To further increase their sales for this game a short pencil with no eraser was produced.

The lowly wood pencil seems to be here to stay as it has survived the fountain pen, mechanized pencils, ball point pens, dictating machines, teletypewriter, and the typewriter. There are those in big business who must have a dozen freshly sharpened pencils on their desks every morning and once they are sharpened for these big wheels they are not re-used by them but are rather passed on down to vice-presidents; etc. There are also those who like a shorter pencil and whose secretaries must be finding those who have lost more than two inches at the pencil sharpener. Thomas Edison used a pencil about 3½ inches in length — one that would fit into his right hand vest pocket. It is said he actually persuaded a pencil company to turn out short pencils especially for him.

The lead pencil is perhaps the only article of commerce in the world to carry a "misnomer" for four centuries. Everyone knows it contains no lead. Another misnomer is that rubber does not erase—"it is simply the binding agent for the pumice which does the work."

The first making of the pencil was a by-product. Near Borrowdale up near the Scottish border a graphite deposit was found by the English which was so pure and solid it could be cut into sticks. Lumps of it was used by the shepherds to mark their sheep. However its primary use was for the precision molding of cannon balls and secondary for pencils. Now years later the cannon ball is obsolete and the lowly pencil is demanded by all of the armed forces.

Today for top quality pencils clay from Bavaria is used with graphite from Madagascar and Ceylon. The wood for the pencil must be free of knots and have a straight grain. At one time the wood used was red cedar grown in the South. Later it was discovered that the wood from the incense cedars grown on the West Coast in the High Sierras was very good and has now become the standard wood. In using this light wood the manufacturers received many complaints from their customers who were used to seeing red wood when the pencils were sharpened. Thus this wood is now dyed red.



The Ship That Never Returned

On a summer's day, when the waves were rippled
By the softly sighing breeze.
Did a ship set sail with a cargo laden
For a port beyond the seas,
There were sweet farewells, there were loving signals
Whilst a form could be discerned;
Ah, they little thought 'twas a solemn parting,
For the ship it ne'er returned.

Chorus
She ne'er returned, she ne'er returned,
Her destiny none ever learned;
And for many years there were fond ones mourning
For the ship that ne'er returned.

Said a gentle youth to to his loving mother:
"Let us cross the wide, wide seas;
For they tell me that in a land far distant
There is health and wealth for me."
And the mother listened with fond affection,
And her heart for her darling yearned;
And she sent him forth with a smile and blessing
On the ship that ne'er returned.

Chorus

2m020."Only one cruise," said the gallant sailor, As he kissed his weeping wife;
"Only one more bag of the golden treasure
And 'twill serve us all through life.
Then I'll spend my days in our cozy cottage
And enjoy the rest I've earned";
But, alas! his bright hopes were doomed to perish
With the ship that ne'er returned.

Chorus

m020."Do not leave me, love," cried the anxious maiden,
"Do not cross the angry sea,
For my heart will break in its lonely sorrow
When thou art far away from me."
But he sailed away, for he dared not linger,
Though with her to stay he yearned,
And for years she wept, vainly waiting, watching
For the hsip that ne'er returned.

PENNINA COTTON

Pennina W. Cotton, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Winburn, was born in 1836, Indiana, and died in 1914 in Paw Paw Township. She was a namesake of a Quaker woman who befriended the family in the days of the Underground Railroad.

She was married at the age of eighteen to William Worrix, whose life was taken in the Civil War in 1864. Three children were born to this union. In 1866 she was married to Joshua Cotton and they were the parents of four children — Stella, Dora, James and Chloe. Dora Cotton Goens lived on a farm north of Decatur. She married Lewis Goens and they were the parents of eleven children. Chloe married John Bradley and together with her brother, James Cotton, they lived in Decatur for many years.

LOOKING BACK ON SIXTY YEARS IN EDUCATION

My education began in Chapman School, a rural school in Newburg Township, Cass County, Michigan. In those days most children were considered ready for school when they reached seven years of age. I was unfortunately born on December twenty-fourth. My parents planned to enter me the following year, but the teacher, a friend of the family, suggested that I start in January after the Christmas holidays. So, in January, 1911, a new first grader enrolled in Chapman School.

Actually, my formal education began at home. Books and stories fascinated me. With some help from my mother I had already learned to read, count, and recite the alphabet when I was five and six years of age. School became an easy, pleasant, and interesting experience. In six and a half years I had completed the eight grades of the rural school. Reflecting on those years, it convinced me that parents were enrolling children too young in the past twenty-five or thirty years at five years of age. This opinion seems justified when we hear the complaints today that students are unable to read, write, spell, and do simple mathematics.

With most children enrolling at about seven years of age, some boys and girls were fifteen and sixteen years old in the seventh and eighth grades. This could be a discipline problem for the teacher if the permissiveness of the present day had existed. However, strict discipline was the rule. Most students probably were given the same warning my father gave, "If you must be punished at school, you can expect the same when you get home." That was a great deterrant!

I recall the day a big, strapping sixteen-year old decided he did not have to obey the teacher, a little lady about five-feet-two with her hair done up on the top of her head. She wrestled that young man to the floor, slapped him up real good, then sat on him while she did up her hair. It scared the daylights out of us little folks, but she was well respected by one and all the rest of the year.

In September, 1918, I entered Vandalia High School. There were about twenty-five freshmen, mostly boys, and four years later twelve of us graduated. Many parents thought a high school education was not important to girls, and many of the boys dropped out of school before reaching their senior year.

I lived five and a half miles from Vandalia. During my freshman year I stayed with Mrs. Nellie O'dell, a widow and teacher in the school. For the next three years I rode a bicycle in the fall and spring and drove a horse and buggy during the winter. When the snow was on the ground a one-horse sleigh replaced the buggy. It took about an hour to make the five and a half miles. This meant leaving home about 7:00 A.M. During basket ball and baseball season I arrived home very late in the evening after practice.

In late May, 1921, the twelve seniors graduated. For the next year I remained at home helping my father with the farming, not knowing what I would like to make my life work. My mother kept urging me to become a teacher. In the following spring it was announced in the Cassopolis Vigilant that teachers' examinations would be given at the Court House the next week. Mother begged me to go. So, for two days I drove the ten miles to Cassopolis. I passed the exams, and in July and August I stayed with friends in Kalamazoo, attended Western Normal School, now Western Michigan University, for six weeks to learn Theory and Practice in teaching. Lo and behold, I was a teacher!

That Fall, September, 1922, I began my career at White Temple, a rural school in Penn Township about two miles from my parents' home. I had all eight grades, which was really a challenge for an eighteen year-old teacher with pupils from six to fifteen years of age. But, I loved it. We became a happy family in the classroom and on the playground. I remained in that school for five years.

I recall a couple of incidents during those five years. On a weekend in winter several of the boys went to a nearby lake to skate and fish. It was quite cold, so they built a fire with poison sumac which grew along the shore. Enough said! Monday morning the boys came to school with swollen faces, eyes nearly closed, smeared with a greasy concoction to stop the itching. They didn't want to miss school, even though the mothers thought they should stay home.

On a serious side, I cannot forget Mabel, a girl about ten. Mabel had not learned to read nor do simple arithmetic. When I asked the children about this, their reply was, "She can't learn so the teachers just let her look out the window." Before that year was over Mabel learned to read the Primer and work with numbers. To this day, when I meet Mabel, she introduces me to her family and friends by saying, "This is Mr. Davis. He was the best teacher I ever had." Coming from Mabel, there can be nothing to make one feel better about his work. That experience affected my teaching for the rest of my fifty years in education.

At the end of the first year I had saved enough to buy a 1923 Model T, the first car in our family. About a year and a half later I gave that car to my parents and purchased a 1924 Model T roadster. I more than owed that to my parents for the sacrifices they had made.

In 1928 I accepted a challenge at Newton Woods, now known as Russ Forest. They had three different teachers the previous year. They said they wanted a man-teacher to straighten things out. Although reluctant to leave the children and parents of the White Temple community, it seemed here was a challenge to be met. After the first month of school the students came to believe that school-time was work-time and recess-time was play-time. We had a wonderful time with few problems for the next five years.

We organized a Liberty Bell Bird Club. Each Friday afternoon we held our club meeting. The big Newton Woods was an ideal place for bird, flower, and tree study, and the school building stood at the edge of the woods.

Newton Woods was named after the owner, Colonel Newton, who took up about 770 acres in the early settlement of that area. He had a daughter, Jane Newton, who married Henry Crego. When Colonel Newton died, Jane Newton Crego inherited this land. At the time I was teaching there Mrs. Crego was in her 80's. We decided to invite her to come to the school one day to tell us about her experiences as a little girl. She held us spell bound with her stories of the Indians coming to buy flour and other things from her father. They always brought her some little gift, such as beads, necklaces, and other trinkets.

At Mrs. Crego's death the nearest relatives were several cousins who really had no need for all that land. As I recall, there was about 330 acres of farm land and 440 acres of woods. When it became known that lumber companies were about to buy the timber, a man interested in preserving those big trees came to the rescue. Fred Russ purchased all but the 80 acres where the school stood. That had already been sold to a lumber company. So, Newton Woods became known as Russ Forest. Mr. Russ turned most of the farm land into reforestation during the next fifteen or twenty years. At his death a few years ago he turned over Russ Forest to Michigan State University, who still control it. Recently, about 1974 or 1975, Cass County Historical Society took over the old Newton mansion as a museum and opened it to the public.

I mentioned in the beginning that I had saved enough in my first year of teaching to buy a car. At the end of the third year I had saved enough to take a bride and furnish a home. We were married June 15, 1925. We brought up three daughters and a son, survived the Great Depression of the 1930's, and recently celebrated a Golden Anniversary. Great credit must be given here to her love, loyalty, hard work, and patience over these many years.

We purchased a farm in April, 1929 now known as the Kraft Farm and Market. We put in many long hours and hard labor there teaching and farming at the same time. The Great Depression came the next year which made things very difficult. One fall hogs were three cents a pound and wheat was thirty cents a bushel. One school year in Vandalia salary was cut to sixty dollars a month, five hundred forty dollars for the year. It seems unbelievable today.

After six years at Vandalia, four years at Red School in Wayne Township, and two years at Gage in Wayne, I was asked by Frank Dodge, Superintendent of Schools, to come to Decatur where I spent the next twenty-eight years before retiring in June, 1972.

Anyone who can recall school days in the old rural school will have memories of the following:

There was no indoor plumbing.

Two small outbuildings stood at the back of the school yard. On cold winter days one did not waste any time going and coming.

Water for washing and drinking was brought from the pump in a pail.

Heat was provided by a large heating stove placed near the center of the room. Wood, or coal, had to be carried from the woodshed.

I recall an incident at Red School. Soot in the chimney caught fire, sparks dropping down in a cleanout area at the base of the chimney. The wall was set on fire. As I glanced up from my class on the recitation seat at the front of the room, I noticed a little first grader staring as if hypnotized at something behind me. I turned to see the fire leaping up the wall. I calmly told the children to march outside carefully. Two older boys grabbed two buckets, ran down the hill to the pump, and filled the buckets. When the children were safely outside, we soon had the fire out. We got a two-day vacation while the damage was repaired.

The rural school was a great learning institution. Older children assisted the younger pupils, and the younger ones learned from listening to the older students. Students became very independent, very responsible.

I enjoyed those twenty-two years in the rural school, and it surely prepared me for my years in Decatur as an elementary principal.

I came to Decatur in September, 1944 as teacher and elementary principal. There were about two hundred thirty pupils from Kindergarten through sixth grade, all housed in what was commonly called the Grade Building. By the early 1950's the enrollment increased rapidly with the annexation of the area rural schools. It became necessary to use two rooms in the High School Building for Kindergarten and second grade. Soon the high school became overcrowded. The Elementary Building solved the elementary problem, but the high school was forced to put the seventh graders in the Grade Building, use the gym for a study hall, and make the former study hall above the gym into classrooms, and use the old shop as a classroom.

So, in 1953 I was relieved of classroom teaching by Superintendent W.C. Bates, to give full-time attention to supervision of the two buildings of elementary students. Then, by 1963 present Junior-Senior High was under construction. This relieved the growing pains already complicating the elementary situation, and we inherited the old High School Building for elementary classrooms. With three buildings to supervise, the principal's job became a very busy one.

I had planned to retire in June, 1969, but Superintendent Wayne Hellenga and the Board of Education convinced me to stay until the new addition to the Elementary Building was completed and in operation.

Finally, in June 1972 I retired after twenty-eight years in the Decatur Public School and a total of fifty years as an educator.

Needless to say, I have many memories of those years. I would like to recall a few here.

Mr. Dodge had hired me to replace Mr. McAllister as principal and sixth grade teacher. But, as fall came Mr. Dodge asked if I would mind taking the fifth grade. He said this group with a goodly proportion of boys had been the subject of complaints by all their teachers up to that time. During that year we often spotted Mr. Dodge in the hallway checking on the situation. At the end of the year he suggested I take them through sixth grade, since he hadn't heard one word of complaint from me. Those supposedly bad boys are today successful and respected citizens and business men. This also reminds me of another boy at the Newton Woods school. Bob was very sharp in mathematics, but he had a problem with reading which made all subjects difficult for him. The problem may have been a physical defect, but it may also have been the result of poor instruction by the previous teachers who had severe discipline problems over a period of two or three years. By the time he reached eighth grade I had taken a position in Vandalia. Bob's parents decided he should not go to high school because they felt he would not be able to graduate, and they felt they were financially unable to furnish car transportation to Dowagiac. This was in the depression years. So, I urged them to let Bob come to live with me in Vandalia to at least try his freshman year where I would be able to help him, if necessary, with his studies.

Bob completed his freshman term, went home to attend Dowagiac the next three years, received a diploma, enlisted in the military, went to the Far East as a member of the Engineers during the war with Japan.

When he returned home after the war, he used his military training to develop a very successful business in Dowagiac, an industry still in operation. He recently built a beautiful home in the country, reported costing $70,000. He has traveled widely in this country and abroad representing his business. This is just another example of how a student given the proper incentive and motivation, can succeed. And, to think that when I was earning about $2,500 per year teaching, Bob was making far, far more!

In the late 1940's and early 1950's the School Forest was being developed under the Ag teacher, Ernie Froehlich. When Ernie had 5000 to 10,000 evergreen seedlings to set out, he called on the fifth and sixth graders. We took them to the forest area in the old red, white, and blue bus, one group from 9:00-11:00, the other from 1:00-3:00. Twenty-five energetic youngsters could really plant a lot of trees. It provided the students with a lesson in conservation and gave them a break from the every day routine.

In the late 1950's busing students became a growing business. It became necessary to have a transportation supervisor to lay out routes, oversee the maintenance of the buses, and settle conflicts among the passengers. Since I knew just about where every student lived, the Elementary Principal had an added job. Thanks to the dedication and hard work of Leo Southworth my job was made easier.

In 1955 or 1956, Michigan law declared that all persons under eighteen years of age must complete a course in Driver Education to receive a driver's license. Driver Instructors had to attend Driver Education courses set up in Western Michigan University as well as other universities in the state to receive certification as an instructor.

Mr. Bates, the Superintendent of Decatur Public School, decided we should start Driver Education in the Spring of 1954. We secured the first driver car, a new Chevrolet, from C.W. Krum and Sons and enrolled our first class. Since I was the only one not teaching any classes, I was asked to take over the responsibility. It was one of the most interesting, most rewarding teaching jobs I have ever done. Much seriousness, a great deal of excitement, and sometimes very comical were the situations we encountered. For a few years students were taken from one of their study halls in regular school time, but eventually, with large numbers of young women and men, it was necessary to do the course during the summer months. Age and increasing responsibilities as Principal forced me to give up Driver Education about five years before my retirement after teaching the course for about twelve or thriteen years and several hundred students.

Twenty-eight years in Decatur Public Schools went by all too rapidly. It was with much reluctance that I retired in June, 1972, but I felt I must have a little time left to enjoy remaining years with my wife and family and friends.

The wonderful cooperation of parents, teachers, administrators, Board of Education, bus drivers, janitors, teacher aids, and other citizens of the community makes one proud to have been a part of one of the best public schools in the State of Michigan.

One of my greatest treasures is the award hanging on the wall in my home which was presented to me by the Elementary Staff. On it is engraved these words: FIFTY YEARS, LAURELS TO AN ARTIST IN EDUCATION. I can only hope that in some small way I have lived up to such a great compliment.

May this historical review bring many pleasant memories and perhaps inspire the younger generation to reach for and achieve the goals they may set for themselves.

PARSHALL VAN DUZER HOUSE

The home of the late Isaac Mazur was built at the turn of the Century by Parshall Van Duzer. He was born Oct. 7, 1850 and died Dec. 23, 1912. He was, at one time, part owner of the Measure Factory which was located on George Street near the M.C.R.R. tracks. The Van Duzer house was the first house in the Decatur area which had central heating. Field stone for the house came from the property of Monva Van Duzer who lived on a farm located about five miles west on the present M51.

Excerpts from Geneology of Van Duzer Family 1975

"AFTER THE BALL"

For years, the Notre Dame University boys attended a summer camp at Bankson Lake. Baseball was their sport and in 1906 the priest in attendance, Father Hugh, arranged a game between the Notre Dame and the Lawton boys.

It was a hot day and after the game, one of the fans — a charming young lady from Lawton — stepped up to the pump for a drink of water. It so happened that a young, freckled-faced, red-headed ball player was also there for the same purpose. He stepped up and gallantly pumped a drink for her which she graciously accepted. In due time, she also graciously accepted the ball player's proposal to be his life partner!

The young man was none other than our amiable and esteemed Elmer (red) Wolfe. (Red was the pitcher that day on the Notre Dame team.)

The Whippoorwill's Song

By H. Millard

Oh, meet me when daylight is fading,
And is darkening into the night;
When songbirds are singing their vespers,
And the day has far vanished from sight;
And then I will tell you, darling,
All the love I have cherished so long,
If you will but meet me at evening,
When you hear the first whippoorwill's song.

Chorus

Whippoorwill! Whippoorwill!
You hear the first whippoorwill's song;
O, meet me; O, meet me
When you hear the first whippoorwill's song.

'Tis said that whatever sweet feelings
May be throbbing within a fond heart,
When listening to whippoorwill's singing,
For a twelvemonth will never depart;
So then we will meet in the woodland,
Far away from the hurrying throng,
And whisper our love to each other,
When you hear the first whippoorwill's song.

Chorus

And in the long years of the future,
Though our duties may part us a while,
And on the return of this evening,
We be severed by many a mile;
Yet deep in our bosoms we'll cherish
The affection, so fervent and strong,
We pledged to each other this evening.
When we heard the first whippoorwill's song.

Chorus

A reward supernal was won by thee
To be met on the Shores of Eternity.
A word that cheers a soul in distress
Comes back with a prayer you deed to bless,
"For what you do to the least of Mine
You do it unto Me."

When alms with kind pressure your hand did dole,
Bringing needed comfort to body or soul,
A treasure in Heaven you laid up that day,
Which naught can destroy, naught take away.
And My Heart rejoiced for the gracious deed,
'Twas your suffering Lord you then did feed,
The kindly touch took the weight from My Cross,
And you the richer were made by your loss:
"For whatever you do to the least of Mine
You do it unto Me."

If done in My Name there is naught so small,
That heedless or lost to the earth can fall,
A word of comfort, a smile of cheer,
A pitying glance, a tender tear,
A cooling draught, an act of love,
Will have its reward in My Home above,
"For whatever you do to the least of Mine
You do it unto Me."

THE BEAUTIFUL SNOW

In the early part of the Civil War, one Saturday morning in the dead of winter, there died at the Commercial hospital in Cincinnati, a young woman over whose head two and twenty summers had passed. She had once been possessed of an enviable share of beauty, and as she her self said, had been "flattered and sought for the charms of her Face," but alas! upon her fair brow had long been written that terrible word — Fallen. Her first wrong step was the small beginning of the "same old story over and over again," which has been the only life history of thousands. Highly educated and accomplished in manners, she might have shown in the best of society. But the evil hour that proved her ruin was but the door from childhood; and, having spent a young life in disgrace and shame, the poor friendless one died the melancholy death of a broken hearted outcast.

Among her effects was found, in manuscript, "Beautiful Snow," which was immediately carried to Enos B. Reed, at the time editor of the National Union. In columns of that paper on the morning following the girl's death, the poem appeared in print for the first time. When the paper containing the poem came out on Sunday morning, the body of the victim had not received burial. Mr. T.B. Reed, one of the first American poets, was so taken with it's stirring pathos that he immediately followed the corpse to its final resting place.

Such according to the "Boston Standard," are the plain facts concerning her whose "Beautiful Snow," will long be regarded as one of the gems of American Literature.

The Beautiful Snow

Oh! the snow, the beautiful snow!
filling the sky and the earth below;
over the housetops, over the street.
Over the heads of the people you meet;
  Dancing,
    Flirting,
      Skimming along.
Beautiful snow! it can do no wrong.
Flying to kiss a fair lady's cheek.
Clinging to lips in a frolicsome freak,
Beautiful snow from the heaven above,
Pure as an angel, gentle as love!
Oh the snow, the beautiful snow
how the flakes gather and laugh as they go
Whirling about in their maddening fun!
It plays in its glee with everyone,
  Chasing,
    Laughing,
      Hurrying by;
It lights on the face and it sparkles the eye,
And even the dogs, with a bark and a bound,
Snap at the crystals that eddy around.
The town is alive and its heart is aglow.
To welcome the coming of beautiful snow!
How the wild crowd goes swaying along,
Hailing each other with humor and song!
How the gay sledges like meteors flash by,
Bright for a moment, then lost to the eye;
  Ringing,
    Swinging,
      Dashing they go
Over the crust of the beautiful snow —
Snow so pure when it falls from the sky,
To be trampled in mud by the crowds rushing by,
To be trampled and tracked by the thousands of feet,
Till it blends with the horrible filth in the street.
Once I was pure as the snow — but I fell!
Fell, like the snowflakes from heaven to hell;
Fell to be trampled as filth in the street
Fell to be scoffed, to be spit on and beat;
  Pleading,
    Cursing,
      Dreading to die,
Selling my soul to whomever would buy,
Dealing in shame for a morsel of bread
Hating the living and fearing the dead
Merciful God! have I fallen so law
And yet I was once like the beautiful snow,
Once I was fair as the beautiful snow, with an eye like its crystal, a heart like its glow;
Once I was loved for my innocent grace,
Flattered and sought for the charms of my face!
  Father,
    Mother,
      Sister, all.
God and myself, I have lost by my fall,
The veriest wretch that goes shivering by will make a wide sweep lest I wander too nigh.
If the snow and the ice struck my desperate brain!
  Fainting,
    Freezing,
      Dying alone;
Too wicked for prayer, too weak for my moan
To be heard in the streets of the crazy town,
Gone mad in the joy of the snow coming down;
To lie and to die in my terrible woe,
With a bed and a shroud of the beautiful snow
Helpless and foul as the trampled may moan Sinner, despair not! Christ Stoopeth low to rescue the soul that is lost in sin and raise it to life and enjoyment again;
  Groaning,
    Bleeding,
      Dying for thee,
The crucified hung on the cursed tree!
His accents of mercy fell soft on thine ear.
"Is there mercy for me? Will he hear my weak prayer?
O God! in the stream that for sinners did flow, wash me and I shall be whiter than snow.

1909

THE FLEETING YEARS
1891-1976

I was born on a chilly 22nd day of Feb., 1891 — on a fruit farm three miles east of Lawton, Michigan. My parents were Henry S. Reynolds and Caroline Miller Reynolds. Both were residents of that area, having been married a few miles from where I was born at Mattawan, Michigan. I had a little brother, Harry, four years old. We were always very close, as we were the only children in the family for several years. Our grandmother, Amanda Miller, lived in our home; in those days she was considered wealthy. We children never wanted for anything. My grandfather Miller had died July 4th, 1893. I remember his death vividly, even though I was only two years of age. I had a new pair of shoes and my father lifted me up on the bed, so grandfather could see them. He told me to take good care of them.

My brother was a saint who never wanted to do anything out of order; however, with a little urging from me, he would try anything. I coaxed him into a piano box where we would smoke dry corn silk, wrapped in dried corn husks; also, he tried a chew of tobacco at my suggestion. It was our last chew! Our grandmother kept us supplied with games — lotto, dominos, etc.

In 1899 a little sister, Vera, was welcomed into the family. She never knew a grandparent. Harry and I had the pleasure of having three. When our sister, Vera, was born, it was a great surprise to us. In those days, all women dressed alike — a loose dress from the shoulders down. No one ever knew that a woman was with child. It was also the custom to send the other children away for a few days. We were taken to a friend's house. It was during grape harvest and my brother, who was a lover of horses, had the honor of driving the horse, hitched to a handy wagon, through the rows of grape vines for the purpose of collecting the baskets of grapes that the workmen had picked. I was his helper! The second day we were in the field, the neighbors came out to tell us that we had a baby sister at home who wanted to get acquainted with us. We couldn't believe it! We were so happy that we went home the same day. Vera and I had great times together. We had a nice play house in an empty corn crib, had horse blankets on the floor for rugs, crates for furniture; but the prize piece of furniture was a wagon seat complete with back and springs — which was our sofa — and was very comfortable. We also gathered pretty weeds and put them in empty bottles for bouquets.

My brother and I drove thirteen miles to attend Sunday School in Mattawan, Michigan. He attended the Methodist with our cousin and I the Congregational with a girl friend.

Our mother made all of Vera's and my clothes. Each summer, Vera, a blond, would have a pretty blue dress and I, a brunette, would have a pink one. Both my brother and me had naturally curly hair. He passed away in February, 1973 at the age of eighty-six, following a long illness.

When I was about thirteen, a group of Brothers from Notre Dame in South Bend, Indiana, bought and founded a large resort at Bankson Lake, four miles from Lawton. Brother Hugh, as he was known to everyone, was a fine person. These Brothers built a large hotel, dance hall, refreshment stands, cottages and a nice little chapel. In those days the boys that came from foreign countries to attend Notre Dame couldn't go home for the summer months. You must remember that there were no "747's" then and Brother Hugh supplied entertainment for them. Twice a week he would hire 3-6 seated surries, — "Yes they had fringe on top" — and a driver for each surrey and a married couple to chaperone the crowd. The Brothers selected fifteen or eighteen young girls from Lawton to go out to the resort for dancing, games, boating and horse-back riding. Brother Hugh took an especial liking to me and the first evening we went, he paired me off with one of the boys whose name was Francis Schick, a lad of fourteen, from South America. We were partners all through the summer. When the time came for them to depart for Notre Dame by train, we girls were invited down to the depot to see them off. While we were waiting for the train to arrive, this lad gave me a lovely gold locket, with letters "N. D." in blue. I had kept that for over seventy years and recently gave it to my oldest granddaugter. Francis and I corresponded with him until three months before I was married. I wrote and told him of the coming marriage and he wrote a beautiful reply. His wish was that, "The happiest day of the past would be the saddest of the future." I have learned since that he was an heir of the Schick Razor Company.

In 1905 another baby girl was born into our family. She was named Ella Lucille. When she was two and one-half years old she would no longer be called Ella and renamed herself (Celie), and it stuck! She was very fond of Red, and the feeling was mutual. She always referred to him as the fellow with "Pink hair." When she heard of the wedding she decided to go. My mother told her that she couldn't go, as it wouldn't be right for a couple to go to get married and take a three-year old child along. We had driven about two blocks in our horse and buggy when my mother came on the run to tell us to stop, as Celie was dragging her heels and hanging onto the buggy.

Time goes by and she graduated from the University of Michigan and taught school for many years in this area. At present her home is in Lawton.

I first saw Elmer (Red) Woolfe at Bankson Lake at a ball game — Notre Dame Vs Lawton. Red was pitching for Lawton. In those days the only water available for drinking was from a public pump, and there was one dipper for all to drink from. My friend and I were at the pump for a drink, as were several warm and perspiring ball players. It was their turn to drink, but Red, the gentleman he was, pumped a dipper of water and handed it to me. I was so proud and elated, as he had just won the ball game, because of his excellent pitching, for Lawton. He was the cutest person I had ever seen — freckles and red hair! We weren't introduced, but a few weeks later I learned that his birthday was the same as mine — February 22nd.

In the middle of August, a Decatur boy (Lyle Rawson) was going with a Lawton girl, and he brought Red along for me — a blind date! I guess it was love at frist sight — as the next July we were married.

At that time he was clerking in a grocery store on Main Street in Decatur, and he was the highest paid clerk on the street. He received $9.00 a week! Red paid his mother board and he dressed very well. We became engaged and he said when we had saved $100.00 we would get married. Each Saturday night he came to Lawton on the train and gave me what was left out of the $9.00. Sometimes it was two or three dollars — sometimes less! I saved until I had one hundred one-dollar bills. We were married July 1 and furnished a five-room house complete — nice solid oak furniture; in fact we are using some of it today — 1976 — and we had money left. All furniture came to $87.00.

The man for whom Red worked for many years filed bankruptcy, and Red had to look for another job. He found one in Otsego, Michigan, and in 1909 we moved there; later we moved to Lawton, and a few years after that, we moved back to Decatur, Michigan. This little village has been our home ever since. Red played base ball and I often accompanied him. He also had an orchestra that played for dances each Friday night. We attended several social functions and it was a good and happy marriage — so much fun going on all the time.

On June 13, 1917, we were blessed with a lovely baby boy, and we named him Reynolds (my maiden name). We moved to our present home at 210 East Sherwood Street on August 18, 1918, and have lived in the same house for fifty-seven years. The house was new and it was built so well and strong. We added a south sun porch, otherwise it's the same as when we came.

Red had the Agency for Ford and Chevrolet cars from 1917 until 1933. Soon after that the car agency was dissolved. Red was Chief of the Decatur Fire Department and Police Chief of Decatur for thirty-two years.

During those years the U.S.A. was involved in a war. I gave New Testament books to each boy who went into service from this community and corresponded with many. We had the "Home Service" department in our home, and gave out clothing to the poor. I have always tried to be civic-minded. In 1930 I took Government Census, was on the rationing board, Lake View Hospital Auxiliary for over fifty years, am a Past Matron of Eastern Star, and a member for over fifty years. I was the second woman ever to be elected as an Elder on the board of the First Presbyterian Church and taught Sunday School for years. We took into our home, three children, when their mother was very ill. After her death, we cared for them for three years.

Our lives haven't been "all down hill" to be sure! We have had a few hard knocks, but the happy years have far exceeded the others! We have felt that the bad times helped to build character. Many have asked us to what do we attribute our longevity. It is all added up on a card which we received on our sixty-sixth wedding anniversary, "You have something beautiful called love!" We have celebrated our 50 — 55 — 60 and 66th anniversary. Not too many couples achieve that.

I am about finished with my memoirs. I know I have left out important events, but cannot bring this to a close without mentioning our son, Reynolds (5 years in the Air Force). We have always been so proud of him. November 30, 1946, he was married to Maryanne Tichacek of St. Louis, Missouri, and we have been blessed with three lovely grand-children — Marianne (we call her Missy), Terry and Jane. Missy is married to a fine young man from Nashville, Tennessee and that is their home. Terry is in his second year in Law School, and Jane is a sophomore at the University of Texas in Austin, Texas.

This is September and it brings with it (in most parts of the country) the first cool days, school, foot-ball games — and the burning of leaves! Nostalgia! Why is it that autumn produces such a tug on memories! Perhaps it is because growth and a summer are dying and the end of a life cycle is so visible. It is a beautiful death — red, yellow, brown and orange in the fields and forests. The fall season is ending and colder weather is coming on. The end of the year! One naturally looks back, all of which is good in our fast moving world, when so few of us take the time to remember the old days, the good friends, the great moments and the dear ones gone or far away.

I am dedicating these memoirs to my dear and devoted "Red" —

"I think that to have known one good man, — a man, who through the chances and mischances of a long life, has carried his heart in his hand like a palm branch, waving all discord to peace — helps our faith in God, in ourselves and in each other."

SMALL TASKS

Sometimes I grow weary of doing
My small, simple tasks every day;
Paring the apples for stewing,
Putting the dishes away.

I would go forth to a battle,
Or sail to the isles of the sea;
But no, I must help milk the cattle,
And cut lemon slices for tea.

I frown at the soup I am salting,
I mop up the floor with a sigh,
My steps grow rebellious and halting,
"Why bother with trifles?" I cry.

Then a picture comes to me and lingers,
And ashamed of the words that I spoke,
I see Jesus, with tired, careful fingers
Patiently shaping a yoke.

BLESSING

God keep thee when the sunset glows
Adown the golden west;
God bless thee when the shadows fall
And all the world's at rest!
God bless thee when the sunrise glad
Proclaims the bright new day!
At dawning or at evening,
God bless thee dear, alway!

TWO LOCKS OF HAIR

Two soldiers lay on the battle field
At night when the sun went down;
One held a lock of thin gray hair
And one held a lock of brown.

One thought of his sweetheart back at home,
Happy and young and gay,
And one of his mother left alone,
Feeble and old and gray.

Pale grew the dying lips of each,
Then, as the sun went down,
One kissed a lock of brown,
And on his dying day —
The other kissed a lock of gray.

THE LITTLE GIRL I USED TO BE

The little girl I used to be came along and sat by me
She wondered how I'd carried out the things she used to dream about.
I scarcely wished to meet her gaze and tell her of my present days,
She was so trusting and so very wee, the little girl I used to be.
"The heathen you were going to teach?" "Why child, I wouldn't dare to preach!"
"The pictures then, where are they now?" "I couldn't learn to draw somehow.
"The book that you had planned to write?" "I'll start that very book tonight!"
"Well, what," and in her eyes were tears, "What have you done with all your years?"
"Life is so different, child, you know, from all you dreamed it long ago.
Dreams are such quaint, elusive things — like star-light on an angel's wings,
I couldn't make your dreams come true for I had other things to do..."
I bent to hear what she would say but sadly she had tipped away
And nevermore was I to see the little girl I used to be...

Once upon a time, in Germany, long ago, a gentle mother was busily cleaning the house for the most wonderful day of the year, Christmas Eve, the day on which the Christ Child was to come and bring gifts.

Not a speck of dust was left. Even the spiders had been banished from their cozy corner in the ceiling. To avoid the housewife's busy cleaning, they finally fled to the farthest corner of the forgotten attic.

Christmas Eve came at last. The tree was decorated and the children were delighted. But the poor spiders were frantic, for they could not see the tree nor be present for the Christ Child's visit.

But the oldest and wisest spider suggested that perhaps they could peep through the crack in the door and see him. Silently they crept out of their attic and across the floor to wait in the crack on the threshold.

Suddenly the door opened a wee bit, and quickly the spiders sneaked into the room. The tree towered so high that they could see only one ornament at a time.

They scurried up the trunk and out along each branch, filled with a happy wonder at the glittering beauty. Every place they went, they left a trail of dusty grey web. When at last they had inspected every bit of the Christmas tree, it was shrouded in a dusty grey of spider webs.

When the Christ Child saw this, he smiled as he thought of the happy spiders seeing his tree. But as he thought of how brokenhearted the mother would be over the dusty tree, he reached out his hand and touched the webs and blessed them. They all turned to shimmering, sparkling silver and gold. The tree glistened in greater beauty than ever before.

And so it became a custom in the Christmas season to have a spider among the other decorations on the tree.

LIFE

Life is a burden; bear it,
Life is a duty; dare it,
Life is a thorn-crown, wear it,
Though it break your heart in twain,
Though the burden crush you down;
Close your lips and hide your pain,
First the cross, and then, the crown.

Father Ryan

O, what were life, if life were all?
Thine eyes are blinded by their tears,
Or thou wouldest see Thy treasures wait thee in the far-off skies,
And Death, thy friend, will give them all to thee.

TRUE STORY OF AN EX-SLAVE

Amy Millard Payne told this story of "Old Darky Banks," an ex-slave who worked for her father, Hobart. She, as a little girl, had two black dolls made of plaster of paris. One day she accidentally broke the leg of one of them. Darky Banks said to Amy, "All black men is 'white' inside."

As a young boy he lived on a big plantation in the South, and his parents worked in the cotton fields. It was his task to go into the fields every day to tell the workers when it was 12:00 o'clock noon. Because he shirked his duty several times in regard to this assignment, the plantation boss tied his two little fingers together behind his back. This punishment continued over a period of time until finally the joints grew rigid. Consequently, the two little fingers stuck out straight and stiff for the remainder of his life. He was 112 years old when he died.

PEDDLERS, TRAMPS AND HOBOS

The coming of the peddlers, in their colorful wagons, was an institution. They carried everything from needles and pins to watches and clocks. They made the "rounds" every spring. The housewives welcomed them because sometimes the peddlers had just what was needed to finish a dress or an apron.

One old peddler, Joe Barker, made his circuit on foot. He was poor and could not afford a horse and wagon so he carried his merchandise (notions) in an old black bag. The country women respected his age and were very kind to him. Invariably they bought some of his goods and oftentimes, if it were near meal time, invited him to partake with the family. The children, too, were glad to see him come — because it meant a display of goods which were a source of wonderment to them. The itinerant peddlers were always jolly, and furnished a bit of entertainment along with their wares!

Tramps and hobos were common in the early days and, as a rule, were not to be feared. For the most part, they were harmless men who had the "wanderlust" and simply wanted to see the country!

They rode the "rattlers," as the box-cars were called, and made themselves quite comfortable unless the train crew routed them out. As a rule the officials ignored them. Quite often the vagrants had money concealed in a leather pouch, worn under their shirts, and they were seldom molested.

One so-called tramp who made seasonal trips, stopped at the Erastus Osborn farm in Hamilton each summer, staying until the fall harvest was finished. His quarters were a small tenant house located in the back yard. He always came and went in a mysterious manner — usually at night and the family did not see him again until the following summer. This continued for a number of seasons and finally one summer he failed to return. Several months later his daughter, who lived in the West, wrote to the Osborn family stating that her father met his death accidentally, while attempting to board a freight train. The daughter related that he had traveled the length and breadth of the land.

One day a tramp stopped at the John Code home in the Code School District (home site of the late Floyd Mathias) to ask for a hand-out. Mary Code gave him a thick slice of home-made bread, spread thick with butter, which she found later — discarded in one corner of the yard.

Sometimes the tramps were surly or lazy and were not willing to perform any menial task in exchange for a meal. Chopping wood was the usual task requested by the housewife, but there were a few who evidently found this beneath their "station in life!"

The hobos were a fairly well-organized institution. They even went so far as to recognize a "King" as the head of their organization. A box car which was sidetracked in Decatur at one time, had "Diamond Jim, King of the Hobos," written on the inside wall.

In Decatur, they usually made their head quarters at Mud Lake — in a cozy hollow behind a very high bank. Here they cooked mulligan stew in their favorite utensils — tin cans. Sometimes they raided a farmer's chicken coop and came up with roast chicken minus the trimmings. It was a favorite pastime of the children of the vicinity to explore their campsite after they had departed and to kick apart the dead embers to see what they could salvage.

The hobos and tramps had a code which they all understood and they always stopped for a "hand-out" at the houses which were marked with the hobo sign. Hobos, like wandering "horse and wagon" gypsies are a thing of the past.

POPULAR SONG OF LONG AGO

THE TRAMP

I long for a place by the fireside,
The nights are so cold and so damp;
Many places I see, but there's no room for me,
For they call me a poor old tramp.

CHORUS:
Only a poor old wanderer,
With no place to call my own;
No one to pity me, no one to love me,
As friendless and sadly I roam.

Long ago I was peaceful and happy,
With dear loving friends ever near,
But now they are gone, and I'm left all alone,
With no one my pathway to cheer.

I tramp, tramp along tho' I'm weary,
No rest through the long, long day;
Through the rain and the snow I must tramp to and fro,
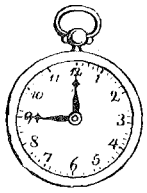
For I've no place to go or to stay.



THE SEANCE

According to my father, Charles A. Rosevelt, there was a great interest in Spiritualism among the pioneer families in Hamilton and Keeler Townships. Robert Nesbitt was a leader of this group. The following paragraph appears in Mr. Nesbitt's autobiography in the Ellis History of Berrien and Van Buren Counties, published in 1880:

> "Mr. Nesbitt is a well known advocate of the doctrine of Spiritualism and has devoted more than thirty years of his life to an investigation of the subject. He is a firm believer in the ministrations and manifestations of departed friends, and frequent meetings of those interested in the study of the doctrine are held at his home, and largely attended, prominent Mediums from this and other states being present."

My father mentioned several of the group who attended these meetings, including his uncle, Jacob Rosevelt, the Arthur Haydon family, the Hiram Bakers, Selah Conklin and a Kieth family. My grandparents were not regular attendants but on one occasion which my father remembered, he went with his parents to a seance when he was ten or twelve years old. The room was dark and everyone was very quiet. Apparently the Medium was successful and when the messages from departed friends and relatives began to come through, father was terrified and bolted for the door shouting, "Let me out of here!" Following this episode the seances continued without father or his parents.

A True Ghost Story

(As told by an old timer of Decatur, Michigan)

In an early day an old negro, by the name of Peter Manuel, lived north of Decatur near the Baptist Church. He drove a team of oxen and it was a well known fact that when he went to the village he stayed until a late hour. He was always "poking" along the road at 11:00 or 12:00 P.M.

In those days there were no radios, TV's, Jukeboxes, nor automobiles to amuse the young people and as a result, the spirited and mischief-making boys of the village made their own fun. Knowing well the nocturnal habits of the old darky, the boys decided to play a joke on him. The road which he had to travel was heavily forested on one side. The boys decided to make a dummy ghost and dangle it from a limb of a tree which branched over the road. As the oxen came plodding along to the darkest part of the forest, old Manuel suddenly saw the ghost swinging back and forth before him. To say that he was frightened was putting it mildly. The boys who were up in the tree, said that he took out his whip and lashed up the oxen. The beasts made one dive, tore out to the side of the road, and sheared off a white pickett fence which was along the road near the old Hobart Millard home.

The boys had their fun, and afterward avowed that they saw him turn white in the darkness.

THE SOVEREIGNS OF ENGLAND

This month England is celebrating the 25th anniversary of the reign of King George. Here is a list of all of the kings and queens of England brought up to date and rendered in rhyme:

First Egbert of the West Saxons governed the Heptarchy
Ruler of all of England from the North to the Irish Sea
Alfred followed Egbert and conquered the warlike Dane
And Edward his son was followed by the gallant Athelstane
After his death Six Boy Kings reigned, First Edward slain by a thief.
Then Edred, Edwy and Edgar and Eward who came to grief
Ethelred last of the Boy Kings was followed by Sweyn the Dane
Who came to conquer England when the Norse folk were slain
Cnut, Harold and Hathacnut and Edward Confessor appear
Then Harold son of Godwin who fell at Hastings drear.
William the First, the Conqueror brings England 'neath his sway
Then William the Red, Henry the First and Stephen's bloody day.
Good King Henry Second, son of Matilda came on
And was followed by Richard the Lion Heart and he by wicked John Third Henry and Edward Longshanks who warred with the stubborn Scot
Then Edward Second, Edward Third and Second Richard the sot
Henry Fourth of Bolingbroke and gallant Harry Five
Then Henry Sixth and trouble together began to arrive
For first it was "God save Harry" then "God save Edward IV"
Then "God save Henry Sixth" again in the desperate Roses' war
But Warwick falls on Barnet Field and Henry's race is run
And Edward IV resumes the throne to pass to a murdered son
Hump-backed Richard of Gloucester, Third of that ill-starred name
Red with the blood of Edward Fifth to England's sceptre came.
He dies on bloody Bosworth field and Henry Tudor's next
Then Henry VIII the Cruel and his son Edward Sixth.
Mary the Bloody then appears and holds the English rule
Followed by great Elizabeth and James the Scottish fool.
Then comes Charles the stiff and proud whose head rolls on the block
At the hands of the iron Cromwell spring from the common stock
Second Charles the dissolute and grim James Two are seen
Ere William and Mary of Orange sweep the court of England clean.
Then good Queen Anne and Four Georges brin' Britain fair renown
When William Fourth and Victoria come each to wear the Crown.
Edward VII in turn gives place to George upon the throne
"God save His Majesty!" I cry and so the list is done. 1,441

THE "MAUVE" DECADE

BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG

By Mrs. R.A. Ashley

It was just before the last fierce charge
Two horsemen drew their reins
With the touch of the hand and a parting word,
We never may meet again.

One had blue eyes and clustering hair
Nineteen but a month ago;
Red on his cheek, and down on his chin —
He was but a boy, you know.

The other was dark, stern and proud
His aim in the world was slim
He only trusted the more to those Who were all this world to him.

They had fought together on many a field,
They had rode for many a mile,
But never before had they faced the foe
With a calm and peaceful smile.

They looked into each other's eyes
With a sad and mournful glow;
The oldest one was the first to speak
Saying, Charlie, my hour has come.

We will both ride up yon hill together
But you will ride back again.
Will you promise a little trouble to take
When I am dead and gone.

There is a face lies next to my heart —
I will wear it in this fight —
With dark blue eyes and golden hair
And a face like the morning light.

Like the morning light is my love's fair face,
She gladdened this lonely life.
But little did she think of the cares of life
When she promised to be my wife.

Go to her Charlie, when I am gone,
Take back this fond, fair face —
Tell her, comrade, how I died
And where is my resting place.

Tears dimmed the blue eyes of the boy
His heart grew sad with pain.
I'll do your bidding comrade mine,
Should I ride back again.

But if you ride back and I am slain
Pray do as much for me.
For my mother at home must hear the news
Write to her tenderly.

One by one they all have gone
Til she has lost both husband and sons,
I was the last one to go, my country called,
She kissed me and sent me on.

Now she waits at home, a praying saint,
Her dear face white with woe
Her heart will be broken when I am gone,
I will see her soon, I know,

And then the order came to charge,
Then instant hand touched hand,
They rode along to the crest of the hill,
That brave and devoted band.

They rode along to the top of the hill
Where the rebels with shot and shell
Poured a volley of death into their ranks
And jeered them as they fell.

They gave a wild victorious shout
But their rights they could not gain.
And those whom doom and death did spare
Rode slowly back again,

Among the dead upon the field
Lay the boy with the golden hair.
And the dark stern man, who rode by his side,
Lay dead beside him there.

Now there is no one to tell to the blue eyed girl
Of all that her lover said.
And the anxious mother who waits for her boy
Will know that he is dead.

There is no one to tell of the last kind words
That were spoken to soften her pain
Until they cross over the river of death
And stand by their sides again.

A LOWELL MATTOX SQUELCH

Lowell Mattox was born in Berrien County and spent most of his life in Cass and Van Buren Counties. He has lived in and around Decatur for several years for the exception of a few which were spent in the woods of Northern Michigan.

He was a very good woodsman. A quarter blood Cherokee Indian, he is a self educated man full of vivacious wit and undaunted humor.

He worked at the Round Oak Company in Dowagiac around 1944. One of his very famous stories that took place in the factory was about a gentleman from Arkansas who was always bragging about the great things that happened in the South. Everything was better "down South" than it was up here.

This gentleman was blessed by the crew at Round Oak with the name of Blyville because he migrated north from there. (He was told it was a good thing he came from Blyville instead of Persimmon Ridge or Skunk Holler.)

Blyville always said the southern railroads were much better than any that he had seen up north. "Have any of you traveled on the railroads in the South?," the question was asked to a small group who had stopped for lunch. "I have," Lowell spoke up. "Well what did you think of them," Blyville replied. Lowell answered as follows: "We set out on our journey through the warm southern air and scenery that you would expect an artist would love to capture on canvass. All of a sudden the train slowed to a stop and there we sat. The conductor came along so I asked what the problem was. He assured us that everything was under control and as soon as farmer Jones finished milking "Bessie" his cow, we would be on our way again. Puzzled at exactly what the conductor meant I leaned out the window in time to see a cow crossways on the track and a weathered man setting on a stool milking the cow with the gentle ease as if he had done this hundreds of times before. When he had finished, the cow looked around at me as if to say thank you for waiting. We were then on our way again."

"I settled back in my seat and watched the plots of farm land pass by me as if we were traveling on a patch quilt. We hadn't gone but a few miles and we again slowed to a complete stop. It can't be another cow I thought. My curiosity was soon dissolved when we were told by the conductor that we should not be alarmed. We will be back on schedule as soon as a hen hatched the half-dozen eggs in her nest. You guessed it, the nest was precariously built between the rails."

"Our journey was again started and as we passed by the hen there were six small chicks scratching in the gravel along the edge of the track. The whistle of the train sounded as if to say, "toot toot you all" in real southern hospitality."

"I watched the telephone poles pass by one after another as if it were a never endless line. The rhythm of the rails clickety-clack, clickety-clack was a soothing sound."

"The clickety-clack grew slower and again we came to a screeching halt. The brakee came into our car and asked me if I had a piece of string. I didn't have a string but I asked him if a shoestring would work. He gladly took it and when the engine was repaired we were on to our destination."

Blyville's reply to the story was, "I don't like this!" "Neither do I" Lowell said, "I never got my shoelace back!"

But The Letter Edged in Black

I was sitting by my window yesterday morning
Without a thought of worry or of care
When I saw the postman coming up the pathway,
With such a happy face and jolly air.

He rang the bell and whistled as he waited,
Then he said: "Good morning to you, Jack!"
But he little knew the sorrow that he brought me
As he handed me a letter edge in black.

With a trembling hand I took the letter from him:
I broke the seal and this is what it said:
"Come home, my boy, your dear old father wants you;
Come home, my boy, your dear old mother's dead.

"The last words your mother ever spoke were:
'Tell my boy I want him to come back.'
My eyes a-blurr, my poor old heart is breaking,
For I'm writing you this letter edged in black.

"Those angry words, I wish I'd never spoke them,
You know I did not mean them, don't you, Jack?
May the angels carry with this I am asking
Your forgiveness in this letter edged in black."

I bow my head in sorrow and in silence.
The sunshine of my life it all has fled
Since the postman brought that letter yesterday morning.
Saying: "Come home, my boy, your dear old mother's dead."

A SWITCH

When Johnny Dragan attended St. Stanislaus Catholic School in East Chicago it was "spit and polish" every day for inspection — with a dark suit, white shirt and natty tie.

Later, when the family moved to Decatur, Michigan, Johnny was astounded and shocked to see Leonard and Neal Dillenbeck, as well as the other boys, enter the McWilliam's school garbed in well-worn overalls and with bare feet!

Had it been today, the faded overalls "bit" would have been accepted and approved.*

Our Way With Those We Love

There is one truth that I have learned in traveling east and west,
The folks we really wound the most are the ones we love the best.
We flatter those we scarely know,
we please the fleeting guest.
And deal full many a blow to those we love the best.

Milwaukee Fire, or the Burning of the Newhall House.

Words and Music by J.W. Kelly.
Copyrighted by S. Brainard & Son.

Send Fred Somers, 13 N. Clark St., Chicago, Ill., fifteen 2-ct. stamps, and he will send the Words and Music of this song.

'Twas the gray of early morning when the dreadful cry of fire,
Rang out upon the cold and piercing air;
Just that little word alone is all it would require,
To spread dismay and panic everywhere.
Milwaukee was excitied as it never was before,
On learning that the fire bells all around,
Were ringing to eternity a hundred souls or more,
And the Newhall House was burning to the ground.

CHOURS

Oh, hear the fire bells ringing at the morning's early dawn,
Hear the voices as they give that dreadful cry;
Oh, hear the wail of terror 'mid the fierce and burning flame,
Heaven protect them, for they're waiting there to die.

The fireman worked like demons, and did all within their power,
To save a life or try to soothe a pain,
It made the strongest heart sick, for in less than half an hour,
All was hushed, and further efforts were in vain.
When the dread alarm was sounded through the oft condemned hotel,
They rushed in mad confusion every way,
The smoke was suffocating and blinding them as well,
The fire king could not be held at bay.—Cho.

At every window men and women wildly would beseech
For help in anguish and despair;
What must have been their feelings where the ladders could not reach!
And they felt death's grasp around them everywhere.
Up in the highest window stood a servant girl alone,
The crowd beneath all gazed with bated breath,
They turned away their faces there were many a stifled groan,
When she jumped to meet perhaps as hard a death.—Chorus.

A boy stood in the window, and his mother stood below,
She saw him, and the danger drawing near,
With upraised hands, to pray for him, she knelt down in the snow,
And the stoutest man could not restrain a tear.
She madly rushed toward the fire and wildly tore her hair,
Take me, oh God, but spare my pride, my joy!
She saw the flames surround him, and then in dark despair
Said: "God have mercy on my only boy!"

Dodge Brothers Got Started in Bicycle Business

Began Producing Automobiles in 1911

Dodge was founded by two brothers who got their start in the transportation business manufacturing bicycles.

John and Horace Dodge left their native Niles, Mich., in 1899 to move to Windsor, Ont., to manufacture bicycles under the name "Evans and Dodge."

In 1901, the brothers, who with the help and encouragement of their father and grandfather became expert mechanics, moved to Detroit to become automobile parts makers. Producing axles, transmissions, steering gears and crankcases in increasing quantities, the company continued to expand rapidly.

The purchase in 1910 of the present site of the Dodge assembly plant in Hamtramck, Mich., established Dodge brothers as the largest automotive parts organization in the country. By 1911, the firm had built parts for more than 500,000 automobiles.

When the brothers decided to build an automobile bearing their own name in 1914, more than 22,000 firms applied for dealerships. On November 14 of that year, the first Dodge car was unveiled—a four cylinder vehicle which weighed approximately 2,200 pounds.

The Dodge immediately earned a reputation for amazing ruggedness and dependability. It achieved such feats as climbing higher up San Francisco's Twin Peaks than any other car of its day. It was the first car to be driven to the bottom of the Grand Canyon and then up the long ascent under its own power.

Since 1914, nearly 9,270,000 Dodge cars and over 3,169,000 Dodge trucks have been sold.

Gen. John J. Pershing used some 250 Dodges in his pursuit of the Mexican bandit Pancho Villa in 1915-1916.

Both John and Horace Dodge died in 1920, and the Dodge company was bought in 1925 by Dillon, Read & Co., [illegible] banking firm, for 146 million dollars.

"Goodwill" was carried on the books at $1, but the goodwill was so highly regarded that it represented 50 million dollars of the purchase price. The company had been operated by the Dodge heirs for the five years from 1920 to 1925 and administered by Frederick J. Haynes.

Dodge was purchased by Chrysler Corporation July 30, 1928 and made a division of that company. [illegible] became the basis of all Dodge operations.

In 1[illegible] the Dodge truck plant was moved to Mound Road in Warren, Mich.

At this year's show, Dodge exhibits include a 1917 model truck, two vacation vehicles or campers, and a dragster, or racing vehicle.

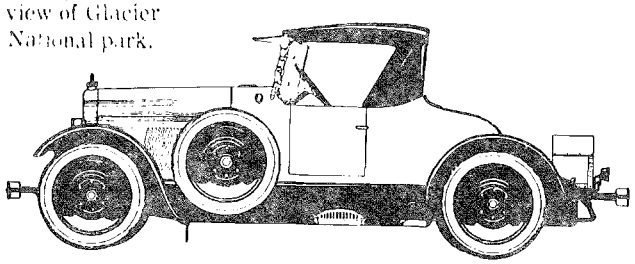
One of the [illegible] is a motor home displayed in [illegible] is [illegible] built on a [illegible] truck chassis, will be shown before a panoramic view of Niagara Falls.

The other travel vehicle has a camper body fully equipped for outdoor living and will be displayed in front of a massive view of Glacier National park.



A TRUE STORY ABOUT THE DODGE BROTHERS DECATUR, MICHIGAN

"Cast your bread upon the water and after many days it will return to you"

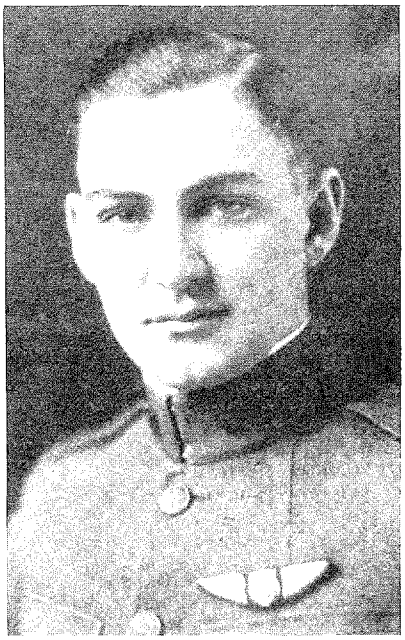
A very good example of the above quotation is found in this incident:

Many years ago in an old house between the Presbyterian and Catholic churches lived two middle-aged women. Their names were Mrs. Burlinham and Mrs. Rogers. The latter married the town banker, popularly known as "Banker Rogers." Mrs. Burlinham was a telegrapher at the Michigan Central depot in Decatur during the time when telegraphy was an important means of communication. These women were highly respected in the village and lived together for many years.

They had two nephews in a distant city who were orphaned at an early age. Those women, out of the kindness of their hearts, befriended those two young boys. They sent money regularly for their maintenance. As the boys grew to manhood they showed a marked aptitude and talent for mechanics, and while they were still young men, they worked in a garage in Kalamazoo. Later they drifted to Detroit where they started a shop of their own. From this small beginning they gradually enlarged their shop and ultimately became the manufacturers of the Dodge motor car. The fame and wealth of Horace and John Dodge grew. They eventually became millionaires and were known throughout the world. Both owned beautiful estates in Detroit and some of their descendants still live there.

"Kind hearts and gentle people" could be said about Mrs. Rogers and Mrs. Burlinham. For their kindness in befriending those two small boys, they were justly and generously rewarded.

Later on, each year, the Dodge brothers sent their aunts a bright new Dodge Sedan. Neither of the women could drive, so the brothers hired a chauffer for them. His name was Harry Johnson, who also acted as general errand boy for them. They enjoyed frequent long rides through the surrounding country. They were humble women who never expected to be rewarded for their benevolence.



CARL SQUIER

Carl Squier possessed that rare combination — brains, ambition, good looks and a scintillating personality. He was considered by many the handsomest young man in Decatur. Because of those qualities, he was readily accepted by the elite social group of the village. Needless to say, he was a great favorite with the girls and could have "squired" any of them.

Ruth Thomas, his childhood sweetheart, (from kindergarten up through the grades) was his choice. He courted her through high school and he was still her choice even after her college days at North Western University.

In Decatur, at the time, one of the "plush" events of the social season was the Fisher ball. Fisher was a big-name band of Kalamazoo and they were considered "tops" in dance music. Carl and Ruth were among the popular younger set who danced to their music. The dances were held in the village town hall — the most commodious building in the community.

Carl belonged to the Sigma-Phi fraternity, along with ten other young men about town. Each year they sponsored a fraternity play. The socially prominent young people were chosen to participate and the plays were always welcomed and well attended — in a day when radio and television were an unheard of form of entertainment. One of the main features of the evening was the entertainment between acts. Four boys — Carl Squier, Harry Pritchard, Chester Shoemaker and Arden Treat formed a quartette and gave a rousing presentation of the popular songs of the time. The boys were attired in ice cream trousers, black coats, topped with smart-looking straw hats (sailor style) and carried canes. Carl had a good singing voice, inherited from his father. One of the numbers they sang was "My Little Girl, You Know I Love You!" Carl had a broad smile on his face as he sang, and later confided to a friend that he was singing to his sweetheart, Ruth Thomas, who was in the audience.

Miss Thomas later contracted typhoid fever and died. She begged to see Carl before her death, but her father was adamant in his refusal to grant her request. The Thomases were one of the prosperous and affluent families of the village and her father had made the remark to a friend that Carl Squier never would amount to anything; therefore, he frowned on the friendship.

Carl was a motorcycle enthusiast and during his cycling days he had a miraculous escape in an accident on the neighborhood road. He collided with the horse and buggy, of a black woman who was driving to town and was catapulted over the buggy top, uninjured.

Some of his classmates and buddies were: Ivan Keyes (a neighbor), Harley Karnes, Pat Neville, Harold Lawrence, Harold and Leo Rose, Harold Hudson, Harry Pritchard, Chester and Harold Shoemaker, Ivan and Harry Genung, Carl Hamilton, Myron Hinckley, Dan Knight and Harold Lyle. The latter was his "nimrod" friend, and he spent many happy hours hunting and fishing on the Lyle farm.

Ivan Keyes and Carl were inseparable when they were young and both owned motorcycles. Both were dashing young daredevils with a zest for living! As they roared down the unpaved main street of Decatur they really stirred up a storm (of dust), followed by "Old Moose," a brindle bulldog, mascot of mainstreet, who always gave chase whenever they appeared.

Neighborhood sleigh-ride parties were a form of entertainment of that period. At the time, Carl was attracted to a neighborhood girl, Hazel Keyes, a very pretty golden haired blonde. Carl always managed to sit next to her in the bob-sleigh.

Harley Squier, Carl's father, operated a milk route and Carl and his brother, Paul, assisted him with the deliveries. The work was distasteful to Carl and he made the remark that it was strictly a job. His brother died a few years later.

At one time he courted the daughter of an Austrian diplomat. Her name was Vicki Vopica, and her father, Charles, while riding the narrow gauge railroad from Kalamazoo, Michigan was impressed with the beauty of Lake Cora, which could be seen from the car window. Mr. Vopica got off at the next station and returned to the lake. He bought lake frontage and later built an elaborate cottage among the trees. Carl was a frequent visitor on week ends.

While Carl was serving as Page Boy in Lansing, Michigan, he had the opportunity of meeting President Theodore Roosevelt. Carl contrived to get in the receiving line three different times to shake his hand. Finally one of the state officials called a "halt" to his maneuvers, explaining that three times around was quite enough for a fourteen-year old boy.

THE DISTANT STAR

Oh life I wonder what you are,
My spirit seeks some distant star.
Oh star I wonder where you be
And I wonder if you will welcome me.

When death shall close up both my eyes
And I wander off to distant skies,
Oh star will you beckon me
And give me light so I can see?

When I take my journey all alone
And for all deeds I shall atone
And be forgiven of all my sin
Oh star will you take me in?

Life has but a little span at best
With some joy and quiet rest
But some day I'll cross the bar
And wander off to some distant star.

Oh star that shines somewhere above,
Can I always be with those I love?
Be with them always over there,
Oh star can you hear my prayer?

My conception of eternity

HISTORY OF McWILLIAM'S SCHOOL

The red brick school house was built in 1886 of kiln 'run' brick from Decatur vicinity. The ground on which it was built was a part of the Alexander, and later, Jim McWilliam's farm. It was customary to name the school after the nearest neighbor, and Jim McWilliams owned the farm adjacent to it; hence its name! The McWilliam's family emigrated to America from Northern Ireland and one of the sons, Alex, had bought a large acreage in Decatur Township. The James Orr family (cousins of the McWilliams) came from Northern Ireland in 1891 and bought the Alex McWilliam's farm (now known as the Orr farm). Alex McWilliams then bought a wooded area of twenty acres directly across the road — which later became part of the farm owned by Ira Gould.

Isabelle Orr McLeese went to the red brick school when she was five years old — in 1892 — and her first teacher was Mable Willison. The other Orr children who attended school were: Anna Orr Wieman, Rev. John Orr, Robert, William, and Daniel Orr, and Margaret Orr Goodspeed. The McWilliams' children who attended, were: Harry and Alex McWilliams, Mae McWilliams Wiley, Ruby McWilliams Hinckley and Anna McWilliams Hinckley.

The Clarence Lindsley children who attended were: Charles and Ward Lindsley, Bessie Lindsley Stickney, Blanche Lindsley Hinckley, Florence Lindsley DuBois and Lora Lindsley McGowan.

The Oliver Lyle children were: Olive Lyle Slocum, Lena Lyle Rawson, Arthur and Fred Lyle. Other pupils were: Della Mabry, Leon Mahoney, Earnest Moss, Maude Canning, Hazel Millard Kelsey and Margaret McLeese Brigham.

The Mellon Bradley children were William Bradley, M.D., Gertrude Bradley Hamilton, Eva Bradley Scott and John Bradley.

The Michael Kelly children who attended were: Jennie Kelly Rapp, Annie Kelly and James Kelly.

Some of the pupils who attended the McWilliam's School circa 1908 were: Alice Worden Hallead, Bernice, Lessel and Elmer (Johnny) Worden, Roscoe Johnson, Helen Lindsley Rutherford, George Lindsley, Theodore Lyle, Gladys Lyle McAdams, Marian Lyle Stewart, Rev. Leo Lyle, Vivian Lyle Shyne and Thomas A. Howland, D.D.S.

The following were early teachers: Maude Place Skinner, Mable Willison, Jennie Simpson Lyle, Lena Lyle Rawson, Anna Pardonette Marshall, Mae McWilliams Wiley, Isabelle Orr McLeese, Anna Orr Wieman, Florence Lindsley DuBois, Jessie Spicer, Ethel Ray Eckler, Agnes Code Freinstein, Lila Bowman, Sarah Parmater Russell, Alberta Stockwell Johnson and Cora Cook Dwight.

An incident occurred at one time (call it a boyish prank if you wish), which resulted in near disaster. It happened, probably, in the late 90's. One of the mischievous boys, who wanted a "forced" vacation, tossed a can of kerosene into a hot stove. He attained the desired result. The stove exploded, but fortunately no one was hurt. Black soot covered the desks, books, walls — everything! School was closed while the hall of learning was being cleaned.

Jennie Simpson, who taught the school in 1891, boarded at the Storm's home (on the road now known as M51) and walked to and from school. A dashing young man of the community, who drove a high-stepping and spirited horse, offered her a ride one morning, as she was walking to school. She accepted the ride and, later, accepted him, William Lyle, as her husband. All of their children attended the McWilliam's School, and later, their daughter, Gladys, was a teacher there. At one period in the school's history there were thirty-five to forty students in attendance.

Others who taught the school were Adelaide Sherrod Toof, Catherine Howland, Mrs. Ballard, Lois Dobson Stockwell, Maxine Taylor Jerue, Ruth Alden Pollock, Hazel Udell Snyder, Dorothy Kinney Jung, Cheridah Graham Atwood and Dorothy Strawderman Anderson. The latter was the last teacher of the school, before the students were transferred to Decatur schools. The McWilliam's School was the first of the area schools to join the Decatur Public Schools (1938).

Many people believe that "bigness" exemplifies scholastic achievement; however, in many cases, the records of the Decatur High School indicate the superiority of the rural students. It is regrettable that the "so-called" progress of the present age, is responsible for the demise of the country schools.

McWILLIAMS SCHOOL TO BE SOLD

On October 24, 1952, a special meeting of the McWilliams school district No. 6 Fr. was called by the decision of the school board.

Moderator Douglas Orr called the meeting to order. The purpose of the meeting was to decide what to do about the McWilliams school house, which is falling into ruin. A motion was made by Dorothy Orr, supported by Robert Dillenbeck, that we sell the McWilliams school house and the site, if the site is owned by the school district. This motion carried by the unanimous vote of 15 members of the district in attendance.

Van Buren County School Commissioner, Mr. Elmer Van Dyke, was present to help in answering any questions involved in this transaction.

It has been found at the Van Buren Court House, Register of Deeds Office, Liber 66, Page 194. Date: April 16, 1884 from Abraham and Alice Powers to District No. 6. They only retained a rail fence.

The McWilliams school has been closed since June, 1941, and the 18 pupils are now transported to the Decatur public school.

A POEM BY CHARLES WARNER

The oldtimers in Cass county, as well as Van Buren, all know Charles E. Warner of Chicago. His ancestors were among the settlers of Volinia township and he was born there not far from the year that Lee surrendered to Grant.

J. E. Goble's story of the West Valley school brought this poem from Mr. Warner.

The Deestrict School

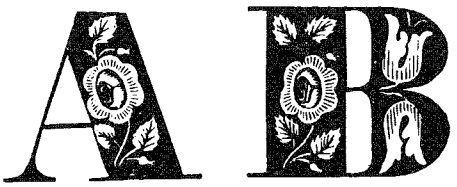
The dear old "Deestrict School," Jont., what memories entwine
About that country school-house with its rude and quaint design.
Its gables were not very high; its windows two by square,
And it was hard to find the paint, there was so little there.
It wasn't much for handsome, Jont., yet its memory we'll prize
'Till we can read our titles clear to mansions in the skies.

It has been sixty years, Jont., yes, and then some more,
Since first we wandered in and out the battered school-house door.
And still I see those wooden desks which some carpenter had planned;
Hand-carved by many a jack-knife in a roughish school-boy's hand.
And I've not forgot those benches, Jont., I know I never will;
Nor the slivers that went through my pants, "How sweet their memory still-"

I've not the slightest doubt, Jont., but you, the same as I,
Oft recall familiar things of those days so long gone by.
The old box stove; the four foot wood; the blackboard, two by six,
On which we worked, by Rule of Three, the schoolma'm's choicest tricks.
And when her back was turned, Jont., it was our schoolboy style
To shy a paperwad or two at the boy across the aisle.

We are in no hurry, Jont., to climb the golden stair,
And behold the wondrous beauty of the country "Over There,"
Of which such pleasing stories for ages have been told
About the walls of jasper and the streets of solid gold.
But when the time shall come, Jont., to learn the master's rules
I hope he'll put us in a class that went to "Deestrict Schools."

Elmer Goble of Chico, California, was a pupil of the West Valley school a half century or more ago and last summer when he was here he promised to write a story of his school days for the Republican. His letter is still coming. May we expect it soon, Elmer?



HISTORY OF THE ORR FAMILY

James Orr, son of James and Peggy McWilliams Orr, was born Oct. 25, 1853 in County Antrim, Ulster, Ireland. At the age of twenty, he came to Decatur, but returned to Ireland one and one-half years later because of the illness of his mother.

When he returned to Decatur, he was united in marriage Feb. 11, 1876 with Margaret Jane McLeese. They were the parents of seven children.

In 1891 the entire family came to the home north of Decatur, which had been owned previously by Alexander McWilliams, Sr. (cousin) who had retired at that time. Margaret died August 13, 1908 and James died Oct. 1, 1929. The farm is still in the Orr family, although the house burned in 1975.

THE OLD RED SCHOOL OF HAMILTON TOWNSHIP

In 1837 Mrs. Calvin Millard, who lived with her daughter, Mrs. John Bennett, taught an improvised school and Sunday school at the home of Mrs. Bennett. A lady teacher, Miss Litchfield from Pennsylvania, was brought into Hamilton shortly afterward, by Robert Nesbitt, to teach his children.

The first district school in Hamilton Township (#7) was the Red School, near Henry Colman's Tavern (later called Brown's Tavern), and it was built in 1837. In 1848, the second school built in Hamilton Township, was the Field.

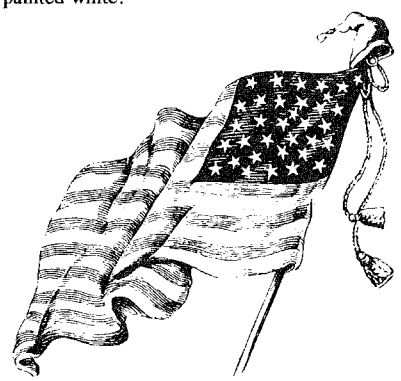
The Old Red School stood where the Barber School was later located, the latter having been built in 1887. Art Creagan states that his father, James Creagan, and Charlie Barber carted the lumber for the new school house from Hartford, after their regular day's work on the farm was completed. At that time the Red School was sold to the blacksmith, George Kidman, for the exorbitant sum of six dollars, and moved to the present site by the Decatur movers of buildings. It had served the community as a school house for about fifty years.

The blacksmith shop was located about a quarter of a mile east of what is now the Watson Store. George Kidman and his family lived in the old school house for a number of years. It was partially burned in 1974, and the portion which remains is a part of the house which now stands on the corner of Territorial Road and C.R. 215.

There were twenty pupils in attendance at one time. Some of them were: George Nesbitt of Decatur, Mrs. Cordelia Bartlett Bullard and William Bartlett of Hamilton and D.H. Briggs of Nebraska. The teacher was a Mrs. Craper, who was the wife of Dr. Craper. Strict adherence to the teaching of the three R's was in vogue at the time.

ADDENDUM

William Tuttle, who attended the Nesbitt school in 1858, (the same year in which it was built), refers also to the structure as that "Old Red School." This indicates that initially, it was painted red. (Red paint was cheap in the '80's.) For the past fifty years or more, it has been painted white.



THE OLD SCHOOL BELL

Sounding aloud on the clear morning air
Ding-dong goes the old school bell,
Over the country side it rings
The summons that all know well.
Trained to obey like an army comes
A garrulous, happy throng,
Shouting and laughing along the way
They respond to that great ding-dong.

Companion of school days the country o'er;
Friend that is staunch and true;
Sending your message from year to year,
Age old but ever new.
Clearly the message rings out on the air
While many responsive would tell
Of the memories they hear sounding loudly and clear
As they list to the old school bell.— M.F.

THE LITTLE RED SCHOOL HOUSE — REVISED

By: Millicaent Taylor
For the Christian Science Monitor
Oct. 30, 1947

The Little Red School House — in a modern version — may stage a comeback.

The one-room school that many a famous American can look back upon has in recent years fought a losing battle for survival under the consolidation program of urban organization. The children can get better teaching and more all around educational experience in the consolidated schools, is the verdict; so the big busses gather them up at the cross roads and trundle them to the nearest town, far from home and familiar environment. Something valuable is lost; this, most educators and parents agree. Now it is proposed in New York City to try to regain some of the valuable things about the little red school house — at least for the younger people. The Board of Education is considering constructing an outlying district of the Bronx, Brooklyn, Richmond and Queens "Home Schools" — little one-story buildings housing only the first four grades.

It sounds like a parent's wonderful dream. Johnny and Joan will walk to school. There in the low brick building set among trees and shrubs, with its safe well equipped playground free from the hazards of bigger boys and girls playing fast games, they will find everything to scale. Life can pursue the intimate leisurely, informal way so necessary in teaching little children. A group of first graders with their teacher can go outside to examine a cricket or see a bud unfolding. Third and fourth graders, needing freedom of movement indoors and out, will not be dominated by the presence of bigger boys and girls, whose learning has grown more formal, who are more self-assertive and whose play is faster and more highly organized.

Teaching can be more informal, home-like, and therefore more real to little children. Movable chairs and tables may be grouped at will for reading, for educative conversation, for quiet work, or even carried outdoors on a spring day. Parents will feel close to a little neighborhood school like this; will visit more often, make friends with the teachers, known much more about supplementing at home the work Johnny and Joan are getting at school.

The buildings can be put up far more inexpensively than in the case of those for older pupils, it is estimated. Stiraways, gymnasiums, lunch rooms, and shops are eliminated. The construction would be light, airy, with wide windows and pleasant home-like rooms. Later, if the school is not needed for younger pupils it can be made into an elementary school annex, a neighborhood center or a teen-age recreation spot.

Along with certain advantages afforded by the consolidated schools are the disadvantages of mass education and of schools located so far from the child's home and community that the learning experiences are divorced from home interests and too often not shared by the parents. The small neighborhood elementary school should recapture for little children the intimacy, informality, nearness to nature, and association with the home that once were at the heart of the better rural one-room schools. May this new and modern type of "Little Red School House" spread beyond New York into all parts of the land!

A VOICE FROM MISSOURI

I maintain that when we gave up all the little red schools and consented to consolidation, etc., that we were giving up to an oligarchy that would determine our way of thinking. Now that Catholic and private schools are closing by the hundreds, the pundits in the educational field are closing in on us. With all the high flown plans for education, the cry still goes out that Johnny still cannot read or figure!

There are several other items that raise my blood pressure too, like working mothers, ERA, inflation, hand outs in general, hospitals, doctors, and even used car dealers.

SCINTILLATING MELODISTS

CHAUTAUQUA

Chautauqua – (T'' – ken – chiata – kue'')
It is a Seneca Indian word and means –
''One who has taken out fish there.''

It started before the turn of the century. It was promoted by townspeople, who wanted to be entertained, and to be enlightened by musicians, lawyers, preachers, presidents and even magicians. One must go back to — no radio — no T.V. — no loud speakers!

It got its name from Chautauqua, New York — a town famous for its religious meetings and Evangelical camps. It was a cultural center and only people of prominence and high I. Q's operated the summer camps and services.

Gradually, the entertainment end came into being, and music and drama played a more important role. Thus the tent was brought into the picture, and Chautauqua was on the road.

THE TENT

The tent was probably 150 Ft. long and 75 Ft. wide, with three center poles and a kitchen on one end. The kitchen was the stage and was shaped the same as our stages today other than it was a part of the big top. Seats were either folding chairs or folding benches — made of duck cloth. A wall, of course, surrounded the big top, being about twenty feet from the main tent — this for ventilation. The big top walls could be rolled up and the outside wall prevented any outsiders from watching the show.

On a typical five-day Chautauqua, the circuit had seven tents and seven crew men who put up and took down the tents. At the end of the five-day run, the tent man had two days to get to the next town and get ready for the week's shows. This went on for a period of twenty weeks. The Chautauqua show started usually in June and ended in September.

THE TALENT

The talent was varied. Lecturers were such men as William J. Bryan, Howard Taft, Booker T. Washington, and many more. Music was — bands, quartets (vocal and instrumental), trios, Dua's and Quintets. Practically all of the musical shows doubled in brass — voice and at least two or more instruments. Later play companies were put in, as well as impersonators.

The afternoonshow would run one hour and fifteen minutes and in the evening the same music did a forty-minute prelude and then the lecturer would do his one to two-hour bit.

The talent traveled in Model T fords, and the jumps were short. I recall one summer where we played 120 towns in Indiana and Illinois — for example, Decatur today, Paw Paw tomorrow and perhaps Allegan the next day. In the various companies in which I worked, they were all males, so, we carried an army cot with us and slept in the dressing tent.

When Mrs. Beek and I worked the Beek duo, and our lecturer was Dr. Raymond Tolbert of Niagara Falls, New York, we stayed in hotels. I worked in a play Company in 1924 — (Six Cylinder Love). The company had two female roles and four male. I played the automobile salesman. We stayed in hotels and traveled by train, carried our own scenery, and played larger towns — Winona Lake, Minot, North Dakota and Ludington, Michigan — to name a few!

I find, in rummaging the old papers that from 1920 to 1924 I worked in eight different companies — all musical, except the Play Co. — both summer and winter.

In the winter season, it was Lyceums — one show a day (at night). Winter Bookings were all train travel. I find that the best winter Booking I had was with two good friends (both dead now) — The Buckeye Male Trio (1923-24). We opened in Sunrise, Wyoming, Oct. 2, 1923 and worked Montana, Washington, Idaho, Utah, Oregon, California, British Columbia, — closed, Thompson Falls, Montana, Feb. 8, 1924. Sunday nights were not booked but every other night was filled.

(The Beek Duo – billed as the Music Land Entertainers – also Beek's Music Makers)

In the fall of 1926 we had a booking with the Ellison White Bureau of New York. This was Lyceum and run from Oct. 8th to March 30th. We opened at Armada, Michigan and closed at Farmington, Michigan. This was all eastern states — West Virginia, New York, Pennsylvania — these and a few towns in Michigan. It was one of our best seasons. We played many towns on the Hudson River, private girls' and boys' schools, and we were well received. At one time we stayed two weeks in New York city and would go at night by train or subway to the date. We stayed in an apartment hotel and since our days were free, we could do the city extras.

We were then booked for summer Chautauqua with associates of Topeka, Kansas. By this time radio had been making a big inroad into show business. It was much harder to get bookings and the towns were further apart so that the jumps were hard to cover, often one-hundred-fifty miles and to do two shows a day and then drive to your next date was hectic and tiring. Seventy-five percent of roads in the west were gravel or shale. Tires were thin (had to buy six new ones) and brakes would go — because of the mountains.

We left Toledo, Ohio, May 7, 1927 and opened in Roswell, New Mexico — traveled twenty-tousand miles in twenty-five weeks, and played two shows a day!

Example: When we left, Mrs. Beek weighed one hundred eighteen pounds. When we finished, she weighed one hundred ten. We played in all the states west of the Mississippi except four, came back — played a few towns in Illinois and Indiana and ended the season in Kyrock, Kentucky in August. Could have booked another two seasons but had had just about enough! This was our last season!

IN CLOSING

I find that in 1923 I was in a concert band — fifteen fellows. We were booked to play Decatur (Chautauqua), the itinerary reads in part: LaPorte, Ind., Whiting, Ind. St. Joseph, Mich., Decatur, Mich. and Nappanee, Ind. That was the summer that the town of Decatur was quarantined with a fever of some sort, so the date was canceled. We were booked in La-Grange, Indiana, Aug. 10th and we, with the townspeople, paraded down Main St. with muffled drums and a funeral dirge. On that date President Harding was buried and this was a gesture from both the Chautauqua people and the town — in respect to his death.

As the Beek Duo, working the west-coast towns, we had long, hard jumps. One I recall! Our next town was 150 miles and part of the route was through the Redwood Forest. We finished our evening show and asked Doc to make his lecture a bit short so that we could do at least 50 or more miles before resting. The road was gravel but fairly good, until we came to a "Road Closed" sign, and a directive: "Use Logging Road." Well, we had no alternative; we took same and it was rough but passable. After a mile or so we came upon a creek (freshets). No bridge! You just drove fast and splashed through! We encountered two of these and finally came to a large one. Not only was it larger; it curved, and in the center it was necessary to make a left turn to reach higher ground. (Mrs. Beek was in the back seat at this time, crying, because she was homesick and tired.) Doc and I surveyed the situation — should we go ahead!! Finally Doc decided that he had better get out, find a pole, and test for depth (especially the curve). Well, good old Doc — he removed his shoes and socks and rolled his pants up to his knees. There was a large tree trunk that had toppled over just at the edge of the curve. Doc found a sapling, and using it as a crutch and also as a depth finder, crawled out on the old tree, to the spot where we had to turn. Of course he was in the glare of the head lights and the old tree trunk was a bit slippery. He proceeded with caution and tested at each two feet for the depth that we needed. He was only three feet from the turn when he slipped and down he went into the creek. He landed on his feet and then fell over to a sitting position. I felt sorry for good old Doc, and I apologized for laughing.

This was the only time in my life, when the female member of the Beek Duo (in the back seat), cried and laughed at the same time. Well, Doc had proved that we could make it through! We continued on and on! No sign of life — just the old logging trail! It was after mid-night — and we were lost! Another hour rolled by and finally we saw a light. We drove to a log house and went into it. An oil lamp was sitting on a home-made desk and there was a rack with keys. A sign under the lamp read: TAKE KEYS AND LAMP: GO UP STAIRS AND GO TO BED. SEE YOU IN THE MORNING. We followed directions! Got Doc settled and then ourselves!

Next morning we came down and had the best breakfast that any logger could wish for. This was a camp stop and they had food and ten rooms. It was clean as a pin. I paid our bill, night's lodging and breakfast — for the three of us — $4.50 (total). We made the afternoon show that day, but we were very pooped!! All a part of 'troopin'!

To those of you who have spent precious time in reading this nostalgia — hope I haven't bored you! It is just a true tale of Chautauqua, Lyceum and Vaudeville that all happened before and during — the roaring 20's

LET ME SING MY SONG

I shall not tarry with you very long
Nor shall I ever pass this way again.
So let me sing to you my little song
And so my best to ease and entertain
My fellow pilgrim, on the lonesome way;
To have him trust me to the very end,
And when I am gone, for him to speak and say
"I miss that man, he was my loyal friend."
To be a friend to someone is a boon
We cannot price or comprehend,
To walk with him is pleasant, but too soon,
The journey ends and friend must part with friend.
The time is short, so let me sing my song,
To comfort those who climb the mountain steep
To mingle with the weary, jard pressed throng
And scatter sunshine ere I go to sleep.

HOW THE GREAT GUEST CAME

Before the Cathedral in grandeur rose
At Ingelburg where the Danube goes;
Before its forest of silver spires
Went airily up to the clouds and fires;
Before the oak had ready a beam,
While yet the arch was stone and dream —
There where the altar was later laid,
Conrad, the cobbler, plied his trade.

It happened one day at the year's white end —
Two neighbors called on their old-time friend;
And they found the shop, so meager and mean,
Made gay with a hundred boughs of green.
Conrad was stitching with face ashine,
But suddenly stopped as he twitched a twine:
"Old friends, good news! At dawn today
As the cocks were scaring the night away,
The Lord appeared in a dream to me,
And said, 'I am coming your Guest to be!"
So I've been busy with feet astir,
Strewing the floor with branches of fir.
The wall is washed and the shelf is shined,
And over the rafter the holly twined.
He comes today, and the table is spread
With milk and honey and wheaten bread."

His friends went home; and his face grew still
As he watched for the shadow across the sill.
He lived all the moments o'er and o'er,
When the Lord should enter the lowly door —
The knock, the call, the latch pulled up,
The lighted face, the offered cup.
He would wash the feet where the spikes had been,
He would kiss the hands where the nails went in,
And then at the last would sit with Him
And break the bread as the day grew dim.

While the cobbler mused there passed his pane
A beggar drenched by the driving rain.
He called him in from the stony street
And gave him shoes for his bruised feet.
The beggar went and there came a crone,
Her face with wrinkles of sorrow sown.
A bundle of fagots bowed her back,
And she was spent with the wrench and rack.
He gave her his loaf and steadied her load
As she took her way on the weary road.
Then to his door came a little child,
Lost and afraid in the world so wild,
In the big, dark world. Catching it up,
He gave it the milk in the waiting cup,
And led it home to its mother's arms,
Out of the reach of the world's alarms.

The day went down in the crimson west
And with it the hope of the blessed Guest,
And Conrad sighed as the world turned gray:
"Why is it, Lord, that your feet delay?
Did You forget that this was the day?"
Then soft in the silence a Voice he heard:
"Lift up your heart, for I kept my word.
Three times I came to your friendly door;
Three times my shadow was on your floor.
I was the beggar with bruised feet;
I was the woman you gave to eat;
I was the child on the homeless street!"

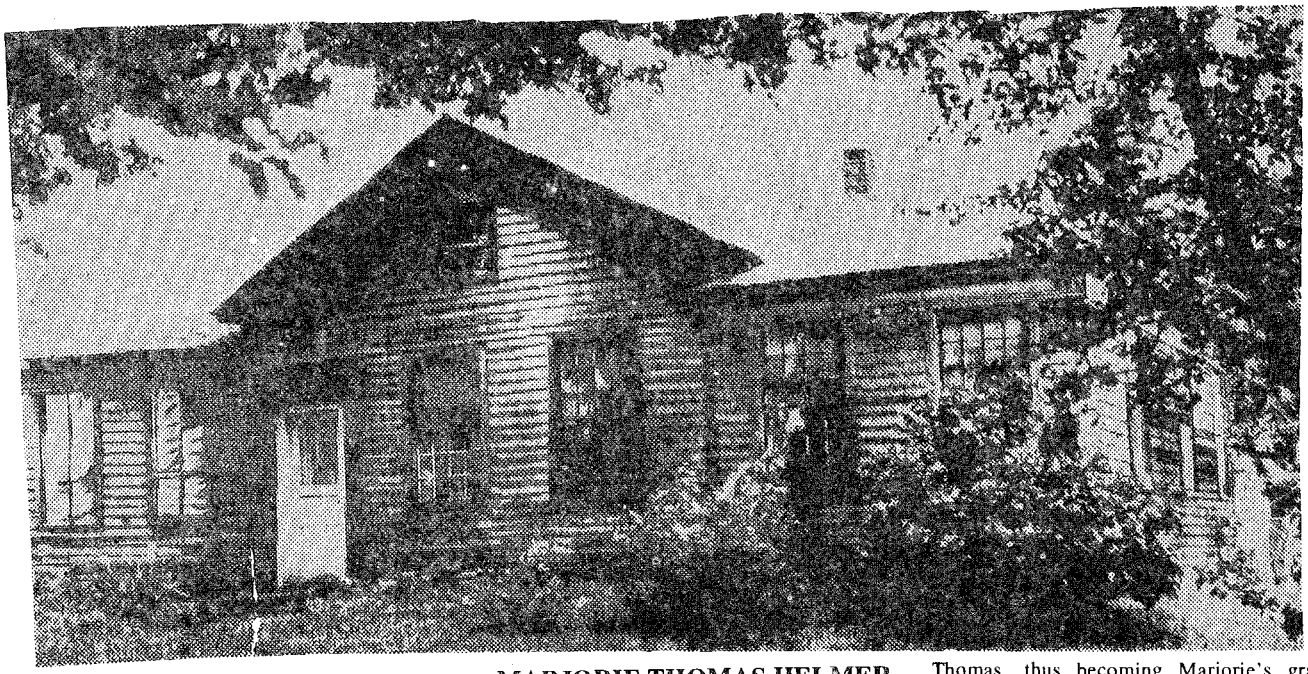
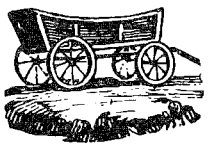
Schoolcraft Bicentennial Committee Purchases Dr. Nathan Thomas House



Underground Railroad

This was also the home of Dr. [illegible] became the first doctor in [illegible] County when he moved to Schoolcraft in 1832. The house was built on the underground railroad of the [illegible], [illegible] slaves in their flight to Canada. It is estimated that between 1[illegible] people found freedom [illegible] this house now in the process of restoration.



MARJORIE THOMAS HELMER

Our townslady and Decatur business woman of forty-six years, Marjorie Thomas Helmer, has an interesting family history in relation to the above article and picture. She and her brother, Maynard, were born in Volinia, Cass County. Her parents, Mark Thomas and Carrie Queal Thomas, later moved to Decatur.

Her maternal grandfather, Rev. Robert Queal, Universalist minister, came from northern Ireland to New York state. Later he moved to Tecumseh, Michigan, then to Decatur. He was retired from his pastoral duties when he came to this town.

Marjorie's paternal grandfather was Dr. Nathaniel Thomas. He lived on Little Prairie Ronde, and was a cousin of the Dr. Nathan Thomas of Schoolcraft. The latter administered to run-away slaves from the South during the Civil War. He later moved the "Underground Railroad" frame house, shown in the picture, to the back of the lot, and built a big brick house in its place. Marjorie enjoyed visiting there when she was a little girl. Aunt Pamela, wife of the Schoolcraft doctor, was the matriarch of the family and she was loved by all. She and the doctor raised a niece of Pamela's, by the name of Marcia Smith, who later married Nathaniel Thomas, thus becoming Marjorie's grandmother.

Marjorie graduated from Decatur High School and Western Michigan College. She taught three years in grade school, South Haven, Michigan, and three years in Grandville, Michigan. (Business Education). She also worked in offices in Grand Rapids.

Her brother, Maynard Thomas, and Guy Calbetzor were the first two rural mail carriers in Decatur (about 1901). For winter delivery the wheels were removed from the mail wagon and sleigh runners were substituted. The body was like a rectangular-shaped box with a small stove in one corner for heat.

Mrs. Helmer was a member of one of the four families who lived in close proximity on Little Prairie Ronde. Each family voted in a different township. They were: George Kern, Marcellus Township; Mark Thomas, Volinia Township; Dr. Nathaniel Thomas, Decatur Township; Willard Thomas, Porter Township.

Mrs. Carrie Queal Thomas, wife of M.S. Thomas, was born in New York in 1856, came to Decatur in 1872, and graduated from the Decatur High School in the class of 1875. She passed away August 8, 1914.

Dr. Nathan Thomas Replaced Old Slave House With Handsome Brick Structure.

MARJORIE THOMAS HELMER

By TOM DONIA
Gazette Staff Writer

SCHOOLCRAFT — A house that was used to hide runaway slaves before the Civil War has been purchased for preservation purposes.

The Schoolcraft Bicentennial Committee is currently completing final paperwork to buy the 140-year-old house built by Dr. Nathan Thomas. It is the only "station" in the "underground railroad" in Kalamazoo County.

The committee is paying $9,700 for the structure, which was moved from its original site in the 1860s. The Schoolcraft Village Council gave $1,000 toward the purchase price.

Committee members plan to ask for donations from local merchants to help pay the balance. In addition, they have asked the Michigan American Revolution Bicentennial Commission for state and federal funds.

Local citizens are forming a "Schoolcraft Historical Society," which will be incorporated in order to legally take possession of the house.

The society will be responsible for historic preservation and some restoration work. It has not been decided how the house will be used, but organizers of the fund drive say it will serve as a center for Schoolcraft's American Revolution Bicentennial activities.

The wood frame house was built by Dr. Nathan Thomas, the first physician in Kalamazoo County. He had come to Schoolcraft from Ohio in 1831 and boarded at the hotel which then stood in the village. He visited his patients by riding his horse to their farms.

Following two years of serious illness throughout the area, the busy Dr. Thomas decided he needed an office. In 1835 he built a 20-by-28-foot building on West Cass Street. A portion of the building he rented to a young man who was studying under him.

Two years later, he moved the house back farther from the intersection where it originally sat, in order to have a more spacious yard. The little building was joined by a new horse barn, all surrounded by a picket fence on Dr. Thomas's acre and a quarter of land.

When Dr. Thomas married the local schoolteacher, Pamela Brown, in 1840, the house was clearly too small for both of them. Up until then, the doctor had boarded at the hotel, but now he added two large wings to his house and took up residence there.

Dr. Thomas was a birthright member of the Society of Friends, the Quakers, and he was outraged by the idea of slavery. Ever since he arrived in Schoolcraft, he was the person villagers asked to help runaway slaves escape to Canada.

In 1843, a representative of the "underground railroad" asked Dr. Thomas if he would help blacks escape on a regular basis. Dr. Thomas quickly agreed.

From that time until late in the Civil War, between 1,000 and 1,500 fugitive slaves passed through the Schoolcraft house. They arrived on wagons, usually in groups of six or 12, from Cassopolis just before daybreak.

Dr. Thomas and his wife fed them breakfast, and they would sleep during the day in the barn or in the small loft of the house. At night, the Thomases again fed them, and they would leave under the cover of darkness for Battle Creek, or, if weather permitted, Marshall. Their final destination was the Canadian border at Detroit.

Running a station in the underground railroad was an expensive and sometimes dangerous affair. In 1847 slave hunters from the South came as far as Cassopolis seeking runaways. But a runner spread the word they were in the area, and Dr. Thomas was able to hide the fugitives in Schoolcraft's cornfields. There was never any violence associated with Dr. Thomas's operation.

After the war that freed all slaves, Dr. Thomas was ready to build a new house, one that would reflect his own elegant manner and the success of his practice.

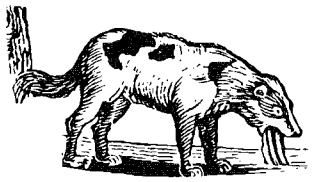
He moved the little house that had served as office, home and hideout for 33 years to a location down the street. It still stands there at 613 East Cass. Meanwhile, he built his large new brick home in 1868 on the original site of the wood one.

For the most part, Dr. Thomas's first house has been rented out for the past nearly 100 years. Only one of the two large wings is still attached, and that appears to have been altered in size.

Modern, wide aluminum siding has been applied over the original narrow wood siding.

The window that once gave the fugitive slaves light in the loft has been sealed up.

Members of the Schoolcraft Bicentennial Committee have not decided to what extent they will attempt to restore the house. But they say they will apply to have the home listed on the National Register of Historic Places.



THE UNDERGROUND RAILROAD

The Religious Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, is a world-wide community of Christians. Scoffers named them Quakers because they trembled at the word of God. The name "stuck" and became popular — even among the Friends. They are known for their traditional opposition to war, and for their humanitarianism. There is no division between clergy and laity and any man or woman has the right to preach. During the Civil War they were particularly active in opposing slavery.

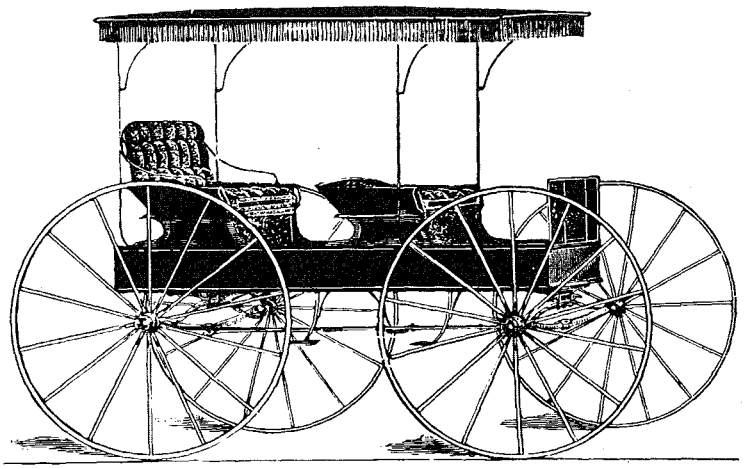
Their founder was George Fox of England, and the Society of Friends was established in 1652. At the time, they denounced both the Anglicans and the Puritans for their teachings.

As conscientious objectors, many Quaker young men refused service in World Wars I and II; however, many others accepted, and were staunch defenders of the colors.

Prominent U.S. Quakers include John Greenleaf Whittier, Lucretia Mott (great Quaker preacher and reformer), Herbert Hoover and Richard M. Nixon.

The mythical "Underground Railroad" was the name applied to the loosely organized aid given runaway slaves from the South before the Civil War. The Fugitive Slave Law of 1850 was deeply resented in the North. Many persons, particularly the Quakers, sheltered runaway negroes in their homes (attics-basements), barns, cornfields — anywhere to protect them from their southern pursuers. The Friends helped to pass them on to the homes of other sympathizers. Such homes were known as "stations." Sometimes the fugitives were hidden under a load of hay or in a false-bottomed wagon as they were passed along from station to station.

The Underground Railroad was effective both in the South and in the North, and it aided 75,000 persons to escape from slavery. The Cassopolis area was prominent for its Underground Railroad activities.



THE SURREY WITH THE FRINGE ON TOP

She was born and raised in the village of Decatur. She had no knowledge of horses! She had no liking for horses! In plain language, she was "plum" afraid of horses! Her inability to understand or appreciate the equine family was a continuing source of irritation to her spouse.

At one time, during her husband's absence from home, it was necessary for her to water the family horse. She stepped gingerly into an adjacent empty stall and offered the animal a stew pan full of water. She and her husband had moved from town onto a farm outside the village and now it had become imperative that she drive a rig, as a horse and buggy was called in the early part of the century. They had purchased a second-hand surrey but for some reason, discarded the fringed top. Her husband raised celery, so the surrey top was used as a protective shade, while the family weeded the tender plants in the celery beds.

This vehicle was the sole means of transportation for the family over a period of years. The children, who came along in due time, dubbed it "The Limousine" and many a jolly time they had as they jogged along. It served them well for transportation to the village and it also provided fun for pleasure jaunts. The "pleasuring" was confined chiefly to picnicking and swimming in the summer time and to nut gathering in the fall.

But time takes its toll of all things — animate and inanimate — and — the limousine was at last growing old! One day the farmer's wife "sallied" forth on an autumn afternoon to take her daughter, two sisters-in-law, her five-year old niece and a six weeks' old baby for a ride into the country past the Harrison cemetery. (Let me digress to remind you that there is more action, more comedy, more tragedy and more scandal in a small town than there is in the great city of Chicago!)

The day was beautiful, the "coach-woman" was inexperienced and awkward, the two ladies in the back set were oblivious to any impending danger, the daughter was complacent and the five-year old in the front seat was obviously enjoying the ride behind "Old Trix!"

Back in the '20's, people who traveled that back road will remember the sod ridges. The road was little traveled. Grass and weeds grew between the bumpy wheel tracks. The merry passengers had proceeded a mile or so and, as the sun was setting, they decided to turn homeward. Instead of driving into a farm yard to turn around, the driver attempted to "bring her about" over the sod humps in the road! Alas and alack! Came a loud crack! No one knew that the running board connecting the front and back seats had collapsed! "The innocents, knowing nothing — feared nothing!" A few more feet and the "ship" began to lurch! And she lurched! Slowly but surely!

The old horse stopped instantly to look around — just in time to see the driver, the five-year old and the daughter, slide out (slowly) between the wheels and onto the ground. It was such a slow descent, that the daughter, beleving the back seat joy-riders were intact, glanced back — but to her horror and utter consternation — beheld four feet, four legs and four underpants catapulting into the air, the aunt clutching the hapless infant to her bosom! How fortunate to have had such a docile, old horse. He just stood — turned his head — and looked! Presently from "aft" came a car! It was Dr. Bope! The unfortunates looked to the "fore" — and — lo! A car approached from the front! It was Wilbur Wiley! The men advanced toward the helpless victims, expecting to see some of them dead or dying! (The story was later circulated in town that a doctor came from one direction and an undertaker from the other.) Wilbur, in spite of the seriousness of the situation, could scarcely suppress a smile. He later remarked, "I've never seen anything funnier in my life! They rolled out of that buggy like so many sacks of potatoes!"

After the doctor decided that there were no serious injuries, he and Wilbur piled the wreckage onto the chassis (which was still intact) and the daughter climbed to a precarious seat on top and, to paraphrase Thomas Wolfe: Turned Homeward Angel!

Her father was just starting down the path, with the milkpail on his arm, when she hove into sight with the remains. He gave one disdainful glance and, as she drew nearer, inquired: "Who the h--- was driving!"

A few months later the five-year old was invited to ride in a new buggy which had been purchased to replace the old vehicle. The child knitted her brow and hastily replied, "NO, — I 'tood' walk!"

One of the passengers.

CROATIANS — DECATUR & PAW PAW

"When Croatian girls are singing
To the tamburizza's sound,
You hear ancient lays a-ringing,
Every eye casts smiles around."

Croatia and Slavonia were formerly a crownland of the kingdom of Hungary — one of the two main divisions of the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy. In 1918, on the dissolution of Austria-Hungary, the people of Croatia and Slavonia, with other Slavic peoples, formed the new nation — Jugo-Slavia.

The Croatians thought that money grew on trees when they first came to America about 1921 — but, as they discovered, only if nurtured by hard work. They have given a good account of thems3lves in this, their a-opted country. They have worked hard and have refused to accept welfare.

Men, twenty-one years of age were compelled to enter military service in the mother country; therefore, many of them left for other countries because of this compulsion. A large number went to the copper country in the Upper Peninsula to work in the mines. Others journeyed to Detroit and Hamtramck, Michigan to work in the factories. Some families went to Iowa and Missouri. Others went to Virginia and Pennsylvania (mainly, to work in the coal mines).

At the time of the strike in Michigan's Copper Country (1913), many came to the Southern Peninsula to buy farms. Margaret Mihelich Abshagen of Decatur was among them. She is one of fourteen children of William Mihelich who worked thirty years in the Calumet & Heckla Company in Upper Michigan. Mr. Mihelich died and is buried there. Others who came to Decatur and Paw Paw were: Kezerles (who came from Iowa to Decatur), Turks, Ozaniec, Markovich, Benesch, Benokovich, Kucinich, Delack, Oreskovich, Polanich, Malich and Sitar. Some other Croatian names are: Pribanic, Gojmerac, Srnec, Pocernic, Marinkovic, Eleyonich, Perpich, Ivelich and Blaskovich.

The 1913 Christmas Eve tragedy was the saddest day Michigan's Copper Country has ever known. It was a Christmas Eve party for the miners' children. There had been poverty and strife for five months since the miners' strike in July. The Women's Auxilliary of the Western Federation planned a big party — and then an unknown man yelled "FIRE" and seventy-five lives were snuffed out through suffocation. There 'WAS NO FIRE!" It was a terrible price to pay for one word shouted by an unidentified man.

The Croatians are fond of parties and holidays which they celebrate with music and dance, wearing colorful costumes. Their national dance is called Kolo, meaning "wheel," and it is similar to square-dancing in America. Their national sport is soccer and like Americans, they are fond of outdoor barbecues and picnics. Some of their favorite foods are janjetina (barbecued lamb), zelja (sauer kraut), povatica (walnut roll), strudel (apple or cottage cheese), palacinke (thin pancake — with filling of cottage cheese, egg and cream), sarma (stuffed cabbage).

The tamburitza is the national instrument of Croatia. Internationally famous are the Duquesne University Tamburitzans. Under the sponsorship of the Croatian Cultural Society, the Tammies are a collegiate group of forty highly talented folk artists, dedicated to the preservation of Slavic folk arts in the United States. They present concerts throughout the country — with singing and dancing.

The tenth annual Tamburitza Festival was held at Zagreb, capital of Croatia, in June, 1976. A side trip was taken to the shrine of Marija Bistrica. It is to Croatians what the Lourdes Shrine is to the French Catholics. Croatia is predominently Catholic, while the southeastern part (Slavonia), is Orthodox Catholic, similar to the Greek Orthodox religion.

At a Croatian wake the mourners remain all night with the corpse, and the next day, at the funeral, the procession, accompanied by music, usually a band, proceeds from the church to the cemetery.

Eileen Helen Zadravec of Youngstown, Ohio, is a Happy Hearts Tamburitzan's alumna. She entered the Tamburitza cultural field at age of nine. Her well-known mother, Angie Zadravec, directs the Happy Hearts Tamburitzans. Miss Zadravec played professionally for seven years with Libby's All-Girl Tamburitza Orchestra of Campbell, Ohio and is presently affiliated with the Rich Krilich Tamburitzans of Akron, Ohio.

The Croatians have many famous scientists. Vladimir Prelog received the Nobel prize in Stockholm, Sweden, for his work in chemistry. Thomas A. Markovich, registered engineer of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, manages Yogoslav nuclear project. Nikola Tesla (born in Smiljan Lika, Croatia, 1856, and died in 1943), was a Croatian — born, the son of a Serbian orthodox priest, and was honored with a statue at the foot of Horseshoe Falls (Goat Island), Niagara. Tesla's greatest triumph was — that he harnessed the might of Niagara Falls, and gave to mankind the many benefits of the alternating current principle which T3sla developed. The principles have remained unchanged since Tesla tapped the power of th3 Falls in 1895. He patented more than nine hundred inventions which could have made him the richest man in the world. He died a pauper in New York City. Croatia has enriched our culture with many more brilliant men who have made outstanding contributions to science and to the arts.

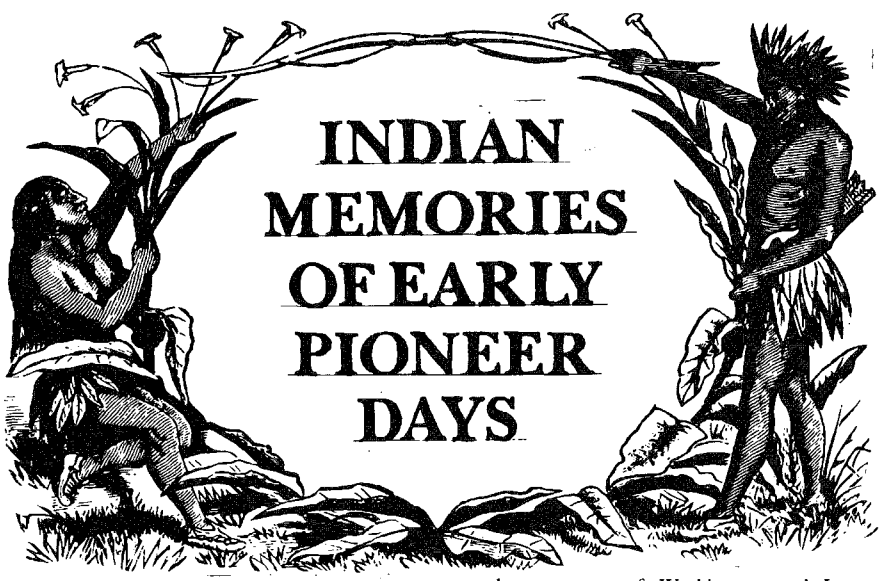
This is how a minister translated the 23rd Psalm in San Francisco:

Science is my shepherd, I shall not want. It makes me to lie down on foam rubber mattresses; it leads me on four-lane highways; it leadeth me into the psychiatrist's office for my ego's sake.

Yea, though I walk through the valley of the hydrogen bomb, I will not fear it, thy jets and atomic bombs comfort me.

Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of the world's billion hungry people; thou anointest my head with home permanents; my alcohol cup runneth over. Surely pensions and social security shall follow me all the days of my life and I shall dwell in the old folk's home forever.



The John Jones Story

John Jones was born in Wales on October 3, 1807, and died at his home in Sanilac County on November 29, 1897. His grave is in the Washington Cemetery, about a mile west of his old home.

The manuscript from which this story was taken was written by Mr. Jones in 1890. Mrs. Madeline Felker, his granddaughter, who lives near the old home owns the original manuscript.

The first survey of this part of Michigan was made in the year 1834 by a party under the direction of Captain Harvey Parke. This survey was made to establish the exterior lines of the townships north of Town 9 N (now Galbraith Line) and as far west as the east boundary of Lapeer County. This work was urgent as the sale of public lands was becoming big business and Michigan was about to become a state. Captain Parke's record of the survey and of the difficulties he encountered make interesting reading.

When John Jones first hunted in Sanilac County in 1835, Captain Parke's markings were fresh and could be easily located. And the records of these two ventures one in 1834 and the other in 1835 give us an authentic description of early Sanilac before the white man came.

Add to this the records of Oliver H. Perry's hunting trips through Sanilac County in 1850 and 1852. We are very fortunate to have all these.

The reader of this story will bear in mind that when Mr. Jones mentions Sandusky he means Sandusky, Ohio and when he mentions Watertown, it alludes to the city of that name in the state of New York.

There were no Indians living in Sanilac. Both the Canadian Indians and those living along the Saginaw River hunted and fished here. All of the Indians that Jones lived and travelled with were Canadian Indians. The farm he worked on in 1835 was near Sarnia, Ontario. There were no elk or deer near there at that time, so the Indians crossed the St. Clair River to go north and hunt in the swamps of Sanilac County.

Jonathan Burtch was an early settler in St. Clair County. He built a sawmill at what is now Burtchville Township.

George Pack owned Pack's dam and Pack's mill on the Black River (1855-1875). His son later built Pack's dam on the AuSable River.

In the twenty-second infantry records, Mr. Jones' birthdate is listed as October 30, 1817. This would make him 45 when he enlisted. He was actually 55 years old in 1862.

The John Jones' homestead was two miles south and one mile east of Carsonville or on the northeast corner of Washington and Loree Roads.

John Jones joined the Masonic Lodge at Port Sanilac on April 1, 1879.

He was supervisor of Washington Township for 12 years. He was elected eight times before the Civil War and four times after the war.

Record of John Jones Written in 1890

I was born on October 30, 1807, in a farmhouse near the seashore on Cardigan Bay (Wales). Every schoolboy should know where that is. I was sent to school when I was young. The farm was a mixed farm, the same as I have now. My father said, "John, I want you to herd the sheep today." Maybe the next day he would say, "John, I want you to herd the cattle," and so on and maybe the next day, "I want you to take care of the bees." My father also had a share in a fishery on the bay. I learned to make all kinds of fish nets and mend them. When I got older, I went to work on one of the fish smacks. They were something like a pilot boat and were out in all weather on the rough coast.

I was not satisfied. I went to work in a market garden in the city of Bristol. When I learned the business well, I left to go to a nursery where I learned to graft and other things. And besides that, I was a good shot with a shotgun. I mention them all because they all became useful to me in America.

On March 1, 1835, I left Liverpool on the ship ALBION and landed in New York on April 14. When I landed in New York, the talk was about Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan. I bought a map of Michigan and that was a great help. I came to Detroit in May. Michigan was a territory then and Detroit was a muddy place. I helped the French to pry the carts out of the mud in the best streets of the city. I found out that old Mr. Campau was the owner of the most part of Detroit and Belle Isle. I got acquainted with a fur merchant. I helped him pack fur. I found the Indians handle the fur better than the white man.

I saw some large horns there. By putting the points on the ground, a man can walk under them. I asked where the animals live. He said there were lots of them within a hundred miles of Detroit. I asked him where and he said, "north of Port Huron."

I thought there was no rest for me till I saw them. He said, "if you want to see Indians, it would pay to go to Malden (near Windsor, Canada) where there were a good many thousands of them to draw the presents from the Canadian government."

They were Canadian Indians. I went the next day. I never forgot the sight. They came around Lake Huron and across somewhere at Mackinaw Straits. The trail could be seen for ten years after. They never came again. The government wouldn't let them. They told me they were the Sioux tribe.

Then I came back to Detroit. Then I went up the river on a scow. The scow was from Sandusky, Ohio, and the captain wanted me to stay with him all summer and make him a seine in the winter. He got me to partly promise to make a net in the winter. He said Sandusky was a good place for fishing.

They were going up for shingles. We went across Lake St. Clair and we stopped at Algonac. It wasn't much. I don't think I went ashore. Then we went up the St. Clair River. We passed a house and the captain said a man by the name of Westbrook lived there. He owned a great tract of land on the river that he got from the government for his services in the war. "Well," I said, "he must be a happy man." They said he is not. He is afraid for his life everyday. They said if they catch him in Canada, he will never come back alive.

We went to Newport, now Marine City and then we went back to Port Huron. It was only a small place. I asked the landlord about the animals with big horns. He said he saw the Indians with such horns and if I wanted to know where they were, I must see Mr. Jonathan Burtch. He lived seven or eight miles north of Port Huron on the banks of the lake (Huron). He had some Indians at his place. I asked him some questions about the Indians. He said the government had them move off some time ago except one Indian. He was in the swamp about one year when he found out that nobody would molest him. He came out then once in a while. He said those Indians you see in Port Huron are Canadian Indians. They go at times up to the swamps to hunt. I asked him if any white people go where the moose and elk are. He said, "no, unless they want to get away from the sheriff and then steal a boat so they can go out on the lake."

I stayed at Port Huron for a while and worked. I tried to make friends with the Indians, but I could not.

Sometimes I would rise early in the morning and go to the river with a troll or a minnow on a hook and throw it out in the river as far as I could. Sometimes there would be a pickerel on the hook before the line was out. They would weigh from one to seven pounds.

There was a man and his wife come with butter to the house where I was boarding. Sometimes the woman would come with a squaw to carry the butter. One day the landlord asked me if I ever worked on a farm. He asked me if I could stack hay. He said there was a man there who wanted a man to stack hay. He said he was a good, honest man and if I made a bargain with him, the man would pay what he promised. I went with him and his wife about a mile to the bank of the river. Under some bushes there, he had hidden a bark canoe. It was not very large. He told me to get into it and sit in the bow. When I stepped in, I thought it would pitch me out. Then I sat down in the bow, his wife in the middle, and he stood up in the stern and paddled. He made it spin across the St. Clair River.

This was the first time I was ever in a bark canoe. I had been in a Welch carrock. Some people might want to know what a carrock is like. Take a fat goose and cut his head off and see the body go up the river, tail foremost. The man sits in the middle of it with his face to the tail and his paddle in the water and paddles tail foremost. They use them in salmon fishing. There are two carrocks that go out in the river. They have a net about six rods long that they drag with a strong current. One has hold of one end of the net and one has hold of the other end. When the fish run against the strong current, they strike the net. The men feel it and raise the net up and the fish is between them as if it were in a bag. They go to shore and every man takes his carrock on his back. A big man must have a big carrock and a boy a small one.

The Indians value a bark canoe very highly. There is much labor in making one of them. They are made like a basket of Norway pine roots and covered with white birch bark and the bark is fastened with splints and then pitch. I saw some of them carry 15 Indians.

My friends and I landed at last and two Indians came down to the bank and commenced to talk. I found my friends could talk with the Indians. They carried the canoe up the bank and let it down by the wigwam, bottom side up. I went home with them and found they had a nice, little farm. I worked for them on the farm.

One day he came to the house and said to his wife, "I think the Indians are going to have a dance on our flats." She said, "what makes you think so?" "The Indians are coming from all directions and are stopping on the flat by the spring," he said. It's strange as we don't get an invitation was her reply. The man turned to me and asked if I would like to go to an Indian dance. I said, "yes." The woman told me I would have to act like a gentleman and if I acted rough, I would never to invited again. "You may think they are all drunk, but they are not. There will be one old squaw there and she will watch you as closely as a cat watches a mouse. She is the governess that night and she will hide every gun and knife so the Indians will have nothing but their fists to fight with. You will know the old governess by a big bunch of beads hanging on her breast. They call it wampum."

I asked them what tribe the Indians were and they said they were the Chippeways. The coat of arms was the turtle. If you ever go in the woods and see a turtle cut on the bark of a tree, that is their hunting grounds.

Two squaws came to the house and said they were going to have a pow wow and they said they wanted them to come. The man said, "this man is a brother hunter and would like to come." The squaws looked at me and laighed and said, "he may come too." The woman said, "it will be something worth seeing. I have only seen it once before and it will be a wonder if I ever see it again after tonight."

I asked what it was the woman said. The Indians believe that a witch or wizard has bewitched one of the tribe, an Indian, or a squaw. They go through such a performance so that the witch or wizard will die in less than a year. You will see it all.

That evening I went with my friends. The woman introduced me to all the squaws, young and old, and said I was her brother and had just come across the big waters. Also that I was a good hunter and could catch fish and that I had a blanket and no squaw. The man introduced me to the Indians as a brother hunter.

The camp had a large wigwam covered with bark. In the middle was a little fire and an Indian lay with his feet to the fire. By his side lay an otter skin well stuffed. After a little, the music commenced. The drum was two or three feet of hollow log with a piece of moose or elk skin on it after taking the hair from it. He did make a noise like a big bass drum and some shot or shook gravel in a gourd. When the music commenced, they danced around this man and every time they came near him, they took up the otter skin, pointed it at the man and said, "boo," and put it down. The Indians got tired of dancing around the sick man.

They had some refreshments of corn and venison and some whiskey, but little. In the morning they went to the edge of the woods and cut the likeness of an Indian on the bark of a good-sized beech tree. The Indians stood about four rods from the tree with a small bow and arrow with the shape of a turtle on the bow. The Indians think those bows are sacred. They walk to a certain place and shoot at the likeness on the tree. Then they cut four poles, four or five feet long and drive them in the ground in the shape of the four points of the compass around the tree. Then they took the bark of the poles and painted them red. They girdle the tree below the likeness. The witch or wizard will die when the tree dies. They all went away. I saw some of the squaws and they said they were going up the lake in a big canoe to peel some white birch bark to make sap troughs and wanted me to go along. I thought the best thing I could do was to stick with them till I found the best hunting ground.

I went with them. We had three canoes to carry the Indian squaws. We went up the lake north of Burtchville and there was a big grove of white birch. They said this was the best time of the year to peel bark. They pick all trees of the same size and take only the thin layer of bark on the outside, a little thicker than a sheet of brown paper. I asked an old squaw how to make a sap trough with them. She took one of them and doubled the end of it, made a little hole in it and put a string in it, tied it across the top and on both ends. The trough would hold eight or nine quarts and last many years.

One Indian and I walked back to Port Huron. He told me after they take care of the corn they were going to hunt. I asked him where and he pointed north and said in the big swamp. I went back to the farm. It was not long before two squaws came and said they were going to have a wabanow. That was a dance. They wanted us to come the next day. The Canada lady friend said, "the squaws took a great liking to you. I warn you, they try to get you drunk and marry you to a squaw." She said, "if you won't live with her, the old squaws will have revenge on you." "Well," said I, "how will I manage it?" "well," she said, "I think you licked enough of the blarney stone to manage that." "Well," said I, "I should like you to tell me how to manage that affair if you were in my place." She said, "it should be simple enough. When the old governess shows you a pretty squaw, you say, 'Mother, you take a great interest in me. I don't want a squaw yet. I don't know where the hunting ground is. I don't know how to make a wigwam' and hand her a present. A little silver coin will do and put your face close to the old squaw's ear and say, 'Mother, don't you think you will have a nicer one bye and bye?' and thank her for her advice and ask what sort of a performance the Indians have in their wedding." The woman laughed and said that a wedding with the Indians is very simple. Let me warn you, they don't want a gentleman with a white shirt over his pants, nor a gentleman with a big cross over his back. The old governess puts the bride and groom on a pole and the Indians dance around them. And the more whiskey they have, the more they dance.

We went to the parting dance. The man said he was not well, but his wife said, "I want you to see this feast again and it may be a chance that you will never see another. But I must warn you again that when you are there, you must do as the Romans do." The man said he would come later on.

Supper was the first thing. The hunters all sat down with the chief at the head of them. I was among them, but the squaws were not. There was a big roasted raccoon put before the chief and he cut off one hind leg and drew it through his mouth and handed it to the man on his left and at last, it came to me. I wished then that I was away somewhere else, but I had to go through the same performance. The meaning of all this was that if I would not lick the coon's leg, I wished them bad luck in the winter's hunting.

After the dance commenced, the old squaw pointed to a young squaw who was very nice. I went to her and told her the same lingo as the woman told me to and I gave her a half dollar. That filled her eye and the old one said that maybe a nicer squaw would come after a while.

The next morning the Indians were all up and moving and going in all directions. I was to join the party that was going across the river to the swamps as they called it.

My Canada friend was raised in the woods and his father was an old trapper. They fixed me up with everything I could carry that would be of any use to me. They laughed and said, "it won't be long before you will be back from this tramp." We started across the St. Clair River and went up the lake shore till we got near the county line by my map. Then we went to the Black River and up the river. The Indians scatter on both sides of the river to hunt. I kept with the squaws. I was afraid of getting lost. After a while, we heard a shot and the squaws stopped. We heard another shot and after a little, two Indians came in with a small deer. The squaws skinned the deer and cut it up with a knife. They were very careful to save the brains. We started again and went up the river until we were somewhere not far from where Croswell now is. Then we went across Black River and went west or northwest a mile or more and came to some old camps. Then we stopped and I saw an open place at a distance. The squaws said it was a cranberry marsh and to come with them. It had a good crop and we picked some for supper.

The next morning we started again, but some of the squaws and Indians stayed in the old camp. We went north and travelled all day. Just at night, we came to an old camp. I must describe this camp because it was near the center of Sanilac County. There was a big marsh on the east of the camp. I told one of the squaws that the water was bad and it would make me sick. She said, "I know where there is good water and I will go with you." She said, "you take your gun." The squaws were beginning to think something of my shooting. The dogs would scare some partridges and they lit in the trees. I would shoot them in the head every time. The squaw and I took a birch pail and went west. I saw a mark on a tree TOWN 12 (this territory had been surveyed the previous year, 1834, under Captain Harvey Parke and all township lines had been blazed on trees). We found the water. It was a well and the quicksand came up with it. I tasted the water and it was sweet and good. A short distance away was a tree blazed T 11.

This was the best spring water I found in the swamps of Sanilac County. There were plenty of springs along Black River and Elk Creek, but the water had a sulphur or brackish taste.

That day the Indians killed a big cow elk. They skinned her before I saw her. I went with the squaws to pick cranberries. One squaw laughed and said, "I wish you would kill an elk with big horns before the Indians do." She said, "we told the Indians you shoot more ducks and partridges and shoot them all in the head. If you go and stop right near the river you will hear the voice the elk makes. It is not like a dog's voice nor like a horse's voice. You must be up early. Indians sleep late in the morning."

I asked her how far it was to the river and she held up her hand and showed me four of her fingers and said so many miles. I ask her which way and she said, "me show you, come with me." She took me to the line on the trees. I found that it was the line that I saw when going after the water. When I went back to the camp, one squaw was taking the hair off the cow elk skin and the grain with it. They said they were going to make some moccasins. I took the pail and went after water. When I came to the tree that had the mark on it, I stopped and took out my map. Then I remembered that when the fur merchant gave me the map, he said, "it is a map of the place where the moose and elk are. Don't lose it, I may want it back." I said that maybe we'd never see one another again. He laughed and said, "there is too much of John Bull in you to want to sell your fox skins there." I had the whole map of St. Clair County which took in those days all of Sanilac and Huron. I had a compass the Canada man gave me. Then I counted the miles to the lake, just fifteen. I could go to Port Huron in a day and a half that way.

A squaw came to look for me there and I told her there was no need for them to look after me, that I could go anywhere. That mark on the tree told me I was fifteen miles from Lake Huron. They never looked after me again.

This camp was near where the court house is now (Sandusky, Michigan).

I took my gun, blanket, and hatchet and travelled east through the cranberry swamp. In about half a mile I came to some scrub cedar. It was white cedar. I never did see any red cedar in Sanilac County. I followed the line and after a while the land got higher with timber on it that I never saw before. It was about 30 feet high and very thick and appeared to be evergreen. White moss hung from the tops like ribbons, six and eight feet long. They told me afterwards that it was black spruce. When I went a mile I found the section corner. About three quarters of a mile further I found a pine ridge. The pine ridge was about forty rods on the line east and west. After I went through the pines, I found a section corner. Another mile east at the edge of the dry land, I found still another section corner.

I should not say much about it except Sanilac County has had a great history. This was in the fall of 1835 and in the fall of 1850, it was all burned and came up in low bush huckleberries. I took a pole and shoved it in the bog 15 to 20 feet. It burned again in 1871 and again in 1881. There were about seven sections in this swamp or bog.

I got to Black River and prepared a place to spend the night. It was the first time that I was alone in the woods. The Indians were six miles from me. I fixed my bed so if anything came to take me away, they would have to come through my camp fire. After a while, an owl began to hoot and the wolves began to howl at a distance and after a while, an old buck came and snorted like a small steam engine. At last the morning came and I got up. After a while I heard a voice. The squaw had said that it was not a bray nor a whisper. I crept to where it was and saw that there were five of them. One had big horns, one had small horns, and three had no horns at all. They ran off and I couldn't get a shot at them. I went to where they had been and found the ground all trampled and wet and found it was a salt lick. I looked around and saw a big oak tree with a short body and a big top. I went to the tree and found a sort of ladder up against it. I climbed to the top and found a place where indians stopped overnight. I thought this is the place where I'll stay tonight. I poked along the river and saw three others and then went back to the Indian camp.

I was in the tree again before dark. I slept much better that night. There were a good many deer or elk in the lick, but I could not see them.

In the morning I saw three elk come: one with big horns and two with no horns. The one that had the horns ran after the one with no horns and made that voice. The big one came pretty close to the tree and stopped. I was in the top and shot and broke his back. Then I came down and went near him. There he was with his head up and his big horns, which I later found to be five feet, six inches from the tip to his skull.

I could hardly believe that those horns grow so large in about six weeks. But they do and they drop them in January and the mice and the porcupines eat the horns.

Now, what was I going to do after all my trouble. He was of no use to me. I could not carry his hide nor his horns to Detroit for what I would get for them. Then I made up my mind to give it to the Indians. When I was looking at the elk, I saw something running on a log. I thought it was a squirrel. When he came near me, he raised his head and I saw it was a marten. "Well," said I, "if your skin was in Detroit, it would be worth more than the skin and horns of the elk." I made up my mind that there was money in this part of the country if I could go to work in the right way. The question was — what was the right way?

I went to the camp and told the squaws that I shot the elk. They asked me, "Did you kill him?" I said, "no," and the squaws all laughed and said he is far off now. I said. "no, I broke his back." They asked me what I was going to do with it. I said I was giving it to them. "To me? to me?" they all said. "No," said I, "not to one, but to all of you. You must draw cuts yourselves. I like you all now, but after a while I may see a squaw that I like better than any of you." "Well," they said, "you may find a nice one bye and bye."

Two Indians came along and the squaws told them about the elk. Two Indians and three squaws went to where the elk was and I went with them to see the performance. They shot the elk in the nect and said they were going to camp there. I wanted to go to the big cranberry marsh. They said they would go tomorrow.

They skinned the elk and hung the meat in a tree with the hide and horns.

The next morning three squaws and three Indians started out. We went north and a little west. At last we came to the best marsh in Sanilac County. It was full of cranberries.

I think it was in Town 13 about the west part of range 14. I left the Indians and went north to Saginaw Bay. I was looking for small game. I came back through the country till I struck the county line and then went on the lake shore. I was looking for a place to land a boat.

I got to Port Huron and went to see my friends. They asked me many questions about the country and the man said, "I should like to go there and trap, but my health is poor. If my health were good, I could make money there. I will give you all the information on how to make your traps and run your lines." I asked the woman how I could get clear of the squaws. They will be after me always. I can't find bread for them in the swamps. The woman said, "very easy, make yourself look like another man and don't let the man at the tavern know you are up the lake. They will ask him about you."

The man asked, "did you see them dress a deerskin?" I said, "yes and elk skin too." The woman said, "that is strange. I haven't. I tried to get them to dress one here and the squaw said she must have it in the wigwam." The man said, "it will be a great help to you as dressed deerskins always sell well."

I went across the St. Clair River to Port Huron and the Sandusky scow was there after more shingles. I went back with them for the winter and worked at making nets. In the spring I fished for pickerel and in the summer I fished for catfish. I spent the winter of 1836 in Sandusky (Ohio). In the fall of that year I got a small skiff and put it on the scow and all the bread and other things I would need to last me till the coming April. I had a new gun made and that gun I have yet. I have killed in Sanilac and Huron counties about 1,200 deer and other game. All the money I ever got for meat was fifty cents. I got that from Thomas Oldfield. It was a quarter of a deer. He got that when he carried the mail from Tuscola. He said they had no meat in Port Sanilac. The last deer I killed was on the Tennesee River. I was a guard on a government steamboat. We were going up the river one morning about sunrise. The boat was full of soldiers. The pilot called out, "a deer ahead." It was just a good rifle shot away. I suppose there were 200 shots fired at her. She was just going into the brush when something turned her around and she went right out into the river. Then the pilot steered right towards her. I saw some of the men shoot right down at her head. There was a boat on the deck with oars in it. I called to some of the men working on the boat to come quickly and shove the boat out and three of us jumped in it. I told them to pull right behind the steamboat. The deer rose a few feet from the boat and I knocked her on the head and got her in the boat. By that time, the steamboat stopped. They pulled us all in the boat and the captain told some of the Negroes to skin the deer. The captain turned to me and said, "sergeant, you have a claim on that deer. We will make it right with you." The next day I was called up to the cabin to get my dinner. The venison was cooked real good.

I got my disguise from an old detective. I don't think my mother would have known me. Nothing happened till we got to Port Huron. I put my things in the skiff and went up the lake. I stopped at Burtchville and got a pack of the Indians' birch to cover my shanty in place of shingles.

I landed about a mile below Bark Shanty Point (Port Sanilac). I carried all my things up and hid them in the woods. I got the boat in a creek and got it up as well as I could. I made up my mind that my motto should be "peace if I can and war if I must.

The first things I carried were one rifle, one shotgun, one axe, one hatchet, and one auger. I went across Black River and up Elk Creek where there was a sand bank and a little spring of water that was pretty sweet. I went to work in earnest to carry my things and put them safely in the bank, not the county bank, but the sand bank. I found the white birch bark was very good. Put the bark in the right way around anything and in the right way, it would be as good and as tight as a barrel to bury it in the sand bank.

I worked hard all winter and had good luck. I pack all my furs and skins and had to make three trips to get them to Port Huron. The mink, martens, otters, fishers and about thirty wild cats and one lynx, eleven fox, and 150 pounds of dressed deerskin. I took them to Detroit and sold them for gold. If I worked at anything else, I would have to take my pay in what they call wild cat money which was very slippery at that time in Michigan.

When I was in Port Huron, I heard them say there were a great many of McKincey rebels down the St. Clair River and soldiers on the other side. I was going up after my second or third trip with a fourteen pound rifle on my shoulder and somewhere near Burtchville I met a man. He looked at me and at the gun and said, "you are going the wrong way." I asked him where he was going and he said he was going to help take Canada. I looked at him and said, "your taking Canada will be like me killing the big elk. After I killed him, I had no use for him and had to ask the indians to take him off my hands. What are you going to do with Canada after you take it?" The man said that he had never thought of that before. "Well," said I, "that's the way it was about the elk." He said, "I don't think I will go any father."

After I sold my skins I went to Sandusky (Ohio) and I fished for catfish for a month or two. I did the same for several years. I met a good many who were asking about Sanilac. I met General Harrison at Sandusky. He was going to Indiana where he had fought a big battle with the Indians many years before. He was then electioneering for president.

About the year 1838, some settlers came to Sanilac and settled in the southeast side. This was at Steven's Landing and Lexington. I had no acquaintance with them then. I was only passing through as a poor trapper. About the year 1840, the pine hunters came in.

In 1845 I didn't have the disguise any more and met the old squaw in Port Huron. She hung on to me just as a mother would embrace her son. I had to promise to come over and see her. I did not want to be all hog as I had made enough out of them in the dressed deerskins. When I went I found the Indians changed the place of meeting. That night they met in the church and the preacher looked at me. The old squaw said to the preacher, "this is the hunter that used to be with us. We thought he was dead, but he is not." The preacher asked me what countryman I was and I said I was a Welsh man. The preacher said, "by what the Indians said, you were a Welsh man or a Scotch man. They are the best marksmen. I hope you have no bad intention." I said, "no sir, I want to pay them for what they taught me." He said, "my blessings to you. There are more Indians and squaws who want to talk to you." One of the squaws was with me in the swamp. I asked her how many of them were here and she said, "five." I asked her to come and bring the others to Port Huron tomorrow after breakfast. Then the old squaw said, "I want to introduce you to a very handsome squaw." The old squaw said, "don't you think she is nice?" I said, "she is," and the old squaw said, "I am glad you like her." After a while the meeting broke up and the preacher came to shake hands with me. I shook hands with all of the squaws and most of the Indians. The old governess kept the pretty squaw near me all she could. She was a nice looking woman and she was half French. I told the preacher I would be there again, but I never saw him again.

The next morning the five squaws came and I took them to Mr. Dowing's store in Port Huron. His wife attended them. I asked her how many yards of calico would make a squaw a short gown. I told the squaws they had the choice of the patterns. I told the woman I would pay for the five short gowns. She called one of the clerks to attend me. He laughed and said, you are lucky you are acquainted with five. A good many here can't get acquainted with one. How long have you known them?" I replied, "about ten years." I said, "ask one of the squaws," and he asked one of the squaws, "how long have you been acquainted with this man?" She lifted her hand and opened her ten fingers and said, "so many years." He said to me, "what is your name?" I said, "John Jones." He said, "are you the hunter and trapper I hear so much about?" I said, "that is my profession." Then one of the squaws came over and giggled and said she was going to get her gown made for the wedding. The clerk asked if she were going to marry the hunter and she said, "no, I am not nice enough for him." The clerk then said, "who is the squaw?" The governess said, "she is Susan Wapoose. Mrs. Dowing said Susan Wapoose is a very handsome woman."

I went up to Sanilac and made up my mind to take up a piece of land. I liked the ridge between the Black River and Lake Huron the best. I know it would make a good fruit country. The land along the lake shore was sandy in some places. Sometimes the trail ran across the shore and sometimes across a point in the early days. One time there was a gentleman who asked a shingle maker, "how do you live here?" "Well," said the shingle maker, "we live here by shaving. In the summer we shave shingles and in the winter we shave newcomers." "Suppose there are no newcomers?" he was asked. "Well, then, we shave each other."

I don't think there were ever many Indians between Port Huron and Saginaw Bay. There were never many signs. I hardly ever found an arrowhead or stone axe nor a burying ground except a turtle cut on the trees.

When I was in Ohio between Sandusky and Portage River I saw many Indian signs. There were lots of arrowheads, stone axes, and big mounds. Another man and I dug in a mound and we found it full of human bones.

I am becoming lazy and indolent. I can't tell the year exactly between 1843 and 1862. I picked a piece of land, the southwest quarter of section 12, town 11 north, and range 15 east. That has been my home ever since on a little creek called Maple Creek. Sanilac County contained a lot of big timber. Some of it was marked out by the surveyor. Section 10 and some of the adjoining sections contain one block of pine of about 1,500 acres. In town 11 north and range 15 east was another stand of pine called the Farnsworth tract. It was said he lost all in one evening at cards. The timber was taken off by the white. Another block the surveyor picked out was in town 11 north, range 16 east, section 28 and surroundings, maybe 1,500 acres. It was bought by Judge Smith of Watertown, State of New York. It fell into the hands of his son, Garret Smith. There was a man named George Pack who owned a stony farm near Watertown, New York. Pack traded the farm to Smith for the pine land. I told Mr. Pack, "you made well in that trade." He said, "I made fifteen thousand on that trade." It was the best tract of pine land in Sanilac County. There was a tract of old looking pine in Town 9 N, Range 16 E. I think it was in section 6 and they called it the bank land. There were other big tracts. Judge Reuben Dimond had a great many tracts. He had one in town 12 north, range 16 east, but the family lost all of it from the years 1845 to 1852. The woods were alive with men looking for pine timber. There was not much pine west of range 14. The most of the pine was in the east half of the county. There was good oak in the west part of the county, but the wood was so heavy that the logs would not float. The first sawmill and dock was built by Judge Dimond at what we now call Stevens Landing. He had a tract of pine in the vicinity.

There were two or three brothers keeping a dry goods store in Sandusky (Ohio). Some of them built a mill and a dock at Lexington. Other docks and mills were built, one about three miles north of Lexington and a mill was built at Port Sanilac by an old gentleman named Oldfield, and another big mill and dock was built about three miles north of Port Sanilac called Osgood's Mill. But it was owned by J.L. Woods and was built to cut a block of pine formerly owned by Judge Dimond. I never saw Judge Dimond. He died in 1846 when I was a trapper.

There was another big mill at a place now called Forester. It was in town 13 north and belonged to a compny (Imaly, Smith, Kelly & Company) somewhere in the east. There was another mill in Town 14, but I was never there. Those mills were no good for Sanilac County. They got all of the timber out by boat and as quickly as the timber was gone, the men left too. If you could look at the Black River from 1848 to 1852, you would think that all of the lumberjacks from the state of Maine were on the banks of it. Also, all the French from lower Canada. You would think that all they left back there were the priest and the sexton. A good many Indians would visit Sanilac County. They found out where my wigwam was but many didn't come near. Sometimes I would give them tobacco.

One day two squaws came along and they giggled in squaw fashion and said, "you can't see your nice squaw any more." I asked why and they said, "the governess is no good for you any more." I said I would like to see the old governess. "Well," said one of the squaws, "she will be at her camp tomorrow." The next day I went to see the old governess and gave her a new pipe and some tobacco. The old squaw got in good humor and said, "you were not in a hurry for a squaw. Maybe another nice one will come along."

About the year 1853, there was a jam of logs on Black River near Port Huron, all of twelve miles long. All the logs came from Mill Creek, Elk Creek, and the head of Black River.

Now for the fisheries of Sanilac County. We had to go out in the lake about twenty miles to catch white fish. The reason we had to go so far was that the fish feed on a little white worm in the sand.

To make a marker or buoy for our nets, we cut a pine about thirty feet long with a big top and trim off all the lower branches. Then we take a big stone and tie a rope to it about sixty fathoms long. Then we let the stone to the bottom of the lake, pull it up about fifteen feet and cut the rope and tie it to the tree and let go. The tree stood up as if it was growing there. We used to get about five barrels of white fish and a barrel of trout each time.

One day I was hauling in the nets and the day was still. A little cloud was over the sun and I could see about forty feet down. I saw a big fish away down and he was near a white fish. I thought he was fast in the net. He kept near a white fish and it appeared that he never moved. When he came about four feet from the top I could see he was not fast in the net. I took a gaff hook and hooked it under him. I got him in the boat and he was the biggest salmon ever brought in. He weighed forty-six pounds.

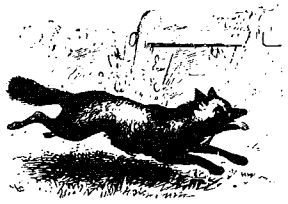
I fished one year from a big vessel. We went out on Lake Huron in April and anchored and had a large skiff to attend the nets. A steamboat came out to us every Sunday to fetch us what we needed and to take the fish we caught. About the fourth of July, a United States cutter came to us and said they had orders from Washington that we must go away within 48 hours or they would sink us. We had to go.

I think it was the year 1852. Five or six men came to me and said, "we have this township organized (Washington township) and we have no supervisor. We want you to take the job." I told them it was out of my profession. They said, "we know you can do it and if you don't, we will lose our organization." "Well," said I, "if that is the case, you can put my name on the ticket." And so they did from that year until 1862. The township then had plenty of money. There was another man who wanted to be the supervisor, Mr. Arthur Carson.

Now I have time to look back at the early religion of Sanilac County. The first was the Indians or spiritual mockers about Lexington. The next was the Mormons. After Prophet Smith moved in from Palmyra, New York, where they dug the golden plates or where he said they dug them. He got a revelation to move to Kirkland, Ohio. I saw Mr. Smith in Ohio. Mr. Smith had another vision to move. There were three families stopped in Indiana. They said they had a vision to move to Sanilac County, Michigan. One family moved on the northwest quarter of section 18, town 10 north, and range 16 east. They held Mormon meetings there on Sunday and wanted me to come. My wigwam was in the southwest quarter of section 12, town 11 north, and range 15 east.

I did not go on my lines or hunt on Sunday, so I used to go to their meetings. I took my gun with me. I know they were all cowards. I was pretending that I was afraid of the wolves going through the woods. I said, "now neighbors, I bet the first elk I kill against a woodchuck that I can beat all of you shooting at a mark-whong! whong! whong!

I never thought that three ignorant families; the Deforest, Drown, and Cooper families should be the head of the Mormon church in Michigan.



I worked on my farm in the summer of 1861. I saw some honeybees at my door and I followed them about a mile and found a hemlock tree. I cut the tree and I found the body of it was about 18 feet long and hollow and full of honey and bees. I hauled it home like a saw log and put it by my house. I told my friends I was thinking of going to the upper peninsula.

But about that time, the government called for six hundred thousand men and Sanilac County was called to raise one company. Mr. A.M. Clark, Mr. E. Chadwick, and Doctor W. Brown all asked me to enlist and go in the army. I told them I was too old, but they said I was all right. I saw old George Pack and asked him if he would take care of my things till I came back. He said he would. I had some stock and four hundred and forty acres of choice land in Sanilac County. Mr. Pack got a man the next day to move into my house. I told the man he may have all the increase of the bees, but he must not meddle with my old gun.

I went to see John Simons at Lexington. He was a second lieutenant. I enlisted in Company K, 22nd Michigan Infantry at Port Sanilac on August 12, 1862, for a three-year term. I was made a sergeant. They never asked me how old I was, but they did ask what countryman I was. I told him I was a Welsh man. He put down that I came from the state of Wales. I think he was drunk then.

I was going to leave the place and I went to bid old man Pack good-bye. He gave me his blessing. I don't think he ever gave his blessing to anybody else. Now I must leave Sanilac County for three years.

I voted for Douglas because I thought the war would pass away. On that I made a mistake. The same as I did many times before.

Well, I went to Pontiac and joined the regiment. I am not going to give a history of the regiment, only a little of myself. We were making after the rebels in Kentucky and they had bombed all the bridges and we had to go through the water to cross the rivers. We were all wet when we got to a crab orchard just at dark. I was just going to lie down when the orderly came and called out, "Sergeant Jones, get your things and report to the adjutant." When I got there, they had twenty or thirty men there. I saw old Captain Hatton there, the oldest captain in the regiment (Captain Ezra C. Hatton of Farmington). He called me to him and said, "I am tired. You can do just as well as I can. You go back about a mile the way we came, to a crossroad. The scouts said there were a good many rebels following us all day. If they come, try to keep them back, but make a noise so we can hear you."

I found the place. The men were wet and the night was cold. They said, "we must have a fire." I said, "you are crazy. If the rebels come and see you around a fire, they won't want a better mark. They will cut you all down. But I will look and see if I can find a place where they can't see the fire." I found one close by and the men made a fire. There was a house near and a man from it came and asked who was in command. I asked him what he wanted. He said, "I don't want you to burn all my fence rails." I said, "the men were wet and cold and needed a fire." He said he had no objection, but he would fetch all the cord wood we needed from the wood pile if we did not burn the rails. After the men carried enough wood, he sat beside us and said he had a store at the crab orchard, but the guerillas had stolen everything he had.

I found he was a Douglas man. I asked him, "do you think if Douglas had been elected that this war would go on?" He said, "I will ask you one question, do you know how many votes Douglas got in the rebel states?" I told him that I did not know, but not many. He said not one and I mean electoral votes and it would go on the same even if Breckenridge had been elected.

Then it passed on till the spring of 1864. I was in Chattanooga. The commander of the company asked me if I ever worked in gardening. I said, "yes, I have worked in market gardens." He said, "I thought so by the way you handle a spade." The next morning the orderly came and called, "Sergeant Jones, pack your things and report to the adjutant." When I got there, I saw forty or fifty men there. The colonel told me that if any of the men disobey me to send them back as prisoners under a corporal. We went to the top of Lookout Mountain and reported to Chaplain Whitcomb. I think he was the chaplain of the Ninth Michigan Regiment. One of the men I had with me was Mathew Peak (Mathew Peak of Sanilac township enlisted at Port Sanilac on August 12, 1862, in Company K, 22nd Michigan Infantry). When we went up on Lookout Mountain, it was cold at night. The chaplain said he wanted us to make a garden for the hospital. There were other men from two other regiments working there. I looked at the work and knew they did not know much about gardening. It looked like a woman's garden. The chaplain asked me if I knew anything about a garden and I said, "I have worked in a garden in England." I said, "do you want your garden looking nice now?" He said, "they don't look very nice now. I will leave it to you. Do the best you can." Then I had my own way and the chaplain was well pleased.

The weather got nice on the mountain, but the nights were cold and damp. In the course of time I had to go down to the valley on business. I had to get cabbage plants. I went past the regiment and saw the colonel. He said, "the chaplain gives you credit for a fine garden." I said, "I'm glad to hear it. I always try to do my best." We began to pick onions and other vegetables and thought we were going to have a good place all fall.

But about the last of July a man came along with a piece of paper in his belt. He handed it to me and it was an order for me to turn everything over, take my men and rejoin the regiment as quickly as I could. It was not long before we were on our way down the mountain. When we got to Chattanooga all the regiment was aboard the railroad cars ready to move. The colonel said, "are all the men here?" I said, "yes sir." By that time I was on top of a car and we were going to Raccoon Mountain. After the fall of Atlanta, the 22nd regiment came back with General Thomas. The 22nd regiment was the headquarter's guard. The second day after we returned to Chattanooga the orderly came to me and said, "Sergeant Jones, you must pack and report to the adjutant." I did not like it very much as I was tired. We had just walked from Atlanta — about 200 miles. I looked over the men and I think there were 45 or 46 of them. The adjutant counted them and said, "report to Captain Somebody." I have lost the name now. He was the captain of transportation. They told me to report to Captain Lathrop on the steamer "Missionary." After I was there about two months, an orderly came with a dispatch for me. I was ordered to take the men back to the regiment. I showed the orders to the captain and he said, "don't go until I come back." He walked uptown as fast as he could. He was not gone very long when he came back and said, "it is all right. Don't go for a little while." It was not long before an orderly came with a dispatch ordering me to stay on the steamer and send the men to the regiment with a corporal. I stayed with the boat until spring and the captain said, "Sergeant, I can get along without you now, but you are just as well here as any place else." I stayed there until the regiment was discharged. I was mustered out at Nashville on June 26, 1865. I got back to Sanilac County early in August. When I was in Port Huron that fall, I saw some of my Indian friends. They said they knew I was a soldier and they were glad to see me back. The chief said, "we shall have a hunt together when I come back."

The supervisor had just moved out of Washington township and the board nominated me in his place. The township was in bad shape. When I went on my old farm the old man said the tree is still full of bees. When I came back, it was not hard to get acquainted with the ladies. I found one and married her. About a year later, she presented me with a boy and said he was mine. He is now about six feet tall. She found five girls somewhere. In sixty-seven, the four squaws came in the house. I was not home at the time. There were two very old squaws and two young squaws. My wife told me that one of them was the handsomest woman she ever saw, was dressed very costly and about twenty years old. They played with the baby about two hours and went away. That was the last time the Indians were around.

They hadn't gotten all of the pine off when I came back from the army. We worked until everything was cut: pine, cedar, and black cherry. All of the big cedar was made into telegraph posts and shipped away and the cedar posts all went the same way. That left the woods full of dead timber.

In the year 1866 I was supervisor again. That spring I planted ten acres of orchard. I paid two hundred dollars for trees and thought I was getting along better than when I was in the army paying taxes on 440 acres of land out of the small salary they give you to carry a musket. But I liked to carry a musket if my pay had been better.

Time passed away until spring of 1871. We had but little rain in the spring and none in June. The fire began to run in July and August and went through my orchard and took the apples on the trees. The fire kept burning all fall. On the 8th of October, that night was the worst. There was still smoke in the woods on New Year's Day.

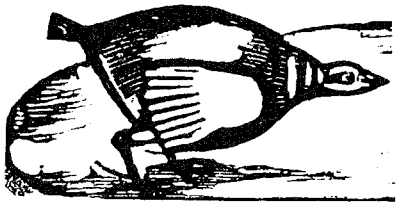
That was the first setback for this part of the country. There were many people who needed relief. John Cleland, the supervisor, came to my house that fall and said the governor asked him to find out how much people lost in the fire. He wanted to know how much I lost. I told him I would mention the things and he could set the price. I mentioned the things and he set the figures. After we got done I said, "how much does it come to?" and he said, "a little over three thousand dollars." I told him I would like to get a little money to replace my orchard. He said, "we don't pay any money." I said, "what do you pay?" and he said, "something to keep the soul and the body together until spring." I said, "I think I won't starve this winter." Mr. William Thompson kept the store at Carsonville. He had some relief hay and he sent me word to come and get some of it. He showed me fifty-pound bales of it. I said, "I may come and get some of it." I saw Mr. George Pack and told him about the offer. He said, "Johnny, I would not dirty my hands with it. That is not all the damage the fire did. It killed all of the fish in Black River." I never saw a fish or a clam in Black River since and the fish in the lake failed about that time. I think the smoke killed them. When I was fishing, we used to get not less than a thousand pounds a day. Other things failed the same way — the elk and the deer disappeared.

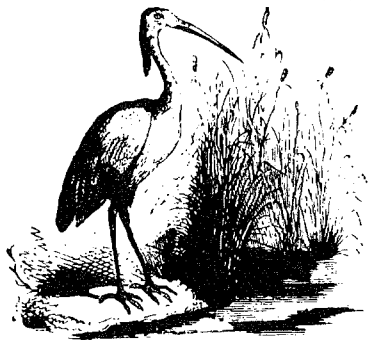
The fire of 1881 came the same way, but I did not lose as much as I did in 1871. Two men came to my house. One was Mr. Barrett, the preacher of St. David Mission and the other was Bishop Harris and handed me twenty dollars that was from the bishop. I told them I did not want alms as long as I was able to work. They said the church wanted me to have it. The bishop and I were always good friends.

He used to get me to repeat the Apostles Creed and the Lord's prayer in the Welch language. The missionary came again and gave me ten dollars. That was all the alms I ever got and it is now the year 1890.

And I never got any army pension and I don't think I ever will. When they gave me my discharge, they said they did not know any reason why I could not re-enlist. I did not spend the balance of my time in the convalescent camp and if anybody wants to know my record in the army, I belonged to the 22nd Michigan Infantry, Company K, and I was Sergeant Jones in the company.

I have no reason to grumble. I get two meals a day of good food. I keep myself looking as at parade dress and I walk to my church with my head uncovered. You would not think that I was over fifty years old and if you want my likeness, my friend, Honorable Richard D. O'Keefe can get you one. He has known me since he was a boy.





THE WRECK OF THE ST. CLAIR

Printed by the Sanilac County Historical Society

Author's note: This is a true story down to the last detail. A letter written by Charles Ferris, one of the surfmen, describes every bit of the rescue and what took place during the night. Also the records of the Port Sanilac lighthouse keeper; the October 3, 1888 issue of the PORT HURON TIMES, the record in BEERS HISTORY OF THE GREAT LAKES and records of the Port Sanilac cemetery were used, along with conversations I have had during years past with witnesses to the affair. All of these together make up a true story.

My name is Charles Ferris and I was born on a farm in southern Michigan and until taking a job with the Coast Guard I had never seen Lake Huron, or any other large body of water. I was twenty years of age, when, in June of 1888 I signed their papers and was assigned to the Sand Beach (now Harbor Beach) Coast Guard Station. The station was and still is located sixty miles above the lower end of Lake Huron, on the western, or Michigan shore.

At that time lumbering was big business and the Saginaw, AuSable and Thunder Bay Rivers carried hundreds of thousands of pine logs annually to the saw mill towns on the lake. Bay City, Saginaw, Tawas, Oscoda, and Alpena were thriving lumber towns where they sawed and shipped millions of feet of lumber annually to the lower lakes. Detroit, Toledo, and Cleveland were important ports receiving these shipments.

The barge ST. CLAIR was engaged in that business. Owned and operated by Captain C. H. Jones of Bay City, she carried five sailors and a woman, or a total of seven including the Captain. The woman was cook for the crew.

The tale which I am about to relate began on the morning of Monday, October 1, 1888. The wind had gone to the northeast and by noon had become a gale. By mid-afternoon the storm had increased tremendously and huge seas were battering the harbor walls. Several ships had already sought shelter in the harbor.

That afternoon I was standing watch in the lookout. I spotted a ship a mile or two to the southeast apparently in trouble. She later proved to be the barge ST. CLAIR, northbound and without a load. Unable to reach the harbor, the captain had ordered both anchors to be dropped and they were attempting to ride out the storm. She was being badly punished by the seas and she appeared to be in trouble.

We launched a lifeboat and went to her before dark. Captain George Plough, our commanding officer tried his best to persuade the men on the ST. CLAIR to board the lifeboat and be taken ashore. Both anchors were holding and Captain Jones was disposed to stay with his vessel. He said that all he had was tied up in her and he would stick with her to the last.

After we saw it was impossible to get the captain or any member of the crew to go ashore, Captain Plough asked for the girl, but for some reason she wouldn't come with us. He then informed Captain Jones that if they needed us to burn a torch as a signal.

We started on our return trip to the shelter of the harbor. After a long and backbreaking pull into the teeth of the gale we reached the harbor entrance. Tremendous cross seas made it difficult to get through the gap but by almost superhuman effort by the entire crew we finally reached shelter, drenched and thoroughly exhausted. There were several tugs and steam barges inside the harbor and we asked several of them to go out and attempt to tow the ST. CLAIR in, but all refused.

So we went to our station and now it was blowing a living gale and increasing by the minute. It was my watch down at the end of the pier. In going to my post I had to run between the madly rushing seas which were sweeping over the breakwater. I had not been at my post long when I saw that a torch had been lighted on the ST. CLAIR.

I worked myself back to the station and reported to Captain Plough. Every man was called for action. Some gave their money or valuables to Mrs. Plough. Then we manned the lifeboat in the worst storm any of us ever were to encounter. As we pulled across the harbor the sky was pitch black and the wind whistled through the rigging of the boats lying in shelter.

After passing through the gap we hit the storm in all its fury. The seas were coming from all directions and it was a difficult task to keep the lifeboat headed in the right direction. We finally reached the ST. CLAIR and endeavored to pull up under the stern in order to remove her crew to the lifeboat. We had to get close enough to take them off one by one and still keep far enough off so our boat wouldn't be stove in by the larger boat. One minute we would be riding high above her and the next she would rise on a huge wave and be high above us. Several times we narrowly missed disaster when her stern came down, just missing us it seemed by inches. This was a very dangerous assignment and required the united efforts of the entire crew. We were all comparatively fresh at the time, otherwise we could not have accomplished what we did.

The girl jumped first, and then the men, with Captain Jones being the last to come aboard. We had left the harbor at seven o'clock and it was eleven when we were ready to pull away from the ST. CLAIR.

The seas were now so high and the wind so strong that it was impossible for us to pull back to the harbor. There was only one thing to do, and that was to run with the storm and let the wind and the seas carry us south toward the shelter of the St Clair River. That would mean a run of sixty miles but there was no other way ...and perhaps by morning the gale would lessen.

As we squared away and headed down the lake our job was to keep the lifeboat on a true course, running with the seas. To allow her to get crosswise into the seas would allow her to broach and throw us all into the water.

Our rudder was soon struck by a huge sea and carried away! Captain Plough shouted orders to the crew that we would have to steer the boat by port and starboard oarsmen, such as give way or hold water to combat the tremendous seas which we were encountering.

We shipped many of them and our boat filled with water five or six times but she was a self-bailer and emptied herself each time. She behaved very well running with the seas.

One big sea caught us and put out our light and Captain Plough couldn't see to read the compass. He called for matches, and one man had a few in a watertight container. After some trouble we got the lantern lighted again.

To get off course was to court disaster. To get too far off to the port would get us into the trough of the mountainous seas and no doubts capsize the boat, and to veer too far to the starboard would bring us too close to the rocky shore.

The wind kept blowing with unabated fury and it seemed like all the demons of hell had been let loose. All of us were drenched many times as the seas and spray continued to sweep over the boat. We were all near exhaustion and suffering from the cold. It seemed that the night would never end.

Keeping the light going so the captain could read the compass also became quite a chore. Two or three of the men were given a chance to hold the lantern but in turn they gave it up as their hands got so cold and numb they could no longer grasp it. Then the girl took it and didn't give it up until daylight. All through the night she kept the lantern safe and sheltered the light from the wind and seas. Never once did she complain of the cold.

Captain Plough directed us to keep looking for a light, either from a boat or from shore. But we saw nothing from the time we left the ST. CLAIR until just about daylight. Then, at about seven in the morning, the captain sighted the Port Sanilac light. He wanted to get the crew ashore as soon as possible as he feared they would perish from cold and exhaustion, so he decided to attempt a landing at once.

It had been eight hours since leaving the ST. CLAIR and we had made 30 miles, just half the distance to the shelter of the river. But to continue on was impossible. There is a limit to human endurance and we had reached that point. After twelve hours of continually fighting the storm we knew that we had approached the end. We couldn't go on much further.

At Port Sanilac there was very little shelter from the seas; just a dock about five hundred feet in length where the steamers landed, built partly of log cribs and partly of piling. The captain decided to round the dock and attempt a landing on the south, or leeward side, and take advantage of what little shelter there was.

The residents of Port Sanilac had been informed during the night of the rescue operation and knew the lifeboat was headed down the lake and would sooner or later arrive at this point. Scores of people were on the dock to witness what happened, and as many were prepared to be of assistance if needed. It was lucky for me that there were, or I would not be here to tell this tale.

We headed for the light. The dock and all the people came plainly into view. We were pushed forward by the madly rushing breakers which became more wicked as we approached shore. Captain Plough ordered the oil tank opened and if it helped any I cannot say. Our lifeboat was about thirty feet long, and time after time those breakers would start astern and coil clear over the boat and never wet the crew. I looked up and it was just like a falls. I expected to see the lifeboat go end-over-end, but we came through all this.

However, just as we were rounding the dock the boat was struck by a tremendous breaker and she rolled down on her beam ends. I did not realize what had happened until I found myself in the water and under the boat. I put my hands up against something and pushed myself down. I bobbed up quickly and found myself some distance from the boat. I could see that she was on her side and some men were clinging to her, but I had to go where the breakers, backwash, and undertow were throwing me. I was completely exhausted and it seemed at times that the breakers would smother me. I got in closer to shore and thought I might touch bottom with one foot, just for a rest, but when I tried it a huge wave completely covered me. I was becoming very weak.

I saw a man coming toward me with a rope tied around his waist and the other end held by people on shore. He shouted to me and said there was a channel between us and he couldn't get out any farther, but he thought he could reach me after another breaker would send me in. I soon got it ...another breaker came roaring in and that was the last I remember.

When I was revived I was in the lighthouse. Afterwards they told me they had worked on me for four hours. They told me the name of the man who had pulled me from the water. He was Colin C. (Coly) McGregor, the dock agent. I have never seen him since. Several others of the lifeboat crew were helped ashore by the townspeople. Chris Oldfield and Robert Williams were two who assisted in the rescue.

As the lifeboat rolled over all but three surfmen and two seamen were thrown out. Everyone expected the boat to right itself immediately but it failed to do so. It beached itself south of the dock, and those clinging to it were saved. The remaining five surfmen and Captain Plough were also rescued as they were wearing life jackets.

Captain Jones, three crewmen, and the girl were drowned. Their bodies came ashore later in the day about two miles south of where the tragedy took place. They were recovered and laid out in the township hall in Port Sanilac. The following day the remains of Captain Jones and Lewis Fertaw were sent to Bay City for burial. George MacFarland, Henry Anderson, and the girl, Julia Gravereatte were buried in potters field in the Port Sanilac cemetery.

MacFarland was from Cleveland, Anderson was from Australia, and the girl was from Sebewaing, Michigan. The two surviving members of the crew of the ST. CLAIR were Maurice McKennan and Jones Rose, both of Detroit.

The survivors were cared for overnight by the people of the village. On the following day, Wednesday, October 3rd, all the members of the Coast Guard crew left Port Sanilac on the steamer R.G. STEWART to return to Sand Beach. She took the lifeboat in tow and we arrived at our destination at five in the afternoon.

There was a large gathering of people awaiting us upon arrival, and we were welcomed with open arms, many saying that they had never expected to see us again. Some said they could not sleep that night, thinking of us out in the storm. We learned that the ST. CLAIR had foundered during the night. Large sections of the breakwater were carried away and the water had run farther into town than had ever before been known. Boathouses were wrecked and boats were driven ashore. It was one of those storms that come only once in a lifetime.

This adventure has been a nightmare to me all these years. In my dreams I can hear and feel the high watery walls in the Stygian darkness come rushing at our tiny craft, each one threatening to engulf us. And again in that murky dawn I will see that high green mountain of water which overwhelmed us in the end.

The leadership of Captain Plough had been superb and each crew member had done his job. You could ask no more. I don't consider it poor judgment that our boat was overturned. It was just bad luck. It was the only thing we could do ...to attempt the landing when and where we did.

In closing I must mention the courage to the girl, Julia Gravereatte. The fortitude she displayed that night on Lake Huron most surely set an example to the others. She deserved much more than a grave in potters field!

THE WRECK OF THE ST. CLAIR

By Yon Swanson

Here, with two Lakemen by her side, who died with her one autumn gale, lies a young girl well qualified to grace a Great Lake's tale.

Nearby Lake Huron's shore she lies, where broken by it's waves she came,
a humble girl, to eulogize,
Julia Gravereatte by name.

Oh, it was many years ago,
October, 1888, the date,
but fresh their memories are I know when folks old tales relate.

For when the autumn gales still blow sad memories all go back to someone dead, they used to know, drowned at Port Sanilac.

For ships, when savage storms vent spite, still sink, and seamen drown, as then,
when all the St. Clair's souls, that night, were plucked off by the Coastguardmen.

It was off Harbor Beach she sank —
(though it was Sand Beach then)
I was a rookie, proud of rank,
one of the Coastguardmen.

Whose annals come of saving life of those who need their aid.
When lakes and oceans breed their strife lifesaving is our trade.

We got them off, aye, I was one who pulled with that stout crew...
I suppose they are all dead and gone,
for Time must have it's due.

We took them off — six men we took and one young lass, all told,
the young girl was the doomed ship's cook...
She never did grow old...

My twenty years, now turned four score, since that wild night we shared;
now close to them I surely draw,
who died when I was spared.

We took them off and dodged the blows from off her stern, that lifting high pile-driving down, came might close while desperately our oars we'd ply.

Aye, I was one who thought we'd saved, from Huron's death, the St. Clair's crew, when those great seas our sailors braved — the worst that I've come through.

We got them off and tried to row for that far haven of the shore, but hammering seas wouldn't let us, so we turned in them and ran before.

We hoped the wind and waves would take us to the St. Clair River's head — Full sixty miles of Huron Lake due south, we turned in dread.

The lantern on the compass held,
blew out — again, somehow, was lit, above the gale our captain yelled for someone to attend to it.

One tried — another — numbed with cold their hands let go the guiding light.
The girl reached for it, took a hold and held it through the freezing night.

She held the light; the skipper steered.
He held the course the compass showed;
Well off the shore he held and cleared while we, froze as in fear, we rowed.

The dark night was the darker for the looming foam we sailed.
The rudder went, he used an oar while all hands prayed and bailed.

The torturous night of probing cold shrieked by in screaming power, while Death, it's tale of horror told to all each year-long hour.

Aye, Death was every soul's consort with ear held to each breast;
in grisly darkness, on each thrwart, grim spirits tightly pressed.

'Til grey dawn let the long night pass;
we saw the heaving shore again.
We'd heard no word from that brave lass...
She never did complain.

Port Sanilac light was still agleam, our skipper headed in to shore;
exhausted we, in nightmare's dream,
bent to each leaden oar.

Our only chance — we could not last — into that froth of hell we flew —

The folks on shore all stood aghast to see what we were coming through.
For breakers coiling leaped o'er head from stern to forward cleared the bow — a sight of unbelieving dread let no drop in somehow.
The folks ashore began to cheer,
we heard them from the boat.
We saw them wave as we drew near nigh dead, but still afloat.
Then, like a flash we overturned,
and then I lost my memory,
but safe on shore, I later learned of how they dragged me from the sea.
Of how that lovely lass was gone,
with both these shipmates, too, while, helplessly, the crowd looked on —
'twas little they could do, until the lake gave up it's dead.
Unclaimed by kin, these three were borne, in sorrow, to this bed of Christ's eternity.
Now old, I come to kneel and pray upon their plot of grass.
They all come back like yesterday,
these lads and that fair lass.*
I leave them in the village care —
they died a long time back...
No autumn storms will wake them there back in Port Sanilac.

MICHIGAN

I love Michigan's lakes and streams,
Best state to me it seems.
Two-thirds the autos are made right here,
We have fruits and grains, and wines to cheer.
Have copper, iron, oil and wheat
Shut in from the world we still could eat.
Come be our guest and fish again
When it's "Blossom Time" in Michigan.

MY MOTHER'S FAVORITE SONG

Alone I sit in the twilight
As I watch the shadows fall
Alone with my dreams of childhood,
And of days now beyond recall.

I can hear my mother singing
In tones so soft and low.
Once more I hear the melody
She sang to me long years ago.

And the song brings back sweet memories
Of a mother's love and care.
Again I see her kneeling
Beside the old arm chair.

And though the prayer was silent
I know she prayed for me.
For strength and tender guidance
To battle life's troubled sea.

And though the years have been many,
And though the years have been long,
There remains the prayer and the echo
Of mother's favorite song.

For gone from my life is a loved one,
Gone, for we all must depart.
Gone are all but the memories
But the song lives on in my heart.

Ninety year old Harley Squier, veteran Supervisor from Buchanan, Stands to the cheers of his fellow members, of the Berrien Board, during a surprise birthday dinner in his honor, at the Green Cottage.

Born Sept. 20, 1861 near Decatur, Mr. Squier has been a member of the Board of Supervisors 19 years. Other members chipped in to present him with a $100. and a candle decked birthday cake. Board Chairman, Alfred Bartz (on Squier's right) and Niles Supervisor Marion Rutherford (on his left), as well as other Supervisors, paid high tribute to Squier. Supervisor Ernie Knott of Benton Harbor said "Mr. Squier had demonstrated, during his long term in office, that he was a man, to be respected, to be loved, and to be depended upon — and that is why we like him."

Squier's record of public service goes back before the turn of the century; he served on the Breedsville Township Board in the early 90's and was County Clerk of Van Buren County from 1893 through 1897. He was also active as a banker and farmer, before he moved from Decatur to Buchanan in 1919 to work at Clark Equipment Company. Later he became Buchanan city Assessor and served on Berrien County Board of Supervisors for nineteen years.

Carl B. Squier was born in Decatur, on April 17, 1893, while his father was serving as County Clerk of Van Buren County. Carl grew up in Decatur, and worked on the parental farm until he enlisted in the Signal Corps, in 1916. Carl became a pilot during the war and served with the 91'st Pursuit Squadron. When Carl came home from Europe he worked for several big Aviation Companies. In 1932 he was one of five men who bought out the defunct Lockheed Aircraft Company, which became one of the giants of the Aviation Industry, under their management. Carl retired as assistant to the President of the Lockheed company, in 1958. He continued in an advisory capacity, until his death on Nov. 5, 1967.

A carrier who carried his can to his mouth well;
He carried so much, and he carried so fast,
He could carry no more — so was carried at last;
For, the liquor he drank being oo much for one,
He could not carry off — so he's now carri-on.

A STORY OF RUSSIA

Russia, now known as U.S.S.R. since the Revolution of 1917 lead by Lenin — thus a Communistic Government was formed. The Union contains almost every kind of climate, from frigid north to sub-tropical south, every kind of soil and topography. It has just begun to use its vast stores of rich natural resources. It has unsurpassed network of rivers totaling two million miles, shores of twelve seas embracing her, forests which make up one-fourth of earth's trees. The language consists of one-hundred ten dialects and Russian cuisines vary accordingly. The population is over two hundred thirty million people and its vast domain covers eight and a half million square miles and has eleven time belts.

To speak of the history of Soviet people is to speak of its history of conquest, suffering and revolution. The tenth century brought Christianity by Prince Vladimir of Kiev. Kiev is still considered as the Mother of Russian cities. When Christianity began, the enthusiasm spurred composers to write songs to compliment the rituals. There is no music in Russian churches. The blend of voices is something to hear. Ukranians are noted for most of the songs. There are no pews and only a few benches for the old. During the time that Christianity was brought to Russia, the weary apostle of Christ traveled on foot, a hazardous and difficult journey. His only visible means he had to show the word of God were rolled parchment paintings and pictures painted on metal, called icons. Frescoes were painted on church walls in the early centuries and some are still well preserved. The Byzantine Rite was established probably due to the Greek influence, language of the apostles, who brought the word of God.

Devotion to Our Lady and saints is strong. Russians make the sign of the cross with three fingers (for Trinity) and start from right to left.

The Cathedral of St. Sophia in Kiev is visited by thousands. It was completed in 1617. Rev. A. Leschoff of Benton Harbor, Michigan, priest of Church of Our Saviour, spent his early days near St. Sophia in Ki3v. Russia does not encourage any form of religion. Churches are open; many of the old churches are now being renovated and preserved as works of art.

Of all the Russian holidays, Easter is the one most deeply rooted — a tradition older than written history. The Soviet Union churches are filled; even people who have abandoned their beliefs, keep the day. This habit stems from nostalgia and gestures of respect and affection for parents and grandparents.

Fasting before Easter was a rigorous one, in which neither meat nor animal products could be eaten. Eggs, lard, butter, milk and cheese disappeared from Russian tables for seven weeks. Easter vigil and service continued 'til midnight. Easter comes with a greeting to each other — "Christos Vaskres" (Christ is risen). "Voistinu Voskres" is the answer returned. (Truly He is risen). Greetings and eggs are exchanged all day. Ukranians are noted for their work of art — make Easter eggs like small mosaics. Usually Easter is a day of festivities; relatives and friends enjoy cracking eggs and all partake of "Zakuska" — a table is filled with ham, sausage, black bread, sweet cake, Paskha, Babka and plenty of vodka. Russians have great appetites, but know how to starve as well. Kaska is one of their staple foods and they have many varieties. They are famous for their sturgeon and caviar (fish roe), blini (crepes), vodka, herring, mushrooms, chicken Kiev, pirashki and many other dishes. When we were in Leningrad food was good and the desserts were excellent. Russians have a passion for ice cream; vendors are seen everywhere.

The 16th Century brought Ivan the Terrible who was remembered primarily for his violence and cruelty, but was also a man of refined tastes, enjoyed celebrations, ceremonies, music, chess, rich raiment and food. He tried to turn his people from their coarse and barbarous ways. In Queen Catherine's reign, fortunes were spent on the pleasures of the table. Both Ivan and Queen Catherine made a remarkable turning point in development of Russian cuisine and culture.

Prior to World War I, there came a great influx of peoples from Europe to America and with this great wave of people many Russians, consisting of Slavs, Ukranians, Byelorussians, Russians, etc. came to America — a country about which they had heard so much. Many husbands came first and then their families, but many never brought their families, as many incurred frustrations and hardships and then World War I came and much was lost by the years. Many settled in America where conditions and weather were more like their native land — some in Canada, Upper Peninsula, Minnesota and Michigan. Some worked in the steel mills of the big cities and some engaged in common labor. Many made good farmers. They are hardy, industrious people. Hospitality of these people is warm and inviting and hardly ever does one leave without a "zakuska" (a bite to eat), which can be small or elaborate. They love children and are very affectionate people. The women of Russia are industrious and reliable and perform many menial and hard tasks that men usually do. Some of the immigrants could read and write and some could not. At that time education was not compulsory. My father attended school only about five years and yet he mastered three languages — Hebrew (spoken), German and Russian (he could read and write). English was difficult but he learned to read the paper and wrote enough to get along. Most all immigrants could speak more than one language. Religious education in small cities was taught by parents and as we grew older, most of the offspring found their own way. In the larger cities there were churches which are in progress yet. There are groups of Russians who settled in Minnesota and Pennsylvania who still enjoy much of the old traditions — food, music, songs, customs, etc. Mennonites from Russia settled in Colorado and Kansas and still carry on and live in the dobe homes.

Today Russia encourages education, the arts, sciences, technology, etc. Crowds gather at the Art Theatres and Circuses and programs are always accompanied by full orchestra, plus the traditional Balaloika. Music is as colorful as the people. They love American music which is played everywhere. The "Bolskai Theatre" is one hundred fifty years old and still hasn't lost its splendor, but its history is two hundred years old. Ballet is foremost in the arts and children who have the potential are encourage-. In the academic field, only twenty-five per cent of the students with high standards can attend college free. They also receive about one hundred fifty rubles a month while attending. Every student I talked to was very earnest and most of them wanted to major in languages, especially English. You can learn English usually from second grade up or start as you enter the University. All children seem to have a zest for learning. They are gracious and in return for your small gift of bubble gum or what have you, they pin on you little miniatures of Lenin, Mickey Mouse, astronauts and colorful post cards. You see very few children in summer as most of them are in camp. Children seem to be well dressed. We saw girls and boys in uniform much like our scouts.

The soviet people have not yet forgotten the war and its sufferings and one can always see fresh flowers on tombs or monuments. Today most of the cities have been rebuilt. To house so many people without homes, apartment buildings were hurriedly built. Their utilities come from centralized power plants. Coming into the large cities like Moscow and Kiev the roads are much like our own toll roads. The city streets are washed daily. Moscow subway is beautiful and each station has its own decor and art work. Moscow Metro carries five million passengers a day and remains spotless. River banks in cities are paved. On the opposite side of the banks of the Volga, you see sandy beaches. Many crossings of the main streets have under-ground passes. One interesting item was ownership of land. Nobody can own land; it belongs to U.S.S.R. You can build a home, if you have money, but if you must sell it, no profit can be made. You can travel to other countries, but you cannot take rubles out of Russia.

Some of the great writers of Russia were Tolstoi, Maxine Gorky, poet, Alexander Pushkin and the greatest singer was Feodor Ivanovitch Chaliapin. The family of Faberge for generations were silversmiths for the royal family. A collection can be seen in Leningrad (once St. Petersburg).

Their traditional dress has yielded largely to contemporary attire and only on festive occasions does one appear in native costumes. The ladies garment usually consists of a white blouse, with full sleeves, intricately cross-stitched and embroidered around the neckline. Skirts are full and trimmed with ribbon around the hem-line — circle of flowers and ribbon for head gear or a high crown-like head piece with ribbons down the back. Some of their headpieces are heavily be-jeweled and elaborate. Embroidered vests can also be worn and boots. Men wear full, long sleeves sometimes embroidered, mandarin collars with buttons down the side. Pants are full and reach just below the knee with boots to meet it. They add a sash and usually a fur cap.

Very few of the pioneer Russians who came to this country in the early 1900's are left, but they are precious. They are part of the old and the new. They came with great enthusaism to this great country, lived in it for the rest of their natural lives, loved it as deeply as their native land and adopted it whole heartedly. The younger generation has melted into the folds of many nationalities, but their lives have been enriched by the hard work, traditions and teachings of these brave people. What a great inheritance they have left for their children!

JOSH GOENS & PONIES

JOSH GOENS — HORSE PULLING CHAMPION

Josh was born in 1893, Paw Paw Township — but for the greater part of his life, has lived on the Goen's farm. He married Rowene Bradley in 1917 in South Bend, Indiana and they were blessed with six children.

Josh is a genial, well-liked neighbor — the kind of man who makes friends easily. When he is seen coming along the road with his diminuitive, well-matched Welsh horses and wagon, neighbors rush to the window to see "Josh go by." For the older ones — it is just a reminder of the bygone horse and wagon days. His little horses were three years old when he acquired them in Lawrence, Michigan. They are now fifteen years old and their names are Madge and Rock. The late Chuck Elliot made the harnesses for them.

Josh has won over one hundred trophies at Pony Pulls. He even beat his brother, Frank, at one pony pulling contest. He and his ponies have participated in contests in the following places: Berrien Springs Fair • Centreville • Climax Legion • Coldwater • Colon • Constantine • Goshen Fair • Jakes Bar — Cassopolis • News Pall$dium • Oak Shores • Paw Paw Flea Market • Schoolcraft • Shipshewana Horsemanship winner — Competitors in the pony pulling contest at the Berrien County Youth Fair, put Fruit Belt Pony Puller's Association Blankets, the prize for horsemanship, on the ponies owned by Josh Goens, who won the award in the light-weight pony division. The fair was attended by over 100,000 persons.

FAMILY HOME FOR OVER 100 YEARS

The Goen's farm, which is near the Baptist Church, about four miles north of Decatur, has been in the family more than one hundred years. This makes the Louis Goen's family of eleven children a Centennial family.

Josh Goens, a son, remembers the log cabin which was built by William Worrix on the site of the present Goen's homestead. Worrix was killed in the Civil War, leaving his wife Pennina and three children. Joshua Cotton was Worrix's neighbor and after the war, Joshua bought the Worrix farm and built on it — what is now, the Goen's homestead. He married the widow of Worrix, Pennina, and they were the parents of four children — Stella, Dora, James and Chloe. Louis Goens, in time, married Dora Cotton and later, bought the farm and remodeled the house into the beautiful home which it is today.

THE IRISH IN DECATUR

"Like lions leaping at a fold, when mad with hunger's pang, Right up against the English line the Irish exiles sprang!"

America's first ethnics were the Irish!

They fled to America in tens and hundreds of thousands during the famine of 1847 and 1848. A million people died and a million fled to foreign lands in 1846 to 1850.

The famine was caused by the mysterious potato blight (a fungus named Phytophthora infestans) destroying the "Irish Paraty" which was the staple crop of Ireland.

The sufferings caused by the very first blight, that of 1845, reported by one writer, surpassed anything on the pages of Thucydides, or in the despondent, dismal chant of Dante. The tyranical English "Powers that be" stood by and did little to alleviate the suffering of the sick and the dying. Some Poor Law Unions, unable to provide coffins for all who died destitute, hit on the expedient of using one coffin with a hinged bottom. Corpses were often simply wrapped in straw for burial. Some were buried even without the covering of straw. People traveling at night sometimes drove over the dead who had dropped on the road and there lay unburied. Dogs, pigs and rats were frequently found feasting on the neglected dead.

Thousands upon thousands, fleeing from Ireland for the "Promised Land beyond the Sea," never saw that land, but died on ship and were buried in the ocean. The stench, vermin and filth in the holds of the ship where the Irish emigrants were crowded was unbearable — and unbelievable! Conditions after they reached New York and Boston were little better! They huddled in dank basements and tenements — sometimes two or three families in one room — in unspeakable wretchedness and filth. They were scorned as a minority group — and soon signs began to appear in the shops and public places — "No Irish need apply!" Forthwith an addition was appended by one of the exiles and it read: "WHOEVER WROTE THIS — WROTE IT WELL — FOR THE SAME IS WRITTEN ON THE GATES OF H---!"

But — they were tenacious and they accepted the most menial of jobs. The Irishmen built the railroads and the canals of their adopted country. The pay was meager for their long hours of toil and sweat. As a popular song proclaimed: "WORK ALL DAY FOR THE SUGAR IN YOUR TAY!"

Back in Ireland, the oppressive English lawmakers used every means to obliterate the Irish race. With the decline of Irish in the 19th century, most of the Irish names were anglicized and many had English names substituted. Even where the current name seems clearly to be English in form, it may have an Irish origin. Some names derived from occupation; for example, Mac an Bhaird (son of the bard), anglicized Mac Ward. Mac an Ghabhann (son of the smith) now MacGowan. The surname was formed, at first, by prefixing the word "Mac" (son) to the given name of the father or Ua, later O (grandson), to that of an earlier ancestor. Examples are O'Brien, O'Connor, MacCarthy and Mac Guinness. Sometimes an English name of somewhat similar sound, was substituted, such as Collins for Cullane (O Corleáin).

Many of the Irish in Michigan came first from New York, then to Ohio and hence to Michigan. Some of those who migrated to Decatur, Michigan created an Irish settlement south of the railroad tracks. Others made their homes in Hamilton Township and engaged in farming. The names of the families who settled in the village were: Patrick and Maurice O'Shean, Peter Costello, Dennis Murphy (grandfather of Sisters Adelaide and Imelda, nee Hazel and Alice Murphy), John O'Leary, Tom Clancy, Anthony McKay, Patrick Enright, Daniel Carney, Vet Redmond, Prudy Brown, Patrick Howland (O'L'Ullachain), Michael and James Mahoney, Hannah Cronin and Mary Moye.

The following made their homes on surrounding farms: John McVay, John and Michael Code, Patrick and Michael Kelly, Michael Ryan, James Howland, Patrick Creagan, John Neville, Michael Cullanine, John Maguire, Tom Conway, John Collins and the Maxwell families.

Many of the men worked on the railroad. The three Mahoney brothers — John, James and Michael — were involved with railroad work, guarding crossings and laying track in the three towns of Dowagiac, Decatur and Mattawan. Starting out to work early in the morning on the hand cars (the kars) wasn't easy work. The hand car was a small four-wheeled platform the width of the track, centrally fitted with a pumping device on the top side and manually operated by four men. At one time between Decatur and Glenwood, there was a bad hand-car wreck. The men had time to jump before an oncoming train crashed into the small car. Fortunately no one was killed; however, one man sustained injuries. Often between Decatur and Glenwood, flocks of wild turkies and partridges, as well as many small animals, were seen from the hand car.

Following the custom in Ireland, nearly every family had a cow and a pig. Butchering parties were an institution in the winter time and a good time was had by all! Every family had enough "sweet pork" to last them for the year! The Irish kids were raised on pork and cabbage!

Part of their entertainment was "an organ in the parlor" where all gathered for a "sing." The two blind children, john and Mary, of Anthony McKay were sent to a school for the blind where they were trained to be singers. They earned their living by singing professionally. Once a year they returned to Decatur and every one gathered to hear them sing. Flannagan's Ball was one of the favorites.

Another big day on the entertainment calendar was — Donnybrook Fair (Domhnach Broc) — later called Hamilton Fair. It was a big event and the young boys arose early and walked from town to the Donnybrook Fair — many of them — barefoot. There were horse races (with some of the best horse-flesh in Hamilton Township), speakers, pop corn, ice cream, taffy, etc.

Before the Catholics had a building, Mass was celebrated in a room above one of the stores. It was an improvised set-up and Michael Mahoney carried the confessional on his back, from his home, to the place of worship. The priest, Father George Clarson, came from Paw Paw on Saturday once a month to celebrate Mass on Sunday. It was a long, cold ride in the winter time. (Horse and sleigh)

The Irish wakes were well attended and after the rosary was recited, the relatives and friends spent the remainder of the night in friendly conversation and conviviality.

Maggie Murphy Ray was one of the colorful business women on Main Street. She was widowed, and together with her daughter, Jennie, managed a restaurant and candy shop. Maggie was an unusual person and a typical Irish woman. Everybody went to her with their troubles and she carried their burdens along with her own. She was ever ready to help a care-laden neighbor. Her store was a meeting place for the young people in the evening and she entered into the spirit of their fun and conversations. She was a familiar figure for many years on the streets of Decatur followed by her bulldog "Moose."

Among the Irish who have distinguished themselves in the entertainment field in the present century are Harry Lillis Crosby (Bing), Dennis Day, Francis Sullivan (Fred Allen), Ed Sullivan and Gene Kelly.

HATS OFF TO THE "ISLE OF THE SAINTS" — In spite of the overwhelming prejudice found in the new land, many of the Irish vaulted from peasantry to professionalism in two generations!!

Three Leaves of Shamrock

When leaving dear old Ireland, in the merry month of June,
The birds were sweetly singing, all nature seemed in tune:
An Irish girl accosted me, a sad tear in her eyes,
And as she spoke these words to me, bitterly she cried:
"Kind sir, I ask a favor, O, grant it to me, please:
'Tis not much that I ask of you, but will set my heart at ease,
Take these to my brother, Ned, he's far across the sea,
And don't forget to tell him, sir, that they were sent by me."

Chorus
Three leaves of shamrock, the Irishman's shamrock,
From his own darling sister, whose blessings, too, she gave.
"Take these to my brother, for I have no other,
And these are the shamrocks from his dear old mother's grave.

"Tell him since he went away how bitter was our lot:
The landlord came one winter's day and turned us from our cot;
Our troubles were so many, our friends were very few,
And, brother, dear, she often used to sight for you.
'O, darling son, come back,' she often used to say,
Alas, one day she sickened and soon was laid away;
Her grave I've watered with my tears, that's how these shamrocks grew;
And brother, dear, they're all I've got, and these I'll send to you."
Chorus

A fellow went into a bar and met a friend of his who looked terrible — two black eyes, broken nose, a few teeth missing and his arm in a sling.

His friend exclaimed, "What happened to you?"

The injured one replied, "I was living the life of Riley" and the friend queried — "So what?" "Black eyes" replied — "Then Riley came home!"

AN IRISH LEGEND

Whoever's born on Christmas
Is favored from the start;
Has laughter and good fortune
And a contented heart;
Is loved by noble company,
Has all that should suffice.
But he that dies on Christmas
Goes straight to Paradise.

MISS FOGARTY'S CHRISTMAS CAKE

As I sat by my window last evening, the letter man brought unto me
A little gilt-edged invitation, saying, Gilhooly come over to tea.
I knew that Fogarty's sent it, so I went out of old friendship's sake,
And the first thing they gave me to tackle was a piece of Miss Fogarty's Christmas cake.

CHORUS.—There were plums and prunes and cherries,
Citron and raisins and cinnamon too,
There were nutmegs, cloves and berries,
And the crust it was nailed down with glue.
There were caraway seeds in abundance,
Sure 'twould build up a fine stomach ache,
'Twould kill a man twice, after eating a slice
Of Miss Fogarty's Christmas cake.

Miss Mulligan wanted to taste it, but really 'twas of no use,
For she worked at it over an hour, but couldn't get none of it loose,
'Till Fogarty came with a hachet, and Kelly came in with a saw,
That cake was the worst, by the powers, to paralyze any man's jaw.

O'Hoolehan took with colic, McNulty complained of his head,
McFadden lay down on the sofa, and swore that he wished he was dead;
Miss Daly was took with histerics and began for to wiggle and shake,
All the men there swore they were poisoned from eating Miss Fogarty's cake.

A SALUTE TO POLAND

No welcome greeted our entrance into Poland. Crowded, chaotic, another world, it was no haven for travelers. The brusque questions of passport officials and my inability to speak the language made me realize I was, indeed, behind the Iron Curtain. My liberty was in my American passport; I clumg to it for dear life.

It didn't help that our luggage was lost, and our hotel reservations refused. We never thought to bribe the desk clerk. Americans don't expect they need to; after all, confirmed reservations mean just that. We were to learn that bribery is the way of life. Our indignant complaints got us overnight accomodations in a second-rate hotel thirty five miles away. We thought anything was better than sitting all night in a hotel lobby. It wasn't.

Being persistant, a trait inherited from our Polish grandparents, we did not take the first flight home. We waited to see if the second day could be as bad. It wasn't. It was the start of an exciting adventure.

Poland was not as I imagined. I read about it, and heard stories of it, though my grandparents seldom spoke of it, except to tell how hard life was there. They were immigrants of the 19th century, traveling steerage across the ocean for opportunities in America. Farmers in the old country, they took any honest work they could get; laboring in factories for a small wage, giving their energy to the expansion of our nation. They scrimped and saved for the time they could farm again, just as many of the Slavic settlers who came to Decatur in the 1920's. Industrial cities like Gary, Chicago, Hammond and Detroit were a magnet to those hardworking immigrants. Our family settled in Chicago, which holds a population of Poles second only to Warsaw, an ocean and a continent away.

The bonds between Poland and America are inextricable. Poland's heroes, Thaddeus Kosciusko (1746-1817) and Casimer Pulaski (1747-1779) were also heroes in the American Revolution. And in a way, Americans are heroes to the Poles, whose interests have historically focused on the West.

After that first day, we were no longer strangers. We were often approached and asked if we knew relatives in Buffalo, Chicago, Detroit or Cleveland. And we were staunchly defended if mistreated by the minor authorities.

I thought about my ancestors as we journeyed through Poland. They had traveled by foot or in carts on the routes we toured. Perhaps we Polish-Americans, Slavic-Americans, had lost our roots, taking little pride in our heritage because we did not know it.

It seems appropriate, especially in this Bicentennial Year, to recall our 200 year American heritage, and to take pride in our ethnic culture of 4000 years.

Poland's written history is more than 1000 years old. At one time, it was the largest country on the European Continent, stretching from the Baltic Sea to the Black Sea, encompassing all the Slavonic people. Throughout Poland are reminders of a glorious age. Every town has a magnificent church. Crakow, always a center for liberal arts, has Wawel Castle and St. Mary's Church. Both contain masterpieces of European Gothic art. Czestochowa is the "Lourdes of Poland."

Independent and individualistic, Poland, alone with England, preserved the tradition of parlimentary government at the close of the middle ages. Ironically, lack of a strong central authority, and geographical vulnerability led to foreign invasion, and the eventual disappearance of the Polish state. All Poland had left was its people. Enslaved for two centuries, they were to suffer worse in the devastation of World War II. Six million Poles lost their lives. Much of their country was reduced to rubble. Warsaw was 90% destroyed. But, the Poles are survivors. This characteristic was the inspiration for her national anthem, entitled, "Poland is not yet lost, while yet we live."

Still, all is not somber in Poland, colorful traditions have been preserved. In spite of the trevails of their past, perhaps because of them, the Poles are ebullient pleasure-loving people. Music, dancing, conversation, food, drink, are greatly enjoyed, (not necessarily in that order). Hedonistic pursuits are, however, tempered by religious fervor. It has been a bastion of Catholicism for a millennium.

Not all of Poland's glory was lost with her past. It lives on in the scientific discoveries of Copernicus, Curie, Heweliusz; the literature of Kochanowski, Mickiewicz, Sienkiewicz; the music of Paderewski and Chopin.

THE JEWELL FAMILY

In the spring of 1867 a young Sergeant Major, newly discharged from Company B. of the New York regiment of the army of The United States, mounted his cavalry horse, Pal, a gift from Uncle Sam for his part in the worst war in history, and headed west to find his fame and fortune.

After numerous stops along the way, he settled in Northeastern Oklahoma territory and set up a small blacksmith shop.

Shortly thereafter he met and wooed the daughter of the local tribal chief of the Choctaw Cherokee tribe living nearby. After a short romance with this dark eyed and dark skinned beauty, named Shining Star (called Naoima in American tongue) they were married in a tribal ceremony, and she traveled with him to the little frontier settlement of Greenway, in northeastern Arkansas.

Once again, young Lenuel Watson set up his blacksmith shop and settled down to raise a family.

First born of this union was a beautiful half-breed baby girl called Opal (Julia). When Opal (Julia) was about seven years old two brothers and a baby sister joined the family in due time.

Being the daughter of the local blacksmith, life did not seem at all harsh to this young beauty only one generation removed from the wilds of America's Frontier. Young Lenuel was a good provider and a hard worker so his family grew up with love and enjoyed the things of life provided in those frontier days.

When young Opal reached young womanhood she met and was married to Lemuel Jewell, the fifth child of a pioneer family which had settled in the red hills south of Greenway. John and Della Harmon Jewell left Elizabethtown, Ky. and reached their homestead in the spring of 1883. Young Lem was two years old when he made the trek to the west. He grew up helping his father keep nine mouths fed by scratching in those red hills growing corn, vegetables, cotton, tobacco and fruit, such as peaches, grapes and apples.

Upon young adulthood, Lem followed the timber cutting business by helping to carve cross ties for the railroad, in those days ties were cut from an appropriate sized tree with a "broad axe" and many is the day he sweated and toiled to earn less than one dollar.

In June of 1901, after two years of marriage, Lem and Julia were blessed with the arrival of Johnny Fay Jewell; the first child of their marriage. When young Johnny was about three his mother, this half wild daughter of Lemuel and Naomi, died in childbirth while giving life to a daughter, named, appropriately Opal (she of the dark eyes). Two days later this baby also died. In his grief young Lem, now broken hearted with the loss of his loving wife and daughter, again took to the woods to provide for young Johnny, and left the raising of this youngster to his mother and father. Lem never again remarried and carried his love of this wonderful wife to his grave. He died at the age of 41 in the winter when his only grandson (whom this story is about) was in his first year.

Johnny Fay grew up on the family farm and knew the love and devotion of grandparents, seeing his father only occasionally. As a result they were more like brothers than father and son.

Johnny Fay, being the shy sort never dated many girls. When he met Beulah Varble, the daughter of a logger, who had also come to the Greenway area from Kentucky, with his five children after the loss of their mother when the youngest was just a baby, Grandpa Varble moved to the little settlement of Trumann. Johnny followed shortly and worked for his father-in-law to be.

In March 1921 John and Beulah were married in civil ceremony in Trumann and John went to work to raise a crop of cotton and help log in the woods, for his father-in-law, Clay Varble. They moved in with Dad Varble and in the following December, on a cold Christmas Eve nite, the subject of our story: James Orval Jewell, put in his appearance. The following year John moved his family into the town of Trumann and went to work in the lumber mills of the Singer Sewing Machine Company.

Young Jim welcomed a baby sister, Lorene eighteen months after his first appearance and they grew up in an atmosphere of love and devotion. John was a good provider for his family and spent long hours teaching Jim and Lorene the lore and love of the great outdoors.

In the fall of 1937, when work in Trumann was waning, John came to Benton Harbor, Mich. and worked in the foundries of the steel industry. Just as he was about to send for his family, he was laid off and in order to provide for his family came to Decatur and went to work for Drew Tuttle on the muck land west of town.

"My earliest memory of Decatur is coming around the curve north east of town to shop with my parents for furniture at Art Galehouse's second hand store." says Jim. "Later when I drove into town for the first time, Russell Cramer was there to direct my parking in front of John Nutt's barber shop."

My mother and dad sacrificed to send me to high school, and I too, like Edgar Bergen and many of the oldsters of this area, crawled on my hands and knees and weeded onions and celery to help pay for gas to get to school and to have a couple dollars to go out on the nite of my graduation with the class of 1940 from central high school in Dowagiac.

"Possessed with a good speaking voice, and the love of people I had always planned to follow a career in boardcasting and singing," Jim reported in this interview. He developed this talent and in the years from 1940 to 1942 he played many a street dance in Decatur from the old band stand and regularly broadcasted from radio station W.T.R.C. in Elkhart, Ind.

With the advent of World War Two, Jim joined the United States Coast Guard and served four years. During this time he was fortunate enough to spend two years in the electronics school at the University of Wisconsin and New London, and Groton, Conn. He served for two years on the coasts of Washington and Oregon where he was in charge of numerous service divisions concerned with the upkeep of lighthouses and radar beacons for the PBY and Blimp Fleet Flying Patrol against possible Japanese invasion of the Pacific Coast.

Upon his discharge in 1946 he moved with his parents onto the former Emo Drenth farm just north of town (on the curve) on North School Street. In June of 1946 he married the lovely Theresa Michalski of South Bend and went to work for A.C. Brigham as a plumber and sheet metal apprentice.

At the same time he began a small radio shop in his home. At Decatur's Centennial in 1948, with the help of A.C. and Bud Brigham (his brother-in-law) he bought the public address system that was used for the appearance of Decatur's favorite son, Edgar Bergen. To this day, being a shy person, Jim has never mentioned this to Edgar (even when he visited Edgar and his family in Calif. some years back).

Shortly after the Bergen appearance Jim sold the amplifier to the Decatur Public School (courtesy of the P.T.A.) and invested the money in a 14 in. Admiral TV set. Thru the courtesy of Raymond Gale, he obtained the Admiral franchise and began, along with George Lindsley and Cecil Page to sell television in Decatur. "Not being satisfied to just sell TV, I went to school and learned how to give the finest service available to my customers," reported Jim.

Not being satisfied to work only 8 hours a day Jim took the Civil Service Exam and qualified at the top of the roster for the job of substitute clerk carrier. From 1947 to 1953 Jim was a familar sight in the Post Office and relieving Lynn Stickney on the city route. Upon the death of Fred Kirk in 1952 Jim was appointed permanent clerk in the office by Postmaster, Herb Creagan.

In the spring of 1952 Jim and Theresa decided to build a new home to replace their modest home at Lake of the Woods. After much dickering he traded a TV and antenna to Judge and Sena Hughey for the lots on which they built a new brick and stone home. When their first son, Jim was born in the fall of 1952 he was welcomed by Judy and Janet. (Judy is now married to Jim Hanson. They live between Decatur and Lawrence and are the proud parents of nine (9) lovely children. Janet is married to Rick Copenhaver, who at the present is finishing his doctorate degree at Western Mich. University and she is in her second year of RN training at Kal. Comm. College. They have three lovely children, so Jim and Theresa can lay claim to twelve wonderful grandchildren, who have become their source of joy and happiness in their old age. Their youngest son, John, was born in May, 1958; this coincided with their purchase of the "West Side Grocery," which they operated until 1964 when Jim helped his classmate of 1940, Dale Lyons, establish "Park Estate Homes." The following year Jim helped Bob Benincass of Dowagiac build a Ford dealership in Decatur and the following year he became a general insurance agent for the Amalgamated Labor Life Insurance Company of Kansas City, Mo. Upon the establishment of a working agency he went to work for Richardson Homes, Inc. of Elkhart, Ind. and in 1972 formed "Knight" Homes, Inc. and upon the sale of "Knight" in 1973, operated a "Rain Soft Water Softener Franchise."

In 1973 Jim founded "Diamond J Enterprises," a sales organization devoted to the furthering of the careers of young persons who show an aptitude for sales. With home offices in Decatur and various offices scattered throughout the country, Jim is kept busy helping his people.

In a recent interview, Jim said, "The future of this great state and country is in the hands of your children and mine. I find no greater joy than working with the young people of today. Never in the history of our great country have our young people enjoyed a more interesting time to grow up. Ours has been a "labor of love" for I can't think of anything more rewarding than working with the youth of today and Tres and I are looking forward to at least another thirty years to serve and live in the most wonderful community in the world, Decatur, Michigan, 49045."

P. S. If there occurs no change; our phone is (616) 423-8180 and I will welcome a collect call at anytime if I can be of service to any youth who feels I can be of help.

With sincere congratulations to Catherine and Monica Howland who have devoted over a full year of their life and countless resources to bring this book to the public.

THE LINCOLN PENNY

Not on the eagle golden shall we behold his face,
Nor yet on gleaming silver the honored features trace;
But to the common copper, the lowly coin instead,
Is given the distinction of bearing Lincoln's head.

The millionaire may seldom its noble outlines grasp,
But childhood's chubby fingers, the image oft will clasp.
The poor man will esteem it and mothers hold it dear—
The plain and common people he loved when he was here.

THE FINE ART OF FROGGING

Luther Lundy was born November 30, 1877, the youngest of eleven children of Robert and Adelina Longsduft Lundy, in Marcellus Township, Cass County, Michigan. The family moved to Nicholsville, Michigan in 1879 and Luther later located in Decatur, in 1903, where he roomed in the big Lyman T. Rawson house at the southern outskirts of the village. At that time, Peter Ickes was renting the house, which was later destroyed by fire in 1917. A. Vandermolen was the owner at the time of its demise.

While the family still lived in Nicholsville, one of the sons, Irey, became very sick. Dr. G. Rose of this village attended him, and during the winter made twenty-seven trips with bob-sleigh or cutter to the Lundy home with Grant Mabry, his beloved and faithful old negro driver. Neither snow nor ice were barriers to the conscientious doctor as he made his rounds to the sick. Oftentimes he stayed on into the night if the patient was critically ill.

Some weeks later the father called at the office to inquire about the bill, explaining that he was unable to pay it immediately. The doctor informed him that the bill covering the twenty-seven trips would be twenty-five dollars. The father was speechless — but the good doctor quickly assured him — "We'll let the rich balance it out!"

Luther was a stone mason and for many years worked with Ed Morland and Harve Taylor, both of whom were masters at their trade. Some of his work can be seen in the stone work of Dr. W. P. Bope's and Dr. Richard Huyck's homes; also, in the home of the late M. S. Carney (presently owned by Mrs. Merle Leighton). There are small squares of stone imbedded in the stonework which were laid by Lute Lundy.

Lute had an avocation — frogging! He used a light wagon and ponies for transportation and carried his boat in the wagon; also, a jack gas light or torch, gunny sacks, hook and line, and wooden tobacco pails.

He worked all the lakes in the vicinity of Decatur — Swift Lake being the best. He went far afield, including lakes in northern Indiana and Kalamazoo County. The lakes near Three Rivers and Union, Michigan were two of his favorite spots.

He caught the giant bull frogs by hook and line in the daytime — and used a jack-gas light or torch at night. A trick he used in catching them at night was in stunning them on the head with a quick chop from the palm of his hand. The average weight of the frogs was three-quarters of a pound, but some of them tipped the scales at one pound. He caught several dozens a night and netted about twenty-five or thirty dollars a week.

Lute also enjoyed field frogging and Frank Rosewarne's farm was one of his favorite haunts. One night he caught seven dozen grass frogs not far from a small pond in Three Rivers.

The frog legs were shipped to Chicago via the M.C.R.R. in wooden tobacco pails, with a chunk of ice nestled in the center of the container. Later he constructed slat crates of laths and shipped the frogs live to the restaurants in Chicago.

The late Doctors Dalton K. Rose, William P. Bope and James E. Maxwell were enthusiastic participants on many of those frogging expeditions.

HARLEY E. SQUIER

Harley E. Squier was born September 20, 1861 in a log cabin near the old Samuel Rich homestead which was located in the vicinity of the Charleston Cemetery. His parents, Mr. and Mrs. David A. Squier, moved into Decatur while he was quite young. David A. Squier went into business in a general store during the early 1860's. Harley received a good grade-school education, and held several positions in Decatur, before he became the manager of the Hinckley Stave Mill in Breedsville. He served as County Clerk in Paw Paw from 1893 through 1897. While County Clerk, Mr. Squier was a member of a quartet, formed with other people connected with the County Courthouse. This quartet traveled to Lansing to sing at the inauguration of the new Governor in 1896. They made the trip by horse and buggy. In 1898 and '99, Mr. Squier accepted a position as a salesman for the company that sold gas street lights, traveling by stage coach and on horseback, to introduce the gas lights to Kansas City, Portland, Seattle and many other communities.

Harley returned to Michigan in 1901 and placed his wife, Sadie Brown, in the Phelps Sanitorium, where she passed away in 1902. Mr. Squier was the chief clerk at the Sanitorium from 1901 to 1904, when the Sanitorium closed on account of financial problems. He returned to Decatur and ran a dairy farm from 1905 until 1919, moving then to Buchanan, Michigan with his second wife, Bertha Jennings Squier and their children. Mr. Squier served as City Tax Assessor of Buchanan, and on the County Board of Berrien County from 1932 until 1951.

He took his only aeroplane trip two weeks before his eighty-fifth birthday in 1946, from Battle Creek, Michigan to Cleveland, Ohio and spent four days at the National Air Show and National Air Races. This trip was one of the highlights of his long life. He passed away on March 8, 1959, after a long illness, and was buried in Oak Ridge Cemetery at Buchanan, Michigan.

OLD FASHIONED CHRISTMAS

You ask for a memory story
I'll endeavor to pen each line,
As my thoughts go slowly trailing
Down the lanes of time.

I'll begin with an old fashioned Christmas
A Christmas of long ago,
When we waited in church for old Santa
Eyes that sparkled and cheeks all aglow.

The tree that was heavily laden
For each some candy, nuts, and a toy,
And tho they were inexpensive
To us it brought worlds of joy.

And all thru the years that are passing
Tho still I am many years young,
I hear those same beautiful carols
As each Christmastime they are sung.

The scene of a Sabbath morning
There is the old family pew,
Where we listened so intently
To those wonderful tales ever new.

But again my thoughts are wandering
As down the trail they lead,
To the old village school house
Where we first learned to write and to read.

The most thrilling event of my school days
Was the year they built the tower,
And we'd watch the hands of old tick tock
Slowly creep to the closing hour.

With a rush that was near a panic
Thru the grove at a rapid pace,
I don't wish to sound like a braggart
But I usually won that race.

There, brick by brick it went upward
Until it reached a dizzy height,
When the thought of someone falling
Would send us away with fright.

But scenes are ever changing
As down the trail we go,
To old familiar faces
Of friends we used to know.

To old board walks and cobble stones
And the workman who dropped his hoe,
Just in time for me to kick it
And so painfully stub my toe.

The scene at an old time fire
The old time bucket brigade,
And the old lamp post on the corner
Are all relics of many decades.

With a chuckle I watch the young folks
As they speed in their cars ever so new,
As compared with that dear little roadcart
So cleverly built for two.

Those wonderful walks in the country
Where the greatest thrill we could seek,
Was a climb to the top of old Fifields' hill
Tho it left us lame for a week.

Spring beauties that grow by the wayside
In every fence corner and nook,
And those lovely golden cowslips
That nestled so close to the brook.

On the banks of the brook in the summer
I'd loiter and bask and tan,
And there dream of the dreams of childhood
As only a youngster can.

But my dreams were never of riches
Of gold or of treasures galore,
But of trips I'd make to cloudland
And of thrills that were held in store.

For there by the hour I'd go sailing
Away up to the tip of the moon,
But oft I'd come back disappointed
When the journey had ended too soon.

Those dreams like the days of my childhood
Are faded and passed and gone,
But in my heart they live and relive
Like the echo of a twilight song.

The church and the old village school house
Their bells no more will chime,
But in memory they ever lead the way
When we stroll down the lanes of time.

For each year has left its imprint
And added a bit of care,
But there's joy and pleasure and sunshine
If we'd but look for our share.

I find it is not thru riches
The path of true happiness lies,
But those who rejoice in simple things
Find the pathway that leads to the prize.

So each year as the years are passing
No matter if stormy or fair,
I tenderly place it in my memories book
And tuck it away with care.

Now when I tire and weary
Of jazz and of rhythms and rhyme,
With my thoughts I go in seclusion
There to trail down the lanes of time.

SCHOOL CRAFT

A "big Island" with big trees is the way School Craft residents refer to a twenty-four acre tract of virgin timber — to be preserved — Michigan Nature Association.

The name "big island" was given to the area by early settlers when the tract was about 600 acres.

At that time in the 1830's it was an "island" in the middle of Prairie Ronde — a prairie for which the town was later named.

The new preserve would be named the Stanley B. Smith Nature Preserve. Smith, who was born in Schoolcraft in 1895, died here in 1962. He was a descendant of Thaddeus Smith, who is said to have walked from Vermont and became an early settler.

Baby's Feet and Hands

I.

A baby's feet, like sea shells pink,
Might tempt, should heaven see meet,
An angel's lips to kiss, we think,
A baby's feet.

Like rose-hued sea flowers toward the heat
They stretch and spread and wink
Their ten soft buds that part and meet.

No flower bells that expand and shrink
Gleam half so heavenly sweet
As shine on life's untrodden brink,
A baby's feet.

II.

A baby's hands, like rosebuds furled,
Whence yet no leaf expands,
Ope if you touch, though close up curled,
A baby's hands.

Then, even as warriors grip their brands
When battle's bolt is hurled,
They close, clenched hard like tightening bands.

No rosebuds yet by dawn impearled
Match, even in loveliest lands,
The sweetest flowers in all the world—
A baby's hands.

GET IN AND RIDE

I was trudging one day down a dusty road,
While my back was curved under a bit of a load,
And the way was long and my feet were sore
And my bones ached under the load I bore!
But I struggled on in the summer's heat
Then, resting a bit I shouldered my load,
And wended my way down the dusty road,
The morning stretched into the afternoon –
My hourney's end seemed as far as the moon
Till at length a horse and a wagon drew near,
And my heart revived with a spark of cheer,
But the man saw only his own small soul,
And the narrow way to his narrow goal,
And whipped his horse into a guilty trot,
Though the sand was deep and the way was hot,
And he passed me by on the dusty road,
And I sank still lower beneath my load,
Yet out of the dust came another man,
And he pulled up short, and he gaily cried,
"I say there, comrade, get in and ride!"
And he placed my bundle behind the seat,
And he said, "Climb in here now, and rest your feet!"
I never pass by a man on the road,
An' "speshly, friend, if he's got a load."
And my feet were rested, my heart was light,
And i blessed the driver, who gayly cried:
"I say there comrade, get in and ride!"
Oh! the world is full of sore-footed men
Who need a slight lift every now and again,
And the agels can see through the white cloud rift
All the God-like souls who give them a lift.

VERSE

So live – that you can give –
When placed beneath the sod,
A soul as bright as the morning light!
Back to its Maker – God.

MOTHER

Whenever life seems sad and drear
And hope seems to depart,
I always think of Mother
And the love that's in her heart.

She is so thoughtful, kind and sweet,
I never can repay
The little things she does for me
In her most helpful way.

And then, whenever things go wrong,
She always seems to care;
She guides and helps me all she can
To make my troubles rare.

All joys of mine are not complete
Unless she shares them too;
Her loving interest reflects
Her kindness through and through.

Though other things may change each day
For better or for worse,
Still Mother's love lives on and on
In riches or reverse.

She never fails to remember me
Each hour and day and year,
So nothing is too good for her,
My pal and friend sincere.

—Josephine Bertolini Comberiate

AT MY MOTHER'S GRAVE

Oh, humbly and penitent
I kneel here on my knees.
As tears fall down I pray to you,
"Forgive me, mother, please!

"I know I was a thoughtless child
Bent on my own way
But here I kneel,
My mother dear,
And ask you to hear me pray.

"I'm sorry for the times I hurt,
I'm sorry I was cruel;
And as you often said
I had to learn in Life's hard school.

"So that your death was not all in vain,
I'll strive to never again cause pain.
And as my teardrops fall anew
I pray for forgiveness from you."

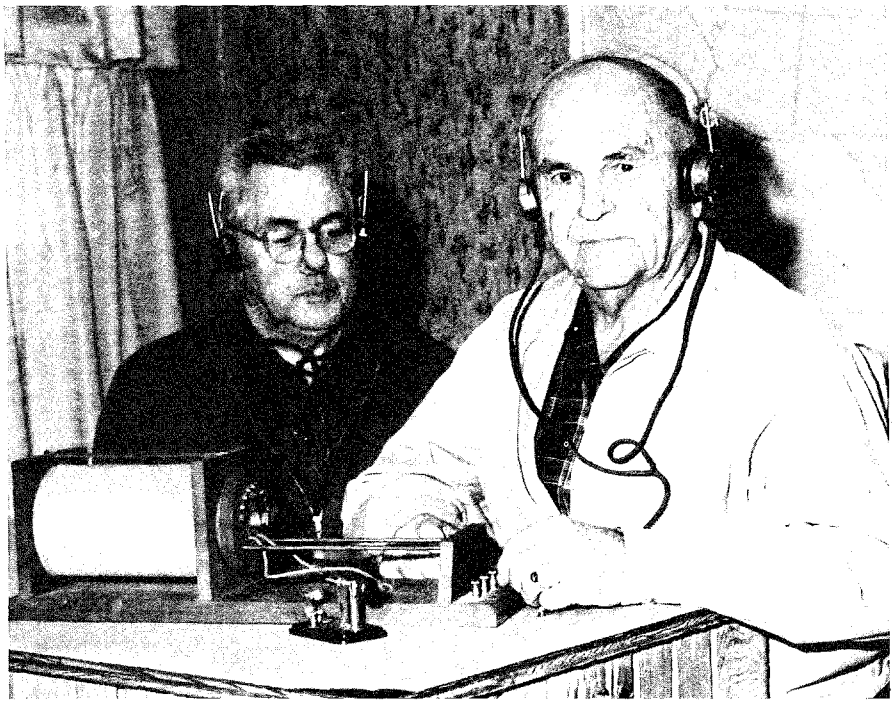
George Lindsley, Frank Barber Recall First Wireless Election Returns in 1920



THE 1920 presidential election returns were the first to be received by wireless. In Decatur, George Lindsley and Frank Barber, using the rig built by George, picked up the voting results from Great Lakes and Arlington and took them to the Republican office where Mr. Moulton took them to the old LaPearl theatre where they were flashed on the screen. Frank was a first-class radio operator in the Navy and was able to receive the results which were transmitted in code. Voice transmission was good at the time but only reached about 15 miles.

ELECTION RETURNS
BY WIRELESS

Ex-Navy Operator Received Information from Great Lakes and Arlington Stations on Presidential Count

Decatur received its first election returns sent out of the state by wireless. The reports were received at the home of W. G. Lindsley, north of Decatur, where his son, George, a senior at [illegible] was pressed into service to take off election returns sent out from the Great Lakes and Arlington government wireless stations.

Frank Barber, an ex-navy wireless operator sat at the receiving instrument of the Lindsley equipment all Tuesday evening and took from the air all such information concerning the presidential count as were sent out. Mr. Barber is an experienced operator, having served in the Navy wireless service more than two years during the war period. He was recently discharged and is spending the fall at his home in Hamilton.

The first reports were received at about 10 o'clock and were followed intermittently by reports from each station.

[illegible] reports showed the [illegible] not [illegible] to be in the Republican column with [illegible] Connecticut, Vermont, Massachusetts, New York, Illinois and Ohio. Kentucky was early added to the Democratic column.

The outfit at the Lindsley home is an excellent one and lacks only the transmitter, which it is doubtful if the government would permit an amateur to use. George has learned the machine and enough of the code as to be able to receive the time twice daily, at eleven o'clock a.m. from the Great Lakes station, and at nine p.m. from the Arlington station.

The wireless reports of the election were received by telephone at the Republican office and transmitted to the LaPearl theatre, where they were thrown on the screen.

The British Isles

Had it not been for the great potato famine of 1853, my sister and I would no doubt now be cutting and stacking turf on the beautiful Emerald Isle from whence our grandparents emigrated. We landed at Shannon 6/28/69 and played it by ear 'til embarking on the Queen Elizabeth at Southhampton, July 26 - arriving New York July 31.

It was not easy to adapt to a right-side steering wheel with a left-hand shift, at the same time remembering to drive on the left-hand side of the road. We were enchanted with the indescribable freshness of the countryside. Ireland is indeed a jem of rare beauty with its lovely lakes and mountains, its quaint, rose-covered cottages surrounded by stone-fenced fields with their varying shades of green such as no other land can boast.

We drove all of nine or ten miles the first afternoon and stopped at Dromoland castle - a 1,500-acre estate - former home of the O'Briens. The castle is a joy with its beautiful furnishings and magnificent paintings and the grounds are lovely - including a lake, golf course, lily pond, hermit's cave and forests of intriguing and pompous trees. You may have read about it in Town & Country. We lingered there a day and a half. Many of our next stops were "B&B" (bed and breakfast) homes - comfortable but modest. One would never perish from the heat in any of them.

On Galway Bay we were thrilled to see hundreds of swans swimming about in all their regal majesty. From there we took a steamer to the Aran Islands, about a three-hour trip, and disembarked at Inishmore. The jarveys, wearing home-spun trousers, were lined up at the dock with their horses and jaunting cars. A very soft-spoken Islander asked, "Would ye like to ride with me?" It was a refreshing experience. The island is bleak & lonely with hundreds of stone fences inclosing small plots of land. We passed many centuries old Gaelic cross memorials along our fifteen-mile trek. We bought a knitted belt from Maggie O'Ryan on a country lane and learned that she was in the picture "Man of Aran" filmed on the island about fifteen years ago. The men of the islands build their own boats, called curraghs, which resemble oversized canoes. They fashion a wooden frame and cover it with tar-smeared canvas. We returned to Galway about seven p.m.

The next day we were off to Connemara and visited a pub that evening. There were five musicians. One of the instruments was a uilleann - a type of bagpipe with arm-operated bellows. Two girls and two boys danced the typical Irish jig which was most entertaining. At intervals, other guests were called upon to do their "thing" - usually a ballad.

One of our memorable evenings was spent at Bunratty Castle out of Limerick. The doorman, butler and ten lovely girls were all in medieval dress. First we climbed the winding stairs to the great room where the kings of old held court seated in the huge, carved, wooden chair before a long table. The walls were hung with massive tapestries, exquisitely carved wooden scenes and huge Irish elk heads. Here we were given Mead to drink (honey base as I recall) while listening to one of the harpists sing and play. Presently we descended to the banquet room for dinner. The butler welcomed us from a small balcony overhead. Our only service was a dagger - soup was drunk from the bowl and like all the soups served in the British Isles, was most delicious. This was followed with ribs, chicken, bread and sponge cake covered with wine. One of the guests was thrown into the dungeon for misbehavior. Following the banquet we were entertained with song and harp by the beautifully gowned and talented Bunratty Singers. From the banquet room we descended to the basement, where, in the presence of a high Irish elk skeleton, were served coffee as a goodnight gesture.

The lakes and mountains of Killarney are enchanting. Here we spent three days (half a day driving the ocean sconic Ring of Kerry) and many miles riding the jaunting cars along the trails resplendent with varicolored rhododendrons, rose of sharon, yellow iris, elder blossom bushes as high as a house and myriads of other unknown shrubs and trees -- all fresh and sparkling from the frequent showers.

Of course we kissed the Blarney Stone and have a silly picture to prove it. Visited the Kennedy Park and John Kennedy's cousin, Mary Kennedy Ryan, in her unimposing cottage. There were many pictures of the Kennedys on her walls, although we didn't see any of Jackie.

Ireland is a country of walkers and we had no hesitancy in sharing a ride with hitchhikers (an unheard of procedure in this country unless one enjoys living dangerously). The extreme friendliness of the people is heartwarming. We were told by a couple of world travelers that Ireland has the friendliest people in the world; however, we did little traveling in northern Ireland! After eight hundred miles of driving, we gave up our car in Dublin. About 10:00 A.M. one Sunday morning we hailed a taxi and asked to be taken to the Giant's Causeway. I don't believe the driver had ever heard of it, but we were on our way. At a filling station he learned it was about a 300-mile round trip so, enroute, we stopped at the town of Drogheda so our cabbie could attend Mass. (He was on his way to Mass when we hailed him in Dublin). In the interval we visited a cathedral where Blessed Oliver Plunkett's head is displayed in a glass case. All was calm and serene as we passed through Belfast. The Giant's Causeway is a phenomenon of intense interest. It is a series of polygonal, basaltic columns which are extremely fascinating. We arrived back in Dublin at about 2:30 A.M. There were no horse races in Dublin so we engaged the same driver to take us to Dundalk the next day, about forty miles north of Dublin, to a steeple chase. All of our nags finished last or next to last and not wanting to swim home -- that ended our horse betting. Would recommend "Jury's" in Dublin for good food and splendid entertainment.

That evening we arrived at Edinburgh, billeted at Hotel Caladonia. We were thrilled by the sight of Edinburgh castle, dominating the city from a very high peak, one side of which is built on the edge of sheer rock. This imposing castle is an ever-present reminder of the ancient days when Robert the Bruce ruled the kingdom. In this spacious courtyard, each fall the famed "Tattoo", featuring many of the clans of Scotland dressed in their colorful kilts, is held. Time did not permit our visiting the world-famous Royal Botanical Gardens in Edinburgh -- 60 acres of horticultural treasures -- as we had a flight out of Glasgow the following morning for Copenhagen.

We had quite a "hassle" in Copenhagen, the taxi drivers couldn't speak English and we couldn't speak Danish. The streets are extremely wide and they drive like maniacs, miraculously missing pedestrians and bicycles. It is frustrating to be driven to the "Baltic" Hotel, especially at midnight, when we had asked to be taken to the "Viking" Hotel. We spent the first evening at a beer hall -- "Sing Along with the Jolly Danes" -- all sat (except when dancing) on benches at long tables. Beer was served in huge stines. Five or six musicians were on stage at one end of the hall -- everyone sang and most everyone danced (but not on the floor) -- all dancing was done on the benches. You simply stood up in place and did your "thing" in time to the music. It was hilarious and we were grateful to have escaped with unbroken necks! The next afternoon we took a North Sealand tour which gave us an opportunity to see the well-kept farms with grazing cattle and world-renowned, plump pigs (almost 2 pigs to every Dane). Many of the homes have professional-looking thatched roofs which is becoming a lost art. We also passed picturesque, huge windmills. Their farming system is cooperative and seems to function very satisfactorily. This trip included a tour of Frederiksborg Castle, 100 rooms, beautifully furnished with ornate furniture, paintings and tapestries.

It is now Sunday, July 20. After Mass we visited Copenhagen's foremost attraction, fabulous Tivoli Gardens, an amusement park on a 19 acre plot in the heart of the city. At intervals, high-stepping horses, followed by uniformed marching men, emerge from one side of the entrance out to the street and back into the gardens. All is gayety, fun and color. Within are music halls, band shells, puppet shows, dance pavillions, pantomimes, restaurants, fireworks, lakes, lagoons, magnificent flowers, trees and shrubs, billions of varicolored light bulbs surrounding the lagoons, trees festooned with light bulbs and lovely balconies from which to view the panorama. At night it is an enchanting fairy land. Their music hall is massive and we attended both the afternoon and evening symphony. Once the doors are closed, no one is admitted and all is perfection. More than four million people a year visit Tivoli. After Walt Disney went through the grounds he announced "I thought that Disneyland was unique, but now I have seen the original."

Monday afternoon, preferring the country side to the city, we took the Danish Riviera Tour, passing the famed Carlsberg Brewery whose owners have done much for science and art. We stopped at "Louisiana" whi h was a "way-out" modern art museum, little of which fell within our realm of comprehension. The next stop we could appreciate, a delightful sea-side resort where we were served the famous Danish pastries. We visited Kronborg Castle, overlooking the sea, where the Ghost of Hamlet's father walked the battlements. Many of the rooms were unfurnished and on the whole it was gloomy and depressing; however, the baby ducks energetically swimming about in the moat, gave the exterior a glimmer of cheer. From there we took a ferry to Helsinborg, Sweden. The ferry was jammed with Swedes laden with Danish hams, bacon, butter, eggs, etc. We did some shopping and then returned to Denmark. That evening we had dinner at Lorrys, a wonderful spot for food, drinks and entertainment. They even had horses and seals on stage, marvelous entertainers with wonderful voices; no hippies and no jive. Years ago the Danes learned that cigar smoking was less detrimental to health than cigarettes, so, by and large they switched, including the women old and young, all smoke long, slim cigars.

The next morning we were off for London. We had been trying since our first arrival at Glasgow to make a room reservation with no luck, but Scandinavian Airlines finally located one at Park Lane Hotel not many blocks from Piccadilly Circus. Time was running out for us. In two and a half days we couldn't do justice to the world famed city of London. Piccadilly Circus is an engaging spot, a tall shaft topped with "Eros" in the center and at the foot, six or seven circular steps surrounding it. It seems to be a mecca for hippies, male and female. There are hundreds of them sprawling on the steps and milling about the circle, dirty and unkempt-looking, many with bedrolls, as fascinating to watch as a den of serpents. Periodically the bobbies would hose the steps down to clear away the debris and they would reluctantly move out of the way. We took the two bus tours of London and were thrilled with the sight of centuries old landmarks that we had read about since childhood. The changing of the guard at Buckingham Palace was very colorful and impressive. While we were waiting, three or four horse-drawn carriages trotted up the long mall, carrying diplomats to pay respects to the Queen.

We felt we couldn't leave England without visiting the birthplace of Shakespeare. We learned that Stratford-on-Avon was about one hundred miles west of London so engaged a private car. It took hours to drive out of the city of London and we were amazed at the vast wooded areas and open fields within the city. At one spot there were hugh herds of deer roaming freely. Our route took us through the Cotswold Country. We were told that many consider this the most delightful part of England. Most of the homes are built of honey-colored Cotswold stone and are very picturesque and quaint.

British Isles Concluded

The fame and wealth of this territory was built up in medieval times by the woolen industry, originally started by the Monks in the 13th century. In later years, the sheep gave way to the growing of corn. The great charm of the whole area lies in the feeling of peace and calm that pervades the towns and countryside. Even their streams are placid and unhurried. This would be a delightful spot to relax for a few days. We stopped at Lygon Arms for lunch and it was a dream. This inn has provided travelers in the Cotswolds with food and shelter for over 400 years. We were loath to leave. All of the rooms were bursting with fascinating antiques.

At Stratford-on-Avon we passed the new house and gardens that Shakespeare had built for his mistress. Ann Hathaway's cottage was as charming as the pictures, surrounded with lovely flowers. Her father owned 95 acres of land which had been in the Hathaway family for 13 centuries and some of the furniture, particularly the beds in the upper chambers, gave rise to the thought that they, too, had belonged for a like period of time. Enroute back to London we passed Eaton, Oxford and Windsor Castle (legendary shrine of British monarchy) arriving our hotel about nine o'clock.

We left the next morning (Saturday) at 8:00 o'clock to take the boat train for Southhampton where we boarded the Queen Elizabeth II. She sailed to Le Havre first to take on passengers and supplies. It was fascinating to watch they myriads of sailboats and other crafts enroute. The Queen is so huge, we felt like rats in a trap, very puzzling to find our way about. Our biggest disappointment was a deck on only one side of the ship. However, it was a pleasant experience - good entertainment - good food - interesting people. Mass was celebrated each morning in the theatre and a movie was shown each afternoon and evening. We had deck chairs on the upper deck and tea and sweets were served each day at 4:30. Arrived New York, Thursday morning, July 31 at 9:30. We waited a couple of hours to clear customs, took a cab to Newark airport and got a flight out that evening and arrived South Bend about midnight. We were very weary but a surprise welcoming party from my office gave us a lift in more ways than one, including transportation to our little shack in the woods at Decatur, Michigan. "Be it ever so humble - there's no place like home."

THE LITTLE ROADS OF IRELAND

The Roman roads run outward from the city on the hills,
And Holland's roads will take you by gaily painted mills,
Small pathways of the East will lead to China's ancient wall --
But the little roads of Ireland are loveliest of all!

From Dublin Bay to Galway - from Cork to Derrytown
From Antrim to Killarney they ramble up and down;
And though you are ten thousand miles from where they twist and wind,
The little roads of Ireland stay forever in your mind.

Wednesday — Froze solid last night but thawed very little today.

Quinton & I took our hogs to Marcellus today. I drove Tom & Bill & Quinton drove John & Kit. Hank High came over to help load up. I took 7 of the large ones on my load. They weighed 2,010 lbs & Quinton took 7 on his load that weighed 1761 lbs. Watson took 2 for himself. We got $380.56 for them.

Watson pd $15.00 for the Berkshire sow that we sold him last summer. She was a good investment for him. She raised him 10 pigs. He sold 5 of them for $2.00 and cheap at that. He has 5 left that are 4.50 apiece. He got $26.80 for the old sow making a total of $59.30 for the investment. I got 2 new shoes put on Tony's hind feet & one for shoe reset.

Feb. 3, 1876

Tuesday — Snowed nearly all day — about 2 in — Not enough for sleighing.

I helped Hank High butcher 3 hogs this forenoon & went over about 4 o'clock & helped him weigh — one weighed 100 & the other 200 lbs. & he had cut up one that was about the size of the smallest one.

Quinton went over to the mill & got the lumber of the 2 logs that I drawed over there was about 400 ft. of it they charged $1.70 for sawing it.

Feb. 4, 1876

Friday — Colder last night but has been a tolerable snug winter's day.

We chored around this forenoon & hitched up the oxen & drawed 2 small loads of wood on the sleigh but it is tough sleighing yet.

This afternoon Quinton & I went down to the swamp & cleared out a road to get some rails & we fetched up some poles for the sheep shed.

Juliet & someone else went to the West Valley school with Hank High. He took our wagon Lib Scott, Frank Morland & Mary Jane Thompson came forward & are going to be baptized. Sharp came back & is preaching there now & he is getting his share of Bier's converts.

Feb. 5, 1876

Saturday — Sharp & frosty last night with a strong southeast wind this morning, but the sun has shown all day.

Doc & I drawed 3 loads of cornfodder this forenoon it is a good deal damaged on acct. of being blown down so much. We drawed with the oxen & mudboat. Quinton chored this afternoon so we went to town with the spring wagon. It is splendid wheeling & did not get home til dusk. (attended Grange)

There was a tin peddler by the name of Bartlett from Kalamazoo stayed here last night. He had a boy with him to drive teem & take care of them for him. He stayed here about 2 yrs ago.

It skinned her off hind leg some & makes her some lame. We hitched her up again after dinner & drove up to Rosewarnes & back & then Quinton & I took bird & Colonel & went to town.

We got 2 barrels of salt one for John Scott & one for our own use paid $1.45 per barrel for it.

I received of A.N. Chamberlain $21.12 of primary school money & $1.40 library.

We got home about sundown. We saw the account of Hank Morris & his wife's murder in the paper. It was the 1st that Jake & I knew of it. The rest of our folks went to the funeral this afternoon. It was estimated that there was 1500 people & 458 teems in the procession — the largest funeral that had ever been known in this part of the country & the most excitement. If the people could have got hold of the villain that done the deed they would have linched him on the spot. The horse was found running loose in South Bend.

STORIES AND POEMS - BY LOWELL MATTOX

Faded Memories

"Back Pete! Back Barney! Whoa boy." All right kids. Jump off. There is your new home." These spoke my father Aaron, the early 1900's. How many times was I to hear these words repeated. For dad was a pioneer homesteader. Working on the roads we moved many and we would arrive at another homestead to be used for some family.

We had chinned off the wagon tongue into the dead grass yard. We explored the house, barn, and cabin of the previous occupy. The floors were wood colored and creaking on a log sill. The roof was a small affair. Dad always said "If you have enough low neighbors for chickens and manure you don't have to clean".

Dad had half Jordean and Scot blood in him and if he had any education, he would have been a fine "Vet" As it was he was a book and music lover. He took what had and had not to have. His sentiments were known & liked by many and could share them, but my first love was the woods and still is.

I've heard my folks tell when they were married in 1900. Dad was skidding logs to the saw mill. The men built them a wide shake roofed cabin with tar paper and there I was born in 1901. The furnishings were mostly home made a one legged bed in one corner, a cupboard in another, a table at one side, at a second stay hand chairs, a cook stove and other items, a little green glass lamp for low cents, which all still shine. Displayed are often of unpublished dollars for a bottle of My Sister was four years younger than I. We walked to school from a half a mile to a mile and one half. Country Schools in those days were rough, and Starting the first day was an ordeal. The boys would form a half circle around the new comer then the bully would step out. "What is your name?" "How old are you?" "I can lick you" etc. Sometimes the best answer was to hit him on the face with my dinner pail. He became your friend after that. Teachers were both good and bad.

When my sister started school she could read a little and write. She was left handed which displeased the School master very much. So he whacked her fingers with a ruler many times. She went home that night with a badly swollen hand.

Dad went over to the teachers boarding place and told him off. "Nature must have intended her to be left handed". I'm not telling you what you can do but what she is going to do. You whack that little fingers again, and I'll break every one of your hands!" Many teachers of that day would not be permitted to teach school today.

By present day standards Schools were poorly equipped. A large stove that burned wood. The teachers desk and chair. Desks and seats nailed to the floor for the pupils. On a shelf in the hall was the water pail and tin cup from which (all) drank. If one pupil had a cold sore on the lip sore all were affected. Quite often we had to carry water from a neighbouring farm house. The teacher was found to do the janitor work. Sometimes a pupil could be found to help.

Christmas was near, snow and slush. It was cold for there were no heaters in the school rooms.

There was one neighborhood label boy I had worked for a cousin, one of the best farmers in the township. He did all his planting, roofing and fencing according to the signs of the moon. I don't know if that made any difference but he was one of the most successful farmers in the district. A lot of the poor farmers were Kentuckians who had been driven from their homes after the Civil War.

Most of the people get along fine. If a man were sick everyone turned out to put in the crops or harvest them until he was able to look out for himself. One family moved into the neighborhood who was a burden to the family and a bit light fingered. He was visited by a crowd of men with pillow cases over their heads. He was given a choice to reform or leave. He moved out the next morning.

One man I remember well was Old Preacher Jimmy. He was a farmer. There was no church in the hill section in the school house. He preached, married and buried but would take no money. "My farm supported me" he said. Years ago on the sermon we read at a work bee he was always there. If a house and contents burned he would drive around and collect household furnishings to give the burned out family a new start.

I remember the year of 1910. That was the year of Halys Comet. It looked like a big star with a long tail. If you are still alive in 1985 you will have a chance to see it. Many people were frightened as they thought the earth would be destroyed. Ours was an age of superstition. We kids were told that a horse hair put in rain water would turn into a snake. That killing toads or spiders would make the cows give bloody milk. These beliefs have largely vanished except in remote sections of the country.

That same year, we had been going to school for several weeks barefooted. School was kept later that year and on June 3rd. it snowed. At noon we kidz went out and made a fox and Geese ring in the snow And did ya we catch X-1. when we got home

The day before Christmas that same year was warm and sunny, we ran around the playground without coatz on. But after the Holidays winter came long, cold and deep snow.

When I was about seven years old my father made me a bow and arrow. It was a crude affair but still I learned to use it. It has been replaced many times by bowz of hickory, ash and sassafras to my present one of osage orange, I have owned many guns but none have taken the place of that first bow. I have ever loved the woodz and the wild creatures that dwelled there. I studied their habitz and why nature had so endowed them.

I have noticed in recent years that childerns toyz are all bought. If we wanted a top, bow, crossbow, slingshot or kite we had to make it ourself, but kidz of today are lacking in skill & with a jackknife.

Changes came. I have seen the board sidewalk give way to concrete. The kerosene lamp and the old lamplighter with his kerosine can and ladder replaced by electricity. The old hitching rack by the parking lot. The blacksmith by the garage. Perhaps it was for the best but our once ~~quiet~~ quiet life has been shattered by two world wars, leaving us on a state of uncertainty We do have more luxury, medicare and conveniences but have lost the spirit of self independence

In 1918 the Spanish flu swept across the country. Many died. But it seemed strange to me that the rugged and healthy looking died and the frail looking ones survived. The same year the big blizzard came. Just before noon Dad said "we're going to have a bad spell of weather. See that old sow carring straw into her house. After dinner we're going to haul up a lot of wood" We brought to the woodshed two large loads of beech and maple

The weather became colder. I milked a bucket full and hung it out of the barn cats reach. Before I could milk another pail full the first had started to freeze. After sundown the blizzard struck. at dawn the snow was piled high. we were in the hill country and there were no modern snow removal equipment

I put on my snowshoes, took a bag of corn and went to the woods to feed the birds. In a few weeks they lost all fear of me except one old crow. We had enough pork, flour and potatoes to see us through, but ran out of coffee and kerosene. Had parched some barley which took the place of coffee. For a light he melted lard in a saucer and put a wick in it. He called it a bitch light. It smelled horrible and gave about as much light as a piece of chalk.

During the First World War, and two years after times were fairly good. Wages and produce prices were good. We had no sales tax or income tax. A certain amount of lawlessness followed the war as it usually does. A law was passed making it illegal to make, sell or drink any alcoholic beverage. Many people were killed and many were made wealthy. It was not a success, the law was revoked.

Then came the depression of the 30's. Some people can still remember it, but young people can have no idea.

of the misery and suffering it brought. The W.P.A. was started to furnish work for the jobless. I was foreman over about twenty-five men. They represented about every race, occupation and belief I learned more about the human race then be put into a large book. Picture a rocky hillside on a cold march day. men with axe, pick and shovel. The careless, happy laugh of the negro The buzzing Consonant of the Slav. The soft drawl of the man from the Ozarks, the musical voice of the Indian.

A fair picture of these Steppons of Depression

Most of the farmers were hostile to the work gang as they needed help on the farms. But no man could support a family on the wages they offered.

Then came World War II. Factories opened. Workers rushed in from the South. Then ~~the~~ followed price fixing, job freezing and rationing. Work in War plants paid good even tho we were taxed about one days wages out of five. I missed the freedom of the outdoors. Rationing was bad and probaly unnecessary. The war made rich men richer and thinned out the surplus population. Indians on reservations and white youths of eighteen were drafted but were not allowed to vote.

If During the war I married a girl from the South. After the war I went back North to work in a state forest. I liked it there. People were isolated enough to be friendly. They were mostly Swedes, Finns, French Canadians and Indian. There were all kinds of fur and game animals. Rivers and lakes were well stocked with both game and pan fish. My shack was eighteen miles from the nearest town.

There were old apple trees, lilac bushes and lilies planted bye the Mormons who had been driven from their old home on Beaver Island in the 1850s. But the thin soil and frequent frosts made farming impossible. The people left and Nature came back to claim her own.

I was getting a bit old for woods work so I followed construction for a time. I was forman for an outfit from Fort Wayne. Most of the help was easy to get along with I would rather not have men from the same town where I live. They were apt to resent taking orders from a foreman they knew. Also a mixed gang is a pain in the neck. Northern and Southern Whites and N.o.S. blacks.

I followed this line of work for about fifteen years until and injury landed me in a hospital. The insurance was quite reluctant to paying up, but after two years of legal wrangling, I received a fair settlement.

So many things have changed or gone completely. The old time peddlar. The Pitt Rawleigh and Watkins man with soap, extracts, spices and linamint.

The tin peddler with milk pans, pails, cups and dippers Two huge sacks, one for white and one for colored rags were on the back of the wagon. For a big sack of rags you could get a tin cup and the handle generally fell off the first time you used it.

Then the pack peddlar. We always called him a Jew, altho he may have been a Syrian or Armenian. His wares were needles, pins, thread, shoelaces, buttons, thimbles and nutmegs. It was a good idea to stab them with a needle. If it was good oil would come out. Gypsies came by with their covered wagons. They traded horses. Their women told fortunes, begged and stole anything that was not nailed down

1 Characters and odd happenings.

When I went to the armory for a physical during World War II, I passed every test except vision. On reaching the ground floor I was accosted by a husky young lad who wanted to know if I had passed.

"Everything but my eyesight" I told him.

"I didn't pass either and I really wanted to go"

"Whats wrong with you" I asked altho by that time I had a pretty good idea. "They gave me a paper but I can't read it." "Here I read it out loud". The paper said rejected for mental deficiency. "Whats that" he asked.

Well I hate to hurt anyones feelings so I finally told him "its nothing that will hurt you but you may never get over it." He laughed "Well if it don't hurt me I don't care if I never get over it"

I've thought of that poor fellow many times, Wondering What became of him. What his previous surroundings were that made so eager to go.

During the 1870s and '80s the farmers of S. Michigan were plauged by gangs of horse thieves from the Kankakee Swamp. The worked by night. There were no State Police. Only a County Sheriff & so they were seldom Caught. Farmers formed what was known, as The Anti Horse Thief Association. My father walking home late at night met two men driving a team and leading another.

They bummed a chew of tobacco and inquired the nearest way to the State line. He recongized the lead team but said nothing. He woke the nearest farmer who collected a gang of men and set out in pursuit. The thieves were captured one half mile ~~for~~ from the Indiana line.

This tale was handed down to me as it happened long before I was born.

For years, summer and Winter alike there was a woman who walked the railroad right of way pulling a ~~little~~ little wagon or sled, the contents covered with a blanket. She would speak to no one. Where she slept, What she ate was a mystery. Today the police would have found out about her. But at that time people were allowed to live their own life without interference as long as they bothered no one

After this woman was found dead near the railroad Under the blanket was found a complete set of silver ware Had she seen better days and salvaged the silver from her other possissons? Or had she been a servant to some wealthy family and fled with the silver? no one knows. There was no identifacasion and she was buried in ~~on~~ an unmarked grave.

One old farmer I remember. many times I watched him walking down the street, whip in hand, his long white beard fluttering in the breeze. The beard was almost his undoing:

One day the grain binder on which he was riding failed to function, so Old Jim jumped from his seat and stuck his head in the Machine to see what was wrong. The horses started forward and his beard received a sharp tug. He took th team to the barn and hitched to the buggy. His old maid daughter came out "Where you going Pa" "I'm going to town Minnie" "Wait a minute. I got some butter and eggs I want to trade in".

On reaching town, the old man tied his team and headed for the barber shop. "Cut them off and give me a shave" He passed his daughter several times. She had never seen him without a beard. Finally "I got your trading done Minnie", She knew the voice and broke out crying "Why Pa. You darned old fool."

Well I guess thats about enough characters because I'll bet there are a lot of people in this town That regard me as a character. I heard a southerner said I was the "quarest critter he ever seed". He's all the time totin a book around. They tell me he'll set down and read a book plumb thru just for pure pleasure" I

The natives of this town regard me as a ~~Communist~~ COMMUNIST for believing that a laboring man is a human being and should be treated as such. I've found there is both good and bad in people of all races and ~~of~~ beliefs Each person is an individual separate from others.

Of course I believe that from birth to death there is a path that each must follow. It may be short or long, straight or crooked. Some paths may have more rocks an ~~bear~~ briars than others. All things that happen to you is for your betterment and some day you will know why. I believe that the Great Power that gave you life, Gave life to every living creature. Therfor it is wrong to kill heedlessly or distroy the things of Nature without reason. Lots of people will not agree with any of this but this I believe.

"ALL THE TIME TOTIN' A BOOK AROUND."

Wendigo

Pierre the breed had gone insane
The hunters met him in the wood
He did not say "Bo Zhoo" but screamed
And ran as quickly as he could.

The 'Mounties' picked him up next morn
With tattered clothes and bleeding feet.
They caught him as he madly dashed
Thru prickly ash and bitter sweet

They brought him bound back to the Post
And locked him safely in a cell
For days on end he raved and tossed
Just like a tortured soul in hell.

Until one day Pierre grew calm
And woodsmen came thru snow and cold.
And sat outside the steel barred door
To hear the story that he told.

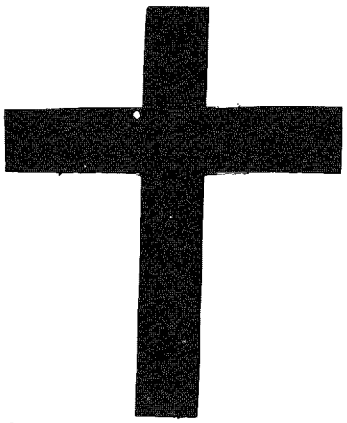
He told them of a horrid thing
A monster taller than a spruce
Whose eyes shone like the fox-fire glow.
With spreading antlers like a moose

His voice did hold a witching note
It echoed like the thunder's roar
Sometimes 'twas like a babbling brook.
Or wild waves dashing on the shore

"Who gazes on that face is doomed
He first goes mad then lingering dies"
The listening trappers crossed themselves
And fled with terror in their eyes.

One day at dusk he stood erect
"He's come for me again" he cried
With horror stamped upon his face
Pierre the breed fell back and died

"He was insane" the factor said
That might be true I wouldn't know.
But all the trappers roundly swore
Pierre had met the Wendigo



The Legend of the Poplar.

'Twas springtime in the North land
When first was told to me
The story of the cruel cross
Carved from the poplar tree.
Near twenty centuries ago
Back in the Holy Land
When Roman rule upon the Jew
Had laid a heavy hand.
There came a simple carpenter
Our grief and sins to bear
To die upon a cruel cross
A crown of thorns to wear.
So when no breeze is stirring
The quivering leaves you see
In sorrow for the Son of Man
Who died upon the tree
And on the burned o'er wastelands
According to His Plan
The poplar tree springs up to hide
Destruction wrought by man.

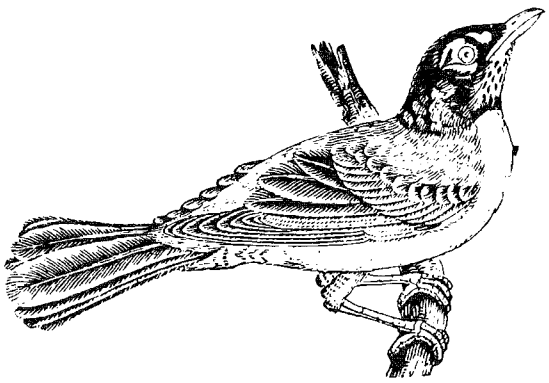
The Woodsmen Prayer.

On Sunday loud the church bells told
To call the city folks to prayer
In stately churches built on busy streets
Where music, candles and the spoken word
Bring thoughts of peace and quiet to their souls.
To me the woods have been a sacred spot
Of all abiding quietness and peace
My music is the sighing of the pines
Of singing birds that flit from tree to tree
Singing their praises to the One
Who watches o'er each single destiny from day to day.
My incense is the wild grape bloom
And flowers colored by a Master Hand,
My candles are the fireflies o'er the swamp.
Or glowing fox fire on the rottening log.
And when my evening fire burns low
'Tis then these thots burn in my inmost mind.
"Oh Gardian Spirit of the Ancient Wild
Guide Thou my footsteps as I walk life's twisted trail
I know not what may lie 'round yonder bend
And guard me from the quicksands at the side
Or Widow maker* hanging over head.
Help me to know the Wisdom of Thy Plan
To love Thy creatures all both great and small
And grant me knowledge for the day when I must walk,
That far flung pathway in the Starry sky

* Widow maker – and over hanging limb.
* The pathway in the Sky – The Milky Way – The pathway of souls.

Smoke

A group of men stood by the station ~~door~~ door.
Joking, laughing and waiting for the train
To bear them to their nightly scene of toil.
They punch the clock and gaze into the smoke
That swirls like heat waves 'neath a sultry August Sky.
Thru windows smoke begrimed, the fading sunset
Casts its farewell gleam.
Ans from afar the stars come out
Pinned on the black robed beauty of the night.
The piping frogs send forth their mournful cry.
The tiny harbingers of coming spring.
With senses dead to all of these
They hear the bandsaws snarling scream
The drumming tamper adds its sullen note.
At last with sleepy eyes they stumble from the train
And each one homeward wends his weary way.
They do not hear the robins sprightly song
Nor turtledove's soft calling to his mate
And wonder came to me that men should toil
Within these haunts
Their ancient kinship with the earth forgot.
While nature loudly calls on every hand.



The Exile

There is an old tarpaper shanty
On the wild Au Sable's shore
And my homesick heart is pining
Just to be back there once more

When the wild geese have gone over
And the springtime is at hand
Then my heart is ever turning
To that fair and distant land.

Summer comes, then fleeting autumn
Warns what winter has in store
When the snow swirls through the woodland
And drifts on the river shore

Through the snowy endless forest
Where mans foot has scarcely trod
Makes you feel that you are nothing
Brings you face to face with God.

On the Windows here in Memphis
The rain beats fierce and free
And the mighty Mississippi
Murmurs to the wide levee.

And some day I'll throw the shackles of the southland from my feet
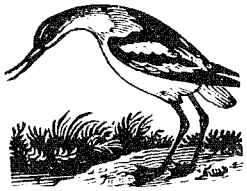
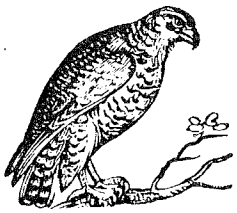
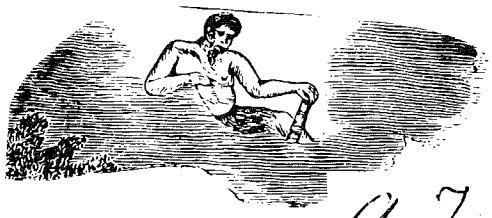
And start a drifting Northward,
To a land that can't be beat

There the tall white birch is gleaming.
There my heart is, Heaven knows.
To that old deserted shanty
Where the singing river flows.







A Forest Dream

A pulp wood by his fire
Had wolfed his lunch ~~than~~ than seemed to tire
His head down to his chest did creep
Then all relaped did fall asleep.
The eastern sky was filled with light
A radiant figure, dazzeling bright
The Mighty Forester came down and stood
To pass out judgement on the wood.
And all the crooked trees that grew
And all with rotten hearts He threw Down to the earth. But all the good
Were left there standing in the wood.
The pulp wood noticed then
That all the trees appered as men
With face and figures that he knew.
It seemed that he was transformed too.
But as the axe drew near to him
To cut him down both root and limb
He turned to flee and loudly spoke
His vain regrets. then quickly woke Twas but a dream. his fire burned low
He took his axe and turned to go Back to his work. But still it seems
There was a warning in his dreams.

The Chips of Life

It was many and many a year ago
When I was but a lad.
Down there the woods we drove one day
Just two of us – I and my dad.
We could hear the sound of the choppers axe
And soon drove up by him.
An Old, old man all withered and bent
And his strokes lacked vigor and vim.
I scoffed a bit after we went by
At the feeble showing he made
But Dad looked thotful, and took a chew
And my smile began to fade
"His axe like him is 'bout worn out
He's so old he can hardly stand
Don't judge a man by the chips he throws
But the axe he holds in his hand."
Oh, many the years that I come and gone
But the memory still stays with me
When I see someone make a botch of things
It's not the chips I see
I ask myself "what chance had he Had he money, friend or land?"
Then I know why of the chips he throws
By the axe he has in his hand.
When the Big Boss calls "It's quitting time".
And my work on earth is thru
May I be judged by the tools I had Instead of the chips I threw.

:: LAST ADVENTURE ::

I know not to what distant land I'll go
  The day I ride into the blazing sunset bright,
Where there will be no sorrow. pain or woe
  Beneath the dazzling radiance of His sight.

I'll shrink not when I feel that icy breath,
  From thorns of doubt my pathway will be clear,
And to that last adventure men call death,
  I'll go as I have lived -- without a fear.

Raiders Open Gridiron Season At Mattawan

The Decatur Raiders will open their 1976 football season at Mattawan this Friday. This first contest will be a non-conference battle and the first game for both teams.

Last season the two met to open the season and Decatur downed the young Wildcats 28-6. This year the Mattawan squad will have 19 lettermen returning and will be coming off a successful 6-3 season last year.

The Wildcats won their last four games of the season in 1975 and should have muscle momentum coming into this year's action. The Mattawan team will be deep at most positions with eight starters returning on offense and seven on defense.

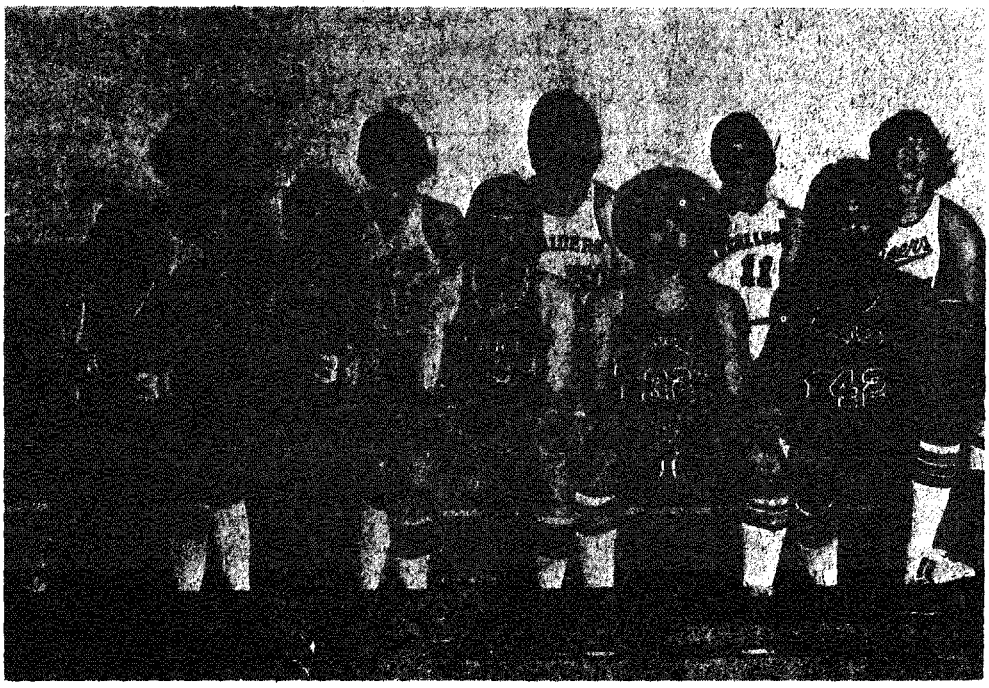
The Raiders will be very inexperienced, losing many of last year's players through graduation. Only seven players are lettermen from last season.

Steven Groendyk and Dave Mroczek will be among the returnees who will help for a talented, but small nucleus. Groendyk has been moved from line to fullback and should add needed power to the backfield. Buck Warkentien and Jim Smola are working at quarterback with Dave Mroczek, Bruce Bohn and Gary Kruegar also seeing action in the backfield.

Defensively Groendyk and 220-pound Bob Taylor will anchor the line. Other experienced defensive men are Brett Ferras and Gary Penning who should help greatly.

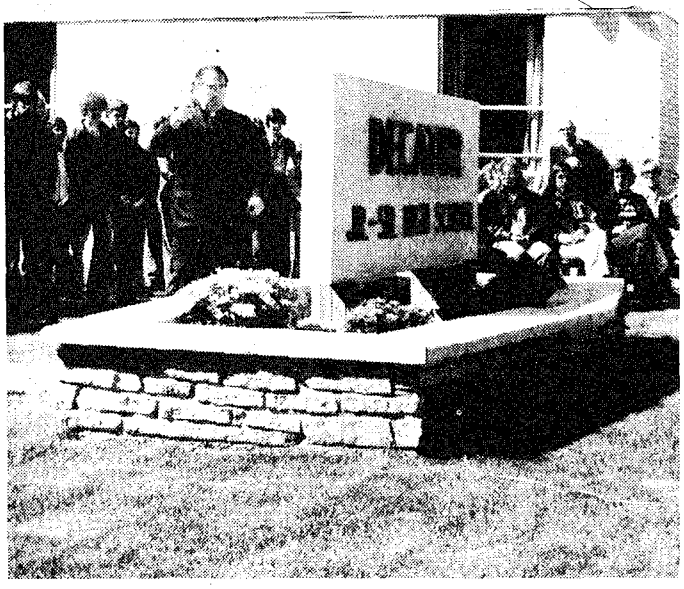
The inexperienced Raiders will be tested strongly in this first game and good support from their rooters will be a big boost. Game time is 7:30.

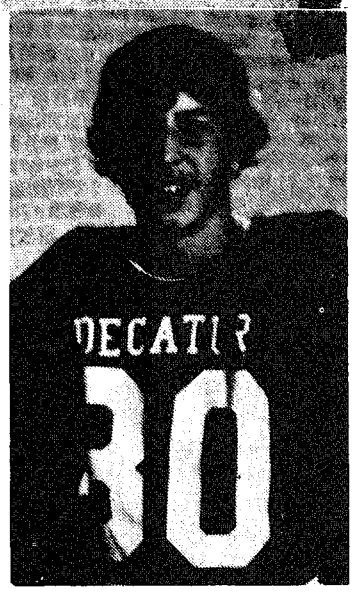
SAC All-Conference Teams



DECATUR HAD FOUR out of the starting five on the 1975-76 basketball squad picked to one of the SAC All-Conference teams or receiving honorable mention. The first team is pictured in the front row: Jim Overley and Captain Kurt Wiese, Decatur; Robert Vandenberg, Martin; Lonnie Lewis, Marcellus and Steve Bradley also of Marcellus. Back row is the second team: Goldman Greene, Bloomingdale; John Lepley, Lawton; Steve Groendyk, Decatur; Dave Mason, Marcellus and Jim Mason, Lawrence. Raider Matt Leighton received honorable mention.

Tim Jankowski Memorial Dedication Held Last Friday





Pictured above is a dedication service for the "Tim Jankowski Memorial Sign." The service was conducted last Thursday by the Rev. Walter Spillane of Holy Family Catholic Church. Among those present at the dedication were Tim's family: Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Jankowski, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Rybarski (Tim's brother-in-law and sister, Mrs. Robert Pike (Tim's sister), and several other relatives. Others present included friends, several members of the Board of Education, Superintendent Hellenga and the members of the senior class (Tim's graduating class).

The combined efforts of many people made the "Tim Jankowski Memorial Sign" possible. The financing was made possible through the Tim Jankowski memorial fund and the Decatur Board of Education. All of the labor, including the architectural fee, was donated. The architect was Guido A. Binda and Associates of Battle Creek and the excavating was done by Dalton Kinney of Decatur. The foundation and cement work was completed by Roy and Marvin Christensen and the brick work by Bruno Dragan and Leonard Jankowski, all of Decatur.

It is hoped that the "Tim Jankowski Memorial Sign" will stand as a lasting memory of an excellent young man who was a model student, a good athlete, and a wonderful person.

LIBBY BROWNING

The period was the early 1900's. Libby Browning was the charming daughter of the proprietor of the popular Browning Drug Store, which burned in the early part of the century.

Miss Browning had a romantic courtship with William H. Clark, the dignified operator of a furniture and undertaking establishment on Phelps Street. After the marriage they lived in the white stucco house on the corner of St. Mary's and Phelps Street across from the Webster Library.

William H. Clark (Old Billy) had a tall, gaunt figure, and when dressed in his black swallow tail coat, made quite an imposing image as he sat on the high seat reserved for the driver of the hearse. He drove a matched, black team - wearing black fly nets (in the summer time) and used a sleigh in the winter time.

In later years Libby became infirm, almost to the point of being a hypochondriac. She remarked to a friend one day that she was "comfortably sick". Her husband, Old Billy, waited on her hand and foot. Lacking plumbing conveniences in the homes of that era, he carried a portable stove (during the winter months), filled with hot coals, and placed it in the little building at the rear of the house, for her comfort.

In the summer season, he attached several umbrellas to the branches of a shade tree to insure her of maximum protection from the sun. Then he carried her outside, and propped her up in pillows. Such was the life of "Milady" as she enjoyed a leisurely sickness!

When Libby was a girl, she lived in the "Old Browning House", which is the stucco house on the north-west corner of Sherwood and William Streets (directly across from the old Dexter Brigham home). The big yard was enclosed with a white picket fence, and she proudly related in later years to a little girl (Margaret McAndrews), how she and several of her girl friends, dressed in their crinoline and hoop skirts, waved to the "Boys in Blue" (during the Civil War), as they marched past her home on their way to the depot to depart for war assignments. Some of those boys never returned!

MOTHER SHIPTON

By: Jean Newton

There exists an amazing amount of alleged information about Mother Shipton - with regard to whose very existence paradoxically enough - there is no dependable proof.

The maiden name of this, in all probability, imaginary, reputed witch and prophetess - said to have been born near the close of the fifteenth century, in Yorkshire, England - was Ursula Southill; her mother, Agatha, also believed to be a witch, was known as "the Devil's Child."

History (lies agreed upon) has it that at twenty-four, Ursula Southill, whose actuality is a question, married Tobias Shipton. The prophecies subsequently turned out to be confessed forgeries.

Among them was the foretelling of the end of the world in 1881, which three score years ago created an international wave of excited apprehension.

Genuine or fake, and regardless of whether Mother Shipton was a real being or not, the following, which is the most popular of the prophecies attributed to her, do credit to a fertile imagination.

SHIPTON PROPHECY

In twice 200 years, the bear

The crescent shall assail,

But if the cock and bull unite

The bear shall not prevail.

But look! In twice 10 years again

Lett Islam know and fear

The Cross shall wax, the Crescent wane,

Grow pale and disappear.

It was first published about 340 years ago. Here it is:

Carriages without horses shall go,
And accidents fill the world with woe.
Around the earth thoughts shall fly
In the twinkling of an eye.
The world upside down shall be,
And gold be found at the root of a tree.
Through hills men shall ride,
And no horse be at his side.
Under water men shall walk,
Shall ride, shall sleep, shall talk.
In the air men shall be seen,
In black, in white, in green.
Iron in the water shall float,
As easy as a wooden boat.
Gold shall be found and shown
In a land that's now not known.
Fire and water shall wonders do.
England shall at last admit a foe.
The world to an end shall come
In eighteen hundred and eighty-one.

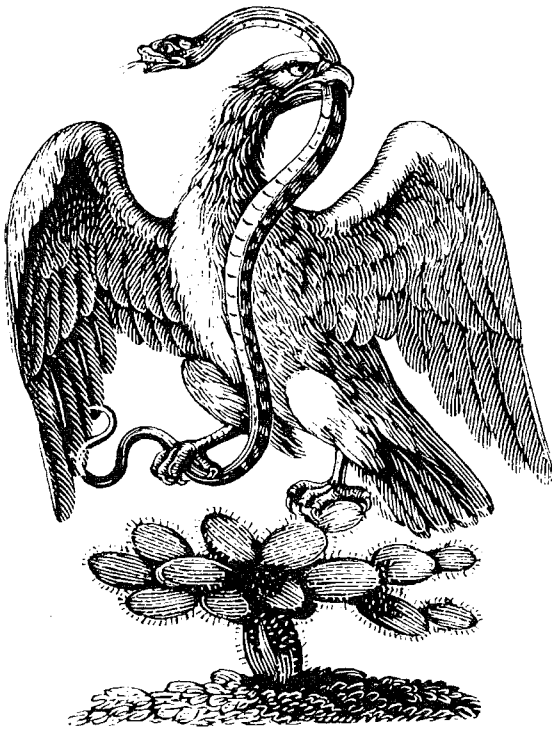
The significance of this symbol

Centuries ago, while North America was a vast wilderness, the eagle was esteemed in many parts of the world as a symbol of power, courage and freedom. Rulers displayed this bird as an emblem of authority and unity.

In tribute to the judgment of the Founding Fathers, a variation of this eagle figure was adopted by the American Historic and Cultural Society as the insignia of its continuing program to Honor America.

The characteristic emblem, containing the nation's colors, is an eagle in red and white profiled against a bell-shaped blue background dotted with 13 white stars representing the original American colonies, and all encircled in a ring of 50 gold stars. The latter compose the make up of the country on its Bicentennial Anniversary.

The Honor America program, customarily held from June 14 to July 4, was designed to broaden the familiarity of the American public with its cultural heritage, constitutional form of government and history and to commemorate the anniversary of the independence of the United States of America.



RICHEST MAN IN BABYLON

TELLS HIS SECRET

© COPYRIGHT 1926-1930-1946
BY GEORGE S. CLASON

IN OLD BABYLON there once lived a certain very rich man named Arkad. Far and wide he was [illegible] famed for his great wealth. Also was he famed for his liberality. He was generous in his charities. He was generous with his family. He was liberal in his own expenses. But nevertheless [illegible] his wealth increased more rapidly than he [illegible]

And there were certain friends of [illegible] who came to him and said: "You, Arkad, are fortunate than we. You have become the man in all Babylon while we struggle for [illegible] You can wear the finest garments and you eat the rarest foods, while we must be content to clothe our families in raiment that is [illegible] and feed them as best we can.

"Yet, once we were equal. We studied under the same master. We played in the same [illegible] neither the studies nor the games did [illegible] us. And in the years since, you have [illegible] an honorable citizen than we.

"Nor have you worked harder or [illegible] insofar as we can judge. Why, then, [illegible] fate single you out to enjoy all the [illegible] life and ignore us who are [illegible]

Thereupon Arkad remonstrated with [illegible] ing, "If you have not received [illegible] existence in the years since we were [illegible] because you either [illegible] govern the building [illegible] or else you did not [illegible] them."

"'Fickle Fate' is a vicious goddess who brings no permanent good to anyone. On the contrary, she brings ruin to almost every man upon whom she showers unearned gold. She makes wanton spenders, who soon dissipate all they receive and are left beset by overwhelming appetites and desires they have not the ability to gratify. Yet others whom she favors become misers and hoard their wealth, fearing to spend what they have, knowing they do not possess the ability to replace it. They further are beset by fear of robbers and doom themselves to lives of emptiness and secret misery.

"Others there probably are, who can take unearned gold and add to it and continue to be happy and contented citizens. But so few are they, I know of them but by hearsay. Think you of the men who have inherited sudden wealth, and see if these things are not so."

His friends admitted that of the men they knew who had inherited wealth these words were true, and they besought him to explain to them how he had become possessed of so much property, so he continued:

"In my youth I looked about me and saw all the good things there were to bring happiness and contentment. And I realized that wealth increased the potency of all these.

"Wealth is a power. With wealth many things are possible.

"One may ornament the home with the richest of furnishings.

"One may sail the distant seas.

"One may feast on the delicacies of far lands.

"One may buy the ornaments of the gold worker and the stone polisher.

"One may even build mighty temples for the Gods.

"One may do all these things and many others in which there is delight for the senses and gratification for the soul.

"And, when I realized all this, I declared to myself that I would claim my share of the good things of life. I would not be one of those who stand afar off, enviously watching others enjoy. I would not be content to clothe myself in the cheapest raiment that looked respectable. I would not be satisfied with the lot of a poor man. On the contrary, I would make myself a guest at this banquet of good things.

"Being, as you know, the son of a humble merchant, one of a large family with no hope of an inheritance, and not being endowed, as you have so frankly said, with superior powers or wisdom, I decided that if I was to achieve what I desired, time and study would be required.

"As for time, all men have it in abundance. You, each of you, have let slip by sufficient time to have made yourselves wealthy. Yet, you admit, you have nothing to show except your good families, of which you can be justly proud.

"As for study, did not our wise teacher teach us that learning was of two kinds: the one kind being the things we learned and knew, and the other being in the training that taught us how to find out what we did not know?

"Therefore, did I decide to find out how one might accumulate wealth, and when I had found out, to make this my task and do it well. For, is it not wise that we should enjoy the fruit of our labors while we dwell in the brightness of the sunshine? For when we depart for the world of spirit, it must all be left behind.

"I found employment as a scribe in the hall of records, and long hours each day I labored upon the clay tablets. Week after week, and month after month, I labored, yet for my earnings I had nought to show. Food and clothing and penance to the gods, and other things of which I could remember not what, absorbed all my earnings. But my determination did not leave me.

"And one day Algamish, the money lender, came to the house of the city master and ordered a copy of the Ninth Law, and he said to me, 'I must have this in two days, and if the task is done by that time, two coppers will I give to thee.'

"So I labored hard, but the law was long, and when Algamish returned the task was unfinished. He was angry, and had I been his slave he would have beaten me. But knowing the city master would not permit him to injure me, I was unafraid, so I said to him, 'Algamish, you are a very rich man. Tell me how I may also become rich, and all night I will carve upon the clay, and when the sun rises it shall be completed.'

"He smiled at me and replied, 'You are a forward knave, but we will call it a bargain.'

"All that night I carved, though my back pained and the smell of the wick made my head ache until my eyes could hardly see. But when he returned at sunup, the tablets were complete.

"'Now,' I said, 'tell me what you promised.'

"'You have fulfilled your part of our bargain, my son,' he said to me kindly, 'and I am ready to fulfill mine. I will tell you these things you wish to know because I am becoming an old man, and an old tongue loves to wag. And when youth comes to age for advice he receives the wisdom of years. But too often does youth think that age knows only the wisdom of days that are gone, and therefore profits not. But remember this, the sun that shines today is the sun that shone when thy father was born, and will still be shining when thy last grandchild shall pass into the darkness.

"'The thoughts of youth,' he continued, 'are bright lights that shine forth like the meteors that oft make brilliant the sky, but the wisdom of age is like the fixed stars that shine so unchanged that the sailor may depend upon them to steer his course.

"'Mark you well my words, for if you do not you will fail to grasp the truth that I will tell you, and you will think that your night's work has been in vain.'

"Then he looked at me shrewdly from under his shaggy brows and said in a low, forceful tone, 'I found the road to wealth when I decided that a part of all I earned was mine to keep. And so will you.'

"Then he continued to look at me with a glance that I could feel pierce me but said no more.

"'Is that all?' I asked.

"'That was sufficient to change the heart of a sheep herder into the heart of a money lender,' he replied.

"'But all I earn is mine to keep, is it not?' I demanded.

"'Far from it,' he replied. 'Do you not pay the garment-maker? Do you not pay the sandal-maker? Do you not pay for the things you eat? Can you live in Babylon without spending? What have you to show for your earnings of the past month? What for the past year? Fool! You pay to everyone but yourself. Dullard, you labor for others. As well be a slave and work for what your master gives you to eat and wear. If you did keep for yourself one-tenth of all you earn, how much would you have in ten years?'

"My knowledge of the numbers did not forsake me, and I answered, 'As much as I earn in one year.'

"'You speak but half the truth,' he retorted. 'Every gold piece you save is a slave to work for you. Every copper it earns is its child that also can earn for you. If you would become wealthy, then what you save must earn, and its children must earn, that all may help to give to you the abundance you crave.

"'You think I cheat you for your long night's work,' he continued, 'but I am paying you a thousand times over if you have the intelligence to grasp the truth I offer you.

"'A PART OF ALL YOU EARN IS YOURS TO KEEP. It should not be less than a tenth no matter how little you earn. It can be as much more as you can afford. Pay yourself first. Do not buy from the clothes-maker and the sandal-maker more than you can pay out of the rest and still have enough for food and charity and penance to the gods.

"'Wealth, like a tree, grows from a tiny seed. The first copper you save is the seed from which your tree of wealth shall grow. The sooner you plant that seed the sooner shall the tree grow. And the more faithfully you nourish and water that tree with consistent savings, the sooner may you bask in contentment beneath its shade.'

"So saying, he took his tablets and went away.

"I thought much about what he had said to me, and it seemed reasonable. So I decided that I would try it. Each time I was paid I took one from each ten pieces of copper and hid it away. And strange as it may seem, I was no shorter of funds than before. I noticed little difference as I managed to get along without it. But often I was tempted, as my hoard began to grow, to spend it for some of the good things the merchants displayed, brought by camels and ships from the land of the Phoenicians. But I wisely refrained.

"A twelfth month after Algamish had gone he again returned and said to me, 'Son, have you paid to yourself not less than one-tenth of all you have earned for the past year?'

"I answered proudly, 'Yes, master, I have.'

" 'That is good,' he answered, beaming upon me, 'and what have you done with it?'

" 'I have given it to Azmur, the brickmaker, who told me he was traveling over the far seas and in Tyre he would buy for me the rare jewels of the Phoenicians. When he returns we shall sell these at high prices and divide the earnings.'

" 'Every fool must learn,' he growled, 'but why trust the knowledge of a brickmaker about jewels? Would you go to the breadmaker to inquire about the stars? No, by my tunic, you would go to the astrologer, if you had power to think. Your savings are gone, youth; you have jerked your wealth tree up by the roots. But plant another. Try again. And next time if you would have advice about jewels, go to the jewel merchant. If you would know the truth about sheep, go to the herdsman. Advice is one thing that is freely given away, but watch that you take only what is worth having. He who takes advice about his savings from one who is inexperienced in such matters, shall pay with his savings for proving the falsity of their opinions.' Saying this, he went away.

"And it was as he said. For the Phoenicians are scoundrels and sold to Azmur worthless bits of glass that looked like gems. But as Algamish had bid me, I again saved each tenth copper, for I now had formed the habit and it was no longer difficult.

"Again, twelve months later, Algamish came to the room of the scribes and addressed me. 'What progress have you made since last I saw you?'

" 'I have paid myself faithfully,' I replied, 'and my savings I have entrusted to Agger the shield-maker, to buy bronze, and each fourth month he does pay me the rental.'

" 'That is good. And what do you do with the rental?'

" 'I do have a great feast with honey and fine wine and spiced cake. Also I have bought me a scarlet tunic. And some day I shall buy me a young ass upon which to ride.'

"To which Algamish laughed, 'You do eat the children of your savings. Then how do you expect them to work for you? And how can they have children that will also work for you? First get thee an army of golden slaves and then many a rich banquet may you enjoy without regret.' So saying he again went away.

"Nor did I again see him for two years, when he once more returned and his face was full of deep lines and his eyes drooped, for he was becoming a very old man. And he said to me, 'Arkad, hast thou yet achieved the wealth thou dreamed of?'

"And I answered, 'Not yet all that I desire, but some I have and it earns more, and its earnings earn more.'

" 'And do you still take the advice of the brick-makers?'

" 'About brickmaking they give good advice,' I retorted.

" 'Arkad,' he continued, 'you have learned your lessons well. You first learned to live upon less than you could earn. Next you learned to seek advice from those who were competent through their own experiences to give it. And, lastly, you have learned to make gold work for you.

" 'You have taught yourself how to acquire money, how to keep it, and how to use it. Therefore, you are competent for a responsible position. I am becoming an old man. My sons think only of spending and give no thought to earning. My interests are great and I fear too much for me to look after. Go to Nippur and look after my lands there. And as the value of my lands increases, so shall I increase the gold I pay you for your efforts.'

"So I went to Nippur and took charge of his holdings, which were large. And because I was full of ambition and because I had mastered the three laws of successfully handling wealth, I was enabled to increase greatly the value of his properties. So I prospered much, and when the spirit of Algamish departed for the sphere of darkness, I did continue to follow his precepts and so greatly increased my own holdings."

So spake Arkad, and when he had finished his tale, one of his friends said, "You were indeed fortunate that Algamish made of you the manager of his lands."

"Fortunate only in that I had the desire to prosper before I first met him. For four years did I not prove my definiteness of purpose by keeping one-tenth of all I earned? Would you call a fisherman lucky who for years so studied the habits of the fish that with each changing wind he could cast his nets about them? Opportunity is a haughty goddess who wastes no time with those who are unprepared."

"You had strong will power to keep on after you lost your first year's savings. You are unusual in that way," spoke up another.

"Will power!" retorted Arkad. "What nonsense! Do you think will power gives a man the strength to lift a burden the camel cannot carry, or to draw a load the oxen cannot budge? Will power is but the unflinching purpose to carry a task you set for yourself to fulfillment. If I set for myself a task, be it ever so trifling, I shall see it through. How else shall

I have confidence in myself to do important things? Should I say to myself, 'For a hundred days as I walk across the bridge into the city, I will pick from the road a pebble and cast it into the stream,' I would do it. If on the seventh day I passed by without remembering, I would not say to myself, 'Tomorrow I will cast two pebbles which will do as well.' Instead, I would retrace my steps and cast the pebble. Nor on the twentieth day would I say to myself, 'Arkad, this is useless. What does it avail you to cast a pebble every day? Throw in a handful and be done with it.' No, I would not say that nor do it. When I set a task for myself, I complete it. Therefore, I am careful not to start difficult and impractical tasks, because I love leisure."

And then another friend spoke up and said, "If what you tell is true, and it does seem as you have said, reasonable, then being so simple, if all men did it, there would not be enough wealth to go around."

"Wealth grows wherever men exert energy," Arkad replied. "If a rich man builds him a new palace, is the gold he pays out gone? No, the brickmaker has part of it and the laborer has part of it, and the artist has part of it. And everyone who labors upon the house has part of it. Yet when the palace is completed, is it not worth all it cost? And is the ground upon which it stands not worth more because it is there? And is the ground that adjoins it not worth more because it is there? Wealth grows in magic ways. No man can prophesy the limit of it. Have not the Phoenicians built great cities on barren coasts with the wealth that comes from their ships of commerce on the seas?"

"What then do you advise us to do that we also may become rich?" asked still another of his friends. "The years have passed and we are no longer young men and we have nothing put by."

"I advise that you take the wisdom of Algamish and say to yourselves, 'A part of all I earn is mine to keep.' Say it in the morning when you first arise. Say it at noon. Say it at night. Say it each hour of every day. Say it to yourself until the words stand out like letters of fire across the sky.

"Impress yourself with the idea. Fill yourself with the thought. Then take whatever portions seem wise. Let it be not less than one-tenth and lay it by. Arrange your other expenditures to do this if necessary. But lay by that portion first. Soon you will realize what a rich feeling it is to own a treasure upon which you alone have claim. As it grows it will stimulate you. A new joy of life will thrill you. Greater efforts will come to you to earn more. For of your increased earnings, will not the same percentage be also yours to keep?

"Then learn to make your treasure work for you. Make it your slave. Make its children and its children's children work for you.

"Insure an income for thy future. Look thou at the aged and forget not that in the days to come thou also will be numbered among them. Therefore invest thy treasure with greatest caution that it be not lost. Usurious rates of return are deceitful sirens that sing but to lure the unwary upon the rocks of loss and remorse.

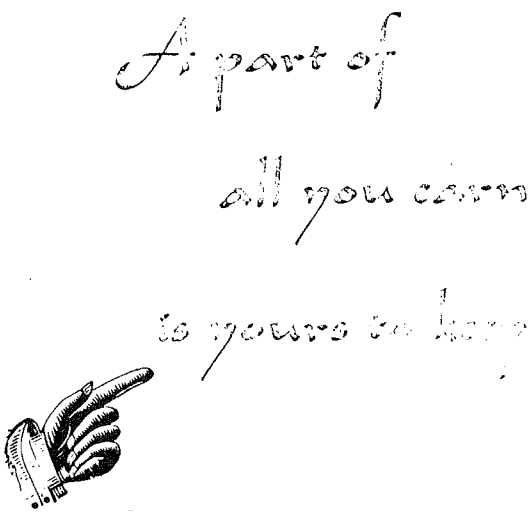
"Counsel with wise men. Seek the advice of men whose daily work is handling money. Let them save you from such an error as I myself made in entrusting my money to the judgment of Azmur, the brickmaker. A small return and a safe one is far more desirable than risk.

"Enjoy life while you are here. Do not overstrain or try to save too much. If one-tenth of all you earn is as much as you can comfortably keep, be content to keep this portion. Live otherwise according to your income and let not yourself get niggardly and afraid to spend. Life is good and life is rich with things worth-while and things to enjoy."

His friends thanked him and went away. Some were silent because they had no imagination and could not understand. Some were sarcastic because they thought that one so rich should divide with old friends not so fortunate. But some had in their eyes a new light. They realized that Algamish had come back each time to the room of the scribes because he was watching a man work his way out of darkness into light. When that man had found the light, a place awaited him. No one could fill that place until he had for himself worked out his own understanding, until he was ready for opportunity.

These latter were the ones, who, in the following years frequently revisited Arkad, who received them gladly. He counseled with them and gave them freely of his wisdom as men of broad experience are always glad to do. And he assisted them in so investing their savings that it would bring in a good interest with safety and would neither be lost nor entangled in investments that paid no dividends.

The turning point in these men's lives came upon that day when they realized the truth that had come from Algamish to Arkad and from Arkad to them.



WHERE THE OLD SNAKE RIVER FLOWS

I want to go out West again
Where the old Snake River flows.
Across the flats of Jackson Hole,
Where the gray green sage-brush grows.

I want to see the rapids
And the riffles flashing white,
I want to see the quiet pools
Where the big trout hide from sight.

I want to see the canyons deep
Through which the waters pour.
With lofty cliffs that tower above
And echo back the roar.

I want to taste the water
That is pure and sweet and dear
And roam within the forest
Where there are bear and moose and deer.

I want to see the foot-hills
Where 1,000 cattle graze,
With White Mountains in the distance
All shining in the haze.

I want to see the higher hills
And the herds of elk that pasture there,
I want to see the flowers and birds
That brighten a land-scape wondrous fair.

I want to see the Tetons
With the rushwater's head;
The quiet lakes below them
And the creeks by which they're fed.

I want to climb 'bove Timberline where clouds and mountains meet.
And away below, where the forests grow
Is the glimmer of lake or stream.

I want to see the fields of snow
That bolster the arid plains,
I want to see the meadows wide
And their fields of growing grain.

I want to sit in a camp at night
Within the flees cheerful glow.
I want to hear the coyotes mournful cry
And the horse bell ringing near and slow.

And when I hit that unblazed trail,
Across the Great Divide,
Grant that my resting place may be --
By Old Snake River's side.

The music of its waters there
Will soothe my last long sleep.
And towering cliffs above my bed
Their silent vigils keep.
